The Man of Bronze, 1935; The Land of Terror, 1935; Quest of the Spider, 1935; The Men Vanished, 1940; The All-White Elf, 1941; Birds of Death, 1941; Mystery Island, 1941; The Invisible Box, 1941; The Pink Lady, 1941; The Devil's Black Rock, 1942; The Fiery Menace, 1942; Men of Fear, 1942; The Three Wild Men, 1942; The Too-Wise Owl, 1942; The Goblins, 1943; The Running Skeletons, 1943; The Secret of the Su, 1943; Waves of Death, 1943; The Derelict of Skull Shoal, 1944; The Three Devils, 1944; Weird Valley, 1944; King Joe Cay, 1945; Rock Sinister, 1945; Strange Fish, 1945; The Terrible Stork, 1945; Terror Takes Seven, 1945; The Thing That Pursued, 1945; Trouble on Parade, 1945; The Wee Ones, 1945

1946-1950 • Colors for Murder, 1946; Death Is a Round Black Spot, 1946; The Devil Is Jones, 1946; The Exploding Lake, 1946; Five Fathoms Dead, 1946; Measures for a Coffin, 1946; Se-Pah-Poo, 1946; Terror and the Lonely Widow, 1946; Danger Lies East, 1947; Let's Kill Ames, 1947; The Monkey Suit, 1947; No Light to Die By, 1947; Once Over Lightly, 1947; I Died Yesterday, 1948; The Angry Canary, 1948; The Pure Evil, 1948; The Swooning Lady, 1948; Terror Wears No Shoes, 1948; The Green Master, 1949; Return from Cormorant, 1949; Up from Earth's Center, 1949

1951-1965 • Meteor Menace, 1964; The Thousand-Headed Man, 1964; Brand of the Werewolf, 1965; The Monsters, 1965; The Lost Oasis, 1965; The Mystic Mullah, 1965; The Polar Treasure, 1965; Quest of Qui, 1965

1966-1970 • The Fantastic Island, 1966; Fear Cay, 1966; Land of Always-Night, 1966; The Phantom City, 1966; Pirate of the Pacific, 1967; The Red Skull, 1967; The Sargasso Ogre, 1967; The Secret of the Sky, 1967; The Spook Legion, 1967; The Annihilist, 1968; The Czar of Fear, 1968; The Deadly Dwarf, 1968; Death in Silver, 1968; The Flaming Falcons, 1968; Fortress of Solitude, 1968; The Green Eagle, 1968; Hex, 1968; The Mystery Under the Sea, 1968; The Other World, 1968; The Dagger in the Sky, 1969; Dust of Death, 1969; The Gold Ogre, 1969; Mad Eyes, 1969; The Man Who Shook the Earth, 1969; Merchants of Disaster, 1969; Red Snow, 1969; Resurrection Day, 1969; The

Squeaking Goblin, 1969; The Terror in the Navy, 1969; World's Fair Goblin, 1969; Devil on the Moon, 1970; The Feathered Octopus, 1970; The Golden Peril, 1970; He Could Stop the World, 1970; The Mental Wizard, 1970; The Midas Man, 1970; The Sea Angel, 1970; The Sea Magician, 1970; The Vanisher, 1970

1971-1975 • The Giggling Ghosts, 1971; The Green Death, 1971; The Living Fire Menace, 1971; The Majii, 1971; The Motion Menace, 1971; The Munitions Master, 1971; The Pirate's Ghost, 1971; Poison Island, 1971; The Submarine Mystery, 1971; The Yellow Cloud, 1971; The Freckled Shark, 1972; Mad Mesa, 1972; The Mystery on the Snow, 1972; Spook Hole, 1972; The Derrick Devil, 1973; Land of Fear, 1973; The Mental Monster, 1973; The Seven Agate Devils, 1973; The Crimson Serpent, 1974; The Devil Genghis, 1974; The South Pole Terror, 1974; The King Maker, 1975

1976-1980 • The Boss of Terror, 1976; The Evil Gnome, 1976; The Mountain Monster, 1976; The Red Terrors, 1976; The Stone Man, 1976; The Angry Ghost, 1977; The Flying Goblin, 1977; The Magic Island, 1977; The Roar Devil, 1977; The Spotted Men, 1977; The Awful Egg, 1978; The Purple Dragon, 1978; The Hate Genius, 1979; Mystery on Happy Bones, 1979; The Red Spider, 1979; Tunnel Terror, 1979; Hell Below, The Lost Giant, 1980; Satan Black, Cargo Unknown, 1980

1981-1984 • Jiu San: The Black, Black Witch, 1981; The Pharaoh's Ghost, The Time of Terror, 1981; They Died Twice, The Screaming Man, 1981; The Whiskers of Hercules, The Man Who Was Scared, 1981; One-Eyed Mystic, The Man Who Fell Up, 1982; The Shape of Terror, Death Had Yellow Eyes, 1982; The Talking Devil, The Ten Ton Snake, 1982; Pirate Isle, The Speaking Stone, 1983; The Golden Man, Peril in the North, 1984; The Laugh of Death, The King of Terror, 1984

CHANCE MALLOY SERIES: Dead at the Take-Off, 1946 (also known as High Stakes); Lady to Kill, 1946

NONSERIES NOVELS: Lady Afraid, 1948; Lady So Silent, 1951; Cry at Dusk, 1952; Lady in Peril, 1959; Hades and Hocus Pocus, 1979

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

RADIO PLAYS: Scotland Yard, 1931; Doc Savage, 1934; The Incredible Radio Exploits of Doc Savage, 1983-1984

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cannaday, Marilyn. Bigger than Life: The Creator of Doc Savage. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1990. Scholarly study of Dent's life and his most famous creation, geared toward the nonscholarly reader.

Farmer, Philip Jose. Doc Savage: His Apocalyptic Life. Rev. ed. New York: Bantam, 1975. Lengthy treatise on Doc Savage that includes a biography of Dent and a bibliography of all Doc Savage's adventures.

Goulart, Ron. Cheap Thrills: An Informal History of the Pulp Magazines. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1972. The chapter "Doc Savage and His Circle" discusses the importance of Doc Savage to the success and evolution of pulp fiction.

Haining, Peter. The Classic Era of American Pulp Magazines. Chicago: Chicago Review Press, 2000. Looks at Dent's contribution to the pulps and the relationship of pulp fiction to its more respectable literary cousins.

Hutchison, Don. The Great Pulp Heroes. Buffalo, N.Y.: Mosaic Press, 1996. Doc Savage is compared with his equally famous codenizens of the pulps: the Shadow, Tarzan, Zorro, and so on.

McCarey-Laird, M. Martin. Lester Dent: The Man, His Craft, and His Market. West Des Moines, Iowa: Hidalgo, 1994. Biography that looks at the life and works of this man, focusing on his writing.

Widen, Larry, and Chris Miracle. Doc Savage, Arch Enemy of Evil: A Pictorial Reference to the Man of Bronze. Milwaukee, Wis.: Fantasticon Press, 1993. A bibliography of Doc Savage works.

AUGUST DERLETH

Born: Sauk City, Wisconsin; February 24, 1909

Died: Sauk City, Wisconsin; July 4, 1971

Also wrote as Romily Devon; Will Garth; Stephen Grendon; Eldon Heath; Kenyon Holmes; Tally Mason; Michael West; Simon West

Types of plot: Private investigator; amateur sleuth; horror

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Judge Peck, 1934-1953

Solar Pons, 1945-1973

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

JUDGE EPHRAIM PEABODY PECK, a longtime resident of Sac Prairie, now retired from legal practice, acts as an amateur sleuth assisting the police in their investigations. Something of an anachronism with his frock coat, wide-brimmed hat, and umbrella, he solves the riddle behind difficult murders through keen observation, deduction, and an understanding of human nature.

SOLAR PONS, a private investigator in the mold of Sherlock Holmes, has his practice at 7B Praed Street, London. His dress and appearance—"a tall, thin gentleman wearing an Inverness cape and a rakish cap with a visor on it"—parallel those of "the Master," as do his deductions en route to solving crimes.

DR. LYNDON PARKER, a "stolid, middle-class, rather unimaginative Englishman," is Solar Pons's faithful companion and observer and recorder of his adventures, much as Dr. Watson was for Sherlock Holmes.

CONTRIBUTION

August Derleth's contributions fall into the areas of detective fiction and horror. Although he is considered a minor American author, his writings are diverse and voluminous—and include poetry, regional history, and science fiction as well as mystery and detective fiction. His major contribution to detective fiction is his series of Sherlock Homes pastiches (the Solar Pons series), which kept alive the spirit and style of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's work after Doyle had ceased writing new adventures. Derleth also created the Judge Peck series of murder mysteries, complete with clues for the reader to solve the crime; all the Peck works are set in the Sauk City region of Wisconsin, which Derleth knew so well. In the related genre of horror fiction, Derleth, as editor and publisher, is credited with preserving and bringing to the reading public the macabre tales of the important American writer H. P. Lovecraft.

BIOGRAPHY

August William Derleth was born in Sauk City, Wisconsin, on February 24, 1909. As a child he went to St. Aloysius School and Sauk City High School, after which he attended the University of Wisconsin at Madison, where he received his bachelor's degree in 1930. Derleth sold his first story, "Bat's Belfry," when he was fifteen, and his interest in horror stories continued throughout his life. Some of his tales, such as those collected in The Mask of Cthulhu (1958), are written on themes reminiscent of Lovecraft, whose work Derleth greatly admired.

As a boy, Derleth read and enjoyed the Sherlock Holmes stories. When he was nineteen, he wrote to Doyle, asking if he would write any more adventures. When the reply contained no promise to do so, Derleth decided to continue the tradition himself. Thus, in 1928 while still at the university, he wrote "The Adventure of the Black Narcissus," using Solar Pons and Dr. Lyndon Parker as his main characters, clearly modeled on Holmes and Dr. Watson. The story appeared in The Dragnet magazine in February, 1929. With this success, Derleth quickly wrote new adventures, including "The Adventure of the Missing Tenants," "The Adventure of the Late Mr. Favershaw," and "The Adventure of the Limping Man." He wrote quickly, once composing three Solar Pons stories in one day, one of which was the much-praised story "The Adventure of the Norcross Riddle."

Derleth worked as an editor for Fawcett Publications in Minneapolis in 1930-1931 and was a lecturer in American regional literature at the University of Wisconsin from 1939 to 1943. As owner and co-founder of Arkham House Publishers in Sauk City from 1939 to 1971, he made some of his greatest contributions, including the preservation of Lovecraft's fiction in book form after the original collections went out of print in the late 1940's and 1950's. In 1953 Derleth married Sandra Winters; they had one daughter and one son. They were divorced in 1959.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

August Derleth. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Derleth wrote more than one hundred books during his life and edited dozens of others. Among the honors he received are a Guggenheim Fellowship in 1938, the Scholastic Award in 1958, the Midland Authors Award (for poetry) in 1965, and the Ann Radcliffe Award in 1967. He died on July 4, 1971.

ANALYSIS

Solar Pons, August Derleth's major mystery series character, had his first adventure, "The Adventure of the Black Narcissus," in 1928, when the author was nineteen years old and a junior at the University of Wisconsin. Because Doyle had written to him that he was not going to write more Sherlock Holmes adventures, Derleth was determined to carry on the tradition. He believed, however, that he could not use the Holmes character directly; instead, the form of the stories had to be, in Derleth's own words, "not that ridiculing imitation designed for laughter, the parody, but that fond and admiring one less widely-known as the pastiche." The name Solar Pons, meaning "bridge of light," was an adolescent creation with the same syllables as Sherlock Holmes, and the 7B Praed Street address was chosen after consulting necessary guidebooks, since his own knowledge of London was limited. (No other setting seemed appropriate.)

FELL PURPOSE AND NO FUTURE FOR LUANA

Although Derleth sold his first story, the stock-market crash of 1929 prevented others written at the same time from being published in The Dragnet. As a result, Solar Pons was set aside, and Judge Ephraim Peabody Peck became the focus of Derleth's first series of detective stories. The ten books of this series take place in Derleth's hometown, which he names Sac Prairie. Yet the works themselves were written hastily and lack the polish of his later Solar Pons stories. They seem to cover a period in which Derleth was developing his craft. Easy to read and conversational in tone, they bear the hallmarks of popular literature. As such, the conversations often contain turns of phrase that seem outmoded, and that at the same time capture the local color of Sac Prairie speech: for example, from Fell Purpose (1953), "he'd never have gumption enough to go out and sock somebody on the jaw," "he's a good egg," "hot-tempered as the devil," and "you're falling just off bounds of charging me with murder." Sentences are composed of short phrases, and descriptions show a straightforward line of reasoning. The narrator, Judge Peck's young secretary, reports the scene of the crime for the reader in No Future for Luana (1945), illustrating this style of writing:

Judging by appearances, such as they were, someone had entered the dressingroom, slugged her, and then, taking no chances, had held her mouth and head and pushed the thorn into her eye. It was not a nice way to die. . . . The make-up table showed that she had just about completed her make-up, which meant that she must have been murdered just shortly before she was discovered. Eyelashes had been attached, dark color for under eyes had been used and set aside, the lipstick was still open, showing that she had probably put it down not long before her assailant entered the dressing-room; the disorder before the mirror was due solely to her having fallen forward among the boxes of cosmetics and other paraphernalia of the theatre.

Only such detail as is pertinent to solving the crime is included, as though the reader were following the actual logical processes in the mind of the narrator.

Judge Peck himself is less open to scrutiny. He smokes his cigar and observes closely as the police proceed with their investigations. Outwardly Peck seems like an absentminded old man, but, as his companion notes, "that large, square-jawed face and the strange, opaque eyes resembled nothing so much as a calculating machine when his mind was agile." His method involves careful, detached observation, followed by "cerebration": "He took the whole puzzle, divided it into subproblems, and began to ratiocinate." The reader is shown the same evidence the judge and his secretary see, as well as an explanation at the end when the riddle is solved. Judge Peck's character, although quickly drawn, is quite evidently in the mold of the rational "sleuth only by courtesy" whose talent for solving the riddle of difficult crimes comes from being a "student of what human nature Sac Prairie afforded."

"IN RE, SHERLOCK HOLMES"

Derleth maintains in A Praed Street Dossier (1968) that Solar Pons "had always had more reality" in his thoughts than Judge Peck, in spite of the fact that London was a much less familiar milieu to him than Wisconsin. When, in 1944, Derleth had the opportunity to consider publishing a group of Solar Pons stories as a book, the earlier stories seemed "very amateurish" to the author; so he revised them and wrote new ones that he finally published himself in 1945 as "In Re, Sherlock Holmes": The Adventures of Solar Pons. Included in this collection are three of his best stories: "The Adventure of the Late Mr. Favershaw," "The Adventure of the Purloined Periapt," and "The Adventure of the Norcross Riddle."

Derleth admitted to composing the Solar Pons stories around titles, with the title as a challenge to bring the full story into existence. The revised and newly composed stories are clearly better fiction than the earlier Judge Peck series. Here Derleth borrows motifs and characters from the Sherlock Holmes series and makes them his own.

Solar Pons is an investigator in the Holmes tradition set perhaps two decades later; the character Pons was born circa 1880 in Prague and was involved in cases dating from 1919 through the 1930's. The parallels between Pons and Holmes are intentional, involving episodes such as the first meeting between Pons and Dr. Parker, easily recognizable expressions, and the stable of characters, including a long-suffering landlady, Mrs. Johnson, and an archenemy, Baron Ennesfred Kroll. Dr. Parker records the adventures of his companion as an observer in the manner of Watson, including his often-reported confusion with the methods used to uncover puzzling crimes.

A PRAED STREET DOSSIER

Yet it is the "Sherlock Homes of Praed Street" who is the focus of the reader's attention. In A Praed Street Dossier, Derleth delineates Pons's curriculum vitae, including his parents ("Asenath Pons, consular official at Prague, and Roberta McIvor Pons") and a younger brother "of Bancroft Stoneham, in His Majesty's Service." He has a public school education and was graduated from Oxford summa cum laude in 1899. He is unmarried, served in British Intelligence during both world wars, and wrote various monographs relating to chess, logic, evidence, and "the inductive process." Derleth adds his own interest in tales of the macabre by having Pons also write "An Examination of the Cthulhu Cult and Others." Beyond that, a physical description given by Dr. Parker includes the familiar cape and hat as well as features with clear Holmesian resonance: "the thin, almost feral face; the sharp, keen dark eyes with their heavy, but not bushy brows; the thin lips and the leanness of the face in general."

The fascination with the Holmes character is the result of the combination of the rational and irrational that produces a hero surrounded by mystery and appeal. His ability in deduction allows him to solve seemingly impossible crimes, and in this he is a genius serving the forces of order in Victorian society. Yet for all of his knowledge of the sciences and rational thought, Holmes is egocentric, misanthropic, remote, and aloof. Acting against the established order in his private life, he drugs himself with cocaine to relieve the boredom between cases. The strength of his appeal lies in the dual aspects of his personality.

With regard to the dark side of his personality, Solar Pons is less interesting. Much of what Holmes is, Pons is also, although the most objectionable trait from the point of view of society has been removed—Pons does not use cocaine but rather his vice is smoking "the most abominable shag ever prepared by the hand of man." He has personal traits that recall the Master: He pulls at his earlobe and closes his eyes when in deep thought, his eyes are keen and alive, and he lounges in well-worn dressing gowns. He is also a master of disguise. (One of his best is the egocentric, rude Baron Egon Von Ruber in "The Adventure of the Orient Express.")

It is in the manner of his deductive reasoning that Pons is eminently Holmesian. The beginning of "The Adventure of the Norcross Riddle" yields an excellent example in which Pons examines a calling card and concludes that its owner is an American by birth who has resided a long time in Great Britain, a "man of independent means," between thirty-five and thirty-nine, of southern United States ancestry whose parents were Republicans. In "From the Notebooks of Dr. Lyndon Parker," Pons's thoughts on probability are reported. According to him, the correct solution can be found by examining all possible solutions to find the one "that will exactly fit all the facts." Pons works logically, observing the facts to make sure nothing is overlooked. His deduction is a process of elimination: If none of the probable solutions fits all the facts, then, he concludes, "whatever remains, no matter how improbable, must be the correct solution" (a strictly Holmesian pronouncement). All the Solar Pons tales are built around that hypothesis, involving a situation where the improbable is shown to be the correct solution.

The main focus of Pons's activities is to solve the problem, normally leaving the question of justice and punishment to the authorities. Both he and Holmes, however, are students of human nature, which often helps them to decide how to act on information they uncover. In "The Adventure of the Bookseller's Clerk,” purchasers of forged signed copies of books are not told of the deception, since that would make them unhappy without good reason. Although Parker is not convinced, Pons himself appreciates the ambiguity of life’s circumstances and remarks that, although people would like a simpler world “composed of black and white or right and wrong,” such a world would also be “inferentially dull.” The challenge of the puzzle is at the center of his character.

Viewed as a whole, Derleth’s two detective-style series fit the genre of mystery and detective fiction without any question. His horror stories fit more easily into science fiction (Harrigan’s File, 1975) or macabre tales (Dwellers in Darkness, 1976, for example). Yet many of these tales can be read as mysteries in the broadest sense. They delve into the irrational, which fascinated Derleth. Many of the stories present a mystery that the individual is trying to unravel, as does Dwellers in Darkness, where the suggested solution lies in the supernatural, and The Mask of Cthulhu, in which people disappear, leaving their clothes behind “in the horrible, life-like position of a man sitting there.” Sometimes people are transformed after contact with mythological creatures from the world of Lovecraft. These stories form an interesting contrast to the Solar Pons series, in which the rational faculty clearly dominates, revealing strictly logical explanations for seemingly irrational occurrences.

Derleth’s main body of mystery and detective work, the Solar Pons series, was clearly undertaken as an imitation. It has been noted that its intention was never to deceive, only to please, and specifically to recall for Holmes fans the wonderful adventures of Baker Street. For this alone, Derleth merits a place among American writers of this genre. His greatest contribution, however, seems to be in knowing excellence in the works of writers such as Doyle and Lovecraft and striving to preserve them for the public, both in his own writing following their models and in his activities as publisher and editor.

Susan L. Piepke

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

JUDGE PECK SERIES: Murder Stalks the Wakely Family, 1934 (also known as Death Stalks the Wakely Family); The Man on All Fours, 1934; Sign of Fear, 1935; Three Who Died, 1935; Sentence Deferred, 1939; The Narracong Riddle, 1940; The Seven Who Waited, 1943; Mischief in the Lane, 1944; No Future for Luana, 1945; Fell Purpose, 1953

SOLAR PONS SERIES: “In Re, Sherlock Holmes”: The Adventures of Solar Pons, 1945 (also known as The Adventures of Solar Pons, 1975); The Memoirs of Solar Pons, 1951; Three Problems for Solar Pons, 1952; The Return of Solar Pons, 1958; The Reminiscences of Solar Pons, 1961; Praed Street Papers, 1965; The Adventure of the Orient Express, 1965; The Casebook of Solar Pons, 1965; A Praed Street Dossier, 1968; Mr. Fairlie’s Final Journey, 1968; The Adventure of the Unique Dickensians, 1968; The Chronicles of Solar Pons, 1973; The Final Adventures of Solar Pons, 1998

NONSERIES NOVEL: Death by Design, 1953

OTHER SHORT FICTION: Consider Your Verdict: Ten Coroner’s Cases for You to Solve, 1937 (as Mason)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Still Is the Summer Night, 1937; Wind over Wisconsin, 1938; Restless Is the River, 1939; Bright Journey, 1940; Evening in Spring, 1941; Sweet Genevieve, 1942; Shadow of Night, 1943; The Lurker at the Threshold, 1945 (with H. P. Lovecraft); The Shield of the Valiant, 1945; The House on the Mound, 1958; The Hills Stand Watch, 1960; The Trail of Cthulhu, 1962; The Shadow in the Glass, 1963; The Wind Leans West, 1969; The Wind in the Cedars, 1997

SHORT FICTION: Place of Hawks, 1935; Any Day Now, 1938; Country Growth, 1940; Someone in the Dark, 1941; Something Near, 1945; Not Long for This World, 1948; Sac Prairie People, 1948; The House of Moonlight, 1953; The Survivor and Others, 1957 (with H. P. Lovecraft); The Mask of Cthulhu, 1958; Wisconsin in Their Bones, 1961; Lonesome Places, 1962; Mr. George and Other Odd Persons, 1963 (also known as When Graveyards Yawn); Colonel Markesan and Less Pleasant People, 1966 (with Mark Schorer); The Shadow out of Time, and Other Tales of Horror, 1968 (with H. P. Lovecraft); A House Above Cuzco, 1969; The Watchers out of Time and Others,

1974 (with H. P. Lovecraft); Harrigan's File, 1975; Dwellers in Darkness, 1976; Aunt May Strikes Again!, 1996; Shane's Girls, 1997; The Quest for Cihulhu, 2000

POETRY: 1933-1950 • To Remember, 1933; Hawk on the Wind, 1938; Elegy: On a Flake of Snow, 1939; Man Track Here, 1939; Here on a Darkling Plain, 1940; Wind in the Elms, 1941; Rind of Earth, 1942; And You, Thoreau!, 1944; Selected Poems, 1944; The Edge of Night, 1945; Habitant of Dusk: A Garland for Cassandra, 1946

1951-1960 • Rendezvous in a Landscape, 1952; Psyche, 1953; Country Poems, 1956; Elegy: On the Umbral Moon, 1957; West of Morning, 1960

1961-1997 • This Wound, 1962; Country Places, 1965; The Only Place We Live, 1966; By Owl Light, 1967; Collected Poems, 1937-1967, 1967; Caitlin, 1969; The Landscape of the Heart, 1970; Last Light, 1971; Love Letters to Caitlin, 1971; In a Quiet Graveyard, 1997

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: 1945-1960 • Oliver; the Wayward Owl, 1945; A Boy's Way: Poems, 1947; It's a Boy's World: Poems, 1948; The Captive Island, 1952; The Country of the Hawk, 1952; Empire of Fur: Trading in the Lake Superior Region, 1953; Land of Gray Gold: Lead Mining in Wisconsin, 1954; Father Marquette and the Great Rivers, 1955; Land of Sky-Blue Waters, 1955; St. Ignatius and the Company of Jesus, 1956; Columbus and the New World, 1957; The Moon Tenders, 1958; The Mill Creek Irregulars, 1959; Wilbur, the Trusting Whippoorwill, 1959; The Pinkertons Ride Again, 1960

1961-1970 • The Ghost of Black Hawk Island, 1961; Sweet Land of Michigan, 1962; The Tent Show Summer, 1963; Forest Orphans, 1964 (also known as Mr. Conservation, 1971); The Irregulars Strike Again, 1964; The House by the River, 1965; The Watcher on the Heights, 1966; Wisconsin, 1967; The Beast in Holger's Woods, 1968; The Prince Goes West, 1968; The Three Straw Men, 1970

NONFICTION: 1931-1950 • The Heritage of Sauk City, 1931; Atmosphere of Houses, 1939; Still Small Voice: The Biography of Zona Gale, 1940; Village Year: A Sac Prairie Journal, 1941; Wisconsin Regional Literature, 1941 (revised 1942); The Wiscon-

sin: River of a Thousand Isles, 1942; H. P. L.: A Memoir, 1945; Writing Fiction, 1946; Village Daybook: A Sac Prairie Journal, 1947; Sauk County: A Centennial History, 1948; The Milwaukee Road: Its First Hundred Years, 1948; Wisconsin Earth: A Sac Prairie Sampler, 1948

1951-1996 • Arkham House: The First Twenty Years: 1939-1959, 1959; Some Notes on H. P. Lovecraft, 1959; Walden West, 1961; Concord Rebel: A Life of Henry D. Thoreau, 1962; Countryman's Journal, 1963; Three Literary Men: A Memoir of Sinclair Lewis, Sherwood Anderson, Edgar Lee Masters, 1963; Wisconsin Country: A Sac Prairie Journal, 1965; Vincennes: Portal to the West, 1968; Walden Pond: Homage to Thoreau, 1968; Wisconsin Murders, 1968; The Wisconsin Valley, 1969; Emerson, Our Contemporary, 1970; Return to Walden West, 1970; Thirty Years of Arkham House: A History and a Bibliography, 1939-1969, 1970; Country Matters, 1996

EDITED TEXTS: 1937-1950 • Poetry out of Wisconsin, 1937; The Outsider and Others, 1939 (by H. P. Lovecraft); Beyond the Wall of Sleep, 1943 (by Lovecraft); Marginalia, 1944 (by Lovecraft); Sleep No More: Twenty Masterpieces of Horror for the Connoisseur, 1944; Supernatural Horror in Literature, 1945 (by Lovecraft); The Best Supernatural Stories of H. P. Lovecraft, 1945 (by Lovecraft); Who Knocks? Twenty Masterpieces of the Spectral for the Connoisseur, 1946; Dark of the Moon: Poems of Fantasy and the Macabre, 1947; The Night Side: Masterpieces of the Strange and Terrible, 1947; The Sleeping and the Dead, 1947; Strange Ports of Call: Twenty Masterpieces of Science Fiction, 1948; The Other Side of the Moon, 1949; Beyond Time and Space: A Compendium of Science Fiction Through the Ages, 1950

1951-1960 • The Haunter of the Dark, and Other Tales of Horror, 1951 (by H. P. Lovecraft); Far Boundaries: Twenty Science-Fiction Stories, 1951; The Outer Reaches: Favorite Science-Fiction Tales Chosen by Their Authors, 1951; Beachheads in Space: Stories on a Theme in Science-Fiction, 1952; Night's Yawning Peal: A Ghostly Company, 1952; Worlds of Tomorrow: Science Fiction with a Difference, 1953; Portals of Tomorrow: The Best of Science

Fiction and Other Fantasy, 1954; Time to Come: Science Fiction Stories of Tomorrow, 1954; The Survivor and Others, 1957 (by Lovecraft); The Shattered Room, and Other Pieces, 1959 (by Lovecraft); Collected Poems, 1960 (by Lovecraft)

1961-1997 • Fire and Sleet and Candlelight: New Poems of the Macabre, 1961; Dreams and Fancies, 1962 (by Lovecraft); Dark Mind, Dark Heart, 1962; When Evil Wakes: A New Anthology of the Macabre, 1963; Autobiography: Some Notes on a Nonentity, 1963 (by Lovecraft); The Dunwich Horror, and Others: The Best Supernatural Stories of H. P. Lovecraft, 1963 (by Lovecraft); Over the Edge, 1964; At the Mountains of Madness, and Other Novels, 1964 (by Lovecraft); Dagon, and Other Macabre Tales, 1965 (by Lovecraft); H. P. Lovecraft Selected Letters 1911-1924, 1965 (by Lovecraft); Wisconsin Harvest, 1966; The Dark Brotherhood, and Other Pieces, 1966 (by Lovecraft); Travellers by Night, 1967; H. P. Lovecraft Selected Letters 1925-1929, 1968 (by Lovecraft); The Shadow out of Time, and Other Tales of Horror, 1968 (by Lovecraft); Tales of the Cthulhu Mythos, 1969 (by Lovecraft); The Tomb, and Other Tales, 1969 (by Lovecraft); New Poetry out of Wisconsin, 1969; The Horror in the Museum, and Other Revisions, 1970 (by Lovecraft); H. P. Lovecraft Selected Letters, 1929-1931, 1971 (by Lovecraft); Something About Cats, and Other Pieces, 1971 (by Lovecraft); Dark Things, 1971; The Angler's Companion, 1997

MISCELLANEOUS: Wisconsin Earth: A Sac Prairie Sampler, 1948; Buster Brown, 1974 (with Richard Felton Outcault); The Katzenjammer Kids, 1974 (with Rudolph Dirks); The Only Place We Live, 1976

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Grant, Kenneth B. "August (William) Derleth." In The Authors. Vol. 1 in Dictionary of Midwestern Literature. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2001. A brief biographical and critical overview.
- Grobe Litersky, Dorothy M. Derleth: Hawk . . . and Dove. Aurora, Colo.: National Writers Press, 1997. The first major, book-length, comprehensive critical study of Derleth's life and works.
- Haining, Peter. The Classic Era of American Pulp Magazines. Chicago: Chicago Review Press, 2000. Looks at Derleth's contribution to the pulps and the relationship of pulp fiction to its more respectable literary cousins.
- Liebow, Ely M., ed. August Harvest. New York: Magico Magazine, 1994. Essays dealing with Derleth's work in all genres.
- Muckian, Michael, and Dan Benson. "One of the State's Great Writers Is Nearly Forgotten." Milwaukee Journal Sentinel Magazine, August 13, 1995, p. 8. A biographical sketch, accompanied by an account of efforts by Derleth's children and admirers to reissue his work and create new interest in him; also includes an interview with Derleth's son, who talks about his father's death wish in the last years of his life.
- Schultz, David E., and Scott Connors, eds. Selected Letters of Clark Ashton Smith. Sauk City, Wis.: Arkham House, 2003. August Derleth is among the most prolific correspondents in this collection of Smith's letters, and this is an excellent source for an informal glimpse of the author in his own words.
- Stephens, Jim. Introduction to An August Derleth Reader. Madison, Wis.: Prairie Oak Press, 1992. A solid biographical and critical overview of Derleth and his works.
- Wilson, Alison W. August Derleth: A Bibliography. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1983. The best full-length source available for information on the life and works of August Derleth. The book begins with a preface, an introduction, and a chronology, including interesting details on his activities and literary reputation. Lists and explains briefly all of his works, divided into "Fantasy World" and "Sac Prairie and the Real World." Contains a helpful index by title.
- Zell, Fran. "August Derleth's Gus Elker Stories in One Volume." Milwaukee Journal Sentinel Cue, November 10, 1996, p. 13. A review of Country Matters, arguing that the Gus Elker stories are formulaic and predictable but that they have preserved a bucolic world and way of life prior to television.

WILLIAM DEVERELL

Born: Regina, Saskatchewan, Canada; March 4, 1937

Also wrote as William H. Deverell

Type of plot: Courtroom drama

CONTRIBUTION

William Deverell's chief contribution to the genre of mystery and detective fiction has been the legal crime novel, with its emphasis on lawyers and courtrooms, criminals and police, the manifold activities that bring these forces together, and the often strange results of their dramatic encounters.

Deverell's novels, like those of his American contemporaries Scott Turow and John Grisham, reflect the public fascination with criminal law and fictional depictions of legal proceedings that have the ring of authenticity. The appeal of legal crime fiction intensified tremendously in the aftermath of the televising of the O. J. Simpson criminal trial in the United States in 1995.

Most of Deverell's fiction is set along the west coast of Canada, around Vancouver, a part of the country often associated with flamboyance, eccentricity, radicals, and excess. Deverell's stories are filled with eccentric characters, colorful dialogue, and strange and surprising twists and turns. They are also enriched by references to classical literature and by Deverell's deep concern for environmental issues.

Deverell's novels are often based on actual legal cases and incidents. A practicing lawyer for many years, Deverell was involved in hundreds of cases. For his novels, he conducted extensive research to ensure accuracy. His work has enjoyed enormous popularity in Canada and worldwide. In terms of quality and impact, Deverell's fiction bears comparison with the best in the field, including that of Turow and Grisham.

BIOGRAPHY

William Herbert Deverell was born in Regina, Saskatchewan, on March 4, 1937. He worked for several years as a newspaper reporter and graduated from the University of Saskatchewan with his law degree in 1963. Deverell practiced law for fifteen years, acting primarily as a defense lawyer in hundreds of cases, including murder trials. During that time he also represented some minor and major figures in the drug trade, and this experience is particularly evident in his novels.

After tiring of his work as a criminal lawyer, Deverell began writing fiction in the late 1970's. He struggled with his first novel for several months but finally found his voice, and Needles was published in 1979. It was an immediate commercial and critical success. Needles won the fifty-thousand-dollar Seal First Novel Award in 1979 and the Book of the Year Award in 1981.

The financial and critical success of the novel consolidated Deverell's career move. He began publishing novels regularly, about one every other year, and went from success to success. In the early 1990's Deverell and his wife, Tekla, built a small cottage on Pender Island, off the coast of Vancouver, that served as a place for him to write. They also built a winter home in Costa Rica. The exotic locations and inhabitants of both Pender Island and Costa Rica have figured in Deverell's later work, particularly in his preoccupation with the fragility and beauty of nature, and the deprivations wrought by urbanization.

In the mid-1980's Deverell wrote a screenplay that became the basis of one of Canada's most successful television series, Street Legal, which ran from 1986 to 1994. Deverell also wrote the screenplay for the film Mindfield, based on his novel of the same name, published in 1989. Fatal Cruise: The Trial of Robert Frisbee (1991) is Deverell's nonfictional account of his defense of a man accused of killing his employer.

From 1991 to 1992, Deverell was visiting professor in the creative writing department at the University of Victoria, British Columbia. In 1994 and again in 1999 he was the chair of the Writers' Union of Canada. His fiction continued to win major awards, including the Dashiell Hammett Prize for literary excellence in crime writing in North America for Trial of Passion (1997) and the 2006 Arthur Ellis Award for crime writing for April Fool (2005). The Arthur Ellis Award recognizes the best works in Canadian crime fiction and scholarship.

Deverell's favorite author is the novelist John Updike. He shares with Updike a fascination with the mystery and complexity of apparently ordinary people and events, as well as a reverence for the natural world and a prose that is rich, evocative, and precise.

ANALYSIS

Most of William Deverell's fiction is grounded in fact and contemporary events. For example, Needles begins with a reference to a major report to the government of Canada on the illegal drug trade, published in the early 1970's. High Crimes (1981) draws on his experience as a defense attorney in a famous drug smuggling case. Trial of Passion is loosely based on a sensational sexual harassment case at a university in British Columbia. Mindfield draws on the United States government's clandestine experiments with LSD (lysergic acid diethylamide) in Canada in the 1950's.

The pervading sense of authenticity and realism conveyed by Deverell's novels is strengthened by his incorporation of "evidence" into his narratives: excerpts from court testimony, police and private detective reports, psychological assessments, wiretaps, and the like. All of this tends to convey a sense of direct, unfiltered contact with primary material. The reader often seems positioned as a juror, weighing and assessing testimony and evidence throughout the story.

Despite the aura of realism, Deverell is also a compulsively self-reflexive writer, often engaging in subtle and humorous postmodern touches. In Kill All the Lawyers (1994), for example, one of the main characters is writing a crime novel following the instructions in a how-to book entitled The Art of the Whodunit. His "fictional" plot strangely anticipates some important developments in the "real" story. The character also relaxes by discussing classic murder mystery fiction with the local police detective, who solves the mystery of the "real" story by methods gleaned from his reading of such writers as Arthur Conan Doyle and Agatha Christie.

Deverell often focuses intensely on the inherent drama of the courtroom duel between the prosecution and the defense. His work is enhanced by and reflects his knowledge of police procedure; forensic science; the interaction of local, provincial, national, and international police forces; and justice as affected by notoriety, power, and money.

Despite the humor and exuberance that mark Deverell's characters, plot, and dialogue, there is throughout his work a sense of the importance and pervasiveness of legal concepts and structures in people's lives. As one of his characters says, "The law. The law! I'm trapped in the bloody clutches of the law. Presumption of innocence, reasonable doubt, grand precepts, aren't they?" Deverell would emphatically say that they are but that they are enacted by flawed and fallible human beings. This volatile mix is what makes his depiction of crime and punishment so readable and relevant.

NEEDLES

Set in Vancouver, Needles explores the underworld links between Asian suppliers of heroin and the vast, voracious North American market for their product. Dr. Au, "the Surgeon," a Chinese national and Canadian land-owning immigrant, is the local Asian syndicate leader charged with responsibility for the Canadian end of the drug trade. The story opens with a shocking scene of vivisection, as Dr. Au slowly and methodically tortures and then kills one of his underlings who has been uncovered as a police informant.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) and the local authorities have been keeping Dr. Au and his operation under surveillance for some time and eventually arrest him for the murder. A twist in the plot is that the RCMP officer who recruited the murdered informer is also on the payroll of Dr. Au, and he plays both sides of the law. At this point, the story's protagonist enters—Forster Cobb, a former government prosecutor who is pressured to take the lead in the prosecution of Dr. Au. Cobb is reluctant partly because he has relapsed into drug use because of professional and domestic stress. Eventually he agrees to take the case.

From this point, the novel details the complex preparations by the prosecution and the defense for the trial of Dr. Au, including strategic delays and pretrial motions. Deverell includes the police activity in court and behind the scenes, including wiretaps, the disposition of evidence, and the protection and preparation of witnesses.

All of this is interwoven with the complex personal lives of the major figures, culminating in some surprising and profoundly human revelations about characters on both sides of the law, including the macabre and sexually deviant Dr. Au. However, the heart of the story is the ebb and flow of the trial itself with all of the legal and sometimes illegal maneuvering that money and power can buy.

HIGH CRIMES

Where Needles focuses primarily on the trial and the activities that accompany it, High Crimes is at times a caper, a legal thriller, and a police procedural. With a few brief snapshots at the beginning, Deverell outlines the main elements of his story. A rich, corrupt Colombian politician has a huge crop of exceptionally high-grade marijuana that he wants transported to the United States. Rudy Meyers, an American businessman involved in a variety of intrigues, offers his services as a middleman. Meanwhile, Central Intelligence Agency personnel are monitoring suspicious activity among the Colombian drug lords. Members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are doing likewise. In Newfoundland, home to generations of daring sailors and fishermen, Captain Peter Kerrivan is about to beat a major drug smuggling charge on a technicality.

For several years, Kerrivan had been pursued by Inspector Mitchell of the RCMP, Canada's chief narcotics officer, in a joint Canadian and American effort at drug interdiction. Mitchell is the embodiment of the righteous lawman—stern, relentless, and methodical. Kerrivan, however, is the embodiment of the romantic outlaw—handsome, brave, and reckless. From the beginning of the story, these two are on a collision course.

Mitchell sets in motion a complex and costly sting operation to nab Kerrivan and his crew with a major drug shipment in Canadian waters. Through the United States Drug Enforcement Agency, Mitchell learns about and then engages the services of Rudy Meyers. For a half-million-dollar fee, Meyers agrees to lure Kerrivan to the Columbian drug lord, broker a drug deal between them, and set an ingenious trap that will ensure Kerrivan's capture and conviction.

The scene shifts to Columbia, where Kerrivan acquires an aging tanker and arranges to buy fifty tons of high-grade marijuana for transportation to Newfoundland and then New York. He and his crew stand to make more than twenty million dollars for the delivery. The narrative then traces the vectors of both police and smugglers, as plans evolve and complications arise for both groups. The tempo is extremely fast paced throughout and enlivened by an eccentric cast of characters.

As Kerrivan and crew sail toward apparent disaster, the RCMP's political masters in the nation's capital get wind of some details of the sting, including its huge cost and some of the shady characters involved. They apply pressure to abort it, fearing a public inquiry. Eventually, Kerrivan and crew are arrested, and the scene moves back into the courtroom. There, the scope of the crime and the notoriety of the accused ensure a complex and sensational trial. The ending is as convincing as it is completely unexpected.

TRIAL OF PASSION

Trial of Passion is one of Deverell's most accomplished novels in terms of characterization, suspense, and pacing. Jonathan O'Donnell is a handsome, successful lawyer and academic in his mid-thirties. He has recently been named acting dean of a major British Columbia law school when he is accused of rape by one of his students, Kimberly Martin, a bright and beautiful young woman who is also a gifted actress.

The facts that are not in dispute include the following: There was an end-of-term dance at which students and professors mixed. O'Donnell and some students, including Kimberly Martin, continued partying afterward and in the early morning hours ended up at O'Donnell's home. There was a considerable amount of drinking and drug use during the evening. Martin passed out on O'Donnell's living room chair, and the other students soon left. What happened between O'Donnell and Martin after the students left is the question that propels the narrative forward.

The story opens with court testimony from a preliminary hearing of the sexual assault charge. With this dramatic opening, the reader is plunged into the heart of a "she said, he said" dilemma: Who and what does one believe, and why? Further excerpts of testimony at the preliminary hearing, and later at the trial, give the reader insight into the complexities and limitations of the legal process. These include the rules about disclosure of evidence, hearsay, voir dire testimony, the selection of juries, pretrial agreements, and the rough-and-tumble atmosphere of actual courtrooms. Despite all the testimony at the preliminary hearing and later at the sensational trial, the basic question of what transpired remains elusive.

Deverell complicates the reader's response to the principal figures throughout the novel in a variety of ways. He provides, for example, private letters that each writes to friends, colleagues, and legal counsels. Although the reader cannot know how candid each is, in every case the voice in question seems forthright about actions, motives, and recollections. Later, the reader is given excerpts of conversations that O'Donnell and Martin have with their respective therapists. Again, these suggest candid, privileged revelations, but again they are inconclusive about an assault. In fact, the more the reader learns about each character, the more appealing, sympathetic, and believable each seems. The reader does learn that there was a growing attraction between them, but that it was kept in check by their mutual recognition of the proprieties of the professor-student relationship and by other commitments in their lives.

At trial, students and colleagues are put on the witness stand to testify to what they saw and heard the night in question. Medical testimony is entered into evidence. Every fact and assertion seems able to be interpreted in contradictory ways. The one touchstone the reader has in this maze is Arthur Beauchamp, a sixty-three-year-old celebrated defense attorney.

The reader is given privileged access into Beauchamp's mind. His sensibility and outlook—erudite, self-deprecating, tolerant, and fair-minded—account a great deal for the story's warmth, humor, and thematic depth. His struggles with the question of whether to take O'Donnell's case and later of how to mount a defense reveal a fundamental principle from which the legal system derives its moral authority. Beauchamp expresses this principle in terms of his commitment to the old Roman maxim: Fiat justitia, ruat caelum (let justice be done though the heavens fall). For Beauchamp, the law is ultimately about the search for truth rather than a contest for victory.

How Beauchamp elicits the truth in open court and how that truth exonerates both the accused and the accuser is a brilliant and powerful insight into the mystery of human beings not only to others but also to themselves. The courtroom may be a place of theatrical performance, but as with all great drama, it can be a place where the most profound and significant human secrets are revealed.

Michael J. Larsen

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: Needles, 1979; High Crimes, 1981; Mecca, 1983; The Dance of Shiva, 1984; Platinum Blues, 1988; Mindfield, 1989; Kill All the Lawyers, 1994; Street Legal: The Betrayal, 1995; Trial of Passion, 1997; Slander, 1999; The Laughing Falcon, 2001; Mind Games, 2003; April Fool, 2005

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NONFICTION: Fatal Cruise: The Trial of Robert Frisbee, 1991

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Deverell, William. @William Deverell.com. <http://www.deverell.com>. Author-based Web site with biographical information, reviews of the major works, and articles by Deverell. Provides a useful orientation and overview.
- McBride, Jim, ed. In Cold Blood: A Directory of Canadian Crime Writing and Crime Writers. Toronto: Crime Writers of Canada, 2002. Alphabetical directory of Canadian crime writers, including William Deverell, that provides synopses of their works.
- New, William H., ed. Encyclopedia of Literature in Canada. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 2002. Biographical entry on Deverell and useful essay on Canadian mystery writing and writers, including Deverell. Indexed.
- Winks, Robin W., and Maureen Corrigan, eds. Mystery and Suspense Writers: The Literature of Crime, Detection, and Espionage. New York: Scribner & Sons, 1998. Important guide to major mystery writers, with an invaluable essay on "The Legal Crime Novel" by Jon L. Breen. Indexed.

COLIN DEXTER

Norman Colin Dexter

Born: Stamford, Lincolnshire, England; September 29, 1930

Also wrote as N. C. Dexter; Norman Colin Dexter

Types of plot: Police procedural; master sleuth; hard-boiled

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Inspector Morse, 1975-1999

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

INSPECTOR MORSE is a brilliant, Eton-educated, curmudgeonly bachelor with a love for classical music, especially that of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and Richard Wagner, and for solving crossword puzzles. He smokes too much and is overly fond of ale, beer, and scotch. He works for the Thames Valley Constabulary of Kidlington, Oxon, and in the early novels, he is depicted as slim, gray-eyed, and dark-haired, but perhaps under the influence of the actor John Thaw, who played Morse in the British television series, he is described in the later novels as paunchy, blue-eyed, and white-haired.

SERGEANT LEWIS is Morse's associate and contrasts sharply with his boss. He comes from a working-class background and was not as well educated as Morse. He was a boxer as a young man and then married and had a family. He is described as a grandfather early in the series, but because of the influence of the young actor Kevin Whately, who played him in the television series, Lewis is described as younger than Morse in the later novels. Dexter says that he created Lewis to serve as "target, scapegoat, and sounding-board" for Morse.

CHIEF SUPERINTENDENT STRANGE of the Thames Valley Police at Kidlington is a large man and Morse's superior, who is critical of the time that Morse spends in pubs, which Morse claims aids in his crime solving. Strange is pleased, however, when some of Morse's cases achieve national interest.

MAXIMILIAN "MAX" THEODORE SIEGFREID DE BRYN is the pathologist who is often called on to examine the corpses in the crimes Morse investigates. He is very professional and has few friends at Thames Valley Police Headquarters. He dies in 1992.

DR. LAURA HOBSON takes over Max's job after his death. A bespectacled small woman in her early thirties, she objects to Morse's calling her "dear" and insists on the professional "Dr. Hobson."

CONTRIBUTION

Colin Dexter's major accomplishment was his creation of the unforgettable Inspector Morse. The novels of the Morse series have made Dexter an important and influential figure in modern English detective fiction. In a poll, Dexter's fellow mystery writers chose Morse as their favorite male sleuth, ahead of Sherlock Holmes, Philip Marlowe, Nero Wolfe, and Adam Dalgliesh. Others have compared Dexter to Dashiell Hammett and Raymond Chandler because he has written not only good detective stories but also high-quality literature. The novels of the Morse series have brought Dexter fame, fortune, and fans around the world, some of whom travel to Oxford to meet him and to relive their favorite scenes from the novels. The Crime Writers' Association has awarded him its Silver Dagger Award twice (1979 and 1981) and its Gold Dagger Award twice (1989 and 1992). He has also received this organization's Cartier Diamond Dagger for outstanding services to crime fiction.

Morse made his first appearance in Last Bus to Woodstock (1975), a novel that introduced several of Dexter's principal techniques and themes, such as insightfully choosing epigraphs relevant to each chapter's subject and mood. Readers also encounter the theme of Morse's fallibility, because he often misidentifies the murderer in the early stages of his investigations. Dexter also uses Morse's companion, Sergeant Lewis, to update this relationship between detective and associate that began with Sherlock Holmes and John Watson. Like Holmes, Morse is an eccentric bachelor, but he is unlike Holmes in his passion for good English grammar, satisfying food and drink, and intelligent, attractive older women. Like Watson, Sergeant Lewis is less intelligent than the master sleuth, but the Morse-Lewis relationship tends to be more acrimonious than that of Doyle's pair. Unlike the traditional puzzle-solving detective, Morse rarely discovers clues in a straightforward fashion. They are scrambled, and he manages to use them in specious but false explanations, so that when the reader finally learns the truth, it is usually a surprise.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Colin Dexter in 1997. (AP/Wide World Photos)

As the series evolved, so, too, did Morse, whose interests in poetry and modern literature are explored. In The Wench Is Dead (1989), which some critics have praised as the best novel in the series, Morse's physical and moral weaknesses are on display. Immobilized with a severe illness in a hospital, the cantankerous Morse is nevertheless able to solve a dead case from the Victorian period. By 1999, with The Remorseful Day, which Dexter insisted was "the final Inspector Morse novel," the author told interviewers that he had said all that he wanted to say about this character, and unlike Doyle and Holmes, there would be no resurrec-tions. Dexter's reputation was further enhanced by the success of the Inspector Morse series on British television between 1987 and 2000. Dexter himself, à la Alfred Hitchcock, made cameo appearances in several of the episodes.

BIOGRAPHY

On September 29, 1930, Colin Dexter was born in Stamford, England, a small town in Lincolnshire about seventy miles north of Oxford, which would later become his residence and the scene of his Morse novels. Alfred Dexter, his father, was a taxi driver, and Colin was educated at Stamford School from 1940 to 1949. After national military service in the Royal Corps of Signals, Dexter read classics at Christ's College of Cambridge University, from which he received his bachelor's degree in 1953. For the next three years he was an assistant classics master at Wyggeston School in Leicester, an East Midlands institution about twenty-five miles west of Stamford. He married Dorothy Cooper, a physiotherapist, in 1956 (they eventually had two children, Sally and Jeremy). After receiving his master's degree from Cambridge, he took a post as sixth form classics master at Loughborough Grammar School. In 1959 he moved closer to Stamford when he became senior classics master at Corby Grammar School. Early in his life Dexter described himself as a socialist in politics and a Methodist in religion, but later he added "lapsed" to each of these descriptors.

In 1966 increasing deafness forced Dexter to retire from teaching, and he became a senior assistant secretary to Oxford University Delegacy of Local Examinations in Summertown. Dexter developed a fascination with crossword puzzles, and he became so adept that he became national champion in the Ximenes competitions. He once said that this interest influenced his style of creating mysteries.

Dexter was forty-two years old before he became interested in writing mystery stories. The precipitating event occurred when he and his family were on vacation in Western Wales on the shore of the Irish Sea. A rainstorm confined him to a kitchen, where, with nothing to do, he wrote the first few paragraphs of a detective novel. Within a few years he published Last Bus to Woodstock (1975), which introduced Inspector Morse to the world. He had no plans for other Morse stories, but the success of his effort led him, in his spare time, to continue developing the character in a series of mysteries. Every year or two another Morse mystery appeared, and the novels began being translated into other languages, and Morse mania spread throughout the world.

To satisfy this great appetite for Morse, Dexter agreed to allow his novels to be dramatized for television. They appeared as part of the Mystery! series. While several films made use of Dexter's plots, not always accurately, others used his characters to formulate plots of their own. Dexter decided to bring the series of novels to an end in 1999, and John Thaw, the actor who played Morse so effectively in the television series, died in 2002 at the age of sixty.

Dexter continued to be honored after the series came to an end. In 2000 he was awarded the Order of the British Empire for his services to literature. He also began to devote himself more assiduously to his hobbies, which, like those of Morse, included doing crossword puzzles and listening to classical music.

ANALYSIS

Colin Dexter once described the essential nature of his Inspector Morse novels, which represent the core of his literary achievement, as "the exploitation of reader-mystification." By this he meant that the novels incorporate both traditional and modern elements. The Morse novels are in the puzzle-solving tradition, and Morse is the agent in restoring reason and order after a crime has created chaos. Dexter also observes Father Ronald Knox's ten commandments for writing detective fiction. Knox, who was the Roman Catholic chaplain at Oxford University, issued in 1929 a list of such rules as "No accident must ever help the detective, nor must he ever have an unaccountable intuition which proves to be right." Indeed, Morse often has intuitions that turn out to be wrong. However, Morse is a modern detective not only in his mode of transportation, a Lancia or a red Jaguar, but also in his reliance of the unconscious to do a lot of his work. As Dexter states in The Daughters of Cain (1994), Morse would toss clues into "the magnetic field of his mind," trusting that the explanation for the crime would "suddenly appear under his nose."

LAST BUS TO WOODSTOCK

The mixture of the traditional and modern can be seen in Dexter's first Inspector Morse novel, Last Bus to Woodstock, in which the inspector tries to discover the murderer of Sylvia Kaye, a provocatively clad young woman who was found bludgeoned to death outside a pub in Woodstock, a small town about eight miles northwest of Oxford. Morse customarily began his cases with a surfeit of confidence, and he is certain that he can solve this murder if he can find and interview the young woman who was seen hitching a ride with Sylvia on that fateful September evening. However, when he finally gets to talk with this woman, she does not tell him what he wants to know. In addition, neither her girlfriends nor her other "Oxford playmates" provide the information he seeks. Indeed, he is frustrated by their withholding of facts and feelings. He settles on the wrong person as the murderer before a husband and wife, each of whom confessed to the murder, are murdered themselves. This tragedy leads the way to the resolution and the identification of the woman murderer, who claims to be in love with Morse. In this novel Dexter makes use of red herrings, which were a staple of traditional puzzle-solving mysteries, but his early misidentification of the culprit and the sexual themes make it modern.

SERVICE OF ALL THE DEAD

Service of All the Dead (1979), which won for Dexter his first Silver Dagger Award, is the fourth in the series, and it centers on the murders of a churchwarden and a vicar. Inspector Morse postpones a vacation to Greece to investigate the seemingly senseless killing of a churchwarden, which the Oxford police have been unable to solve. Furthermore, Morse believes the death of the vicar in a fall from a church tower, which the police think was accidental, was murder. The way Dexter introduces the clues of this ecclesiastical murder mystery is similar to the techniques used in traditional puzzle-solving mysteries, but the way he scrambles the clues once they seem to mesh is modern. Modern, too, are the lives of the vicar's congregation, which exhibit the mixture of unholy lusts and disreputable desires of characters in American hard-boiled mysteries. During Morse's investigations the number of unexplained deaths increases before he is able to "serve" all these dead persons by finally fitting all the pieces together to complete the true picture of what happened.

THE DEAD OF JERICHO

The Dead of Jericho (1981), which won for Dexter his second Silver Dagger Award and which fans voted their favorite Morse story, focuses on Anne Scott, a woman Inspector Morse meets at a party. She later appears to have hanged herself in Jericho, a lower-middle-class section of Oxford. At the inquest, the jury brings back a verdict of death by suicide, but Morse cannot accept this. His subsequent investigations lead him to his usual early wrong conclusions, while he tries to untangle the very messy former life of this beautiful but enigmatic woman, to whom Morse was attracted, and whom, he feels, he might have saved.

THE WENCH IS DEAD

The Wench Is Dead (1989), the eighth novel in the series, won the Gold Dagger Award for the best mystery of the year. The title comes from Christopher Marlowe's The Jew of Malta (pr. c. 1589): "Thou hast committed—/Fornication; but that was in another country,/ And besides, the wench is dead." For Dexter, the past is this other country, and this novel is unusual in that it centers on a murder that occurred in 1859. Inspector Morse comes across the case during his stay in Oxford's Radcliffe Hospital while he recuperates from a stomach hemorrhage and an enlarged liver. In a hospital library book, he learns of the murder of Joanna Franks, a young woman whose body was found floating in the Oxford Canal, but he becomes convinced that the two men hanged for the murder were innocent. With the help of the hospital librarian and Sergeant Lewis, he begins to collect the pieces of the puzzle, but he is unable to put them together until he is discharged from the hospital. He discovers the solution, of which he is 99 percent certain, through an anagram.

THE WAY THROUGH THE WOODS

The Way Through the Woods (1992), which won for Dexter his second Gold Dagger Award, is the tenth novel in the series. Inspector Morse's interest is piqued when a young woman disappears and he believes that she has been murdered, but when a year later she turns up neither alive nor dead, the case remains unsolved. Then the police receive an anonymous letter with a puzzling poem that the writer claims provides the solution to the young woman's disappearance. The police publish the letter and poem, which Morse reads while he is on vacation in Dorset. After some surprising twists in the plot, Morse solves the poem's riddle, and the persons responsible for the crime are taken into custody by the Thames Valley police. Incidentally, in his letter of thanks to The Times, Morse reveals the first initial, E, of his first name, which remains unknown to the reader.

THE REMORSEFUL DAY

Dexter culminates his series in The Remorseful Day (1999) with Inspector Morse's unofficial investigation of the death of a local nurse, Yvonne Harrison, with whom he was once romantically involved. The case has baffled the police for two years, and Morse, even after new evidence surfaces, refuses to lead the reinvestigation of the crime, but he does collect clues on his own, which puzzles Sergeant Lewis. Morse, who is in failing health, also has to contend with the criticisms of Lewis and Chief Superintendent Strange. Morse eventually discovers the truth, which proves to be disturbing to all those involved.

Following the making of his will, in which Morse leaves his body to medical research and his property to Lewis and the British Diabetes Association, Morse's "confession" of what was good and bad about his life brings him a kind of personal redemption, and his death brings the series to an emotionally moving end.

Robert J. Paradowski

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

INSPECTOR MORSE SERIES: Last Bus to Woodstock, 1975; Last Seen Wearing, 1976; The Silent World of Nicholas Quinn, 1977; Service of All the Dead, 1979; The Dead of Jericho, 1981; The Riddle of the Third Mile, 1983; The Secret of Annexe Three, 1987; The Wench Is Dead, 1989; The Jewel That Was Ours, 1991; The First Inspector Morse Omnibus, 1991; The Second Inspector Morse Omnibus, 1991; The Way Through the Woods, 1992; The Third Inspector Morse Omnibus, 1993; Morse's Greatest Mystery, and Other Stories, 1993; The Daughters of Cain, 1994; Death Is Now My Neighbor, 1996; The Fourth Inspector Morse Omnibus, 1998; The Remorseful Day, 1999

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

TELEPLAYS: The Secret of Annexe Three, 1987; Service of All the Dead, 1988

NONFICTION: Liberal Studies: An Outline Course, 1964 (2 volumes.; as N. C. Dexter; with E. G. Rayner); Guide to Contemporary Politics, 1966 (as N. C. Dexter; with Rayner)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Dexter, Colin. "The Man Behind Inspector Morse." Interview by David Brown. Christian Science Monitor 89 (April 2, 1997): 15. This transcript of a radio interview conducted in Boston deals with the personal background to the novels, an analysis by Dexter of Morse's character, and his explanation of why the novels and the television series have been so successful.

Edmonds, Joanne. "Creation, Adaptation, and Re-Creation: The Lives of Colin Dexter's Characters." In It's a Print! Detective Fiction from Page to Screen, edited by William Reynolds. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1994. Some critics have complained about the omissions and distortions in the television versions of Dexter's Inspector Morse novels, and this article analyzes what is lost and gained when his characters appear in the new medium.

Heinz, Drue, et al. "Criminal Conversations." The Paris Review 44 (Winter, 2002-2003): 178. This is the fifth in a series of conversations with well-known writers to be published by The Paris Review. It is an edited version of discussions on the subject of crime writing held at a villa on Lake Como in Italy, and Dexter was very much a part of this seminar.

Karnick, S. T. "Detective and Mystery Stories." American Spectator 33 (December, 2000/January, 2001): 40-55. In this article, Dexter's first Inspector Morse novel is compared with Edward D. Hoch's "The Problem of the Covered Bridge" and Tony Hillerman's Skinwalkers (1986). These, and other examples Karnick analyzes, are seen as representatives of how new authors have breathed life into the moribund puzzle-solving mystery.

May, Radmila. "Murder Most Oxford." Contemporary Review 277 (October, 2000): 232-239. This article seeks to answer the question of why the Oxford setting has proved so important and beneficial in the novels of the Inspector Morse series and in the novels of other authors. May tries to show how both the real and mythical Oxford informed these stories.

MICHAEL DIBDIN

Born: Wolverhampton, Staffordshire, England; March 21, 1947

Died: Seattle, Washington; March 30, 2007

Types of plot: Police procedural; psychological; thriller; historical; amateur sleuth; metaphysical and metafictional parody

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Aurelio Zen, 1988-2007

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

AURELIO ZEN, an Italian detective, is still somewhat a man of mystery, although he has appeared in eleven novels and is Michael Dibdin's best-known character. He is described as middle-aged, tall and thin, with a prowlike nose, but little else is known about his appearance. His history is likewise sparse. A native of Venice, he lost a father whom he barely knew during World War II. He has been married and has had a series of romantic relationships of various lengths and depths. In the beginning of the series, he is living in a Rome apartment with his mother and has been working at a desk job within the police ministry, in disgrace because he investigated the kidnapping of Italian prime minister Aldo Moro, which ended badly, with the murder of the official. Zen is world-weary, cynical, and fatalistic, with a dark sense of humor, a habit of ironic introspection, and an expedient morality that changes to fit circumstances. Though an excellent and persistent investigator—in a methodical, plodding manner—he sometimes resorts to deceit and illegal activities that make him part of the problem rather than part of the solution.

CONTRIBUTION

Michael Dibdin may have achieved widespread fame only late in his career, with the publication of his first Aurelio Zen novel, Ratking, in 1988, on the verge of his fortieth birthday, and he may have written only eighteen novels in his thirty-year career, but he has left a lasting legacy in the mystery genre. An innovative and experimental writer who chose words with great care and devised multilayered plots that brought greater depth and meaning to crime fiction, Dibdin successfully tested the boundaries of mystery and thriller conventions throughout his life. Keenly observant and blessed with a well-developed sense of dark humor, he produced the homage to the classical detective, The Last Sherlock Holmes Story (1978). He paid tribute to Agatha Christie and others from the Golden Age of traditional mysteries with The Dying of the Light (1993). He produced a historical sleuth (A Rich Full Death, 1986), subtle studies of psychological suspense (The Tryst, 1989, and Thanksgiving, 2000), social satire (Dirty Tricks, 1991), and a chilling examination of random American violence (Dark Specter, 1995).

However, the contribution that Dibdin will undoubtedly be best remembered for is his creation of Aurelio Zen, the cynical, philosophical Italian detective who in the course of his investigations prowls the length and breadth of his native country attempting to bring order out of chaos. Dibdin presents the grimy underbelly of Italy unknown to tourists—contradictory, corrupt, and culturally heterogeneous, a nation with a long and volatile history that has seen everything and seemingly grown blasé about crime—and sets his protagonist to work at almost impossible tasks in a milieu where his job is often undermined by the authorities in charge. Dibdin, who often stated that he never planned a series but was merely fictionalizing his experiences from his sojourn in Italy during the 1980's, was forced by popular demand to continue writing about Aurelio Zen; the books have been translated into more than fifteen languages. Critics (except those in Italy, who are apparently indifferent to the crime genre) have been almost universal in their praise of the Zen novels. For his efforts, Dibdin won the Crime Writers' Association's Golden Dagger Award for the initial entry, Ratking, and a New York Times notable book citation for a nonseries novel, Dirty Tricks.

BIOGRAPHY

Michael John Dibdin was born on March 21, 1947, in Wolverhampton, Staffordshire, England, the son of physicist and science lecturer Frederick John Dibdin and health worker Peggy Taylor Dibdin. From the age of seven he was raised in Lisburn, Northern Ireland—a small, isolated community where storytelling was a primary form of entertainment—and attended schools in Scotland. An eager reader, Dibdin devoured classical and modern novels, nonfiction, poetry, and plays, and read the Sherlock Holmes stories at age fourteen.

Dibdin attended the University of Sussex, earning a bachelor of arts in English literature in 1968, and was briefly a part-time lecturer at the College of Technology in Belfast, Northern Ireland. In 1969, he gained a master of arts in English literature from the University of Alberta, in Edmonton, Canada, and studied for his doctorate for a semester before dropping out of school. Dibdin worked for several years in Canada as a contract painter and decorator and at a variety of other part-time jobs. He married Benita Mitbrodt in 1971, and the couple had a daughter, Moselle.

With his family, Dibdin returned to England, settling in London. He wrote three novels that remained unpublished before penning a pastiche, The Last Sherlock Holmes Story, pitting the famous detective against Jack the Ripper, which received mixed and generally lukewarm reviews and moderate sales. Dibdin's marriage dissolved soon after, and his wife returned to Canada. Dibdin then obtained a teaching certificate to enable him to travel abroad and spent some five years at the International House in Perugia, Italy, first as an English teacher and later as a language assistant.

After returning to England, Dibdin wrote the historical mystery A Rich Full Death (1986), featuring poet Robert Browning as an amateur sleuth. The same year, he married Sybil Sherington, with whom he had a daughter, Emma Yvette; that marriage also later ended.

Dibdin attracted considerable attention with the publication of his third novel, Ratking, which introduced his continuing character, Italian police detective Aurelio Zen. The novel won the Gold Dagger Award as best novel from the Crime Writers' Association, and opened the floodgates of Dibdin's imagination. Thereafter, the author—while occasionally contributing short stories to such periodicals as Granta and Modern Painters and book reviews to the Independent on Sunday—published a full-length work of fiction on an almost yearly basis. Dibdin typically alternated between well-received nonseries thrillers (such as The Tryst, Dirty Tricks, and The Dying of the Light) and further entries in the critically acclaimed Zen series.

In the early 1990's, while attending a crime writers' conference in Barcelona, Spain, Dibdin met fellow mystery writer and single parent K. K. (Katherine Kristine) Beck, who sometimes writes as Marie Oliver and who created amateur sleuth Iris Cooper and private investigator Jane da Silva. Dibdin and Beck married and moved to her home in Seattle, Washington. There, Dibdin wrote his first American-based novel, Dark Specter, and continued producing entries in his popular Aurelio Zen series until his death. Dibdin died in Seattle after a brief illness, on March 30, 2007, shortly after celebrating his sixtieth birthday.

ANALYSIS

From the beginning of Michael Dibdin's career, no one questioned his storytelling or writing abilities. The strongest criticisms he experienced focused on his first novel, The Last Sherlock Holmes Story, and were leveled at the author for his violation of certain Sir Arthur Conan Doyle conventions. After the publication of the critically successful A Rich Full Death, and particularly following the initial entry in the Aurelio Zen series, Ratking, dissenting opinions on Dibdin's work have been few and far between.

Dibdin's fertile imagination roamed over many diverse topics that he set against the backdrop of crime: spiritualism (A Rich Full Death), mental disintegration (The Tryst), British class distinctions (Dirty Tricks), the treatment of the elderly (The Dying of the Light), and the arrhythmia and violent nature of American society (Dark Specter). Both in these nonseries works and in Dibdin's Zen series—which deals with various Italian-based crimes culminating in murder—his plots are complex and meticulously structured. The Zen novels in particular consist of many separate twisted skeins painstakingly woven together to present a rich, atmospheric tapestry of life, corruption, and violent death, Italian-style. Aurelio Zen himself may be theorized to represent facets of one or both of two Latin root words that might have inspired his name: Aurelio suggests both aur- (hearing: a detective must develop the ability to listen and hear the unspoken to be successful) and aurum (gold: the investigator as a shining nugget among drab dross). Zen, an unusual sobriquet in a country where surnames typically end in vowels, suggests an embodiment of the principles of Zen Buddhism: the study of self-discipline and a commitment to meditation, with the objective of attaining enlightenment through intuitive insight and to achieving transcendent truths beyond the intellect—all lessons that must be learned in the nonlogical and paradoxical venue of Italy.

Dibdin, who can always be counted on to employ words with exacting precision, is at his most lyrical stylistically when writing of detective Zen. The author is a master at evocative descriptions of the Italian countryside and in drawing distinctions among the qualities of the places where his investigator carries out dubious, dangerous, and often futile assignments. He sketches Zen and other characters with uncanny skill; produces pungent, realistic dialogue filled with insight and sly humor; and seasons his narrative with pithy similes and well-thought-out metaphors that subtly underlie each entry in the series, making for a highly satisfying reading experience. Dibdin's body of work has achieved a rare critical distinction that usually eludes most genre writers: It is considered literature.

THE DYING OF THE LIGHT

At first glance, The Dying of the Light presents the typical cast of a traditional English mystery. Gathered in the lounge of a country hotel, the Eventide Lodge, are Colonel Weatherby, reading a newspaper; Mrs. Hargreaves, a hypochondriac who constantly plays solitaire; an aged couple—Charles Symes and Grace Lebon—who work at a jigsaw puzzle; Samuel Rosenstein, talking into a telephone; Lady Belinda Scott, fingering the keys of a piano; Canon Purvey, reading a book; George Channing, a millionaire manufacturer of corned beef; and a pair of elderly ladies, Rosemary Travis and Dorothy Davenport, who like twin Miss Marples sit together speculating about who could have committed a series of murders.

Closer examination, however, reveals that appearances are deceiving and that the props are leftovers from earlier times. The colonel's newspaper is many years old. Mrs. Hargreaves' deck of cards is actually a pack of ancient postcards. The jigsaw is made up from several sets of puzzle pieces. The phone is not connected. The piano's strings are missing. The canon's book is really a 1951 appointment diary. All the characters, far from being guests, are aged patients in a run-down nursing home run by a venal, cold-hearted brother and sister who are bilking—and perhaps conspiring to dispose of—their charges.

Always inventive, author Dibdin has in The Dying of the Light turned the cozy mystery on its head to produce a novel that is by turns shocking in its believability, gently humorous in its exploration of the resilience and wisdom of the aged, and respectful of the Golden Age mystery even as he stretches the genre's conventions.

BLOOD RAIN

Blood Rain (1999), the seventh entry in Dibdin's popular Aurelio Zen mystery series, sees the taciturn Italian detective posted to Catania, Sicily, where he is charged with secretly overseeing the governmental effort to investigate and quell Mafia activities. Zen's adopted daughter, Carla Arduini, a computer systems installer working for the Direzione Investigativa AntiMafia (DIA, an organization charged with putting an end to mob rule), is also in the town in the shadow of volcanic Mount Etna and divides her time between her newfound father and a burgeoning friendship with an anti-Mafia judge, Corinna Nunziatella.

The catalytic incident of the novel is the discovery in an abandoned railroad boxcar in a deserted area of the island of a decomposing body, which is suspected to be corpse of the son of a Mafia chieftain. The murder sets off a new wave of violence among various competing factions: mob clans, law enforcement officials of questionable loyalty, and corrupt government officials. The resulting power struggle threatens to sweep Zen, his daughter, officials, vicious mafiosi, and innocent bystanders into a deadly cauldron of danger and death.

Atmospheric, incisively observant of local customs, history, and geography, Blood Rain is peppered with authentic characters who seem to step from the pages. Dialogue, often sprinkled with profanity and local imprecations, rings true. Beneath every passage is a darkly humorous, world-weary sensibility that gives the series a satisfying flavor that allows readers to overlook the fact that plot threads are sometimes left dangling—just as in real life.

Jack Ewing

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

AURELIO ZEN SERIES: Ratking, 1988; Vendetta, 1990; Cabal, 1992; Dead Lagoon, 1994; Così Fan Tutti, 1996; A Long Finish, 1998; Blood Rain, 1999; And Then You Die, 2002; Medusa, 2003; Back to Bologna, 2005; End Games, 2007

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Last Sherlock Holmes Story, 1978; A Rich Full Death, 1986; The Tryst, 1989; Dirty Tricks, 1991; The Dying of the Light, 1993; Dark Specter, 1995; Thanksgiving, 2000; The Vine, 2001

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

EDITED TEXTS: The Picador Book of Crime Writing, 1993; The Vintage Book of Classic Crime, 1997

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Kaner, Stefan. "Elementary." Review of The Last Sherlock Holmes Story, by Michael Dibdin. Time, July 31, 1978, 83. A favorable review of The Last Sherlock Holmes Story, pitting Holmes against the bloodthirsty Jack the Ripper.
- Library Journal*. Review of Cosi Fan Tutti, by Michael Dibdin. 122, no. 8 (May 1, 1997): 144. A favorable review of the Zen novel Cosi Fan Tutti, which finds the detective in Naples, where, in a darkly comic turn he is mistaken for a mafioso while helping a wealthy widow prevent her daughters from marrying men who are connected to the Mafia.
- Ott, Bill. Review of Blood Rain, by Michael Dibdin. Booklist 96, no. 14 (March 25, 2000): 1333. A highly favorable review of the Aurelio Zen entry Blood Rain, wherein the detective heads to Sicily to spy on the state police's anti-Mafia operation for the rival Interior Ministry. Ott calls it a welcome and darker novel, compared with several previous entries that had a comic flavor, and terms Blood Rain "Crime fiction at its multifaceted best."
- Petrusza, David. Review of The Last Sherlock Holmes Story, by Michael Dibdin. National Review 30, no. 23 (August 18, 1978): 1036. An unfavorable review of The Last Sherlock Holmes Story, which, though praising the novel's brisk pace, condemns the author's sloppy research and the unforgivable sin—in a mystery—of telegraphing the solution to the story.

- Publishers Weekly*. Review of A Rich Full Death, by Michael Dibdin. 246, no. 20 (May 17, 1999): 59. A very favorable review of A Rich Full Death, in which poet Robert Browning teams with expatriate American Robert Booth to investigate a series of murders in Florence, Italy. The novel is praised for its lively dialogue, historical details, and believable characters, with special attention paid to the many allusions to Dante's Inferno. Called a "sure-handed command of literature, history and humor in an intricate, literate period piece."
- Spinella, Michael. Review of Thanksgiving, by Michael Dibdin. Booklist 97, no. 13 (March 1, 2001): 1226. A favorable review of Thanksgiving, in which a middle-aged British journalist, having recently lost his beautiful, mysterious wife in a plane crash, becomes obsessed with tracing her past and is entangled in a murder. Called a "chilling and suspenseful psychological drama."
- Stasio, Marilyn. "Crime." Review of A Long Finish, by Michael Dibdin. The New York Times Book Review, October 11, 1998, p. 28. A favorable review of the darkly comic A Long Finish, in which detective Zen is off to Piedmont, Italy, where he accidentally becomes the cause of violence that flares among feuding families, rival vintners, and truffle harvesters in an old-world culture changed by crime, cited especially for its "all-embracing sense of place."

CHARLES DICKENS

Born: Portsmouth, Hampshire, England; February 7, 1812

Died: Gad's Hill, near Rochester, Kent, England; June 9, 1870

Types of plot: Police procedural; thriller

CONTRIBUTION

Although Charles Dickens did not gain his fame as a writer of mystery and detective fiction, he was unquestionably the nineteenth century master of the genre known as the "sensation novel," a melodramatic fiction in which mystery, crime, villainy, and secret evil predominate. Moreover, Dickens made use of his knowledge of the newly created Metropolitan Police Force in England, focusing on the force's detective procedures in several short works and in one of his most respected novels, Bleak House (1852-1853). His unfinished novel, The Mystery of Edwin Drood

Charles Dickens in his Gad's Hill study. (Library of Congress)

(1870), because it has stimulated many readers to provide their own ending, has become one of the most famous detective novels in literary history.

BIOGRAPHY

Charles John Huffam Dickens was born on February 7, 1812, the second of eight children of John Dickens and Elizabeth Barrow Dickens. Because his father's job as clerk in the Naval Pay Office paid very little and made it necessary for him to travel, Dickens spent a penurious youth in many different places. At the age of twelve, he faced the traumatic experience of being put to work in a shoeblack warehouse while his father was imprisoned for debt. Oliver Twist's hard young life is the best-known fictional result of what Dickens considered to be an act of desertion by his parents.

After his father was released from prison, Dickens went to school at a London academy. At the age of fifteen, he worked as a solicitor's clerk in law offices and two years later became a freelance reporter for the courts—experiences that he later put to good use in his fiction. At the age of twenty-one, he began publishing "Sketches by Boz" and joined The Morning Chronicle as a newspaper reporter. The year 1836 was important for Dickens, for he published the Boz sketches as a book; married Catherine Hogarth, the daughter of a journalist; and began Pickwick Papers (1836-1837), a serialized work so phenomenally popular that he was on the way to becoming the most widely read author in England.

While Pickwick Papers was still running in serial form, Dickens began Oliver Twist (1837-1839) and shortly thereafter Nicholas Nickleby (1838-1839), both popular successes. He seldom took time off, writing novel after novel at an astonishingly prolific rate; his serial fictions ran in London magazines or newspapers almost constantly. The high point of his career was between 1850 and 1860; during that period, he published his most respected novels—David Copperfield (1849-1850), Bleak House, Hard Times (1854), A Tale of Two Cities (1859), and Great Expectations (1860-1861).

When he was not writing novels, Dickens was touring the United States or the Continent, editing various journals and newspapers, working with amateur theatrical groups, and giving public readings from his works. This extremely heavy work load finally took its toll on his health. On June 8, 1870, after working all day, he suffered a stroke at his Gad's Hill home; he died the next day. He was buried in Westminster Abbey.

ANALYSIS

Crime and imprisonment are frequent themes in the novels of Charles Dickens; few modern readers are unaware of the efforts of Fagin to ensnare the young Oliver Twist into a life of crime, and few are unaware of the horrible significance of the Bastille and the guillotine in A Tale of Two Cities. Nevertheless, Dickens's most important works to focus on the nature of crime are Bleak House, the plot of which is the classic mystery-story pattern of the effort to uncover secret guilt, and The Mystery of Edwin Drood, that famous unfinished detective novel that has so piqued the interest of numerous amateur sleuths.

Because Dickens spent much time in his early life as a court reporter, he published several minor works focusing on mysterious murder and detective investigations even before Bleak House and The Mystery of Edwin Drood. An early Dickens story, "A Confession Found in a Prison in the Time of Charles the Second," written in 1841, which has been suggested as the source of Edgar Allan Poe's story "The Tell-Tale Heart," focuses on the obsession to commit murder. In "Three Detectives: Anecdotes," published in the early 1850's, Dickens deals with the methods of the detective branch of the newly created Metropolitan Police Force.

Illustration from an 1870 American edition of Barnaby Rudge. (Library of Congress)

BARNABY RUDGE

The first of his full-length novels to deal with a mysterious murder and an investigative effort to discover the murderer, however, is Barnaby Rudge: A Tale of the Riots of '80 (1841), a historical novel that primarily deals with the Gordon Riots of 1780 and the attack on Newgate Prison. It is a novel of various strands that do not always successfully come together; the subplot of Barnaby Rudge most relevant to the detective genre focuses on the efforts of Geoffrey Hare-dale to find the murderer of his brother, even though it is obvious throughout that the villain is the father of the idiot boy, Barnaby Rudge. The novel is also important in the history of detective fiction in that the great amateur detective Edgar Allan Poe deduced the plot and the ending of the story after having read only the first two serial installments, deduced it so accurately, in fact, that Dickens himself was reported to be astonished by his accuracy.

BLEAK HOUSE

It is with the publication of Bleak House that Dickens makes the most extensive use in a major novel of the motif of secret crime and detection. Inspector Bucket, who is introduced about midway through the novel, in a chapter entitled simply "Mr. Bucket," is said to be the first professional detective in English crime fiction. Indeed, since the novel was published, it has been generally assumed that Bucket is based on Inspector Charles Frederick Field, one of the most famous detectives of his time and the subject of an earlier nonfictional article by Dickens. A professional rather than an amateur detective like Poe's C. Auguste Dupin, the methodical Bucket is a harbinger of the numerous inspectors of Scotland Yard who populated twentieth century detective fiction.

Bleak House stands as a milestone in history for another reason. Its entire plot—from the ominous fog that hangs, both literally and figuratively, over the law courts at Chancery at the novel's beginning to the death of Lady Dedlock at its end—follows what has come to be recognized as the classic pattern of the detective novel. It is only when the crucial final discoveries of Lady Dedlock's secret and the significance of her lawyer's murder make all the seemingly disconnected events meaningful that the latent structure of the work becomes manifest and the novel achieves the kind of closure associated with the classics of the detective genre.

Although when Bleak House was first published some reviewers complained that it had no plot, more recent critics have perceived the elaborate symbolic parallels and contrasts between characters and events that make up the intricate mystery pattern of the novel. Edgar Johnson, one of Dickens's most perceptive critics, argues that the plot of the novel is like a whirlpool that circles faster and tighter until it draws all the characters into its destructive funnel. At the center of the whirlpool is Lady Dedlock, whose secret indiscretion threatens to be revealed until her blackmailing solicitor, Tulkinghorn, is mysteriously murdered. As Inspector Bucket proceeds to solve the mystery of the murder, the symbolic web of the case of Jarndyce versus Jarndyce in the law courts at Chancery fatefully ensnares all who become involved in it. A powerful work that transcends its sensation-novel model, Bleak House not only satirizes the baroque complexity of the law but also constructs a profound symbolic microcosm of the complex mysteries of human hopes and secret sins.

THE MYSTERY OF EDWIN DROOD

Although Bleak House is his most brilliant novel to make use of the detective-story model, the most famous work to establish Dickens as a master of the detective genre is the uncompleted and, compared to Bleak House, uncomplicated The Mystery of Edwin Drood. The story of its origin and the reported assumptions about Dickens's intentions for it have been told many times. According to Dickens's biographers, Dickens planned the work in an effort to beat Wilkie Collins (whose novel The Woman in White, 1860, has been credited with creating the English detective story) at his own game.

The central character in Dickens's novel is not Edwin Drood but rather his uncle, John Jasper, the choirmaster of Cloisterham, who in the first scene of the book is found in a squalid opium den. The plot revolves around the mysterious disappearance of Drood, a student engineer who has come to stay with his uncle. Although Dickens's death prevented him from solving the mystery of Drood's disappearance, the existing parts of the novel suggest quite clearly the villain's identity. Drood has been betrothed to the orphaned Rosa Bud since childhood, but Jasper's behavior around Rosa makes it obvious that he is obsessed by her. Although Jasper seems the most apparent suspect, the plot is complicated by the involvement of Neville Landless and his sister Helena, who have recently arrived from Ceylon. Landless, a passionate, swarthy man, also admires Rosa and strongly dislikes Drood, with whom he argues. After Drood's disappearance during a storm, Landless is the most likely suspect, especially since shortly thereafter he also disappears. Adding to the mystery is the arrival of a stranger in Cloisterham named Dick Datchery, whose white-haired appearance makes it clear that he is in disguise. The novel ends with Jasper's return to the opium den and its owner, Opium Sal, hearing him mumble in his stupor about having done something.

Although there seems little mystery here to be unraveled, detective-story aficionados have long been fascinated with what The Mystery of Edwin Drood leaves untold. First of all, there is the mystery of Jasper. Although he seems to be the villain of the piece, the novel never makes it clear that he has committed any crime. The one bit of external evidence for his guilt has been reported by Dickens's friend and biographer John Forster, who wrote that Dickens said one feature of the story was to be the discovery by the mur-derer that he did not have to commit the murder to achieve his objective. Because the reader finds in the section of the novel that Dickens completed that Rosa and Edwin agree to break their betrothal, it seems clear that if Jasper did kill Drood because of his desire for Rosa, then that act indeed was unnecessary.

The second mystery is the fate of Edwin Drood. Some readers have suggested that because Dickens considered using other titles for the novel, such as "The Disappearance of Edwin Drood" or "Edwin Drood in Hiding," Drood is not even dead. In fact, of the many theories accounting for the novel's conclusion, roughly one-third take this approach. The third mystery revolves around the character Dick Datchery, who seems to be one of the other characters in disguise. Although the most likely candidate is Neville Landless, come back in disguise to discover the true murderer of Drood and thus clear himself, other readers have suggested several other characters in the novel, including Drood himself.

The most basic reason that detective-story fans are fascinated with resolving the mystery of a story that seems so utterly lacking in mystery is one of the most powerful conventions of the detective story itself: The most obvious suspect for the crime is often not the criminal at all. Although Jasper is the only character in the novel who seems to have the personality and the motive for killing Drood, many readers refuse to believe that Dickens intended to make the solution so easy, especially if he were indeed interested in showing Collins that he could beat him at his own genre.

What makes The Mystery of Edwin Drood, in spite of its uncompleted status, a powerful work is its consideration of one of the central concerns of nineteenth century fiction—a man split between powerful instinctive urges and his sense of social responsibility. Although Poe in the United States and Fyodor Dostoevski in Russia also dealt with this theme of the double nature of man, the most famous work in English fiction to focus on it is Robert Louis Stevenson's The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1886). John Jasper, like Dr. Jekyll, has his socially respectable side as the choirmaster of Cloisterham; nevertheless, hiding within him are powerful erotic urges and drug-induced hallucinations that make him seem like the bestial Mr. Hyde. The way the novel deals with the Freudian conflict between the urge-driven Id and the socially responsible Superego within the detective-story genre accounts for much of its power.

More readers have been concerned with the practical mysteries of the unfinished plot of the book, however, than they have with its thematic implications. A critical industry of Droodiana has grown up around The Mystery of Edwin Drood as numerous readers and critics have tried to solve the mystery or provide their own ending. An early effort to write the missing ending, Richard Anthony Proctor's Watched by the Dead: A Loving Study of Dickens' Half-Told Tale (1887), takes the approach, since followed by various stage versions of the story, that Drood is not dead at all. The best-known film version of the novel, a 1935 film with Claude Rains as John Jasper, however, "finishes" the story by making Neville Landless, disguised as Dick Datchery, the obvious hero and thus the means by which Jasper is revealed as the murderer of Drood.

Dickens, the most widely read novelist of the Victorian era, and still the best-known writer of that period, has the enviable distinction of being both a best-selling author who knew precisely how to create memorable characters and involve his readers in powerful, page-turning stories and a critically acclaimed artist who was able to make use of popular melodramatic and sensational fictional modes to explore the secret mysteries of human motivation and the complications of living within the social contract.

Charles E. May

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: Oliver Twist, 1837-1839 (also known as The Adventures of Oliver Twist); Barnaby Rudge: A Tale of the Riots of '80, 1841; Bleak House, 1852-1853; The Mystery of Edwin Drood, 1870 (unfinished)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Pickwick Papers, 1836-1837 (also known as The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club); Nicholas Nickleby, 1838-1839 (also known as The Life and Adventures of Nicholas Nickleby); The Old Curiosity Shop, 1840-1841; Martin Chuzzlewit, 1843-1844 (also known as The Life and Adventures of Martin Chuzzlewit); Dombey and Son, 1846-1848 (also known as Dealings with the Firm of Dombey and Son, Wholesale, Retail, and for Exportation); David Copperfield, 1849-1850 (also known as The Personal History of David Copperfield); Hard Times, 1854 (also known as Hard Times for These Times); Little Dorrit, 1855-1857; A Tale of Two Cities, 1859; Great Expectations, 1860-1861; Our Mutual Friend, 1864-1865

SHORT FICTION: Sketches by Boz, 1836; A Christmas Carol, 1843; The Chimes, 1844; The Cricket on the Hearth, 1845; The Battle of Life, 1846; The Haunted Man, 1848; Reprinted Pieces, 1858; The Uncommercial Traveller, 1860; George Silverman's Explanation, 1868; Christmas Stories, 1871

PLAYS: The Strange Gentleman, pr. 1836; The Village Coquettes, pr., pb. 1836; Mr. Nightingale's Diary, pr., pb. 1851 (with Mark Lemon); No Thoroughfare, pr., pb. 1867 (with Wilkie Collins)

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: A Child's History of England, 1852-1854; The Life of Our Lord, 1934

NONFICTION: American Notes, 1842; Pictures from Italy, 1846

EDITED TEXTS: Master Humphrey's Clock, 1840-1841 (periodical); Household Words, 1850-1859 (periodical); All the Year Round, 1859-1870 (periodical)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ackroyd, Peter. Dickens. London: Sinclair-Stevenson, 1990. The author, a major English novelist, writes a biography of Dickens that warrants the characterization of being Dickensian both in its length and in the quality of its portrayal of the nineteenth century writer and his times. In re-creating that past, Ackroyd has produced a brilliant work of historical imagination.

Baker, William, and Kenneth Womack, eds. A Companion to the Victorian Novel. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2002. Includes chapters on Victorian detective fiction and Charles Dickens. Bibliographic references and index.

Connor, Steven, ed. Charles Dickens. London: Longman, 1996. Part of the Longman Critical Readers series, this is a good reference for interpretation and criticism of Dickens.

- Frank, Lawrence. Victorian Detective Fiction and the Nature of Evidence: The Scientific Investigations of Poe, Dickens, and Doyle. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2003. Looks at the models of evidence at play in the detective fiction of Dickens, Edgar Allan Poe, and Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, comparing them to one another, as well as to the very different models of evidence that took hold in the twentieth century. Bibliographic references and index.
- Haining, Peter. Introduction to Hunted Down: The Detective Stories of Charles Dickens. Chester Springs, Pa.: Dufour Editions, 1996. Extremely useful overview of Dickens's contribution to the detective genre and comparison of his various stories to one another.
- Jordan, John O., ed. The Cambridge Companion to Charles Dickens. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2001. From the Cambridge Companions to Literature series. Includes bibliographical references and an index.
- Newsom, Robert. Charles Dickens Revisited. New York: Twayne, 2000. From Twayne's English Authors series. Includes bibliographical references and an index.
- Reed, John Robert. Dickens and Thackeray. Athens: Ohio University Press, 1995. Discusses how beliefs about punishment and forgiveness affect how Dickens and William Makepeace Thackeray told their stories. Discusses Dickens's major fiction in terms of moral and narrative issues.
- Smiley, Jane. Charles Dickens. New York: Viking, 2002. A Dickens biography by a noted American novelist. Includes bibliographical references.
- Smith, Grahame. Charles Dickens: A Literary Life. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1996. A strong biography of Dickens.
- Weliver, Phyllis. Women Musicians in Victorian Fiction, 1860-1900: Representations of Music, Science, and Gender in the Leisured Home. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2000. Includes a chapter on Dickens's use of the tropes of fugue and dissonance in The Mystery of Edwin Drood. Bibliographic references and index.

PETER DICKINSON

Born: Livingstone, Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia); December 16, 1927

Also wrote as Malcolm de Brissac

Types of plot: Police procedural; psychological; historical

PRINCIPAL SERIES

James Pibble, 1968-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

JAMES PIBBLE is a nondescript Scotland Yard detective. He is timid, yet persevering and honest, and capable of brilliant flashes of insight into character and motive. His eccentricity ensures that he is given the most bizarre and seemingly unsolvable cases. Of lower-middle-class origin, he is troubled by memories of his dead father's failures.

CONTRIBUTION

The first of Peter Dickinson's James Pibble series, The Glass-Sided Ants' Nest (1968), signaled the emergence of a major, if offbeat talent. However, even before he had finished with the Pibble series, Dickinson had begun writing nonseries crime novels, many of them with historical settings. One of the most stylistically innovative writers in the field, Dickinson often tests or redefines the boundaries of crime fiction. His characters are unconventional, his settings are exotic or deliberately disturbing, and his plots, especially in the later nonseries novels, vie with mainstream fiction in their complex juxtapositions of past and present. Although Pibble is too eccentric a police officer to have inspired many imitators, Dickinson's nonseries novels may justly be compared with those of his contemporary, Ruth Rendell, for having creatively blurred the distinctions between crime writing and mainstream fiction, thus clearing fresh ground for the generation of writers who followed.

BIOGRAPHY

Peter Malcom de Brissac Dickinson was born in Livingston, Northern Rhodesia (now Zambia) on December 16, 1927, to English parents. His father was a British civil servant. Dickinson has written fondly of his childhood in Africa. In 1935 Dickinson's family returned to Berkhamstead, England.

In 1940 Dickinson entered Eton, a prestigious English preparatory school, did military service just after World War II, then attended King's College, Cambridge, graduating with a bachelor's degree in 1951. For seventeen years, Dickinson worked as an editor and book reviewer for the magazine Punch. Subsequently, he turned to writing fiction full time.

Completed when Dickinson was almost forty, The Glass-Sided Ants' Nest won the Crime Writers' Association's Gold Dagger Award for best work of fiction. In 1969 Dickinson won the Gold Dagger a second time for The Old English Peep Show. In addition, Dickinson has won several awards for his work as a writer of children's fiction, including the Whitbread Book Award for the novel Tulku in 1969.

ANALYSIS

Peter Dickinson's Pibble novels, while they may be classified technically as police procedurals, do not fit comfortably into that niche. Pibble is a Scotland Yard detective, but by contrast to the more conventional detectives of the genre, he generally works alone, and his investigations do not consistently adhere to realistic police methods. Although Pibble does a fair amount of evidence gathering, fingerprinting, and so on, he more often than not solves his cases by way of inspired leaps of intuition underlaid by a subtle and painstaking process of deduction.

A more radical distinction may be drawn between the character of Pibble and the police detectives of the Golden Age of crime fiction that preceded World War II: the somewhat dimwitted plodders, such as Agatha Christie's Inspector Battle, forever outclassed by the brilliance of Hercule Poirot, or the idealized and heroic police detectives who, like Ngaio Marsh's Inspector Roderick Alleyn, are often from aristocratic backgrounds. Pibble conforms to neither type. He is from a lower-middle-class background and is far from heroic in any conventional sense. However, neither is he dimwitted or plodding. He is possessed of a retentive memory for details, is well-read and an avid crossword puzzler, and often displays flashes of intuitive brilliance. Nevertheless, he frequently makes mistakes and, partly because of class insecurities, allows himself to be bullied by others, both police associates and suspects. Because Pibble is one of the most introspective investigators in the history of the police procedural, his thoughts and perceptions are at times labyrinthine as the reader follows him, often stumbling and seemingly lost, toward a final solution. Thus Pibble is to some extent a deliberate inversion of the heroic Golden Age model of the police detective.

Although the character of Pibble is the most distinguishing feature of the Pibble series, Dickinson's crime scenes, which are often so bizarre as to verge on the surrealistic, are also notable. In The Glass-Sided Ants' Nest, for example, a small group of New Guineans is resettled in a London house, where their chief is brutally murdered. Dickinson cleverly interweaves the story of Pibble's investigation of the murder with the story of the group's life in New Guinea and the events leading up to its migration to England. Equally unconventional is the fourth novel in the series, Sleep and His Brother (1971), in which a recently retired Pibble is drawn into a series of baffling events occurring on the premises of a country house near London, now remodeled and serving as an institution for the care of children suffering from a rare disease that may also produce paranormal powers.

Although it is difficult to generalize about Dickinson's nonseries mysteries, most of them may be loosely classified as historical fiction. Typically, they begin in the present but seek to unravel some mystery—usually a murder—that remains hidden in the past. Often, the past that these elegant mysteries explore is the period of the Golden Age of crime fiction, and the setting for these hidden crimes is a country house reminiscent of the country house settings of Golden Age fiction. However, whereas authors like Christie and Marsh portrayed that world as essentially static and its hierarchical social world still intact, Dickinson reconstructs that same world from a post-World War II perspective, allowing signs of its disintegration to become more apparent. Most representative of these historical reconstructions is The Last House Party (1982), much of which is set in a country manor.

THE GLASS-SIDED ANTS' NEST

The "ants" to which this The Glass-Sided Ants' Nest refers are a small tribe of New Guineans called the Ku. The reasons for their removal to England are revealed in fragments as the novel unfolds, in part through the narrative of Dr. Eve Ku, the English daughter of a missionary to New Guinea, who grew up there and has become a member of the tribe. Before the tribe was removed from New Guinea during World War II, its members had almost all become Christians. However, the degree to which the men of the tribe have accepted a Christian and more "civilized" way of life in England becomes a thematic issue explored at some length by Dickinson. Dr. Ku, whom the tribe regards as a man, is an anthropologist and is working on a study of the tribe's customs. Thus her position in the tribe is ambiguous; she is both participant in and observer of the customs she studies.

The major weakness of this novel is that the solution to the murder of the chief, Aaron, is only tangentially related to its anthropological theme. This weakness is offset somewhat by the fact that the men of the tribe become major suspects in the investigation when Pibble discovers that they have secretly begun to resurrect their pre-Christian practices, largely involving the ritual invocation of an almost forgotten tribal god. The tribe's chief, Aaron, a firm convert to Christianity, had opposed such practices. The other men, Pibble suspects, may have conspired to murder Aaron to remove the primary obstacle to their attempt to preserve their ancient religious beliefs. Thus much of the investigation points toward a solution to the crime that would have been intrinsic to the tribal conflicts whose depiction lies at the thematic center of the novel. However, Dickinson sacrifices the integrity of his plot for the sake of a surprise ending.

Nonetheless, The Glass-Sided Ants' Nest well deserved the praise lavished on it at the time of its publication. Most enduring is the novel's juxtaposition of primitive and civilized cultures, the former deeply embedded in ritual and taboo, and the latter, by contrast, typified by a random and apparently meaningless (from the tribe's point of view) frenzy of activity. In this way, the novel functions as a powerful critique of modern urban society, though it does so without idealizing a more primitive way of life.

SLEEP AND HIS BROTHER

In Greek mythology the phrase "sleep and his brother" refers to Hypnos, the god of sleep and dreams, and Thanatos, the god of death. In Sleep and His Brother, the name of Hypnos is never explicitly mentioned, but he is clearly the symbolic deity who presides over the premises of the south London Sospice estate, now home to the McNair Foundation, which provides care for cathypnics, children afflicted by a rare sleeping sickness (cathypny). This purely fictitious disease, the result of a hormonal abnormality, lowers the body temperature of those afflicted, and generally leads to an early death. The god of death appears here explicitly in the form of a Greek millionaire and developer, Athanasius Thanatos, who is one of the McNair Foundation's financial backers, but whose motives may be more sinister than they at first appear.

When the novel opens, Pibble has been forced into early retirement by his Scotland Yard superiors, and is feeling at odds with himself and more than a little resentful that he has been deprived of an occupation. His involvement with the McNair Foundation has nothing to do, initially, with a criminal investigation. Instead, he is cast in the role of reluctant private consultant, called in by the foundation's secretary. Pibble soon suspects that the foundation's resident psychiatrist, Dr. Ram Silver, may be a fraud—a con man masquerading as a doctor. He becomes involved, as well, with Thanatos, and begins to suspect that this seeming philanthropist is secretly conspiring to turn the Sospice mansion into an exclusive resort. Although no death occurs until someone dies in the midst of an apparent arson at the novel's dramatic conclusion, Pibble is convinced that a murder has indeed occurred; but he lacks the kind of proof that would convince his former Scotland Yard colleagues.

In this novel, Dickinson might be said to be deliberately deconstructing the traditional police procedural in several ways. The suspected murderer, for example, is never publicly exposed, preventing the reader from gaining any traditional sense of closure. Moreover, when late in the novel Pibble's former colleagues from the Yard are called in, they are presented in satirical fashion as brutal careerists, dealing out physical and verbal abuse to hapless bystanders.

Sleep and His Brother draws extensively on contemporary scientific research to create not only a fictitious and yet utterly convincing disease but also a strikingly unconventional setting in which the children afflicted by that disease emerge as sympathetic and engaging characters. These cathypnic children have subnormal intelligence but manage to communicate effectively with vocabularies of no more than three hundred words. Fat and cherubic in appearance, they inspire obsessive affection in everyone. They are also believed to have paranormal abilities, a theme that Dickinson explores at some length, drawing some interesting parallels between Pibble's own intuitive investigative methods and the supposed telepathic powers of the children. In addition, the novel explores questions of medical ethics—especially those involving eugenics and euthanasia—that were in the 1970's (and remain) issues of political and social concern but which are rarely dealt with so seriously in crime fiction. In fact, the solution to this hypothetical murder turns on the willingness of one researcher to use the cathypnic children as sacrificial lambs in his quest for a Nobel Prize.

THE LAST HOUSE PARTY

The party in The Last House Party is a gathering of the English social elite for a weekend of games, political intrigue, sumptuous dinners, and a glittering ball. The party takes place at the Snailwood mansion in 1937, amid portents of the coming war with Germany. At the climax of these events, an eight-year-old girl, daughter of Lady Snailwood's secretary, is sexually assaulted. Decades later that little girl, Sally Dubigny, has become the caretaker of the Snailwood estate, but the identity of her assailant remains a mystery. The arrival one day of an old man offering to repair Snailwood's famous tower clock, stopped since 1937, opens up a window into the past and a possible solution to the mystery.

Although Dickinson has been justly praised for the Pibble novels, it is in the later nonsensical works that his fictional powers attain their full maturity. In The Last House Party, plot, characterization, theme, setting, and symbolism are all unified and consistently developed. Dickinson's portrayal of the so-called Snailwood Gang, the aristocratic circle of which the beautiful Lady Zena Snailwood is the cold and calculating centerpiece, is completely convincing. With a sure ear for the dialog of the period, Dickinson explores the conflicting political currents of the era as well as the underlying personal obsessions and perversions that often shape them.

What is most compelling in this novel, however, is the recognition that the country house mystery that it re-creates was, in essence, a ritual tale of guilt and expiation, requiring a scapegoat and a sacrificial victim. Numerous critics of Golden Age fiction have noted that most of the crime novels of the period depict a world that is essentially static, its social hierarchies and customs depicted as eternal and unchanging. Although that placid order is momentarily shattered by murder, its social equilibrium is restored in the end by an unambiguous identification of the killer and by his or her expulsion, symbolically speaking, from the community. The Last House Party, by contrast, while it recreates the glittering surface of that lost world, and alludes frequently to the sacrificial theme, does not offer its readers the same ritual closure. The sacrificial victim is not murdered, but lives on, carrying the repressed memories of that childhood tragedy into the present. In her efforts to find some satisfying closure, she fashions a narrative about past events, believing that she has correctly identified the identity of her assailant. However, that narrative proves to have been built on false supposition and wish fulfillment. In the end she is shattered by the revelation of the assailant's true identity. So, also, is the reader's confidence shaken when the assailant proves to have been not simply the most unlikely suspect but also the most sympathetic. Such an assault on the reader's confidence would have been antithetical to the aims of the Golden Age crime writer.

Jack E. Trotter

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTIONDETECTIVE SUPERINTENDENT JAMES PIBBLE

SERIES: The Glass-Sided Ants' Nest, 1968 (also known as Skin Deep); The Old English Peep Show, 1969 (also known as A Pride of Heroes); The Sinful Stones, 1970 (also known as The Seals); Sleep and His Brother, 1971; Lizard in the Cup, 1972; One Foot in the Grave, 1979

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Green Gene, 1973; The Lively Dead, 1975; The Walking Dead, 1977; A Summer in the Twenties, 1981; The Last House Party, 1982; Hindsight, 1983; Death of a Unicorn, 1984; Tefuga, 1986; Perfect Gallows, 1987; The Yellow Room Conspiracy, 1994; Some Deaths Before Dying, 1999

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVEL: The Poison Oracle, 1974

TELEPLAY: Mandog series, 1972

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: 1968-1980 • The Weathermonger, 1968; Heartsease, 1969; The Devil's Children, 1970; Emma Tupper's Diary, 1971; The Iron Lion, 1972; The Dancing Bear, 1972; The Gift, 1973; Chance, Luck, and Destiny, 1975; Presto! Humorous Bits and Pieces, 1975; The Changes, 1975; King and Joker, 1976; The Blue Hawk, 1976; Anner-ton Pit, 1977; Hepzibah, 1978; The Flight of Dragons, 1979; Tulku, 1979; City of Gold, and Other Stories from the Old Testament, 1980

1981-1990 • The Seventh Raven, 1981; Healer, 1983; Giant Cold, 1984; A Box of Nothing, 1985; Merlin Dreams, 1988; Eva, 1988; AK, 1990

1991-2007 • A Bone from a Dry Sea, 1992; Time and the Clockmice, Etcetera, 1993; Shadow of a

Hero, 1994; Chuck and Danielle, 1996; The Lion Tamer's Daughter, and Other Stories, 1997; Mann's Story, 1998; Suth's Story, 1998; Noli's Story, 1998; Po's Story, 1998; The Ropemaker, 2001; The Tears of the Salamander, 2003; The Kin, 2003; Inside Granddad, 2004; Angel Isle, 2007

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Binyon, T. J. Murder Will Out. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989. Useful discussion of the police procedural in chapter 3, including a brief reflection on Dickinson's place in the genre.

Casiday, Bruce, and Waltraud Woeller. The Literature of Crime and Detection. New York: Ungar, 1988. Features a chapter titled "The Psychological Thriller" that provides useful background for students of Dickinson's nonseries novels.

Dickinson, Peter. "Murder in the Manor." The Armchair Detective (Spring, 1991). Here Dickinson expounds, from the point of view of writer and reader, on the Golden Age crime novel as a literary and psychological artifact.

Scaggs, John. Crime Fiction: New Critical Idiom. New York: Routledge, 2005. Provides useful chapters on the role of the police procedural in maintaining the social status quo and on the parallels between historical research and crime investigation; relevant for Dickinson's series and nonseries novels.

Symons, Julian. Bloody Murder: From the Detective Story to the Crime Novel—A History. 3d ed. New York: Mysterious Press, 1993. Symons's analysis of the Golden Age country house mystery is essential for grasping Dickinson's later novels.

HEIMITO VON DODERER

Born: Weidlingau, near Vienna, Austro-Hungarian Empire (now in Austria); September 5, 1896

Died: Vienna, Austria; December 23, 1966

Types of plot: Historical; psychological

CONTRIBUTION

Heimito von Doderer is the undisputed master of the modern Austrian novel. Although not a writer of mystery and detective fiction in the narrow sense of the term, Doderer, like Fyodor Dostoevski, adapted the conventions of the genre to his own ends. In his novels, as in Dostoevski's, crime and detection have a metaphysical significance. Doderer's readers must themselves become "detectives," able to distinguish between different levels of reality. In his short fiction as well, Doderer reveals the influence of the mystery genre; his treatment of the mysterious and the supernatural is in the tradition of Edgar Allan Poe.

BIOGRAPHY

Heimito von Doderer was born on September 5, 1896, in the small town of Weidlingau, near the city of Vienna, Austria. He was the youngest of six children of Wilhelm Ritter von Doderer and Luise Wilhelmine von Doderer. He grew up and went to school in Vienna. In the fall of 1914, he matriculated as a law student at the University of Vienna.

In 1915, Doderer entered the military service and advanced to the rank of lieutenant. The following summer he was taken prisoner of war in Russia, where he was interned in various camps in Siberia and East Asia. In 1920, he fled from a camp and walked from the Kirghiz Steppe back to Vienna. He resumed his studies at the university, now in history and psychology. He earned a doctorate in medieval history in 1925.

Doderer started to write in 1916 and continued while a prisoner of war. In the 1920's he managed to publish some of his poetry and short stories, but he failed to gain widespread recognition. In the late 1920's he supported himself primarily by writing historical feuilletons for various Vienna newspapers. In 1929, Doderer encountered the work of the writer and painter Albert Paris Gütersloh, a profound experience that was to guide him as a writer and thinker for the remainder of his life. He articulated the influence that this artist had on him in the monograph Der Fall Gütersloh (1930; the Gütersloh case).

The 1930's were important but turbulent years. In 1930, Doderer married Gusti Hasterlik, a woman he had loved for ten years. The marriage failed after two years, and they were divorced in 1938. In 1933, Doderer became a member for several years of the then-illegal Austrian Nazi Party. After two years of extensive study and instruction, Doderer converted to Catholicism in 1940. In that decade he also gained literary prominence with the publication of Ein Mord den jeder begeht (1938; Every Man a Murderer, 1964) and Ein Umweg (1940; a detour).

During World War II, Doderer served as a lieutenant and captain in the German air force. While stationed in France, he began writing Die Strudlhofstiege: Oder, Melzer und die Tiefe der Jahre (1951; the Strudlhof steps), the novel that made him famous in Europe. In 1952 he married Maria Emma Thoma. In 1956 he published Die Dämonen: Nach der Chronik des Sektionsrates Geyrenhoff (The Demons, 1961), the work that brought him worldwide recognition as one of the most important prose writers of German literature in the twentieth century.

During the last decade of his life, Doderer published other novels, several volumes of short stories, numerous essays, and his diaries. He also began writing a grandly designed tetralogy to be called Roman No 7 (novel number 7). The first part was completed as Erster Teil: Die Wasserfälle von Slunj (1963; The Waterfalls of Slunj, 1966). The second part, Zweiter Teil: Der Grenzwald (1967; the forest at the border), was published posthumously. Doderer died on December 23, 1966, in Vienna, Austria.

ANALYSIS

Heimito von Doderer's fictional world is a delightful mixture of excruciatingly close adherence to precise description of concrete details and an equally strong dedication to belief in the mysteries of the fantasy world. It is known, for example, that Doderer would examine meteorological records in Vienna simply to ensure that his description of the weather on a particular day would be in absolute congruence with the facts of that day in history. His descriptions of Vienna, to cite another example, are so accurate that the reader of his fiction can rely on them perfectly and use them as a traveler's guide without fail.

As a trained historian—he had a doctorate in medieval history from the University of Vienna and was a member of the Institute for the Study of Austrian History—Doderer approached his task as a writer with an uncanny appreciation for details and valid facts. A part of his training required that he learn the various languages and dialects that were in use during medieval times. Consequently, when the plot of The Demons called for the inclusion of a manuscript on medieval sorcery found in the library of a castle that dated back to those times, Doderer was able to create a fictional manuscript that truthfully reflected the topic of witchcraft in the fourteenth century. Furthermore, the manuscript—which is fifty pages long in the printed text—was written in the South Bavarian dialect of Early New High German. (The translators have rendered the manuscript in the language of William Caxton, the first English printer, who flourished in the second half of the fifteenth century.)

The fantasy world is created with the same attention paid to order and detail. In virtually all Doderer's major works there appear forms of dragons. These mythical beasts took on various guises, as Doderer explained in his essay "The Return of the Dragons" (1958). In his own lifetime, Doderer experienced the appearance of strange creatures: a lobster or crab found in the French Bay of Toulon that was more than three feet long, well over twice the previously known size of this species; an eel-type fish caught in the Danube near Vienna that was about five feet long, with a head whose circumference was well over two feet and a weight close to sixty pounds; a grass or ring snake that he saw as a youth near his summer home draped across a brook like a garland, which he estimated to have been close to ten feet long.

These examples of strange creatures may not in fact resemble the terrible monsters with crested heads and tremendous claws, often spouting fire, which the medieval knight fought to gain the love of a fair maiden. They are, however, modern manifestations of the same concept. Doderer reproves the nineteenth century zoologists for excluding this ancient form of animal from their taxonomic descriptions of the animal world merely because they could find no living examples of the dragons. As one proof of their continued existence, Doderer gives the example of the famous Komodo dragon, a lizardlike animal found in the wild interior of the island of Java, which is almost twenty feet long and has all the physical characteristics of the dragon except that, when angered, it spews a very foul smell rather than fire. Despite such evidence, Doderer concludes, the scientists of the nineteenth century established a "type of zoological totalitarianism in which things (such as dragons) cannot be, which are not allowed to be." One should, he adds, be cautious when walking through the woods alone. Suddenly, passing a cavernous ravine, one may encounter a ferocious beast that needs to be slain before one can gain the love of a fair maiden.

Virtually all Doderer's novels and short stories, even many of his "shortest" stories, are detective stories in which the psychological and biographical motivations of an individual or group are examined. The results of such an investigation lead generally to a greater apperception of the self or the group. The cause of the "crime" is normally found to be the character's living in a state of nonacceptance of reality. Doderer calls this the "second reality."

In the essay "Principles and Function of the Novel" (1958), Doderer states that to bring about the "first reality"—whether for author, character, or reader—it is essential to go through a process of experiencing an event, of forgetting that event, and finally of remembering. "Writing," Doderer maintains, "is the unveiling of grammar through a sudden burst of coincidental remembering." The remembered experience undergoes a conversion to the medium used by the writer, namely language. At this point, the significance of the experience is also examined and transformed by the writer as moralist. Consequently, the completed work is a psychological novel of development. The individual character has undergone a process that not only has led to that stage of greater apperception of the self—the “first reality”—but also has made him become a more humane individual.

In the same essay, Doderer also speaks about the structure of the novel. A lifelong admirer of Ludwig van Beethoven, he compares the novel to the symphony, an elaborate composition in three or four movements: The novel, like a symphony, comprises an exposition in which numerous contrasting themes are introduced, a development of these themes, a recapitulation of the themes, and a coda that brings the composition to a satisfactory conclusion. A “great symphony” of several movements would repeat the basic form numerous times. Because the classic symphony requires the use of a very strict and specific form, Doderer makes the same demand of the novel. And as he writes, he gives initial priority to the form of the novel rather than the content.

To have an overall picture while working on a novel, Doderer developed a series of sketches or blueprints, just as an architect draws a plan for a building.

Heimito von Doderer.

He mentions having used a drawing board to plot the major novels, especially the later polygraphic works. In this way, Doderer was able to keep track of the scores of characters and the highly convoluted plots that are so characteristic of his work. As a result of this technique of writing, the reader always enjoys a heightened experience of suspense, while at the same time following a story that is realistically told and that is consistent within itself.

EVERY MAN A MURDERER

A closer examination of the two major novels that have been translated into English illustrates Doderer’s theory and technique. Every Man a Murderer begins:

Everyone’s childhood is plumped down over his head like a bucket. The contents of this bucket are at first unknown. But throughout life, the stuff drips down on him slowly—and there’s no sense changing clothes or costume, for the dripping will continue.

The man whose life is to be related here . . . might almost serve as a proof that no one can ever wash away that bucket’s contents.

With this statement as a motto, the life of Conrad Castiletz is examined in a leisurely and very methodical fashion. It begins with detailed descriptions of the child and his family, the home life of a relatively well-to-do textile merchant in a major urban environment around the turn of the twentieth century. The narrative resembles a traditional psychological study of the well-ordered life of this young man. Indeed, nothing seems to be extraordinary. Yet, it becomes disturbing when the life of young Conrad continues in this orderly, almost nonhuman way. He seems to avoid all experiences that cannot be subjected to his control: Every morning he previews the day’s events to ensure that he is properly prepared to meet them without fail or surprise. There are nevertheless times when he is confronted by the unexpected. In such cases, when he cannot impose order on an event, Conrad has the facility to relegate it to his subconscious.

Yet, in Doderer’s work and clearly in Every Man a Murderer, both what is unexpected and what is ordinary on first occurrence are often a “second reality.” Events may seem transparent or they may seem mysterious. Neither Conrad nor the reader perceives the “first reality” until life—and the novel—continues, the events forgotten and then remembered. What is initially not a crime becomes one; what was a mystery is resolved. Conrad’s life, which once had been in a state of nonacceptance of reality, becomes a fully apperceived life, the “first reality.”

THE DEMONS

The Demons deals with the confusion of “second reality” and the ultimate emergence of a “first reality” on a more massive scale. Doderer begins:

And yet—in fact you need only draw a single thread at any point you choose out of the fabric of life and the run will make a pathway across the whole, and down that wider pathway each of the other threads will become successively visible, one by one. For the whole is contained in the smallest segment of anyone’s life-story; indeed, we may even say that it is contained in every single moment; start up your dredging machine and you take it all up, no matter whether ecstasy, despair, boredom, or triumph happens to fill the moving buckets on their endless chain of ticking seconds.

This passage introduces the motto of this polygraphic novel of more than thirteen hundred pages in which Doderer examines not one character but an entire cross section of society at a critical point in history. The novel is set in Vienna from the fall of 1926 until July, 1927; it is narrated, however, from the perspective of twenty-eight years later, 1955.

The main narrator is the retired civil servant Georg von Geyrenhoff, who assures the reader that the historical events that led up to the burning of the Palace of Justice are fully and convincingly recorded in these pages. In 1955, when he submits his report, Geyrenhoff realizes that that event was “the Cannae of Austrian freedom,” even though no one knew it at that time. Austria had fallen victim to the false ideology of German Nazism—a “second reality” in which an entire country lived. It could not recover until it experienced the total depth of destruction of World War II and realized that it had subjected itself to demoniac forces. Doderer noted that the refusal to perceive reality in a valid manner—he named this “deperception”—can be seen on a national level as well as on an individual basis. To recover from the illness of a time and become humane once more requires a conscious perception of reality, an apperception or a living in a “first reality.”

The novel, however, is far more than a historical or philosophical report. To arrive at the “first reality” requires detection, and mysteries must be solved. An apparently upright member of the community is a secret thief. An underworld character commits a seemingly senseless murder. The subterranean sewers of Vienna harbor a demoniac force, and there are other forms and creatures that threaten life from below, but they cannot be readily perceived.

Evil forces from the depths of time reside in the medieval manuscript found in the Neudegg Castle. It reports the 1464 trial of two women charged with practicing sorcery, specifically the sexual power of magic. It was, however, not a real trial, since the entire scheme served only the voyeuristic perversions of the master of the castle, Achaz Neudegger. The manuscript is a detailed account of the establishment of a “second reality” in a fantasy world of times past. Parenthetically it can be observed that the current owner and the reader of the manuscript will reach the desired level of apperception only after they have critically examined the manuscript and have established the false ideology that it reports.

From the lower depths of the subconscious comes “Kap’s Night Book,” a diary of dreams kept by Anna Kapsreiter. The two chapters of the novel devoted to this diary are limited to thirteen dreams. All a reflection of Anna’s waking life, the dreams are, at the same time, prophetic. Unlike the thoughts, feelings, and actions of many other characters, those of Anna Kapsreiter occur on the level of a “first reality.” She was perhaps the only one who knew that the burning of the Palace of Justice signified “the Cannae of Austrian freedom.” Unfortunately, she could not tell everyone else.

This massive novel has 142 characters, of which almost three dozen are main characters. There is no single or main plot, but many plots that involve all characters in some way. Some lead almost normal lives, while the stories of others can be absurd and grotesque, fanciful, or totally lacking in imagination, modern or medieval. In the end, Doderer certainly ties up all the threads, completing the metaphor with which the novel begins, but his own comparison to music is more reflective of this work. In The Demons, Doderer has composed a “great symphony” with its elaborate movements of contrasting themes fully developed and a final coda that brings the entire composition to a satisfactory conclusion.

Thomas H. Falk

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: Das Geheimnis des Reichs, 1930; Ein Umweg, 1940; Die erleuchteten Fenster, 1950; Die Strudlhofstiege: Oder, Melzer und die Tiefe der Jahre, 1951; Die Merowinger, 1962; Roman No. 7, Erster Teil: Die Wasserfälle von Slunj, 1963 (The Waterfalls of Slunj, 1966); Roman No. 7, Zweiter Teil: Der Grenzwald, 1967 (fragment)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Die Bresche, 1924; Ein Mord den Jeder begeht, 1938 (Every Man a Murderer, 1964); Das letzte Abenteuer, 1953 (novella); Die Dämonen: Nach der Chronik des Sektionsrates Geyrenhoff, 1956 (The Demons, 1961)

SHORT FICTION: Die Posaunen von Jericho, 1958; Die Peinigung der Lederbeutelchen, 1959; Meine neunzehn Lebensläufe und neun andere Geschichten, 1966; Unter schwarzen Sternene, 1966; Frühe Prosa, 1968; Die Erzählungen, 1972

POETRY: Gassen und Landschaft, 1923; Ein Weg im Dunkeln, 1957

NONFICTION: Der Fall Gütersloh, 1930; Julius

Winkler, 1937; Grundlagen und Funktion des Romans, 1959; Tangenten: Tagebuch eines Schriftstellers, 1940-1950, 1964 (diaries); Repertorium, 1969; Die Wiederkehr der Drachen, 1970; Commentarii: Tagebücher 1951 bis 1956, 1976; Commentarii: Tagebücher 1957-1966, 1986; Heimito von Doderer-Albert Paris Gütersloh: Briefwechsel, 1928-1962, 1986

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bachem, Michael. Heimito von Doderer. Boston: Twayne, 1981. Contains biography as well as close analysis of Doderer's works and a bibliography of primary and secondary sources.

Dassanowsky, Robert von. Review of The Lighted Windows. Southern Humanities Review 35 (Fall, 2001). Reviews the republication of Doderer's novel, with notes and forward by John S. Barrett.

Hesson, Elizabeth. Twentieth Century Odyssey: A Study of Heimito von Doderer's "Die Dämonen." Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1983. A thorough study of Doderer's most important work.

Kling, Vincent. Afterword to A Person Made of Porcelain, and Other Stories, by Heimito von Doderer. Riverside, Calif.: Ariadne Press, 2005. Useful commentary on Doderer's short fiction.

Pfeiffer, Engelbert. The Writer's Place: Heimito von Doderer and the Alsergrund District of Vienna. Translated by Vincent Kling. Riverside, Calif.: Ariadne Press, 2001. Study of the neighborhood in which Doderer lived and its importance to understanding his work.

D. J. DONALDSON

Born: Sylvania, Ohio; 1941

Also wrote as David Best; Don Donaldson

Types of plot: Police procedural; psychological; thriller

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Andy Broussard and Kit Franklyn, 1988-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

ANDY BROUSSARD is a well-seasoned, expansive, and self-indulgent medical examiner in New Orleans. He thrives on the challenge of finding answers and the truth, but he never loses sight of the effect that death has on the living. He is an eclectic mix of the sophisticate and down-to-earth regular guy, having a fondness for opera, Louis L'Amour novels, and lemon drops.

KIT FRANKLYN, a psychologist who works as a suicide investigator in the coroner's office, is a perfect foil to Broussard as she focuses on the emotional and psychological aspects, particularly motive, rather than the physical facts. Her personality, too, is the opposite of his: She is idealistic and inexperienced, with a natural caution tempered by some curiosity and a tendency to find herself in awkward and dangerous situations.

CONTRIBUTION

D. J. Donaldson is distinguished as one of the first authors to use a forensic scientist as a primary character in a mystery series. Despite the attention he pays to forensic detail in his works, they are not grotesque and include just enough violence and criminal intent to have some of the elements of a hard-boiled detective novel. In addition, the main characters, Andy Broussard and Kit Franklyn—the traditional, experienced forensic scientist and the younger, more expressive psychologist—are accessible to a broad audience.

Donaldson's Broussard and Franklyn series is notable for its setting of New Orleans; he makes the city virtually a character in and of itself. The incidents in the novels take place all over the city, in front of its singular urban backdrops and in the bayous with alligators and fishing shacks. Donaldson liberally peppers his novels with details about the city's history and culture to lend credence to the milieu, which is also enhanced by recurring characters who have a strong cultural flavor right down to their accents.

After writing six novels in the Broussard and Franklyn series, Donaldson began to write psychological/medical thrillers, employing his expertise in neurology and anatomy. Written as Don Donaldson and David Best, these works all take place in medical or psychological settings and have the same underlying theme of scientific discovery taking precedence over ethical concerns such as patients' rights. Oddly enough, another prevalent theme is the struggle of the primary character, who is always a woman, to achieve confidence and recognition in her chosen, usually male-dominated profession.

BIOGRAPHY

Donald Jay Donaldson grew up in Sylvania, Ohio, and married his wife, June, in Florida in February, 1961. He received a bachelor's degree from the University of Toledo and returned to Sylvania to become a teacher of ninth-grade general science. This lasted only six months until Donaldson began pursuing a doctorate in human anatomy.

Donaldson relocated to New Orleans and spent five years at Tulane University working on his doctorate. He has admitted that New Orleans did not impress him while he was there. It was not until he began writing fiction that he came to appreciate all that New Orleans had to offer, saying that there was only one place he wanted to write about, "mysterious, sleazy, beautiful New Orleans."

After finishing his degree, Donaldson moved again, this time to Tennessee, where he became a professor of anatomy and neurobiology at the University of Tennessee Medical School, teaching microscopic anatomy. Although he enjoyed teaching, he felt that something was missing, and he determined that he wanted to try his hand at writing fiction.

To prepare for writing what would ultimately become the Broussard and Franklyn series, Donaldson spent some time at the county forensic center with medical examiner Jim Bell. He attributed much of his first novel, including the inspiration for his primary character, to Bell:

Unfortunately, Jim died unexpectedly after falling into a diabetic coma a few months before the first book was published. Though he was an avid reader, he never got to see a word of the book he helped me with. In many ways, Jim lives on as Broussard. Broussard's brilliant mind, his weight problem, his appreciation of fine food and antiques, his love for Louis L'Amour novels . . . that was Jim Bell.

ANALYSIS

D. J. Donaldson's Andy Broussard and Kit Franklyn series is in the seductive and seedy setting of New Orleans, and centers on a medical examiner and his newly hired suicide investigator/psychologist. Their relationship is very hierarchical, both in professional terms because Broussard is Franklyn's boss and in emotional terms because he is her mentor and her protector in a world that is both male dominated and violence driven. Their relationship develops over the six novels: Broussard goes beyond the role of a mentor, becoming more parental and protective, and Franklyn suffers "growing pains" when she faces violence, death, and evil intent, and struggles to make sense of it all in the world of law enforcement.

Like the authors of many forensic-science novels, Donaldson strives to remain true to the science and stoicism of police work. He focuses on the evidence, specifically the physical and corporal detail, using it not only to determine cause of death but also to infer means and motive. Periodically, however, Donaldson takes a morbid turn, as when he writes "a dreadful array of bone and blood, sinew and skin. Through the gore, a displaced eye could be seen dangling like a spent flower." This gruesome imagery is as much a part of the Donaldson formula as is his interest in having characters die of exotic causes and then providing detailed descriptions of the diseases' effects.

This formula carries through to the novels written later, under the names of Don Donaldson and David Best. They also have common themes that exploit the ethical and political issues that seem to be inherent in the practice of medicine and medical research, areas with which the author is professionally familiar.

CAJUN NIGHTS

Cajun Nights (1988) is the first book in the Andy Broussard and Kit Franklyn series and definitely has one of the more intriguing plots, focusing as it does on the connection between nursery rhymes and classic cars. The modern-day mystery is interwoven with the tale of a man who was hanged in Louisiana in 1738. His dying words are repeated by one of the characters as if to explain some mysterious deaths:

one day I will return and right this wrong as I did the other. And the streets of this city will run with blood as friend slays friend, fathers slay their children and rampant suicide sends the souls of men by the hundreds to everlasting hell. . . . beware the songs you loved in youth.

What seem at first to be a couple of unrelated murder-suicides are revealed as more nefarious after Franklyn investigates. Both victims owned the same rare classic car model, and both were observed to be acting strangely and singing nursery songs right before they murdered their families and then killed themselves. The story plays on the mystic past of New Orleans and creates some memorable characters in the city's residents, but it is the investigative science that uncovers an insane legacy of revenge.

OTHER BROUSSARD AND FRANKLYN NOVELS

Franklyn's expertise and maturity develop throughout the succeeding novels, with Broussard standing by to help guide her, providing sage advice and lemon drops for comfort. Blood on the Bayou (1991) exploits the legend of the loup-garou, or lycanthrope, against the backdrop of a southern plantation. It also introduces Franklyn to Teddy Labiche, who comes to play a larger role in her life in subsequent novels. No Mardi Gras for the Dead (1992) employs the unlikely weapon of a rose as a mood-altering instrument, with a would-be suitor literally falling dead at Franklyn's feet. New Orleans Requiem (1994) draws Franklyn and Broussard into a gruesome game of scrabble with letters left on the mutilated chests of corpses. A further-reaching and insidious killer is introduced in Louisiana Fever (1996) with an ebola-like virus as a by-product of a smuggling ring. In Sleeping with the Crawfish (1997), Franklyn and Broussard face down a ruthless scientist, uncover a crooked police officer, and bring down a governor. The book ends with an affirmation from Broussard—"There's no one who can do your job better. Please come back. Andy."—which persuades Franklyn, who had been contemplating a more mundane career, to return to fighting the good fight with Broussard.

DO NO HARM

Do No Harm is somewhat different from the novels in Donaldson's initial series in that the violence is recounted as it occurs, rather than recreated from an examination of what is left at the scene as Franklyn and Broussard habitually do. This introduces an element of impending danger, speeds up the pace, and underscores the malevolence of the plot, which is a twist on the story of a doctor "playing God" with an experimental treatment on unaware and uninformed patients. The reader is introduced to the villain in the beginning of the story, the motive and method are kept a mystery, and it is the means and the science behind the motive that are revealed a bit at a time.

Sarchi Seminoux, a pediatric resident, is drawn into the plot when her nephew has a sudden, unexplained neurological attack. After some angst, her nephew is miraculously cured by neurosurgeon Dr. Latham but with some inexplicable side effects. Seminoux investigates, researching neurological disorders, consulting specialists, and interviewing Latham's former patients. All of this leads her to suspect him of some improper conduct or malpractice. Dr. Latham, a respected neurosurgeon, has been using the database of the Cord Blood Repository to match healthy children from that database to patients in his own clinic with Huntington's disease, Parkinson's disease, and similar neurological disorders.

Seminoux does nothing to hide her suspicions, assuming instead that drawing the attention of the appropriate authorities will resolve the issue. She does not anticipate either the politics involved in medicine nor the fact that Latham is willing to go to great lengths to protect his own interests. Latham employs a number of suspicious characters to set her up and "gaslight" Seminoux, in an effort to distract her, make her doubt her findings, and discredit her with her colleagues.

In Do No Harm, as in the Broussard and Franklyn novels, the heroine is gothic in her naïveté, bordering on trite in her inability to take charge of a situation at least in the beginning. Donaldson depicts a woman, really an ingénue, in a male-dominated profession who is tested throughout the events of the novel, through violence, malice, and death. She comes through these events forever changed, but stronger for the struggle.

Dr. Koesler, a counterpoint for Seminoux and playing the same role of a superior man as Broussard, sums it up in the last pages of Do No Harm with this statement:

We live in a soft country where things come easily and people can get along fine without backbone if they're bright enough. You were once that way. . . . You don't work with me there unless you're a fine doctor and have the fiber to stand straight under fire. After what you've done in the last few weeks, you, Dr. Seminoux, are just such a person.

It certainly underscores this theme of trial by fire, whether it is just the age-old story of innocence meeting adversity and maturing to triumph or seeking to underscore the struggle that female doctors and scientists face professionally.

AMNESIA

Donaldson again looks at the perversion of medicine in Amnesia, epitomized in the opening thoughts of the villain:

The logical next step in his research unfolded in his mind like the birth of something hideously deformed. And he found it appalling. But even as he stood there, marshaling all the reasons it couldn't . . . shouldn't be done, he knew it was only a matter of time before he gave in.

The story starts at a medical conference where a disagreement ensues about the possibility of "making movies of memory." When the speaker, Oren Quinn, an administrator at Gibson State Mental Hospital, picks Marti Segerson out of the audience and asks her opinion, Segerson acknowledges the possibility. Soon the reader discovers that Segerson had contacted Quinn in an effort to secure a position in his hospital.

Segerson is a psychiatrist who sees an opportunity to resolve personal issues and questions by taking a position in the mental hospital that houses the serial killer who confessed to murdering her sister. Oddly enough, the “eccentric” administrator of the hospital is as sociopathic as the serial killer, performing experiments on memory and recall on patients and medical staff alike and surgically implanting a device that can revise memories as well as record them, all in the name of scientific advancement. He uses one of his patients, a serial killer, as he might a rat in a maze, implanting certain instructions or giving him orders and setting him free to stalk a new victim. As Segerson continues to investigate and discovers these abnormal experiments, she becomes the doctor’s next subject.

The novel concludes with an explanation of what has transpired. As Segerson prepares to forget and move on, she is asked a riddle by a “wise” patient with whom she had developed a friendship, “When is the most progress made with the fewest steps?” She comes to a sudden, life-changing realization that it is “when it is right in front of you,” and with that, she commits to staying to help the patients in the asylum.

Donaldson’s work is accurate in its depiction of the forensic science and the investigative process, with a little drama thrown in to further the plot. His characters are likable and engaging if somewhat contrived and superficial, but his depiction of New Orleans—its glamour, its seamy side, its rich southern history, and natural beauty—is accurate.

Wendi Arant Kaspar

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

ANDY BROUSSARD AND KIT FRANKLYN SERIES: Cajun Nights, 1988; Blood on the Bayou, 1991; No Mardi Gras for the Dead, 1992; New Orleans Requiem, 1994; Louisiana Fever, 1996; Sleeping With the Crawfish, 1997

NONSERIES NOVELS: Do No Harm, 1999 (as Don Donaldson); In the Blood, 2001 (as Don Donaldson); The Judas Virus (as Best), 2003; Amnesia (as Best), 2004

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Anderson, Patrick. The Triumph of the Thriller: How Cops, Crooks, and Cannibals Captured Popular Fiction. New York: Random House, 2007. Anderson, the thriller reviewer for The Washington Post, discusses the popularity of this genre and gives his opinions regarding its writers. Includes discussion of medical thrillers.
- Burch, Peggy. “A Turn Toward Fresh Thrills: Medical Novelist Finds Change the Best Tonic for Career.” Commercial Appeal, October 1, 1999. Article discusses Donaldson’s decision to write medical thrillers.
- Conlee, Lynn. “Murder, He Wrote.” Agenda (July/August, 1998). This profile of Donaldson includes his history and reasons for writing what he did.
- Donaldson, D. J. Official Website of Don Donaldson. <http://www.donaldson.com/> The author’s Web site provides a casual biography, reviews of books, and descriptions of some of his works.
- Genge, Ngaire. The Forensic Casebook: The Science of Crime Scene Investigation. New York: Ballantine Books, 2002. Deals with all aspects of forensic science as it pertains to investigation crime. Draws on interviews with forensic experts and police and contains many true-crime stories.
- Thomas, Ronald R. Detective Fiction and the Rise of Forensic Science. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999. An examination of the development of forensic science in the mystery novel, focusing on older works.

FYODOR DOSTOEVSKI

Born: Moscow, Russia; November 11, 1821

Died: St. Petersburg, Russia; February 9, 1881

Types of plot: Psychological; thriller; inverted

CONTRIBUTION

Although most of Fyodor Dostoevski's major works deal with crime, especially murder and suicide, only two of his works fit into the genre of detective fiction, and only one is frequently associated with the popular form known as the murder mystery. Bratya Karamazovy (1879-1880; The Brothers Karamazov, 1912) deals with a murder, a manhunt, and a trial, but Prestupleniye i nakazaniye (1866; Crime and Punishment, 1886) focuses more closely on the nature of crime and its detection. In Crime and Punishment, Dostoevski elevates the murder mystery to the level of great art. Engaging in a penetrating study of the criminal mind, he probes deeply into the psychopathology of crime. He follows the criminal through his obsessions, his anxieties, and his nightmares.

By highlighting the effects of poverty and isolation on potential criminals, Dostoevski depicts the social milieu that breeds crime and encourages criminal behavior. Furthermore, he re-creates big-city life, with its nefarious characters and its hopeless derelicts living at the brink of despair. Probing deeply into the shadows of the human condition, he tries to unearth the root of crime itself.

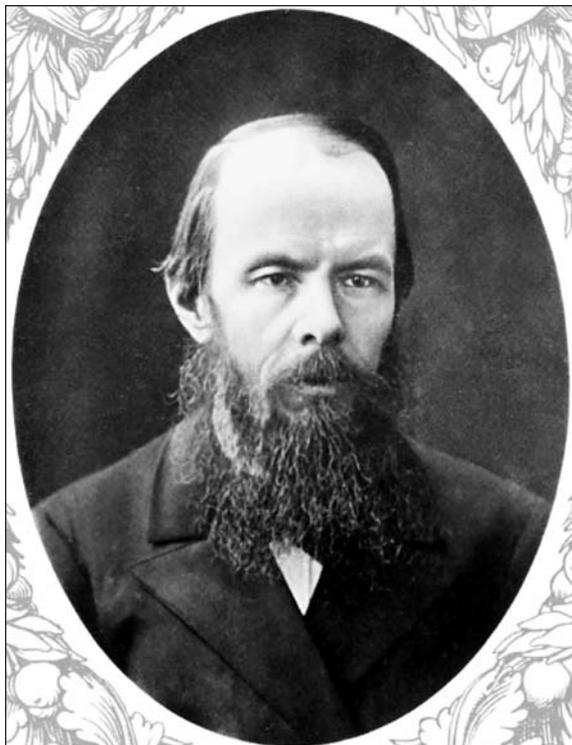

Dostoevski goes beyond the sociology of crime and murder, however, to explore its politics and metaphysics. Instead of asking who the murderer is, he explores such questions as, is murder permissible? If so, by whom? Under what conditions does one differentiate between the revolutionary and the common criminal? He also follows the criminal beyond the act of his apprehension to explore how crime should be punished. To Dostoevski, crime becomes sin, a sin that must be expiated through deep personal suffering and a mystical transformation of character. Dostoevski does not ask who committed the murder, but why there is murder. In his opinion, the murder mystery is merely a vehicle for exploring the mystery of murder.

BIOGRAPHY

Fyodor Mikhailovich Dostoevski was born in Moscow on November 11, 1821. His father, a member of the minor nobility, was a former army surgeon at the Marinsky Hospital for the poor; thus, very early in life, Dostoevski came into contact with poverty, disease, and death—topics that were to haunt his literary works. His father was a tyrannical man, while his mother was a meek, frail woman. During his education in Moscow, Dostoevski was attracted to literary studies, but at his father's bidding, he entered the St. Petersburg Military Academy. While at school, he avidly studied the works of William Shakespeare, Sir Walter Scott, E. T. A. Hoffmann, Nikolai Gogol, and Honoré de Balzac, and especially the romantic dramas of Friedrich Schiller.

In 1839, Dostoevski's father was murdered by his own serfs; thus, murder and its effects touched Dostoevski deeply, as borne out in his last and greatest novel, The Brothers Karamazov. Also, during his student days in St. Petersburg, he came into close contact with poverty, alcoholism, and prostitution as he wandered through the notorious Haymarket district of the city. After completing his education, Dostoevski embarked on a literary career, writing translations, articles, and novels. Soon he came under the influence of radical underground organizations and began publishing subversive articles and working with known revolutionaries. In 1849, he was arrested, imprisoned, condemned to death, and paraded before a firing squad, only to be reprieved at the last minute by the czar, who had never intended to kill him. This experience impressed on him indelibly what it was like to be a condemned criminal.

Escaping execution, he was sentenced to four years of hard labor in Siberia. There he learned not only about the effects of punishment on crime but also about the inner workings of the criminal mind. His close contact with a prisoner named Orlov allowed him to observe the behavior of a cold-blooded murderer who had no fear of punishment. Dostoevski's years of imprisonment were followed by four years of exile as a common soldier.

Fyodor Dostoevski. (Library of Congress)

In 1857, he embarked on a stormy marriage with the tubercular, volatile Maria Isayeva. Meanwhile, he had trouble rekindling his literary career. After several failures in establishing a literary journal, the deaths of his brother and wife, a tempestuous but ill-fated love affair, and a disastrous series of gambling sprees, the impoverished, debt-ridden, and ailing Dostoevski hired Anna Snitkina to help him meet his contractual obligations to his publishers. With her help, he completed Crime and Punishment in 1866, and the next year he married her. Under her guidance, he was able to straighten out his financial affairs and to complete his three great novels: Idiot (1868; The Idiot, 1887), Besny (1871-1872; The Possessed, 1913), and The Brothers Karamazov. He died on February 9, 1881, of a lung hemorrhage. Throngs of admirers attended his funeral.

ANALYSIS

Fyodor Dostoevski is one of the most important figures in the history of the modern novel. His works explore such existential dilemmas as universal guilt, human alienation, the meaning of human suffering, and the limits of morality. His characters are tormented individuals living on the fringe of society, torn between their sensual appetites and their longings for spiritual fulfillment. They are split apart by their self-centered egotism and their need to be a part of the human community and are always searching for certainty in an uncertain world. Dostoevski explores the ambivalence of human emotions, plumbs the nightmare world of the human psyche, and lays bare the anguish of the human soul, torn between self-glorification and self-abasement. His characters reach salvation only through a life of pain and suffering. Only by experiencing the dregs of life can they partake of the mystery of redemption.

Although his themes are somewhat lofty for the detective and mystery genre, Dostoevski foreshadowed many of the character types who would later populate the modern detective thriller. His novels are inhabited by rapists, child molesters, sadists, prostitutes, and cold-blooded murderers who hold themselves above the laws of God and human beings; he also portrays revolutionaries, insurgents, spies, and counterspies. Dostoevski takes the reader into the stench and squalor of the slums, where vice and corruption are a way of life. In his novels, scenes of violence intermingle with drunken orgies. His works deal with lengthy criminal investigations, detailed police interrogations, and prolonged manhunts.

THE BROTHERS KARAMAZOV

Although elements of crime and detection are a staple part of Dostoevski's canon, only two novels, as noted above, can be truly considered detective novels or murder mysteries: The Brothers Karamazov and Crime and Punishment. The Brothers Karamazov is a crime thriller and a mystery novel. When Fyodor Karamazov is brutally murdered, the evidence points clearly to his son Dmitri, who has threatened and attacked his father over money matters and their attempts to woo the same woman. Because he is caught escaping from his father's house on the night of the murder and is found spending large sums of money, he is arrested, tried, and convicted of murder. He is not, however, the murderer. The real murderer commits suicide. In The Brothers Karamazov, the detectives and prosecutors discover clues, compile evidence, and listen to reliable testimony but miss the essential points. Nevertheless, the novel is more than a detective story; it is a story about universal guilt, a story in which God, himself, is put on trial.

In critical articles on the detective novel, The Brothers Karamazov is cited less often than Crime and Punishment. Yet the critical debate over Crime and Punishment demonstrates how controversial is Dostoevski's status as a writer of murder mysteries. According to W. H. Auden, Crime and Punishment is not a true detective story but a work of art because "its effect on the reader is to compel an identification with the murderer." In his opinion, the detective story is a fantasy story, and "fantasy is always an attempt to avoid one's own suffering," whereas Crime and Punishment is a work of art that allows the reader to share "in the suffering of another."

Disagreeing with Auden, Julian Symons writes that the crime story can be a work of art but "a work of art of a peculiar flawed kind, since an appetite for violence and a pleasure in employing a conjurer's sleight of hand seem somehow to be adulterating the finest skills of a novelist." In addition, Symons believes, "at his best the crime writer can illuminate the condition of society and interpret psychotic states of mind, but he never moves like Dostoevski in mystical regions where spiritual truths are being considered." John Cawelti dismisses Crime and Punishment on purely formal grounds. In his opinion, a murder mystery must conceal the crime, focus on an inquiry into hidden clues, and leave the revelation of the criminal until the end of the story. He finds that "Crime and Punishment does not fulfill a single one of the basic structural conditions of the classical detective formula."

It would be beyond the scope of this analysis to assess the definitive elements of a detective story. Certainly, Dostoevski does not strictly follow the Edgar Allan Poe/Sir Arthur Conan Doyle formula. Doyle did not start writing his Sherlock Holmes stories until 1887, after Dostoevski had already completed his major novels. Clearly, Dostoevski was not interested primarily in a tale of ratiocination based on a whodunit model. In discussing Crime and Punishment, he states that he is writing a "psychological account of a crime," a true murder mystery that takes into account not only the crime but also the criminal.

CRIME AND PUNISHMENT

Crime and Punishment shows the way in which Dostoevski skillfully creates the suspenseful elements of the murder mystery thriller. Raskolnikov, a derelict student, plans to kill an elderly pawnbroker. He cases her home carefully, discovers that she will be alone at a certain time, and counts the 750 steps to her apartment (exhibiting a truly Holmesian eye for detail). Despite his careful planning, the murderer is caught in the act when the pawnbroker's demented sister comes in, and he is forced to kill her. Later, two clients show up at the door at the same time as two house painters in an adjacent room are having a brawl. The murderer ducks into a vacant room, making a narrow escape. When he wakes up out of a delirious sleep, he is summoned to the police station, but the police want him simply because he owes his landlady money.

Dostoevski pulls a double reversal, as the murderer hears the story of the murder being discussed and faints. Soon the hunt is on. A mysterious informant appears; just when the detective seems to have the murderer trapped, another suspect dashes in with a false confession. Then, when Raskolnikov confesses his crime to a sympathetic prostitute, the man who wants to seduce Raskolnikov's sister overhears the confession, adding the complication of blackmail. For all of its lofty themes, Crime and Punishment is built around plot machinations similar to those of the thrillers devoured by modern audiences.

Dostoevski, however, is writing more than a pot-boiler. He is writing a murder mystery that can serve as an archetypal study of the genre. Often, the victim in a murder mystery is reduced to the status of a deserving victim. Dostoevski highlights this point; his murderer establishes philosophical grounds for murdering a loathsome person. In a letter to his publisher, Dostoevski described the murder victim as "an old woman, deaf, stupid, evil, and ailing, who herself does not know why she continues living . . . and who after a month, perhaps, would die anyway." Raskolnikov sees her as an insect, without the right to live and thus deserving of death. In The Brothers Karamazov, Ivan questions his father's right to live and finds a clear rationale for murdering the despicable drunkard even though he himself does not commit the murder. Dostoevski defines the murder victim as a person, who, at least in the eyes of the murderer, deserves to die.

Dostoevski also defines the detective. In Crime and Punishment, Porfiry antedates not only Sherlock Holmes but many of the other creations of the early twentieth century mystery writers as well; nevertheless, in him, one can see some of the traits of the modern detective. He is an ordinary civil servant working out of a modest apartment. Like many modern detectives—Peter Falk's Lieutenant Columbo is a classic example—Porfiry is a middle-aged, corpulent man who is aware that his appearance and manners often reveal him to be a slightly comic figure. Thus, it is easy for people to underestimate this master of criminal psychology, adept at using small talk, non sequiturs, and circumlocutions to entrap his quarry.

Porfiry subtly drops hints that he knows Raskolnikov's every move, tells him that he likes to keep criminals at bay so that they can ensnare themselves, works Raskolnikov up to a frenzy using evasive tactics, and then calms him by opening a window to give him fresh air. Like a modern detective, he takes an interest in the suspect and is moved by Raskolnikov's misguided actions. He combines the toughness of a grueling interrogator, who keeps the criminal dangling in a cat-and-mouse game, with the sympathetic concern of a father confessor, who wants the fallen sinner to admit the error of his ways.

Another modern characteristic of Dostoevski's murder mystery is the creation of the anguished world out of which the crime arises. Raskolnikov walks down what Raymond Chandler calls the mean streets of the fallen city. Wandering through the St. Petersburg slums, Raskolnikov encounters a would-be rapist about to take advantage of a delirious young girl, watches a woman throw herself off a bridge, and finds a drunkard who has been run over and left bleeding in the street.

Raskolnikov's environment is oppressive. His apartment is a cramped cubicle with soiled wallpaper, the streets through which he flounders are teeming with squalor, and the world in which he lives is filled with sensuality and violence. In one scene, which could come directly out of a modern detective thriller, Raskolnikov's sister fends off a would-be rapist. She shoots him, grazing his head, but her anger only arouses him more; he dares her to kill him.

Finally, in the bulk of his novel, Dostoevski examines the psychology of the criminal mind. Raskolnikov becomes the archetype for many modern criminals. Like most criminals, he sees himself as above the law. He holds the doctrine that exceptional individuals such as himself are allowed to murder ordinary individuals who stand in their way. Dostoevski highlights this point not only in Raskolnikov's philosophy but also in Ivan Karamazov's dictum that all things can be made lawful.

The criminal is also seen as an isolated and alienated individual. Haunted and hunted, he is suspicious of everyone and breaks off all human contact. Raskolnikov severs all ties with family and friends. The criminal is seen as pathological, for as Raskolnikov writes in his article, crime begets illness. Raskolnikov is delirious, agitated, subject to delusions, and haunted by nightmares. The criminal is viewed not as a stock villain but as a troubled individual plagued by a dual nature, capable of great kindness as well as of extreme cruelty. Raskolnikov can give his money away to a poor widow and save children from a burning fire at the same time that he can kill a helpless mentally disabled girl. Such is the case of the modern mobster in the gangland thriller; a godfather figure can minister to the needs of his family while at the same time casually ordering murders. This focus on the criminal's divided nature adds complexity to the crime novel.

One of the key factors in standard detective fiction is the search for a single motive, but Dostoevski, anticipating a more modern perspective, does not limit the criminal's motives to one factor. So complex are Raskolnikov's motives that he himself cannot sort them out. Besides examining the complexity of the criminal's motives, Dostoevski highlights two central aspects of criminal behavior: the return to the scene of the crime and the compulsion to confess. In a modern mystery, the murderer often stealthily returns to the scene of the crime, perhaps to destroy some pieces of evidence, but Raskolnikov brazenly returns to the pawnbroker's room and asks about the blood. He dares two painters to come to the police station so that he can explain his snooping. This scene also shows his compulsion to confess.

Often the murder mystery focuses on the detective's exposure of the murderer and the murderer's bold confession, which comes as a final catharsis. Raskolnikov wants to confess from the moment he commits the crime. No less than a dozen times, he finds himself on the verge of admitting the truth. In many a murder mystery, it is this subconscious will to confess that often causes the murderer to slip up and leave himself vulnerable to the ever-prying detective. Finally, in his confessions, Raskolnikov discovers the real nightmare of the murder mystery. The murderer in the act of killing another kills himself. Even in a simple murder mystery, the murderer faces execution or the ruin of his life. In Dostoevski's work, he destroys his soul.

Dostoevski uses many stylistic devices to capture the workings of the criminal mind. He uses interior monologues composed of short, clipped sentences and intersperses rambling soliloquies with rapid-fire dialogue. He also depends heavily on repetition of key words and associates certain words with certain characters. Characters' names are associated with their psychological traits as well; Raskolnikov is derived from raskolnik, meaning a schismatic.

In many ways, Dostoevski transcends the limits of the mystery genre; in others, he is thoroughly modern. Both Raymond Chandler and Ross Macdonald held that the modern hard-boiled detective novel is about goodness in the midst of evil, pure-heartedness in the midst of depravity, and courage in the midst of cowardice. Both writers believed that the murder mystery is about the art of redemption, and the art of redemption is the key to Dostoevski's murder mysteries. Instead of a finely tuned aesthetic experience based on cleverly developed, rational deductions, he offers the reader a deeply felt, mystical experience based on sin, suffering, and redemption.

Paul Rosefeldt

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: Prestupleniye i nakazaniye, 1866 (Crime and Punishment, 1886); Bratya Karamazovy, 1879-1880 (The Brothers Karamazov, 1912)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Bednye lyudi, 1846 (Poor Folk, 1887); Dvoynik, 1846 (The Double, 1917); Netochka Nezvanova, 1849 (English translation, 1920); Unizhennye i oskorblyonnye, 1861 (Injury and Insult, 1886; also known as The Insulted and Injured); Zapiski iz myortvogo doma, 1861-1862 (Buried Alive: Or, Ten Years of Penal Servitude in Siberia, 1881; better known as The House of the Dead); Zapiski iz podpolya, 1864 (Letters from the Underworld, 1913; better known as Notes from the Underground); Igrok, 1866 (The Gambler, 1887); Idiot, 1868 (The Idiot, 1887); Vechny muzh, 1870 (The Permanent Husband, 1888; also known as The Eternal Husband); Besy, 1871-1872 (The Possessed, 1913; also known as The Devils); Podrostok, 1875 (A Raw Youth, 1916); The Novels, 1912 (12 volumes)

SHORT FICTION: Sochineniya, 1860 (2 volumes); Polnoye sobraniye sochineniy, 1865-1870 (4 volumes); Povesti i rasskazy, 1882; The Gambler, and Other Stories, 1914; A Christmas Tree and a Wedding, and an Honest Thief, 1917; White Nights, and Other Stories, 1918; An Honest Thief, and Other Stories, 1919; The Short Novels of Dostoevsky, 1945

NONFICTION: "Zimniye zametki o letnikh vpechatleniyakh," 1863 ("Winter Notes on Summer Impressions," 1955); Dnevnik pisatelya, 1876-1887, 1880-1881 (2 volumes; partial translation Pages from the Journal of an Author, 1916; complete translation The Diary of a Writer, 1949); Pisma, 1928-1959 (4 volumes); Iz arkhiva F. M. Dostoyevskogo: "Idiot," 1931 (The Notebooks for "The Idiot," 1967); Iz arkhiva F. M. Dostoyevskogo: "Prestupleniye i nakazaniye," 1931 (The Notebooks for "Crime and Punishment," 1967); F. M. Dostoyevsky: Materialy i issledovaniya, 1935 (The Notebooks for "The Brothers Karamazov," 1971); Zapisnyye tetradi F. M. Dostoyevskogo, 1935 (The Notebooks for "The Possessed," 1968); Dostoevsky's Occasional Writings, 1963; F. M. Dostoyevsky v rabote nad romanom "Podrostok," 1965 (The Notebooks for "A Raw Youth," 1969); Neizdannyy Dostoyevsky: Zapisnyye knizhki i tetradi 1860-1881, 1971 (3 volumes; The Unpublished Dostoevsky: Diaries and Notebooks, 1860-1881, 1973-1976); F. M. Dostoyevsky ob iskusstve, 1973;

Selected Letters of Fyodor Dostoyevsky, 1987

TRANSLATION: Yevgeniya Grande, 1844 (of Honoré de Balzac's novel Eugénie Grandet)

MISCELLANEOUS: Polnoe sobranie sochinenii v tridsati tomakh, 1972-1990 (30 volumes)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adelman, Gary. Retelling Dostoyevsky: Literary Responses and Other Observations. Lewisburg, Pa.: Bucknell University Press, 2001. A study of the possible influence of Dostoevski on a number of authors in various genres.

Frank, Joseph. Dostoevsky. 5 vols. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1976-2002. This mammoth, twenty-five-year undertaking is by far the most comprehensive biography and study of Dostoevski's life and work available.

Kjetsaa, Geir. Fyodor Dostoevsky: A Writer's Life. Translated by Siri Hustvedt and David McDuff. New York: Viking, 1987. A thorough and compelling work on Dostoevski's life that seeks to shed light on the creation of Dostoevski's fiction, citing letters and notes as artistic points of departure for Dostoevski.

Peace, Richard, ed. Fyodor Dostoevsky's "Crime and Punishment": A Casebook. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005. Collection of essays examining the history and meaning of Dostoevski's most famous and influential novel.

Rosenshield, Gary. Western Law, Russian Justice: Dostoevsky, the Jury Trial, and the Law. Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 2005. A careful study of Dostoevski's personal experiences, as well as his detached observations of the Russian justice system.

Scanlan, James P. Dostoevsky the Thinker. Ithaca, N.Y.: Cornell University Press, 2002. Scanlan examines Dostoevsky in the role of philosopher, a central issue in understanding his contribution to literary crime fiction.

SIR ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE

Born: Edinburgh, Scotland; May 22, 1859

Died: Crowborough, East Sussex, England; July 7, 1930

Type of plot: Master sleuth

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Sherlock Holmes, 1886-1927

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

SHERLOCK HOLMES is a private investigator and an eccentric researcher in virtually all areas of criminology. He begins taking cases when in his twenties and continues into his sixties, though he has by then retired from his rooms at 221B Baker Street, London, to beekeeping on a South Downs farm. Though loyal to friends and the social order, he remains above his cases, casting the cool light of reason on seemingly insoluble puzzles. A connoisseur of crime, he languishes in depression when no problem worthy of his great powers is before him.

DR. JOHN H. WATSON is a friend and constant companion of Holmes and historian of his cases. Watson meets Holmes while seeking someone to share a flat. Though married and widowed more than once and maintaining a practice as a physician, Watson aids Holmes regularly until his retirement. He admires and emulates his strange and brilliant friend but can never solve the intricate puzzles on which Holmes thrives.

PROFESSOR MORIARTY, an unscrupulous schemer, the undisputed ruler of London's labyrinthine underworld, is one of Holmes's few intellectual equals.

CONTRIBUTION

Arthur Conan Doyle's short stories and novellas featuring Sherlock Holmes became enduring classics of the mystery and detective genre. Doyle is credited with refining and developing the formula first realized by Edgar Allan Poe in “The Murders in the Rue Morgue” and “The Purloined Letter.” In so doing, he created a form for the detective story that remained enormously popular until World War II and that remained the supreme example of crime fiction throughout the twentieth century. According to John G. Cawelti, this form makes a mythic game of crime; the criminal act becomes a manifestation of potential chaos in the self and society, but the detective asserts reason’s power over this element, reassuring the reader of control over the self and safety within the social order. The continuing popularity of Doyle’s stories is evidenced by their remaining in print in an abundance of competing editions, the scholarly activity they stimulate, and the proliferation of film and video adaptations—as well as new Holmes tales by other authors.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. (Library of Congress)

BIOGRAPHY

Arthur Conan Doyle was born on May 22, 1859, in Edinburgh, Scotland, the fourth child of Charles Doyle and Mary Foley Doyle. Irish Catholics in Protestant Edinburgh, the family felt its minority status. Charles, an artist and public servant, was eventually institutionalized for epilepsy and alcoholism. Seeing talent in young Arthur, the strong and practical Mary Doyle procured for him an excellent education despite their difficult circumstances and eventually saw him through medical school at the University of Edinburgh (1877-1881).

While studying medicine, Doyle published his first story, “The Mystery of Sasassa Valley,” in 1879. Also while at the university, he met his model for Holmes, Dr. Joseph Bell, to whom he dedicated his first collection, The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes (1892). He married Louise Hawkins after completing his M.D. in 1885. His medical practice was never financially successful. After the publication of his first Holmes novel, A Study in Scarlet (1887), he gradually became able to earn a good living at writing, and he abandoned medical practice in 1891.

Though his Holmes tales earned for him fame and fortune, Doyle’s dream was to become a great historical novelist like Sir Walter Scott. A prolific writer, Doyle continued to produce painstakingly researched and rendered historical romances, few of which found many readers. Doyle became frustrated as the stories he considered potboilers appeared in The Strand, a new popular magazine, and demand for more of them increased. He tried to “kill off” Holmes in “The Final Problem,” but seven years later he was again writing about him.

Doyle’s private career was nearly as eventful as Holmes’s. He was twice a ship’s medical officer. In the Boer War, he served under terrible conditions and without pay as a medical officer. His published defense of the British conduct of the war won for him knighthood. He interested himself in reform movements and twice ran unsuccessfully for Parliament. In 1897, he met and fell in love with Jean Leckie. He married her ten years later, after the death of his first wife from tuberculosis. With his first wife he had two children, with his second, three.

The loss of his first son, Kingsley, and several friends in World War I motivated Doyle to join the spiritualist movement, about which he wrote extensively. He continued to produce memorable fiction, not only Holmes stories but also an adventure series with Professor Challenger as the hero. The Lost World (1912) is the best-known novel in this series. Doyle died of heart disease at his home, Windlesham, in Crowborough, East Sussex, England, on July 7, 1930.

ANALYSIS

Arthur Conan Doyle wrote the Holmes stories mainly to earn money. He did not think of them as serious works of art and was somewhat dismayed at their success. He had apparently stumbled on a formula that would hold the readers of the new mass-circulation magazines that catered to urban readers educated in the public schools of the late nineteenth century. For much of his professional career he felt ambivalent about his creation. While a Holmes story (or later a play) was sure to bring income, Doyle really wanted to be writing in other, more respectable genres. While his Holmes stories were consciously artful, Doyle thought of them as “mere” fantasies, often privately expressing a disdain for them similar to that which Holmes expresses toward Watson’s overly sensationalized narratives of his brilliant cases.

Many critics attribute Doyle’s success in this series to his conceptions of Holmes, Watson, and their relationship. There are, in fact, central elements of the classic detective formula. Holmes is passionate about solving problems and about little else. For example, the only woman ever to earn much of his respect is Irene Adler, the beautiful songstress of “A Scandal in Bohemia” who outsmarts him when he attempts to steal an incriminating photograph from her. Yet his aloofness from ordinary life does not entirely exempt him from ordinary values. He cares touchingly for Watson and at least adequately for the innocent victims of crimes. He devotes his talents to the cause of justice, and he takes his country’s part against all enemies. In contrast, his most dangerous adversaries possess Holmes’s skills but use them solely for themselves. The most famous of these is Professor James Moriarty, the Napoleon of crime, who figures in several tales but most vividly in “The Final Problem.”

As in the case of trying to steal Irene Adler’s photograph, Holmes is not above bending or even breaking the law, but he does so mainly in the service of higher levels of social order or justice. He will steal a photograph to preserve order in European ruling families. A killer may go unpunished if the murder seems justified, as in “The Abbey Grange.” Although Holmes may stray from the letter of the law, he never violates its spirit.

Holmes battles crime for two reasons: to preserve order and for the sheer pleasure of solving challenging intellectual problems. Virtually every area of knowledge to which he has applied himself relates to solving crimes. He is credited with writing monographs on codes and ciphers, tattoos, tobacco ashes, marks of trades on hands, typewriters, footprints, the human ear, and many other highly specialized subjects. Among his eccentricities, perhaps only his devotion to the violin and to listening to music are not directly related to his work.

A STUDY IN SCARLET

The learning Holmes cultivates serves his particular method of detection. This method is established in A Study in Scarlet, when Holmes says on meeting Watson for the first time, “You have been in Afghanistan, I perceive.” After considerable delay, Holmes explains how close observation of Watson’s skin, appearance, and posture, combined with knowledge of current events led quickly and inevitably to his conclusion. Holmes cultivates close observation of relevant detail to form and verify hypotheses. That is the same general method C. Auguste Dupin describes when explaining how he managed to read his friend’s mind in Poe’s “The Murders in the Rue Morgue.” An incident of such observation and reasoning becomes part of the formula of a Holmes story. Holmes considers himself a scientific detective; for this reason he holds himself above the more ordinary human passions that might cloud his reasoning powers. His objectivity can make him seem callous. For example, in “The Dancing Men,” he shows little concern for the victims and is more interested in the solution of the puzzle than in protecting those threatened.

This weakness in Holmes is counterbalanced in part by Watson. Holmes’s interest in a case tends to end when the puzzle is solved and the culprit captured, but Watson’s narratives often offer brief summaries of the subsequent lives of criminals and victims. Watson provides the more mundane human interest. As Cawelti and others have shown, the good doctor is the reader's representative in the story. Although he lacks Holmes's transcendent rational powers, Watson has all the endearing qualities of courage, energy, compassion, patriotism, and loyalty, as well as an ordinary intelligence. A kindly and admiring middle-class gentleman, Watson connects the reader to the strange and powerful genius of the detective. Furthermore, within the stories, Watson connects Holmes with the ordinary world, repeatedly calling attention to the human needs of other characters. While Holmes is the specialist in crime, Watson is the generalist, a well-rounded person, dependable when action is necessary but falling short in the art of detection.

One of Watson's most important functions is to conceal what goes on in Holmes's mind. Holmes is given the irritating but essential characteristic of refusing to reveal what he knows until he has completed his solution, sometimes waiting until the criminal is caught. Such concealment is essential to the dramatic power of the stories; it creates suspense and an eagerness to continue reading, and it allows the story to build toward the moment of surprising revelation of the criminal or the crime.

Though he developed them in unique ways, Doyle borrowed these elements from Poe: the detached and rational detective, the admiring and more prosaic companion, and the relationship between them that helps connect the reader with the detective while concealing the sleuth's thinking. Cawelti gives Doyle credit for discovering the full potential of the Watson type of narrator, thus using this sort of character to establish the classical detective genre. Doyle also borrowed the form of his plot from Poe. Cawelti points to six elements that have become conventional, though in varying order, in the plot of the classical detective tale: introduction of the detective, description of the crime, the investigation, the solution, the explanation of the solution, and the denouement. Doyle develops these elements into the modern formula that transforms what was present in Poe into a powerful popular genre.

THE HOUND OF THE BASKERVILLES

The Hound of the Baskervilles (1901-1902), perhaps the greatest of the Holmes tales, illustrates Doyle's deployment of these plot elements as well as the highest level of his artistic achievement in this series. Watson introduces Holmes's powers by means of a friendly competition that becomes an important structural and thematic element. Watson examines a walking stick left by a client and makes inferences about the client's identity, concluding that Dr. James Mortimer is a successful elderly country practitioner. Holmes notes that while Watson is partly correct, he is mostly wrong. Mortimer is a country doctor, but he is city-trained, young, active, and unambitious, and he owns a dog. Holmes is careful to point out that Watson's errors helped him to find the truth. This pattern is repeated in the central portion of the novella, the investigation. This introduction of Holmes, Watson, and their relationship emphasizes the relative power of Holmes to get at the truth in tangled and fragmentary evidence. Watson's attempt is well done and intelligent, but it cannot match Holmes's observation and reasoning. This difference becomes much more important thematically when the duo is trying to prevent a murder.

Doyle artfully handles the description of the crime. Mortimer presents three accounts of events that set up an opposition between supernatural and natural explanations of the recent death of Sir Charles Baskerville at Dartmoor, his Devon estate. The first is a document telling how a remorseless ancestor brought a curse on the Baskervilles in the shape of a hound from Hell that kills those who venture on Dartmoor with evil in their hearts. The second is a newspaper account of the inquest into Sir Charles's death. The coroner concluded that he died of his weak heart while on an evening stroll, but Mortimer has noted details of the scene he investigated that suggest foul play. Sir Charles's behavior was unusual, and there was at least one footprint of a gigantic dog at the scene. Mortimer has come to Holmes to ask what should be done to protect the new heir, Sir Henry Baskerville, soon to arrive from Canada. After illustrating Holmes's incredible powers, Doyle presents him with a problem that may be beyond those powers: dealing with a supernatural agent.

One consequence of Doyle's development of the potential of Watson as a character narrator is the extension of the investigation section of the story. As it becomes possible to extend this section in an interesting manner, the story can become longer. In A Study in Scarlet and in his later novella, The Valley of Fear (1914), as well as in several stories, Doyle stretches the narrative by interpolating long adventures from the past that explain the more recent crime. Though such attempts seem clumsy, they point toward the more sophisticated handling of similar materials by writers such as Ross Macdonald and P. D. James. In The Hound of the Baskervilles Doyle prolongs the story while exploiting the gothic aspect of his theme by making Watson the investigator.

After several clues and mysteries develop in London, Holmes sends Watson with Mortimer and Sir Henry to Dartmoor. The brief London investigation sets up another theme indicative of Doyle's art. The man who shadows Sir Henry proves to be a worthy adversary of Holmes, using an effective disguise and successfully evading Holmes's attempts to trace him. On his departure, this suspect names himself Sherlock Holmes. This doubling of Holmes and his adversary continues throughout the tale.

Sidney Paget's illustration of Sherlock Holmes and Professor Moriarty fighting to the death near the top of Reichenbach Falls in "The Adventure of the Final Problem" for the December, 1893, issue of The Strand Magazine. The story itself provides only circumstantial evidence of Holmes's death—making it easier for Doyle later to bring Holmes back.

At Dartmoor, Watson studies the few local residents and encounters a number of mysteries. His investigation successfully eliminates the servants as suspects and discovers the secret relationship between them and Selden, an escaped convict in hiding on the moor. On the whole, however, Watson is bewildered by the mysteries. The moor becomes a symbolic setting; Watson often reflects that the landscape of the moor, with its person-swallowing muck, mirrors the danger and impenetrability of the mystery. Though he can see and understand much of what happens, he cannot fit together all the pieces. The only master of the landscape appears to be Mr. Stapleton, a naturalist who has come to know the area in his pursuit of butterflies.

Holmes, however, has also mastered the moor by studying maps and, without Watson's knowledge, hiding on the moor to investigate the situation secretly. Almost as soon as Watson learns of Holmes's presence, the rival masters of the landscape prove to be rivals in crime as well, for Holmes has concluded that Stapleton is the man responsible for Sir Charles's death and for the attempt on Sir Henry that the two sleuths witness that evening. Within a day of Holmes's arrival, the whole crime has been solved. Holmes learns that Stapleton is really a lost Baskerville relative who can claim the inheritance when Sir Henry dies, and he learns how Stapleton tricked a woman into luring Sir Charles outside at night, where he could be frightened to death.

Doyle creates a characteristic sensation by having Holmes suddenly appear on the scene and show that he has effectively mastered the situation. The gothic mystery and ambiguity of the moor pushes men of common sense such as Sir Henry and Watson toward half belief in the supernatural, toward confusion and irrational fear. Like a gothic villain, Stapleton feeds these weaknesses, using his superior intelligence and the power of his knowledge of the landscape. Only Stapleton's good double, Holmes, can understand and thus resist this power. Even Holmes has difficulty, though, when the moor seems to help Stapleton (a dense fog develops on the night of the capture), and Stapleton succeeds in surprising the generally unflappable Holmes. Stapleton does this by smearing glowing phosphorus on his killer hound's muzzle to give it the supernatural appearance of a hound from Hell. The sleuths are surprised that the dog is able to attack Sir Henry before they can shoot it.

Both the fog and the dog work against Stapleton finally, showing that nature is, in reality, a neutral force in human affairs, as it must be if Holmes's scientific art is to triumph in finding the truth and bringing justice. Stapleton's wife, an unwilling accomplice, finally rebels against using the hound to kill and reveals Stapleton's hiding place. Stapleton apparently loses his way in the fog and sinks into the mire.

In this novel, the explanation of the crime coincides on the whole with its solution. These are the most important and dramatic parts of a classical detective story because they satisfy both the reader's anxiety for the fates of the possible victims and the reader's desire to understand the mystery. Bringing them together as Doyle does produces a sensational and dramatic effect appropriate to a detective story with a gothic setting and gothic themes.

The denouement belongs partly to Holmes and partly to Watson. Watson deals with the human interest, explaining something of the fates of the important characters. Holmes clears up a few remaining mysterious details, including the one clue that led him from the first to suspect the Stapletons, the brand of perfume that so slightly emanated from the anonymous warning note they received in London at the beginning of the case.

The Hound of the Baskervilles illustrates Doyle's more important contributions to the familiar conventions of the classic detective story. His invention and exploitation of the relationship between Holmes and Watson enable him to engage the reader more deeply in the human interest as well as in the intellectual problem of the tale. Furthermore, the relationship enables Doyle to extend the investigation portion of the plot, forging an effective structure for longer tales.

One element of Doyle's art in these tales that ought not to go unmentioned is his wit and humor, of which this novel offers many examples, not the least of which is Holmes's successful deducing of the breed of Mortimer's dog by observing it from his Baker Street window. The thematic oppositions Doyle establishes between Watson and Holmes, the natural and the supernatural, and Holmes and Stapleton are evidence of Doyle's art as well. Doyle knowingly develops these oppositions within his gothic setting, making a symbolic landscape of the moor and creating ambiguous images of nets, tangles, and the detective himself to underscore what Cawelti has identified as the central thematic content of the classical detective genre.

According to Cawelti, one characteristic of the classic formula is that the frightening power of the gothic villain is brought under control and used for the benefit of society. In The Hound of the Baskervilles, that struggle for control is directly reflected in the doubling of Stapleton and Holmes, as it was in the earlier Holmes works through the doubling of Moriarty and Holmes. Furthermore, Cawelti observes that classic detective fiction addresses the issue of middle-class guilt over repressed sexuality and aggression and over exploitation of the lower classes. The detective rescues ordinary characters from irrational fear and superstition and discovers that one person, a criminal or outsider, is the real enemy. This pattern of removing generalized guilt and pinning it onto an outsider is clear in The Hound of the Baskervilles—even though the victim has a title. Sir Henry, a modest Canadian farmer suddenly elevated in status by his uncle's death, intends to benefit his community with his new fortune. Stapleton's opposition threatens to frustrate this noble purpose and to turn the power of the estate toward the pure selfishness of the originally cursed ancestor; he would reinstate the old, evil aristocracy at the expense of the new, socially responsible aristocracy toward which the middle class aspires.

Doyle's achievements in the Sherlock Holmes series include creating memorable characters and stories that have remained popular throughout the twentieth century, expanding the classic detective formula invented by Poe into an effective popular genre, and bringing considerable literary art to a form he himself thought subliterate.

Terry Heller

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTIONSHERLOCK HOLMES AND DR. WATSON SERIES:

A Study in Scarlet, 1887 (serial; 1888, book); The Sign of Four, 1890 (also known as The Sign of the Four); The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes, 1892; The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes, 1894; The Hound of the Baskervilles, 1901-1902 (serial; 1902, book); The Return of Sherlock Holmes, 1905; The Valley of Fear, 1914-1915 (serial; 1915, book); His Last Bow, 1917; The Case-Book of Sherlock Holmes, 1927; The Final Adventures of Sherlock Holmes, 1981 (revised and expanded 2001)

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Mystery of Cloomber, 1888; The Surgeon of Gaster Fell, 1895

OTHER SHORT FICTION: Mysteries and Adventures, 1889 (also known as The Gully of Bluemansdyke, and Other Stories); The Captain of Polestar, and Other Tales, 1890; My Friend the Murderer, and Other Mysteries and Adventures, 1893; The Great Keinplatz Experiment, and Other Stories, 1894; An Actor's Duel, and the Winning Shot, 1894 (with Campbell Rae Brown); Round the Red Lamp: Being Fact and Fancies of Medical Life, 1894; The Green Flag, and Other Stories of War and Sport, 1900; The Last Galley: Impressions and Tales, 1911; Danger! and Other Stories, 1918; Tales of the Ring and Camp, 1922 (also known as The Croxley Master, and Other Tales of the Ring and Camp); Tales of Terror and Mystery, 1922 (also known as The Black Doctor, and Other Tales of Terror and Mystery); Tales of Twilight and the Unseen, 1922 (also known as The Great Keinplatz Experiment, and Other Tales of Twilight and the Unseen)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Micah Clarke, 1889; The Firm of Girdlestone, 1889; Beyond the City, 1891; The Doings of Raffles Haw, 1891; The White Company, 1891; The Great Shadow, 1892; The Refugees, 1893; The Parasite, 1894; The Stark Munro Letters, 1895; Rodney Stone, 1896; The Tragedy of the Koroska, 1897 (also known as A Desert Drama); Uncle Bernac, 1897; A Duet, with an Occasional Chorus, 1899 (revised 1910); Sir Nigel, 1905-1906 (serial; 1906, book); The Lost World, 1912; The Poison Belt, 1913; The Land of Mist, 1926

SHORT FICTION: The Exploits of Brigadier Gerard, 1896; The Man from Archangel, and Other Stories, 1898; The Adventures of Gerard, 1903; Round the Fire Stories, 1908; One Crowded Hour, 1911; Three of Them, 1923; Last of the Legions, and Other Tales of Long Ago, 1925; The Dealings of Captain Sharkey, and Other Tales of Pirates, 1925; The Maracot Deep, and Other Stories, 1929; Uncollected Stories: The Unknown Conan Doyle, 1982

PLAYS: Foreign Policy, pr. 1893; Jane Annie: Or, The Good Conduct Prize, pr., pb. 1893 (with J. M. Barrie); Waterloo, pr. 1894 (also known as A Story of Waterloo); Halves, pr. 1899; Sherlock Holmes, pr. 1899 (with William Gillette); A Duet, pb. 1903; Brigadier Gerard, pr. 1906; The Fires of Fate, pr. 1909; The House of Temperley, pr. 1909; The Pot of Caviare, pr. 1910; The Speckled Band, pr. 1910; The Crown Diamond, pr. 1921; Exile: A Drama of Christmas Eve, pb. 1925; It's Time Something Happened, pb. 1925

POETRY: Songs of Action, 1898; Songs of the Road, 1911; The Guards Came Through, and Other Poems, 1919; The Poems: Collected Edition, 1922

NONFICTION: 1900-1910 • The Great Boer War, 1900; The War in South Africa: Its Cause and Conduct, 1902; The Case of Mr. George Edalji, 1907; Through the Magic Door, 1907; The Crime of the Congo, 1909

1911-1920 • The Case of Oscar Slater, 1912; Great Britain and the Next War, 1914; In Quest of Truth, Being a Correspondence Between Sir Arthur Conan Doyle and Captain H. Stansbury, 1914; To Arms!, 1914; The German War: Some Sidelights and Reflections, 1915; Western Wanderings, 1915; A Visit to Three Fronts, 1916; The British Campaign in France and Flanders, 1916-1919 (6 volumes); The Origin and Outbreak of the War, 1916; A Petition to the Prime Minister on Behalf of Roger Casement, 1916(?); The New Revelation, 1918; The Vital Message, 1919; A Debate on Spiritualism, 1920 (with Joseph McCabe); Our Reply to the Cleric, 1920; Spiritualism and Rationalism, 1920

1921-1984 • Fairies Photographed, 1921; The Evidence for Fairies, 1921; The Wanderings of a Spiritualist, 1921; The Case for Spirit Photography, 1922 (with others); The Coming of the Fairies, 1922; Our Ameri- can Adventure, 1923; Memories and Adventures, 1924; Our Second American Adventure, 1924; Psychic Experiences, 1925; The Early Christian Church and Modern Spiritualism, 1925; The History of Spiritualism, 1926 (2 volumes); Pheneas Speaks: Direct Spirit Communications, 1927; A Word of Warning, 1928; What Does Spiritualism Actually Teach and Stand For?, 1928; An Open Letter to Those of My Generation, 1929; Our African Winter, 1929; The Roman Catholic Church: A Rejoinder, 1929; The Edge of the Unknown, 1930; Arthur Conan Doyle on Sherlock Holmes, 1981; Essays on Photography, 1982; Letters to the Press, 1984

EDITED TEXTS: Dreamland and Ghostland, 1886; D. D. Home: His Life and Mission, 1921 (by Mrs. Douglas Home); The Spiritualist's Reader, 1924

TRANSLATION: The Mystery of Joan of Arc, 1924 (Léon Denis)

MISCELLANEOUS: The Sir Arthur Conan Doyle Reader, 2002

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Akinson, Michael. The Secret Marriage of Sherlock Holmes, and Other Eccentric Readings. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1996. Attempts to read Holmes's stories in the manner in which Holmes himself might read them. "The Adventure of the Speckled Band" is read in terms of the philosophy of Kundalini yoga; "A Scandal in Bohemia" is read in terms of its use of traditional romance motifs and its debt to Edgar Allan Poe; Jungian psychology is used to read A Study in Scarlet; and Derridian deconstruction is used to read "The Adventure of the Copper Breeches."

Barsham, Diana. Arthur Conan Doyle and the Meaning of Masculinity. Burlington, Vt.: Ashgate, 2000. A discussion of masculinity according to Doyle, delving into all Doyle's writings, including his war correspondence and travel writings.

Day, Barry, ed. Sherlock Holmes in His Own Words and in the Words of Those Who Knew Him. Lanham, Md.: Taylor, 2003. Day has culled details of Holmes's life from passages in the stories and arranged them into an entertaining biography.

Fido, Martin. The World of Sherlock Holmes: The

Facts and Fiction Behind the World's Greatest Detective. Holbrook, Mass.: Adams Media, 1998. An entry in the "World of" series, this study of Holmes reveals the distinctive, fictional London in which the detective lives and works.

Hodgson, John A., ed. Sherlock Holmes: The Major Stories with Contemporary Critical Essays. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1994. Includes nine essays on Holmes, from a variety of critical perspectives, including feminist, deconstruction, and discourse analysis approaches.

Jann, Rosemary. The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes: Detecting Social Order. New York: Twayne, 1995. Part of Twayne's Masterwork series, this slim volume is divided into two parts, the first of which places the great detective in a literary and historical context, followed by Jann's own reading of Arthur Conan Doyle's Sherlockian approach to detective fiction. In addition to a selected bibliography, Jann's book includes a brief chronology of Doyle's life and work.

Orel, Harold, ed. Critical Essays on Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. New York: G. K. Hall, 1992. Including both evaluations by Doyle's contemporaries and later scholarship—some of it commissioned specifically for inclusion in this collection—Critical Essays is divided into three sections: "Sherlock Holmes," "Other Writings," and "Spiritualism." Harold Orel opens the collections with a lengthy and comprehensive essay, which is followed by a clever and classic meditation by Dorothy L. Sayers on "Dr. Watson's Christian Name."

Press, Charles. Looking over Sir Arthur's Shoulder: How Conan Doyle Turned the Trick. Shelburne, Ont.: Battered Silicon Dispatch Box, 2004. Study of Doyle as stylist, seeking to explain exactly what features of his writing account for its massive popularity.

Ross, Thomas Wynne. Good Old Index: The Sherlock Holmes Handbook, a Guide to the Sherlock Holmes Stories by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle—Persons, Places, Themes, Summaries of all the Tales, with Commentary on the Style of the Author. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1997. An excellent manual for followers of Doyle's Holmes stories.

ANNETTE VON DROSTE-HÜLSHOFF

Born: Castle Hülshoff, near Münster, Westphalia (now in Germany); January 10, 1797

Died: Meersburg, Baden (now in Germany); May 24, 1848

Type of plot: Historical

CONTRIBUTION

Although primarily known within the history of German literature as an outstanding lyrical poet of the nineteenth century, Annette von Droste-Hülshoff also wrote a novella, Die Judenbuche: Ein Sittengemälde aus dem Gebirgichten Westfalen (1842; The Jew's Beech Tree, 1914), that ranks among the best of both novellas and the historical mystery genre. Tightly constructed and vividly written, this story of murder, guilt, and the eventual triumph of justice presents a realistic picture of village life in Westphalia (now in Germany) during the late eighteenth century as well as psychological portraits of individual characters that suggest the author's keen sense of observation. In 1844, Droste-Hülshoff began another mystery prose piece, "Joseph: Eine Kriminalgeschichte" (Joseph: a crime story), but it unfortunately remained a fragment and has never been translated.

BIOGRAPHY

Annette von Droste-Hülshoff was born January 10, 1797, on the Hülshoff estate near Münster, in the province of Westphalia. She was born into a long-established line of conservative Catholic nobility and remained very attached to her large family. A highly intelligent and sensitive girl, Droste-Hülshoff was well versed in five languages. In her early teens she began writing poetry in the style of Friedrich Schiller and Gottfried August Bürger. After two disappointing experiences with lovers, she grew depressed and stopped writing for a number of years. The death of her father in 1826 further burdened her spirit.

In 1834, Droste-Hülshoff left the protective circle of her family and their country estate, Rüschaus, to live with her sister Jenny, who had married a widowed Swiss scholar. They moved to the Castle Meersburg on the shore of Lake Constance. At this time, Droste-Hülshoff met and fell madly in love with Levin Schücking, a man seventeen years younger than she, whose mother had been her close friend. This intense relationship rekindled her poetic muse, and she produced a number of fine poems. She managed to have her brother-in-law employ the young man in his library, and the two lovers spent their days walking and reading each other's poetry. In April, 1842, however, Schücking left Meersburg and later returned with his young bride. Droste-Hülshoff was devastated by the loss of her lover and poetic confidant. In 1844, Schücking published a small volume of Droste-Hülshoff's poetry, thereby establishing her reputation as a lyric genius. Her poems deal with a spiritualized vision of nature and with issues of religious faith and doubt.

Ill-fated in love, the poet never married. The disappointing affair with Levin Schücking had caused Droste-Hülshoff great emotional stress, and in 1843 she grew seriously ill from nervous exhaustion. A sickly individual with a tubercular condition as well as psychosomatic complaints, Droste-Hülshoff died of an embolism at the age of fifty-one in Meersburg.

ANALYSIS

Annette von Droste-Hülshoff began work on The Jew's Beech Tree in 1837 and completed it in 1841. It was based on a true incident that had occurred in the latter half of the previous century. She had heard of the story from her grandfather, who had been a magistrate assigned to the case. She also used an 1818 newspaper account of the murder—written by her uncle, August von Haxthausen—as a basis for her tale. The case involved a Christian man who had murdered a Jew and had left the country before he could be brought to trial. Captured by the then-invading Turkish army, he had spent twenty-five years in slavery. When he escaped, he returned home. Because of the hardship he had already endured, he was not prosecuted for his crime, but his conscience drove him to commit suicide, and he hanged himself from the tree where the original murder had taken place. This strange story of guilt and justice preoccupied Droste-Hülshoff, and she set out to write a fictional account of the events. The novella went through several revised versions and was first serialized in the spring of 1842 in a literary magazine, Morgenblatt für gebildete Leser.

THE JEW'S BEECH TREE

The Droste-Hülshoff work is the story of Friedrich Mergel, a poor shepherd boy whose father, a drinker, is found dead one day. He and his mother are in dire straits. His uncle, Simon, and Simon's illegitimate child, Johannes Niemand, take Friedrich under their protection. Friedrich and the pale and worn-looking Johannes, who appears as if he were Friedrich's brother, become close friends. Simon is, however, involved with a ruthless band of poachers who, thwarting the efforts of the authorities, roam the forests nightly and steal wood from private lands. Despite the efforts of his honest mother, Friedrich becomes involved with this band of thieves and serves as a lookout. One night, he deliberately misleads the forester Brandis, sending him to his death at the hands of one of the poachers. He later recognizes the murder weapon, an ax, as belonging to his uncle.

One day, in the autumn of 1760 during a community dance, Friedrich, now a proud and boastful young man, is publicly warned by a Jewish moneylender, Aaron, that he has not yet paid for the watch he had bought. Friedrich is shamed before his fellow villagers. The next day Aaron is found murdered under a beech tree, and Friedrich and his cousin Johannes are missing. Members of the Jewish community are outraged by the incident, and they purchase the tree with the assurance that it will never be cut down—as a living memorial to their murdered friend. With an ax, they carve a warning on the tree in Hebrew: "If you ever approach this place, what has been done to me will also be done to you."

Twenty-eight years later, on Christmas Eve, 1788, an old and beaten man returns to the village. He claims to be Johannes Niemand. He has spent his years as a slave to the Turks and finally escaped. Later he is found hanged from the beech tree, where the original murder had occurred. From a prominent scar on the corpse it is clear to Brandis's son, who is the one to find the decomposing body, that the hanged man is in truth Friedrich Mergel, driven to suicide by the burden of his guilt.

The Jew's Beech Tree is a realistic tale of poverty and desperation, racial prejudice and criminal greed, and murder and nagging guilt. It contains elements of the English gothic novel—stormy nights and a ghostly forest—that lend it a mysterious, supernatural atmosphere. The novella's German subtitle—literally, "a portrait of manners and customs from the mountain region of Westphalia"—suggests its objective, almost sociological perspective on the behavior and morals of the community in which Droste-Hülshoff lived. In her narration of the murders of the forester Brandis and the Jew Aaron, Droste-Hülshoff leaves out connecting commentary so that the reader is placed in the role of "detective" who must deduce the perpetrator of the crimes. She also provides the reader with random details—such as the uncle's ax—that serve as clues to the guilty individual.

As is the case with most examples of mystery and detective fiction, the Droste-Hülshoff story ultimately revolves around the themes of justice and injustice. The issues of right and wrong are, in keeping with the realistic tone of the story, by no means idealized or clear-cut. The young and naïve Friedrich Mergel is born into impoverished circumstances, and although his mother attempts to rear him with the proper sense of right and wrong, he succumbs to the weight of poverty and leads the immoral life of a criminal. As a vain and arrogant individual who commits a heinous murder because of his injured pride, however, he deserves his ultimate fate. He is also the son of a violent and abusive drunkard, and the story suggests the tragic social determinism of hereditary traits.

Johannes Niemand, the illegitimate child whose name translates as "John Nobody," is also an apparent victim of the shadowy world into which he is born. Because he is an outcast within the bourgeois world, a life of crime on the fringes of society seems to be his only option. A major theme of The Jew's Beech Tree—and of much crime fiction—is therefore an ethical one: Life presents choices, and the ones the individual makes determine his personal guilt. The Droste-Hülshoff text questions the role of free will and draws attention to the existence of evil in the world.

The issue of racial prejudice is the most obvious example of social injustice in the novella and points to the central theological theme of the story. Aaron's murder and the final revenge of the Jewish community suggest a biblical and divine sense of justice as in the Old Testament pronouncement of "an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth." As in most detective and mystery novels, in which the case is always solved, the murderers eventually caught, there is in the Droste-Hülshoff story a metaphysical sense of absolute justice, an underlying conviction that all crimes within the universe are ultimately punished.

In one of the early versions of the novella, the exact day of the murder was October 28, and as is also the case in the final version, Friedrich returns to the village twenty-eight years later. Similarly, it is the son of the forester whom Friedrich had sent to his death at the hands of his uncle who finds Friedrich's hanged corpse. These seeming coincidences again suggest the existence of a transcendent order of justice—a divinely established universe—behind the seemingly chaotic and random flux of appearances. Droste-Hülshoff, reared as a strict Catholic, was very much concerned with matters of faith and was horrified at the idea that no God, no transcendent order existed in the universe. Thus, in a very real sense, the "mystery" in her tale of Friedrich Mergel and his just fate is that of faith itself, and the "solution" to the crime becomes a revelation of the divinity and the divine plan.

The most interesting character in the story is certainly that of Johannes Niemand. He is described as closely resembling Friedrich. In the poor light of the fire one night, even Friedrich's mother mistakes the haggard and brooding Johannes for her son. Droste-Hülshoff employs here a time-honored literary device, that of the doppelgänger, or double. As Mr. Hyde is to Dr. Jekyll in the well-known Robert Louis Stevenson novel, the outcast Johannes serves as the dark alter ego of Friedrich, the aspect of his personality that is attracted to the criminal side of life. Thus the Droste-Hülshoff story remains very much a psychological one, Friedrich Mergel/Johannes Niemand symbolically depicted as two sides of one person. The psychology of the criminal mind—the influence of heredity and environment—is another major theme in the genre of crime fiction, and the dual characters in the Droste-Hülshoff story suggest the inner struggle between good and evil within the self. As the horrible Mr. Hyde takes over the personality of the benevolent Dr. Jekyll, the criminal life of Johannes consumes the existence of Friedrich. It is fitting that Friedrich returns to the village and commits the act of suicide in the guise of his cousin Johannes.

Within the genre of the historical mystery, Droste-Hülshoff ultimately presents a moral tale that reaffirms her belief in a structured, divinely based universe. The naturalistic world of her story is one in which a transcendent reality underlies the chaotic appearance of events. This duality of reality versus appearance is a fundamental structural principle of most mystery and crime fiction in the sense that the task of the detective—and that of the reader—is to uncover the truth of events by interpreting the seemingly random clues found at the scene of the crime. The investigator seeks the order hidden within the chaos of details. Because the detective's job is to bring the criminal to justice, the central issue in mystery and crime fiction, as it is in The Jew's Beech Tree, is one of morality.

Thomas F. Barry

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVEL: Die Judenbuche: Ein Sittengemälde aus dem Gebirgichten Westfalen, 1842 (The Jew's Beech Tree, 1914)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

PLAY: Perdu: Oder, Dichter, Verleger, und Blaustrümpfe, 1840

POETRY: Gedichte, 1838; Spiritus familiaris des Rosstäuschers, 1842; Gedichte, 1844; Das geistliche Jahr, 1851; Letzte Gaben, 1860

NONFICTION: Westfälische Schilderungen aus einer westfälischen Feder, 1845

MISCELLANEOUS: Sämtliche Werke, 1955

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Foulkes, Peter. Introduction to Die Judenbuche: Ein Sittengemälde aus dem Gebirgichten Westfalen, by Annette von Droste-Hülshoff. Oxford, England:

- Basil Blackwell, 1989. English-language introduction to and analysis of a German-language edition of Droste-Hülshoff's mystery novella.
- Mare, Margaret. Annette von Droste-Hülshoff. London: Methuen, 1965. Probably the most comprehensive study of the life of Droste-Hülshoff available in English. Includes a bibliography.
- Morgan, Mary E. Annette von Droste-Hülshoff: A Biography. New York: P. Lang, 1984. Book-length study of the life of the German poet, playwright, and author.
- Pickar, Gertrude Bauer. Ambivalence Transcended: A Study of the Writings of Annette von Droste-Hülshoff. Columbia, S.C.: Camden House, 1997. Detailed, comprehensive study of Droste-Hülshoff's oeuvre, including her portrayal of women, her representation of fantasy, and her use of narrative perspective.
- Webber, Andrew. "Traumatic Identities: Race and Gender in Annette von Droste-Hülshoff's Die Judenbuche and Freud's Der Mann Moses." In Harmony in Discord: German Women Writers in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries, edited by Laura Martin. New York: P. Lang, 2001. Focuses on the distinctively nineteenth century German nature of Droste-Hülshoff's mystery and its particular representation of race and gender.
- Whiting, Raleigh. "From Confusion to Clarity: Further Reflections on the Revelatory Function of Narrative Technique and Symbolism in Annette von Droste-Hülshoff's Die Judenbuche." In Deutsche Vierteljahresschrift für Literaturwissenschaft und Geistesgeschichte 54 (1982): 259-283. Detailed discussion of Droste-Hülshoff's use and generation of revelation—a key aspect of The Jew's Beech Tree and of any mystery story.

ALEXANDRE DUMAS, PÈRE

Born: Villers-Cotterêts, France; July 24, 1802

Died: Puy, France; December 5, 1870

Types of plot: Amateur sleuth; historical

CONTRIBUTION

Although Alexandre Dumas, père, was an extremely prolific playwright and novelist, he owes his fame largely to Les Trois Mousquetaires (1844; The Three Musketeers, 1846) and Le Comte de Monte-Cristo (1844-1845; The Count of Monte-Cristo, 1846). In these works, Dumas made use of well-known events in French history to tell fascinating and well-structured tales. These two romances have remained popular both in France and elsewhere since their publication.

In his biography of Dumas, Richard S. Stowe stressed similarities between The Count of Monte-Cristo and works in other literary genres, specifically mystery and detective fiction. Stowe's insight reveals an important element of The Count of Monte-Cristo: Edmond Dantès, the main character in this novel, does in fact become a private investigator after his escape from a prison near Marseilles. Dantès first seeks to identify and then to punish those responsible for his unjust imprisonment. He uses numerous disguises, obtaining relevant documents from unsuspecting individuals. This information enables Dantès to prove the treachery committed against him. He then prepares and carries out a systematic and fearful revenge against the four men whose actions brought about his fourteen years of imprisonment.

BIOGRAPHY

Alexandre Dumas, père, was born on July 24, 1802, in Villers-Cotterêts, a small town northeast of Paris. His father, Thomas-Alexandre Dumas, was a general in the French army and his mother, Marie-Louise-Elisabeth Dumas, was the daughter of inn-keepers from Villers-Cotterêts. Thomas-Alexandre Dumas died when his son was only four years old, and Mme Dumas decided to move back into her parents' inn, where she reared her son and daughter. Dumas spent his childhood and adolescence in his native town.

Alexandre Dumas, père. (Library of Congress)

In 1823, he moved to Paris, where, during the 1820's and 1830's, he established a solid reputation in literary circles and came to know such important French writers and artists as Victor Hugo, Gérard de Nerval, Eugène Delacroix, and Alfred de Vigny. Between 1829 and 1851, Dumas wrote, either by himself or in collaboration with other dramatists, more than sixty plays. His many historical dramas and melodramas were well received by both Parisian theatergoers and critics. Despite their enormous popularity during his lifetime, Dumas's plays have largely fallen into oblivion.

In 1838, he began to write historical romances. The year 1844, when The Three Musketeers appeared in print, was the most important in his literary career; during the same year, he began to publish chapters from The Count of Monte-Cristo in the Journal des débats, a Parisian literary journal. During the last twenty-four years of his life, Dumas continued to write extensively, but he was never able to duplicate the extraordinary popular and critical success of The Three Musketeers and The Count of Monte-Cristo. The French public associated Dumas so closely with The Count of Monte-Cristo that he decided to call his own house "le château de Monte-Cristo" (the castle of Monte-Cristo).

Although Dumas was married to the actress Ida Ferrier from 1840 to 1848, they had no children. Nevertheless, he did have three children from different mistresses: two daughters and a son, Alexandre, who became a famous playwright himself. To avoid confusing them, most critics call the father Alexandre Dumas, père, and his son Alexandre Dumas, fils. In the summer of 1870, Dumas, père, became paralyzed as the result of a stroke. On December 5, 1870, he died at his son's home in Puys, a small city on the coast of Normandy.

ANALYSIS

The 118 chapters of The Count of Monte-Cristo may seem excessively long to many modern readers. The novel is divided into three major sections of unequal length. The first thirty chapters take place in Marseilles before, during, and just after Dantès's imprisonment in the Château d'If, a prison in the harbor there. After his escape from prison, Dantès assumes the identity of the Count of Monte-Cristo, and the next nine chapters take place in Italy, where the now-wealthy Count of Monte-Cristo is living. The relevance of these chapters becomes clear to readers only in the third part of this novel, which takes place largely in France, where Dantès carries out his vengeance against those who sent him to prison.

THE COUNT OF MONTE-CRISTO

Edmond Dantès is an odd, not totally sympathetic character. Although he was the victim of a legal injustice, his vengeance can only be called extreme. To punish his now-politically influential enemies, he does not hesitate (twenty-three years later) to destroy the lives of their wives, children, and other relatives. As an excuse for his retribution, in chapter 91 Dantès claims that he is merely carrying out God's wishes. Nevertheless, Dantès was not the only Frenchman to have been imprisoned unjustly during the Napoleonic era and the restoration of the Bourbons to the French throne. Dumas's own father had been imprisoned unjustly for twenty months; these months in prison had adversely affected his health, causing him to die young. Unlike Dantès, however, Dumas's father never sought vengeance against those who sent him to prison.

The structure of The Count of Monte-Cristo parallels that of many other detective novels. At the beginning, everything seems to favor Dantès. He has just become the captain of the Pharaon, a commercial boat owned by the kind and generous M. Morrel, and is engaged to Mercédès, whom he plans to marry the next day. Unfortunately, there are two obstacles to his happiness: Fernand, who also loves Mercédès, wishes to stop this marriage, and Danglars, the apparently dishonest accountant for the Pharaon, is afraid that Dantès will discover financial irregularities in the ship's accounts. Fernand and Danglars are delighted to learn that the dying M. Leclère, whom Dantès replaced as captain of the Pharaon, has asked Dantès to deliver a letter to Napoleon Bonaparte, then a prisoner on Elba. Although indifferent to politics, Dantès takes his letter to Elba and receives a letter from Napoleon for a certain M. Noirtier in Paris. Fernand and Danglars denounce Dantès to the local prosecutor, claiming that he is a traitor who is attempting to restore Napoleon to the throne. A neighbor named Caderousse knows of the plot but remains silent. That evening, Dantès is arrested and then questioned by Villefort, an assistant prosecutor in Marseilles. After examining the compromising letter from Napoleon, Villefort orders that Dantès be taken, untried, to the Château d'If, where political prisoners are kept.

During the first few years, Dantès does not understand the reasons for his imprisonment, finally becoming convinced that it must be part of a divine plan. He believes that someday he will be freed and those who punished him will in turn be punished. The possibility of vengeance brings him extreme pleasure. Thus, even before he escapes from prison, readers do not feel completely sympathetic toward him.

After several years in solitary confinement, Dantès finally makes contact with Abbé Faria, a prisoner in an adjoining cell, who has dug a tunnel between their cells while seeking to escape. Faria helps Dantès recall the events before his arrest and during his interrogation. Thus, Dantès comes to an understanding of how Danglars and Fernand may have profited by his arrest and why Villefort was so displeased by Napoleon's letter. In the 1790's, Faria had known Noirtier, the addressee, who was then a fervent Bonapartist. Noirtier is Villefort's father, and his active opposition to King Louis XVIII might well have endangered Villefort's career. Thus, it was in Villefort's interest to destroy this letter and send Dantès to prison without the inconvenience of a public trial.

Readers of The Count of Monte-Cristo must accept an extraordinary number of coincidences, such as the fact that this Italian priest personally knew Villefort's father. Nor is this the last of the almost unbelievable developments. Faria also reveals to Dantès that a fabulous cache of diamonds and other precious jewels has been hidden since the fifteenth century on Monte-Cristo, a small island near Corsica. Only Faria knows that this treasure exists. After his friend's death, Dantès escapes from prison by pretending to be the dead man. Bodies at the prison are placed in sacks and large weights are attached to the legs; the sacks are then dropped into the sea. Despite these precautions, Dantès frees himself easily and swims safely to shore—fourteen years to the day after his arrest.

Now that he is free, Dantès begins planning his "implacable vengeance" against Caderousse, Villefort, Danglars, and Fernand. Were he to forgive these four men, it would constitute a grievous sin in his mind. Although readers may empathize with Dantès, they also realize that a long imprisonment has transformed him into a bitter individual. Soon after his escape from the Château d'If, Dantès reaches the island of which Faria spoke. Without much difficulty, Dantès transports a fortune to Italy, where he will spend most of his time until 1838.

During this period, Dantès does return briefly to Marseilles to save the generous Morrel from financial ruin. Nevertheless, Dantès does not reveal his true identity to the Morrels, who treated him well in 1815. Dantès also learns that his own father died of starvation, reinforcing his belief that the four wrongdoers must be punished. In his mind, they are indirectly responsible for his father's death. The count uses his enormous wealth and a series of disguises to obtain all the information relevant to his case, including what has happened since 1815 to the four men who sent him to prison.

Caderousse has become a common criminal, often imprisoned. (Dantès provokes Caderousse's former cellmate, whom he has cheated, to kill him.) Fernand, now known as the Count of Morcerf, is a French general. Danglars is a powerful and wealthy Parisian banker. Villefort has become the chief prosecutor in France.

Dantès's vengeance against Fernand is especially painful for him because his beloved Mercédès is married to Fernand, who assured her that Dantès died in prison. Mercédès recognizes the Count of Monte-Cristo; he in turn convinces her that she and her son can save their honor only by leaving her husband. They do so and the count pushes Fernand to suicide. Dantès's vengeance against Danglars is imaginative and incredibly effective. While in Italy, Dantès befriended a notorious bandit named Luigi Zampa, who frequently kidnapped travelers and held them for exorbitant ransoms. Zampa will do whatever his benefactor asks. Zampa kidnaps the wealthy Danglars and proceeds to bleed him dry: Danglars must pay for his meals, and each one costs 100,000 francs, while a bottle of wine or mineral water costs 25,000 francs. Danglars's immense fortune soon disappears.

Villefort's punishment is especially cruel. His second wife desires that her son, Édouard, and not her stepdaughter, Valentine, inherit her husband's fortunes. A number of people are poisoned, apparently including Valentine. Later, however, the reader discovers that Valentine has not actually died, and she weds Maximilien Morrel (the son of the shipowner). When Villefort confronts his wife with proof of her murders, he gives her a choice: If she does not kill herself, he will have her arrested for murder. She goes him one better, killing herself and their young son Édouard. After this murder-suicide, Villefort goes mad. Although Mme de Villefort was clearly an unstable and violent woman, Dumas never fully explains her relationship with the Count of Monte-Cristo, leaving readers to suspect that the count encouraged her murderous penchant.

The death of the young and clearly innocent Édouard de Villefort finally convinces Dantès that his revenge has gone too far, because he can no longer control the destructive forces that he set into motion; he leaves Paris. Before sailing away, Dantès brings together Maximilien Morrel and Valentine de Villefort on his island of Monte-Cristo. In their marriage, they may attain the happiness that Edmond Dantès never experienced.

Although it may be more accurate to describe The Count of Monte-Cristo as a psychological novel than as a detective novel, it does possess several elements common to that genre. The first crime in this novel is a wrongful imprisonment, Faria relies on his own experience to explain Dantès's punishment, and Dantès then obtains documents and testimony to prove Faria's hypotheses. A detective novel strives to prove the innocence or guilt of specific characters. The Count of Monte-Cristo does this quite successfully, but it also illustrates the destructive force of hate. The count's vengeance does not result in justice. Ultimately, readers feel little sympathy for the original victim. Instead, the young Édouard de Villefort is the victim who is remembered and pitied.

Edmund J. Campion

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVEL: Le Comte de Monte-Cristo, 1844-1845 (The Count of Monte-Cristo, 1846)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVEL: 1838-1840 • Acté, 1838 (English translation, 1904); La Salle d'Armes, 1838 (includes Pauline [English translation, 1844], Pascal Bruno [English translation, 1837], and Murat [English translation, 1896]); Le Capitaine Paul, 1838 (Captain Paul, 1848); La Comtesse de Salisbury, 1839; Le Capitaine Pamphile, 1840 (Captain Pamphile, 1850); Othon l'Archer, 1840 (Otho the Archer, 1860)

1841-1850 • Aventures de Lyderic, 1842 (Lyderic, Count of Flanders, 1903); Ascanio, 1843 (with Paul Meurice; English translation, 1849); Georges, 1843 (George, 1846); Le Chevalier d'Harmental, 1843 (with Auguste Maquet; The Chevalier d'Harmental, 1856); Amaury, 1844 (English translation, 1854); Gabriel

Lambert, 1844 (The Galley Slave, 1849; also known as Gabriel Lambert, 1904); Les Frères corses, 1844 (The Corsican Brothers, 1880); Les Trois Mousquetaires, 1844 (The Three Musketeers, 1846); Sylvandire, 1844 (The Disputed Inheritance, 1847; also known as Sylvandire, 1897); Une Fille du Régent, 1844 (with Maquet; The Regent's Daughter, 1845); La Guerre des femmes, 1845-1846 (Nanon, 1847; also known as The War of Women, 1895); La Reine Margot, 1845 (with Maquet; Marguerite de Navarre, 1845; better known as Marguerite de Valois, 1846); Vingt Ans après, 1845 (with Maquet; Twenty Years After, 1846); La Dame de Monsoreau, 1846 (Chicot the Jester, 1857); Le Bâtard de Mauléon, 1846 (The Bastard of Mauléon, 1848); Le Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, 1846 (with Maquet; Marie Antoinette: Or, The Chevalier of the Red House, 1846; also known as The Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, 1893); Les Deux Diane, 1846 (with Meurice; The Two Dianas, 1857); Mémoires d'un médecin, 1846-1848 (with Maquet; also known as Joseph Balsamo; Memoirs of a Physician, 1846); La Véloce, 1848-1851; Le Vicomte de Bragelonne, 1848-1850 (with Maquet; The Vicomte de Bragelonne, 1857; also as 3 volumes: The Vicomte de Bragelonne, 1893; Louise de la Vallière, 1893; and The Man in the Iron Mask, 1893); Les Quarante-cinq, 1848 (with Maquet; The Forty-five Guardsmen, 1847); Le Collier de la reine, 1849-1850 (with Maquet; The Queen's Necklace, 1855); La Tulipe noire, 1850 (with Maquet and Paul Lacroix; The Black Tulip, 1851)

1851-1860 • Ange Pitou, 1851 (Six Years Later, 1851; also known as Ange Pitou, 1859); Conscience l'Innocent, 1852 (Conscience, 1905); Isaac Laquedem, 1852-1853; Olympe de Clèves, 1852 (English translation, 1894); La Comtesse de Charny, 1853-1855 (The Countess de Charny, 1858); Catherine Blum, 1854 (The Foresters, 1854; also known as Catherine Blum, 1861); El Saltéador, 1854 (The Brigand, 1897); Ingénue, 1854 (English translation, 1855); Le Page du Duc de Savoie, 1854 (Emmanuel Philibert, 1854; also known as The Page of the Duke of Savoy, 1861); Les Mohicans de Paris, 1854-1855 (and Salvator, 1855-1859; The Mohicans of Paris, 1875; abridged version); Charles le Téméraire, 1857 (Charles the Bold, 1860); Les Compagnons de Jéhu, 1857 (Roland de Montrevel, 1860; also known as The Companions of Jéhu, 1895); Les Meneurs de loups, 1857 (The Wolf Leader, 1904); Ainsi-soit-il!, 1858 (also known as Madame de Chamblay, 1862; Madame de Chamblay, 1869); L'Horoscope, 1858 (The Horoscope, 1897); Le Capitaine Richard, 1858 (The Twin Captains, 1861); Histoire d'un cabanon et d'un chalet, 1859 (The Convict's Son, 1905); Le Chasseur de Sauvagine, 1859 (The Wild Duck Shooter, 1906); Le Médecin de Java, 1859 (also known as L'Île de Feu, 1870; Doctor Basilius, 1860); Les Louves de Machecoul, 1859 (The Last Vendée, 1894; also known as The She Wolves of Machecoul, 1895); La Maison de Glace, 1860 (The Russian Gipsy, 1860); Le Père la Ruine, 1860 (Père la Ruine, 1905)

1861-1911 • La San-Felice, 1864-1865 (The Lovely Lady Hamilton, 1903); Le Comte de Moret, 1866 (The Count of Moret, 1868); La Terreur prussienne, 1867 (The Prussian Terror, 1915); Les Blancs et les bleus, 1867-1868 (The Whites and the Blues, 1895); The Romances of Alexandre Dumas, 1893-1897 (60 volumes); The Novels of Alexandre Dumas, 1903-1911 (56 volumes)

PLAYS: 1825-1840 • La Chasse et l'amour, pr., pb. 1825 (with Adolphe de Leuven and P.-J. Rousseau); La Noce et l'enterrement, pr., pb. 1826; Henri III et sa cour, pr., pb. 1829 (Catherine of Cleves, 1831; also known as Henry III and His Court, 1904); Christine: Ou, Stockholm, Fontainebleau, et Rome, pr., pb. 1830; Antony, pr., pb. 1831 (English translation, 1904); Charles VII chez ses grands vassaux, pr., pb. 1831; Napoléon Bonaparte: Ou, Trente Ans dans l'histoire de France, pr., pb. 1831; Richard Darlington, pr. 1831, pb. 1832; La Tour de Nesle, pr., pb. 1832 (redrafted from a manuscript by Frédéric Gaillardet; English translation, 1906); Le Fils de l'émigré: Ou, Le Peuple, pr. 1832 (selections pb. 1902); Le Mari de la veuve, pr., pb. 1832; Teresa, pr., pb. 1832 (based on a draft by Auguste Anicet-Bourgeois); Angèle, pr. 1833, pb. 1834; Catherine Howard, pr., pb. 1834 (English translation, 1859); La Vénitienne, pr., pb. 1834; Cromwell et Charles I, pr., pb. 1835 (with E.-C.-H. Cordellier-Delanoue); Don Juan de Marana: Ou, La Chute d'un ange, pr., pb. 1836; Kean: Ou, Désordre et génie, pr., pb. 1836 (with Théaulon de Lambert and Frédéric de Courcy; Edmund Kean: Or, The Genius and the Liber- tine, 1847); Caligula, pr. 1837, pb. 1838; Piquillo, pr., pb. 1837 (with Gérard de Nerval; libretto); Le Bourgeois de Gand: Ou, Le Secrétaire du duc d'Albe, pr., pb. 1838 (with Hippolyte Romand); Paul Jones, pr., pb. 1838; Bathilde, pr., pb. 1839 (with Auguste Maquet); Léo Burckart, pr., pb. 1839 (with Nerval); L'Alchimiste, pr., pb. 1839 (with Nerval); Mademoiselle de Belle-Isle, pr., pb. 1839 (English translation, 1855); Jarvis l'honnête homme: Ou, Le Marchand de Londres, pr., pb. 1840 (originally credited to Charles Lafont) 1841-1850 • Jeannic le Breton: Ou, Le Gérant responsable, pr. 1841, pb. 1842 (with Eugène Bourgeois); Un Mariage sous Louis XV, pr., pb. 1841 (A Marriage of Convenience, 1899); Halifax, pr. 1842, pb. 1843 (with Adolphe D'Ennery?); Le Séducteur et le mari, pr., pb. 1842 (with Lafont); Lorenzino, pr., pb. 1842; L'école des princes, pr. 1843, pb. 1844 (with Louis Lefèvre); Le Mariage au tambour, pr., pb. 1843 (with Leuven and Léon Lhérie); Les Demoiselles de Saint-Cyr, pr., pb. 1843 (The Ladies of Saint-Cyr, 1870); Louise Bernard, pr., pb. 1843 (with Leuven and Lhérie); Le Garde forestier, pr., pb. 1845 (with Leuven and Lhérie); Les Mousquetaires, pr., pb. 1845 (with Maquet; adaptation of Dumas's novel Vingt ans après); Sylvandire, pr., pb. 1845 (with Leuven and Louis-émile Vanderburch); Un Conte des fées, pr., pb. 1845 (with Leuven and Lhérie); échec et mat, pr., pb. 1846 (with Octave Feuillet and Paul Bocage); Une Fille du Régent, pr., pb. 1846; Hamlet, prince de Danemark, pr. 1847, pb. 1848 (with Paul Meurice; adaptation of William Shakespeare's play); Intrigue et amour, pr., pb. 1847 (adaptation of Friedrich Schiller's play Kabale und Liebe); La Reine Margot, pr., pb. 1847 (with Maquet; adaptation of Dumas's novel); Le Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, pr., pb. 1847 (with Maquet; The Chevalier de Maison-Rouge, 1859); Catilina, pr., pb. 1848 (with Maquet); Monte-Cristo, parts 1 and 2, pr., pb. 1848 (with Maquet; Monte-Cristo, part 1, 1850); La Guerre des femmes, pr., pb. 1849 (with Maquet; based on Dumas's novel); La Jeunesse des mousquetaires, pr., pb. 1849 (with Maquet; based on Dumas's novel Les Trois Mousquetaires; The Musketeers, 1850); Le Cachemire vert, pr., pb. 1849 (with Eugène Nus); Le Chevalier d'Harmental, pr., pb. 1849 (with Maquet;

based on Dumas's novel); Le Comte Hermann, pr., pb. 1849; Le Connétable de Bourbon: Ou, L'Italie au seizième siècle, pr., pb. 1849 (with Eugène Grangé and Xavier de Montépin); Le Testament de César, pr., pb. 1849 (with Jules Lacroix); La Chasse au chastre, pr., pb. 1850 (with Maquet?; based on Dumas's story La Chasse au chastre); Le Vingt-quatre février, pr., pb. 1850 (adaptation of Zacharias Werner's play Der 24 Februar); Les Chevaliers du Lansquenet, pr., pb. 1850 (with Grangé and Montépin); Pauline, pr., pb. 1850 (with Grangé and Montépin; based on Dumas's novel Pauline); Urbain Grandier, pr., pb. 1850 (with Maquet)

1851-1860 • Le Comte de Morcerf, pr., pb. 1851 (with Maquet; part 3 of Monte-Cristo); Villefort, pr., pb. 1851 (with Maquet; part 4 of Monte-Cristo); Romulus, pr., pb. 1854; L'Orestie, pr., pb. 1856; L'Invitation à la valse, pr., pb. 1857 (adapted in English as Childhood Dreams, 1881); L'Envers d'une conspiration, pr., pb. 1860; Le Roman d'Elvire, pr., pb. 1860 (with Leuven)

1861-1979 • La Veillée allemande, pr. 1863, pb. 1864 (with Bernard Lopez); Madame de Chamblay, pr. 1868, pb. 1869; Les Blancs et les bleus, pr., pb. 1869 (adaptation of part of his novel Les Blancs et les bleus); Théâtre complet, pb. 1873-1876 (25 volumes); The Great Lover; and Other Plays, pb. 1979

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: Histoire d'un casse-noisette, 1845 (Story of a Nutcracker, 1846); La Bouillie de la Comtesse Berthe, 1845 (Good Lady Bertha's Honey Broth, 1846); Le Roi de Bohême, 1853 (also known as La Jeunesse de Pierrot, 1854; When Pierrot Was Young, 1924); Le Sifflet enchanté, 1859 (The Enchanted Whistle, 1894)

NONFICTION: 1833-1840 • Gaule et France, 1833 (The Progress of Democracy, 1841); Impressions de voyage, 1833, 1838, 1841, 1843 (Travels in Switzerland, 1958); La Vendée et Madame, 1833 (The Duchess of Berri in La Vendée, 1833); Guelfes et Gibelins, 1836; Isabel de Bavière, 1836 (Isabel of Bavaria, 1846); Napoléon, 1836 (English translation, 1874); Crimes célèbres, 1838-1840 (Celebrated Crimes, 1896); Quinze Jours au Sinai, 1838 (Impressions of Travel in Egypt and Arabia Petraea, 1839)

1841-1850 • Excursions sur les bords du Rhin, 1841 (with Gérard de Nerval); Le Midi de la France,

1841 (Pictures of Travel in the South of France, 1852); Chroniques du roi Pépin, 1842 (Pepin, 1906); Jehanne la Pucelle, 1429-1431, 1842 (Joan the Heroic Maiden, 1847); Le Spéronare, 1842; Le Corricolo, 1843

1851-1956 • Mes mémoires, 1852, 1853, 1854-1855 (My Memoirs, 1907-1909); Souvenirs de 1830 à 1842, 1854-1855; Causeries, 1860; Les Garibaldiens, 1861 (The Garibaldians in Sicily, 1861); Histoires de mes bêtes, 1868 (My Pets, 1909); Souvenirs dramatiques, 1868; Grand Dictionnaire de cuisine, 1873 (with Anatole France); On Board the "Emma," 1929; The Road to Monte-Cristo, 1956

TRANSLATION: Mémoires de Garibaldi, 1860 (of Giuseppe Garibaldi's Memorie autobiografiche)

MISCELLANEOUS: Œuvres complètes, 1846-1877 (301 volumes); Œuvres d'Alexandre Dumas, 1962-1967 (38 volumes)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bell, A. Craig. Alexandre Dumas: A Biography and Study. London: Cassel, 1950. As the subtitle suggests, Bell pays significant attention to both the life and work. The introduction deals succinctly with the phenomenon of Dumas's popularity and the need for a careful treatment of his entire body of work. Still a helpful and thorough guide.

Bell, David F. Real Time: Accelerating Narrative from Balzac to Zola. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2004. Treats Dumas's representations of time, communication, and speed and compares him to other French authors. Bibliographic references and index.

Gorman, Herbert. The Incredible Marquis. New York: Farrar and Rinehart, 1929. Remains a reliable and very readable biography.

Maurois, André. The Titan: A Three-Generation Biography of the Dumas. Translated by Gerard Hopkins. 1957. Reprint. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1971. A classic in Dumas studies by a seasoned biographer. Includes notes, bibliography, and illustrations.

Munro, Douglas. Alexandre Dumas père: A Bibliography of Works Published in French, 1825-1900. New York: Garland, 1981. A discussion of Dumas's original popularity and his reception in the francophone world.

Schopp, Claude. Alexandre Dumas: Genius of Life. Translated by A. J. Koch. New York: Franklin Watts, 1988. A detailed, lively narrative.

Stowe, Richard S. Alexandre Dumas père. Boston: Twayne, 1976. The best short introduction in English, with chapters on Dumas's dramas, novels, and other fiction. Includes notes, chronology, and annotated bibliography.

DAPHNE DU MAURIER

Lady Daphne Browning

Born: London, England; May 13, 1907

Died: Par, Cornwall, England; April 19, 1989

Types of plot: Historical; horror; psychological

CONTRIBUTION

Daphne du Maurier's three mystery novels, Jamaica Inn (1936), Rebecca (1938), and My Cousin Rachel (1951), are landmarks in the development of the modern gothic romance. Working out of the tradition of the nineteenth century British gothic novel, du Maurier breathed new life into the form through her evocations of the brooding, rugged landscapes of Cornwall and its ancient buildings and mansions. She created a world filled with a rich history of superstitions, danger, and mystery. Manderley, the great house in Rebecca, haunted by the ghostly presence of its dead mistress, and Jamaica Inn, an isolated tavern near the Cornish coast, filled with dark secrets and violence, are so powerfully drawn as to become equal in importance to the characters who inhabit them. The naïve heroines of these two novels must overcome their anxieties and insecurities in the face of physical and psychological threats and penetrate the secrets that surround them before they can achieve final happiness, peace, and love. Du Maurier's use of setting, her characters, and her plots became models for the countless gothic tales and romances that followed on the publications of these novels.

My Cousin Rachel retains some of the gothic flavor of her earlier works but focuses more on the ambiguous psychology of its heroine. Unlike the typical mystery or detective novel, this book ends with, rather than solves, a mystery: Is Rachel an innocent, misunderstood woman or a sinister, calculating murderer?

In her two famous short stories, "The Birds" and "Don't Look Now," du Maurier establishes the twentieth century sense of dislocation. These tales of horror show the accepted order of things suddenly and for no apparent reason disintegrating. Her characters find themselves battling for their lives against creatures they have always assumed to be their inferiors: birds and children. The continuity of time itself is in question in "Don't Look Now," where du Maurier introduces the startling theme of precognition. Her innovative use of horror in "The Birds" has given rise to a host of stories and films about creatures, ranging from ants to rabbits, that threaten to destroy civilization.

BIOGRAPHY

Daphne du Maurier was born on May 13, 1907, in London, the daughter of the famous actor-manager Sir Gerald du Maurier. Although she enjoyed the company of her two sisters when she was growing up, her best friend was always her father, an exciting, romantic, and somewhat irresponsible man. As a young girl she desperately wished that she had been born a boy so that she could be free to live an adventurous and unorthodox life like her father's. She even adopted the persona of a fictitious character she named Eric Avon, captain of a cricket team, to act out her fantasies of male independence.

Du Maurier was determined not to model her life on that of her mother, who seemed to her too limited by domestic concerns. As she matured, du Maurier romanced the ghost of her father in both her fiction and her life. Her fantasies about him shaped the heroes of her novels and were embodied in the man she eventually married, while the needs of the "boy in the box," her alternate persona, were satisfied by deep and lasting friendships with women, including romantic relationships with two of them.

After attending private schools in England, du Maurier attended finishing school at Camposena, outside Paris, in 1923. By the end of that decade, she had begun writing short stories and developed an obsessive interest in three things: the history of her family and of Cornwall (where her parents owned a large house), the sea, and a mysterious old house called Menabilly. These three interests became inextricably bound up with her career as a writer. Shortly after the publication of her first novel, The Loving Spirit (1931), she married a thirty-five-year-old major in the Grenadier Guards, Frederick A. M. Browning.

Although eager to settle down in Cornwall, especially because she was soon the mother of three children, she and her family were frequently uprooted as they followed her husband to his various military stations. No matter where she was, however, Cornwall was always at the center of her thoughts and her fiction. In fact, it was during her time in Alexandria, Egypt, that she wrote her greatest Cornish novel, Rebecca.

The fame and wealth she acquired after the publication of Jamaica Inn in 1936 and Rebecca in 1938 only increased in the following years, for Alfred Hitchcock adapted these novels into films. Starring Laurence Olivier and Joan Fontaine, Rebecca won the Academy Award for Best Picture of 1940. Her work then in great popular demand, du Maurier went on to write ten novels, two plays, and several biographies, histories, and memoirs. Almost all the novels became best sellers and had a special appeal to women. It may be for those reasons that highbrow reviewers (mostly men) have patronized her work and academic critics have chosen to ignore it.

In 1943, du Maurier moved into Menabilly, the mysterious mansion that had captured her imagination as a young girl and which she had transformed into Manderley, the grand home of Maxim de Winter. In 1952, du Maurier was made fellow of the Royal Society of Literature; in 1969, she became Dame Commander, Order of the British Empire. Despite these honors and her growing fame, du Maurier became a recluse, confining herself to her writing and her family in Menabilly after the death of her lover and inspiration, Gertrude Lawrence. Her small, private world began to come apart after the death of her husband in 1965. In 1969, her lease on Menabilly expired, and she moved a few miles away to another historic house, Kilmarth, at Par, on the coast of Cornwall.

She won the Mystery Writers of America's Grand Master Award in 1978. In the same year she published Growing Pains: The Shaping of a Writer, an autobiography that ends at the date of her marriage. In 1980, she published The Rebecca Notebook, and Other Memories, a work that illuminates the creative process that lay behind her most famous work. In 1989, du Maurier's will to live seemed to wither as she ate less and less and made her rounds to visit family and friends, breaking her stringently observed routines, to say good-bye. She died in her sleep on April 19, 1989. In 2000, du Maurier received an Anthony Award for best novel of the century for Rebecca.

ANALYSIS

Daphne du Maurier's first two novels, The Loving Spirit and I'll Never Be Young Again (1932), began to kindle an interest in romances during a period when realism was still in vogue. Her next novel, The Progress of Julius (1933), was much bolder: It introduced the theme of incest between father and daughter. This work was followed by du Maurier's biography of her father, in which she attempts to sort out her complex feelings about him, to gain a perspective on him that would allow her the freedom to develop her independence.

JAMAICA INN

In Jamaica Inn, du Maurier combines the elements of her earlier popular romances with those of the gothic novel to create her first mystery. This haunting tale, set on the Bodmin moor around the year 1835, is the story of an assertive, independent woman named Mary Yellan. The twenty-three-year-old heroine (who appears to embody du Maurier's own fantasies of love and adventure) goes to live with her aunt and uncle, who manage Jamaica Inn, an isolated tavern whose dreadful secrets have driven Mary's aunt mad. Mary's uncle, Joss, it turns out, is a vicious smuggler. He and his consorts make secret trips to the coast, where they use lights to lure ships to crash on the rocks. These "wreckers," as they are called, then murder the survivors and steal their goods, which they store at Jamaica Inn.

A noteworthy psychological dimension separates Jamaica Inn from the conventional mystery romance: Du Maurier bifurcates the demon-lover father of The Progress of Julius into two characters for this novel. Mary's uncle, Joss, a powerful, huge, older man, embodies pure malignancy; his young brother, Jem, is a handsome, arrogant, mysterious figure who, by the end of the novel, becomes Mary's lover and presumed husband.

Jamaica Inn is the first of du Maurier's novels to contain the main features of the gothic romance: the isolated, bleak landscape; a house filled with mystery and terror; violence and murders; mysterious strangers; villains larger than life; and a strong-minded woman who bravely withstands hardships and brutality and is rewarded with marriage and the promise of a full life. Du Maurier renders her material in a style remarkable for its simplicity. She rarely employs metaphoric language except in her descriptions of landscape and buildings—and then does so with restraint, allowing highly selective details to convey the spirit of the atmosphere.

REBECCA

Du Maurier's masterpiece, Rebecca, combines features of the popular romance, the gothic novel, the psychological novel, and autobiography to create one of the most powerful tales of mystery and romance in the twentieth century. Following the tradition of Charlotte Brontë's Jane Eyre (1847) and Emily Brontë's Wuthering Heights (1847), du Maurier's novel contains most of the trappings of the typical gothic romance: a mysterious, haunted mansion, violence, murder, a sinister villain, sexual passion, a spectacular fire, brooding landscapes, and a version of the madwoman in the attic. Du Maurier's novel, however, is much more than a simple thriller or mystery. It is a profound and fascinating study of an obsessive personality, of sexual dominance, human identity, and the liberation of the hidden self. The real power of the work derives from du Maurier's obsession with her father and her resolution of that obsession through the fantasy structure of the novel.

In this sophisticated version of the Cinderella story, the poor, plain, nameless narrator marries Maxim de Winter, a handsome, brooding, wealthy man twice her age, and moves into Manderley, a mansion haunted by secret memories of his first wife, Rebecca. The macabre housekeeper, Mrs. Danvers, is dedicated to protecting the memory of Rebecca from the innocent new mistress of the house. Mrs. Danvers is the evil witch, the embodiment of Rebecca's sinister spirit, the Other Woman, who must be destroyed before the fairy tale can be happily concluded. Like Rebecca herself, Mrs. Danvers represents a powerful hold on Maxim that recreates the Oedipal triangle in du Maurier's own life. The nameless narrator must compete with and overcome the Other Woman to obtain her father-lover. When Maxim finally admits that he never loved the domineering Rebecca—indeed, that he hated and murdered her—the great mystery surrounding Maxim and Manderley is solved.

It is not marriage (as in the typical romance) that brings du Maurier's heroine happiness, but the symbolically significant death of Mrs. Danvers, the fiery destruction of Manderley, and the exorcism of the spirit of Rebecca, events that crown the narrator with her true and unique sense of identity as Mrs. de Winter and assure her that she is the solitary recipient of Maxim's love and devotion.

MY COUSIN RACHEL

My Cousin Rachel is du Maurier's tour de force. In making her narrator, Philip Ashley, a man who is unaccustomed to the company of women, sexually naïve, and somewhat paranoid, she creates a wonderfully ambiguous storyteller. Philip suspects that the mysterious and seductive Rachel has poisoned his wealthy cousin and benefactor, Ambrose Ashley. He comes to see this beautiful half-English, half-Italian adversary as a femme fatale;

nevertheless, he soon falls in love with her himself. Throughout the novel, his attitude toward her fluctuates between adoration and trust and fear and suspicion. Toward the end, though he apparently has come to view her as innocent, he allows her to walk across a bridge that he knows will not hold her weight, and she is killed.

Du Maurier's technique is similar to that used by Robert Browning in his dramatic monologues, in which the narrators present the "facts" through their own limited and often-misguided perceptions, revealing their own characters more fully than those of the people they describe. Du Maurier thus captures the rich ambiguity of life itself, the hazy border between fact and fantasy, truth and illusion.

"THE BIRDS"

In its depiction of horror, du Maurier's short story "The Birds" far surpasses Alfred Hitchcock's popular film adaptation with its intrusively added love story. She strictly limits the focus of her tale to a British farmer, Nat Hocken, and his family, tracing their developing panic as thousands of seagulls begin to menace the countryside. In this small world, humans have ceased to have dominion over the birds and beasts.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Tipi Hedren in a scene from Alfred Hitchcock's 1963 film The Birds, which was loosely adapted from Daphne du Maurier's short story of the same title.
(Museum of Modern Art, Film Stills Archive)

The serenity of English village life and the wisdom and common sense of the inhabitants are displaced by terror and confusion in this sudden reversion to a Darwinian world of the survival of the fittest. Nat hears reports on his radio that birds in London are also becoming predators, but du Maurier continues to confine the sense of horror to the Hocken family, which becomes a microcosm of an apparently worldwide disaster. She concludes her tale with Nat listening to the birds as they attack his house, about to break through and destroy him and his family; the reader is left to conclude that civilization itself may be on the verge of extinction.

“DON’T LOOK NOW”

The motion-picture version of du Maurier’s other great tale of mystery and horror, “Don’t Look Now,” has been described as “the fanciest, most carefully assembled Gothic enigma yet put on the screen.” Directed by Nicholas Roeg and starring Donald Sutherland and Julie Christie, the film captures du Maurier’s suffocating sense of terror through its subtle and enigmatic imagery. The story centers on an English couple, John and Laura, on vacation in Venice in an attempt to distract themselves from the crushing memory of the recent death of their young daughter, Christine. They meet two strange sisters, one of whom is blind and, like Tiresias, has psychic powers. She tells Laura that Christine has contacted her to warn John that he is in danger in Venice.

Laura later returns to England to attend to her son, who has become ill at school; John becomes convinced that during her absence he has seen her in Venice riding a vaporetto in the company of the two weird sisters. At the end of the story it becomes clear that John has the power of precognition and that he did indeed see his wife and the two women. They were riding in the vaporetto carrying his corpse to the church. In his wife’s absence, John had come to the assistance of a person whom he assumed to be a small child, perhaps resembling Christine, who was running from some men. The pursuers prove, however, to be police, and the fugitive is a dwarf, a psychopathic killer who stabs John to death. John’s memories of Christine and his vision into the future thus blend into a horrifying clarity of understanding as he dies.

Du Maurier’s skillful presentation of the gothic setting of a decaying Venice, the mad dwarf, the recurring glimpses into the future, the suspense, and the violence makes this an innovative mystery. As in a Greek tragedy, the characters seem inextricably entangled in a fatalistic course of events. Like the blind sister, John is possessed of psychic powers, but he refuses to credit or understand his fatal foreknowledge. On a psychological level, the story suggests the hero’s guilt over the death of his daughter and how that emotion leads to his fatal compassion for the murderous dwarf.

Richard Kelly

Updated by C. A. Gardner

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: Jamaica Inn, 1936; Rebecca, 1938; My Cousin Rachel, 1951; The Scapegoat, 1957; The Flight of the Falcon, 1965; The House on the Strand, 1969

SHORT FICTION: The Apple Tree: A Short Novel and Some Stories, 1952 (also known as The Birds, and Other Stories and as Kiss Me Again, Stranger: A Collection of Eight Stories); The Breaking Point, 1959 (also known as The Blue Lenses, and Other Stories); Not After Midnight, and Other Stories, 1971 (also known as Don’t Look Now); Echoes from the Macabre, 1976

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: The Loving Spirit, 1931; I’ll Never Be Young Again, 1932; The Progress of Julius, 1933; Frenchman’ Creek, 1941; Hungry Hill, 1943; The King’ General, 1946; The Parasites, 1949; Mary Anne, 1954; Castle Dor, 1962 (with Arthur Quiller-Couch); The Glass-Blowers, 1963; Rule Britannia, 1972

SHORT FICTION: Come Wind, Come Weather, 1940; Happy Christmas, 1940; Early Stories, 1955; The Treasury of du Maurier Short Stories, 1960; The Rendezvous, and Other Stories, 1980; Classics of the Macabre, 1987

PLAYS: Rebecca: A Play in Three Acts, pr. 1940, pb. 1943 (adaptation of her novel); The Years Between, pr. 1944, pb. 1945; September Tide, pr. 1948, pb. 1949

NONFICTION: Gerald: A Portrait, 1934; The du Mauriers, 1937; The Infernal World of Branwell

Brontë, 1960; Vanishing Cornwall, 1967; Golden Lads: Sir Francis Bacon, Anthony Bacon, and Their Friends, 1975; The Winding Stair: Francis Bacon, His Rise and Fall, 1976; Growing Pains: The Shaping of a Writer, 1977 (also known as Myself When Young: The Shaping of a Writer, 1977); The Rebecca Notebook, and Other Memories, 1980; Letters from Menabilly: Portrait of a Friendship, 1994 (Oriël Mallet, editor)

EDITED TEXTS: The Young George du Maurier: A Selection of His Letters 1860-1867, 1951; Best Stories of Phyllis Bottome, 1963

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Abi-Ezzi, Nathalie. The Double in the Fiction of R. L. Stevenson, Wilkie Collins, and Daphne du Maurier. New York: Peter Lang, 2003. Examines the figure of the double as a trope of mystery and suspense fiction, comparing du Maurier with two of her predecessors in the genres. Bibliographic references and index.
- Auerbach, Nina. Daphne du Maurier: Haunted Heiress. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1999. Noted critic Auerbach discusses her fascination with du Maurier.
- Cook, Judith. Daphne: A Portrait of Daphne du Maurier. London: Bantam Books, 1991. Good insights into the woman and the author.

- Forster, Margaret. Daphne du Maurier: The Secret Life of the Renowned Storyteller. New York: Doubleday, 1993. A candid, meticulous, and riveting biography, prepared with cooperation of the du Maurier family after du Maurier's death.
- Horner, Avril, and Sue Zlosnik. "Daphne du Maurier and Gothic Signatures: Rebecca as Vamp(ire)." In Body Matters: Feminism, Textuality, Corporeality, edited by Avril Horner and Angela Keane. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000. A reading of the title character of Rebecca, arguing that she possesses the same traits as do vampires in gothic fiction.
- _____. Daphne du Maurier: Writing, Identity, and the Gothic Imagination. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998. An evaluation of du Maurier's fiction from historical, cultural, geographic, and female gothic literary perspectives.
- Kelly, Richard Michael. Daphne du Maurier. Boston: Twayne, 1987. A solid introduction to the author's works. Includes index and bibliography.
- Leng, Flavia. Daphne du Maurier: A Daughter's Memoir. Edinburgh: Mainstream, 1994. A good biography of du Maurier written by her daughter.

SARAH DUNANT

Born: London, England; August 8, 1950

Also wrote as Peter Dunant (with Peter Busby)

Types of plot: Private investigator; thriller; psychological

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Hannah Wolfe, 1991-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

HANNAH WOLFE is a private detective, the sole employee of Frank Comfort, hard-boiled former police officer and owner of Comfort and Security, a private security firm. Hannah is tough and independent, yet real and vulnerable. Her straightforward security jobs, such as shepherding a rich teenager on a shopping expedition in London, tend to turn into more complex investigations because of her intelligence and feisty persistence. Hannah has a wry sense of humor, often turned on herself, and is unlucky in love.

CONTRIBUTION

Sarah Dunant has created a realistic female private investigator in Hannah Wolfe, adding a feminist slant to the detective-fiction genre. She has added psychological and issue-oriented elements to the genre without sacrificing the necessary strengths of plot and action. Her later novels Transgressions (1997) and Mapping the Edge (1999) stretch the boundaries of the psychological thriller genre, developing themes of women who refuse to become victims and exploring the relationship between sexuality, fear, and control. Her style is intelligent and literary, blurring the lines between detective fiction, psychological thriller, and literary fiction. Dunant's work bridges the gap between commercial fiction and the literary novel. Hannah Wolfe's self-conscious commentary is reminiscent of postmodernism, while both Transgressions and Mapping the Edge maintain complex parallel plots that are experimental in form. The first Hannah Wolfe mystery, Birth Marks (1991), was shortlisted for Britain's prestigious Gold Dagger Award. Fatlands (1994), the second Wolfe mystery, won the Silver Dagger Award.

BIOGRAPHY

Sarah Dunant was born on August 8, 1950, in London. She earned a degree in history from Newnham College, Cambridge University, in 1972, and began working as a producer for British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) Radio in 1974. She became a successful broadcaster, critic, and writer, well-known to British audiences as a presenter of BBC Radio 4's Woman's Hour; BBC Television's The Late Show, a nightly cultural news program; and BBC Radio 3's Nightwaves.

Dunant wrote her first two novels, the thrillers Exterminating Angels (1983) and Intensive Care (1986), with Peter Busby under the joint pseudonym, Peter Dunant. The first novel Dunant published under her own name, Snow Storms in a Hot Climate (1988), is a psychological thriller with a complex web of psychology, eroticism, humor, twisting plot, and intelligent writing that foreshadow the elements of the her later mysteries.

Dunant then wrote three mysteries in the Hannah Wolfe series. Her objective was to create a realistic modern female detective who would be clever yet vulnerable. Set in London, Birth Marks introduces Hannah Wolfe, a working-class young woman who works for a security firm. She takes a job tracking down a missing ballet dancer, and an unexpectedly complex tale of action and ideas unfolds. Fatlands, perhaps the most compelling Wolfe mystery, followed in 1994. Further revelations about Hannah's philosophy of life are intertwined in a novel that manages to be frightening, violent, and witty at the same time and leaves the reader thinking about contemporary issues and feminist lifestyles. The third novel in the series, Under My Skin (1995), is set in the milieu of an upscale women's spa and features the murder of a prominent plastic surgeon. Once again, action and feminist issues are intertwined with the engaging character of Hannah.

Dunant edited two nonfiction collections, The War of the Words: The Political Correctness Debate (1995) and The Age of Anxiety (1996), continuing her successful double career as writer and broadcaster. Two nonseries psychological thrillers followed, Transgressions and Mapping the Edge. Both books are complex, stretching the boundaries of form as well as what is traditional and permissible behavior for a woman. She was criticized by feminists for the controversial rape scene in Transgressions, in which the heroine deflects the potential violence of her attacker by seducing him.

In 2000, Dunant bought an apartment in Florence, Italy, and turned to historical fiction. The Birth of Venus (2003), set in fifteenth century Florence, is the story of an intelligent young woman, Alessandra Cecchi, who longs to be a painter. She makes a marriage of convenience with an older man who turns out to be a homosexual but who allows her to paint. She becomes the lover of her young painting teacher, and then her world explodes with the rise of the fiery fundamentalist monk Savonarola. In this novel, Dunant combines her background in history and art with her insights into female sexuality. The book was highly successful, becoming a best seller.

Following The Birth of Venus, Dunant gave up her work for the BBC to devote more time to her two teenage daughters, Zoe and Georgia, and to her writing. A second historical novel, In the Company of the Courtesan (2006), is set in Venice and recounts the adventures of a beautiful courtesan who becomes the model for Titian's "Venus of Urbino," narrated by the heroine's servant, a dwarf.

ANALYSIS

Sarah Dunant writes sharp and witty, complex literary mysteries. Her heroines are contemporary women who are realistic and candid. Her novels incorporate a subtext of challenging women's traditional roles, especially regarding sexuality. These are women who take charge of their own destinies and value independence over security. Even when they become victims of violence, they struggle for control. They are vulnerable yet credible. However, the elements of character and contemporary issues are always subordinate to plot and action. The story keeps moving through unexpected twists and turns right up to the last page; there are no easy answers or unsatisfactory endings in Dunant's novels.

BIRTH MARKS

Birth Marks, the first Hannah Wolfe mystery, is a novel of psychology as well as a traditional detective novel. This novel introduces Hannah Wolfe, a single security investigator in her thirties. Hannah's assignments are generally less-than-glamorous jobs such as providing security to rich women on shopping jaunts or department store surveillance. As the novel opens, Hannah takes a missing person assignment: A young ballet dancer has fallen out of touch with her elderly teacher/guardian.

Set in London, the tale is told in the first person. Hannah comments with humor and irony on her business and the people around her as well as on her own life. She is tough and idealistic at the same time. Her commentary pays homage to Raymond Chandler's hard-boiled style with nods to Agatha Christie. She speaks directly to the reader in a wryly self-conscious style.

When the eight-months' pregnant dancer is found drowned in the Thames, an apparent suicide, the police consider the case closed. However, Hannah is both persistent and insightful. Considering her own biological clock, she understands that an eight-months' pregnant woman is likely to be looking toward new life, not death. Intelligence and observation, the detective's tools of the trade, contribute to her suspicion that the suicide note was not in the dancer's apartment when Hannah was snooping there shortly before the death was discovered. Hannah digs deeper, tracks the dancer to Paris, and the tale becomes one of artificial insemination and surrogate motherhood. The dancer had been recruited to bear a child for a rich and childless war hero and had been leading a double life.

The ending has a twist; it is not what it first appears to be, revealing the moral ambiguity and complexity of modern life. Hannah reveals an intelligence, attitude, humor, and self-knowledge that makes the reader eager to read more about her. The book is a rich combination of character, setting, psychology, voice, and contemporary issues with solid plot and action.

FATLANDS

The second Hannah Wolfe mystery, Fatlands, lives up to the promise of the first. Hannah has taken a job shepherding a spoiled, rich fourteen-year-old on a shopping trip in London. While the young girl is in her charge, she is blown up in a car explosion presumably meant for her father, a research scientist who has received death threats from animal rights activists. Stunned, grieving, and feeling responsible, Hannah unravels an increasingly complex and compelling plot that navigates through factory farming, international corporate politics, and the deadly potential of chemicals in people's food.

Fatlands is a page-turner that is notable for its central scene of violence to Hannah and the aftermath of that violence. Viciously beaten by her unknown antagonist in a dark country lane, Hannah ends up in the hospital. Through her brutally honest first-person narration, the attack is seen and felt through Hannah's own eyes. She continues her investigation, emotionally scarred but determined to find and confront her attacker. In the thrilling ending, she comes face to face with her attacker and faces not only her fear but also the motivation for violence against women. In Fatlands, Dunant introduces the relationship between sex and violence, pain and fear, and the refusal of a woman to become a victim that would be further developed in the later novel Transgressions.

Fatlands was a popular and critical success. Critics and the public praised the book for its intelligence and style, for its observation and wit, for its feminist perspective and its use of ideas, all pleasingly subordinate to its action and plot.

UNDER MY SKIN

Hannah Wolfe returns in Under My Skin, the third mystery in the series. As the new plot unfolds, the reader is made aware that Hannah suffers from post-traumatic shock syndrome as a result of the severe beating she received in Fatlands. She bears a physical scar on her face in addition to the emotional scars, so it is ironic that her new case is set at a health and beauty spa outside London, among women who will do almost anything to be as perfectly beautiful as possible.

As in all of the Hannah Wolfe mysteries, a straightforward case with a relatively easy solution, sabotage at the upscale health spa, evolves into something more challenging: the murder of the plastic surgeon husband of the spa's beautiful, surgically altered owner. As Hannah investigates, interviewing a number of his unsatisfied clients, witty and ironic commentary on the contemporary fascination with youth and beauty abounds. At the same time, Hannah is informally investigating the seeming infidelity of her sister's husband, of whom Hannah has never been fond. Once again, the obvious and easy conclusions are not the end of the story, and the twists and turns of the plot's ending are ultimately both surprising and satisfying.

Dunant succeeds in creating another novel that combines ideas about contemporary life and relationships, a solid page-turning detective story, and insights about men and women with a deeper exploration of the character of Hannah Wolfe. This is an entertaining book, compelling for those readers who are by now hooked on Hannah's life and work, but it does not reach the depth of complexity and psychological insight of Fatlands.

TRANSGRESSIONS

Transgressions, a nonseries psychological thriller, is Dunant's most controversial novel. Elizabeth "Lizzie" Skorvecky, recently separated from her boyfriend of several years, lives alone in a rambling house on the outskirts of London. She has isolated herself from her friends while she translates a steamy, almost pornographic, Czech detective novel into English. When strange things begin to happen in her house, she first suspects her former boyfriend, then poltergeists, but finally realizes that she is being stalked by a potential rapist, possibly even a serial killer.

The central and most controversial scene of the thriller is the rape scene. When Lizzie finds the stalker in her bedroom, she overcomes her fear and refuses to become a victim. Desperately hoping to defuse the violence and save her life, she takes control and seduces her rapist. Dunant wrote the scene graphically from both the erotic and psychological viewpoints and received some scathing criticism from feminists and critics as a result.

The form of the book is literary and complex: As the two stories unfold, the story of what is happening to Lizzie and the story that she is translating begin to merge. When Lizzie realizes that her stalker has been reading the erotic drafts of her translation, taking them from her curbside trash bins, she begins to write for him, creating a third level of narrative. Rather than give in to her fear, she begins to orchestrate the climax of the plot. Determined to trap him, she calls him to return by writing vivid and arousing scenes. Suspense and tension build. Again, Dunant's ending does not disappoint.

In this novel, Dunant stretches the boundaries of what is permissible in a rape scene. She creates a heroine who refuses to become a victim at the same time that she fears she is losing her grip on reality. She explores the complex relationship between sexual obsession, violence, power, and fear, and she creates a compelling psychological thriller that keeps the reader engrossed until the last page.

MAPPING THE EDGE

Once again Dunant stretches the boundaries of form and genre in her novel of suspense, Mapping the Edge. Anna, an investigative journalist and single mother living in London, leaves her beloved young daughter with trusted friends and departs for a brief vacation in Florence. When she does not return as planned, her friends have to face the possibility that she is not coming back. Missing, but why? Abducted? Murdered? Lingered with a lover? Dunant interweaves two parallel possible scenarios, Anna kidnapped by a stranger or Anna involved in a romantic interlude that becomes increasingly sinister, with the story of the tension among those who wait at home, narrated by Anna's best friend, Estella. Estella, trying to solve the mystery of what has become of Anna, and speaking in the first person, is somewhat reminiscent of Hannah Wolfe in tone, intelligence, and attitude.

Anna, in either scenario, needs to rise above the role of passive victim or lover to take control of the situation and return to her daughter. Both possible scenarios are fraught with suspense. In one, she must escape her kidnapper by cooperating enough to determine his motives and weaknesses. In the other, as she gradually realizes that her lover is a scam artist, she must unravel his motives and secrets to foil his plan to use her in his art smuggling scheme.

Familiar Dunant elements of intelligent, independent women, psychological thriller, suspense, and a victim who overcomes her fear to take charge of her fate, along with commentary on contemporary sexuality, lifestyle, and relationships, and a plot that keeps the reader turning the pages late into the night create another satisfying and unsettling novel. It is never revealed which is the true reason for Anna's disappearance, as she grapples with the conflict between motherhood and duty and the desire to return to a freer, less restricted life.

Susan Butterworth

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

HANNAH WOLFE SERIES: Birth Marks, 1991; Fatlands, 1994; Under My Skin, 1995

NONSERIES NOVELS: Exterminating Angels, 1983 (as Dunant; with Peter Busby); Intensive Care, 1986 (as Dunant; with Peter Busby); Snow Storms in a Hot Climate, 1988; Transgressions, 1997; Mapping the Edge, 1999

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: The Birth of Venus, 2003; In the Company of the Courtesan, 2006

EDITED TEXTS: The War of the Words: The Political Correctness Debate, 1995; The Age of Anxiety, 1996 (with Roy Porter)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Dunant, Sarah. "The Female Eye: An Interview with Sarah Dunant." Interview by David Stuart Davies. Armchair Detective 27, no. 4 (Fall, 1994): 419-421. An interview in a journal devoted to detective fiction, analyzing Hannah Wolfe's place in the detective canon. Discusses Birth Marks and Fatlands.
- _____. "Rewriting the Detectives." The Guardian, June 29, 1993, p. 228. Dunant wonders how female mystery writers will depict the violence against their women protagonists, graphically or subtly.
- Horeck, Tanya. "'More Intimate than Violence': Sexual Violation in Sarah Dunant's Transgressions." Women: A Cultural Review 11, no. 3 (Winter, 2000): 262-272. In-depth scholarly article discussing the controversial rape scene in Transgressions from a feminist point of view.
- Johnson, Tracy. "The Fear Industry: Women, Gothic and Contemporary Crime Narrative." Gothic Studies 4, no. 1 (2002): 44-62. In-depth scholarly article discussing Dunant's place in the canon of crime writing, placing her in the gothic literary tradition, and discussing narratives of fear and women's sexuality.
- Neustatter, Angela. "Women: Fear and Loathing." The

Guardian, May 27, 1997, p. T008. Dunant responds to the criticism about her protagonist turning a rape into a seduction in Transgressions. Steinberg, Sybil. "Sarah Dunant: Fate and Fiction in Florence." Publishers Weekly 251, no. 10 (March 8, 2004): 43-44. Profile of Dunant that discusses her background, themes, and writing The Birth of Venus.

ROBERT L. DUNCAN

Robert Lipscomb Duncan

Born: Oklahoma City, Oklahoma; September 9, 1927

Died: Norman, Oklahoma; January 28, 1999

Also wrote as W. R. Duncan; James Hall Roberts

Type of plot: Espionage

CONTRIBUTION

Robert L. Duncan, who sometimes used the pseudonym James Hall Roberts, wrote a new kind of spy novel, one in the tradition of John le Carré and Graham Greene, but different in its focus on international conspiracies that a persistent individual can undo. His recurrent message is that, despite seemingly impossible odds, a determined, resilient man with the courage of his convictions and a sense of right can make a difference in today's world. His strengths are his expertise in Far Eastern history, politics, psychology, and culture, and his willingness to break traditional molds. The Q Document (1964), for example, is unique in its application of New Testament studies and scholarship on the deciphering of ancient manuscripts to an intriguing thriller plot. Duncan's novels are regularly published in Great Britain, France, Norway, Sweden, Finland, the Netherlands, Denmark, West Germany, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Japan, and South America.

BIOGRAPHY

Born on September 9, 1927, in Oklahoma City, Oklahoma, the son of Norman Duncan (an attorney) and Eva Pearl (Hall) Duncan, Robert Lipscomb Duncan was married to Wanda Scott, a writer, on April 12, 1949. He received his bachelor of arts degree in 1950 and his master of arts degree in 1972, both from the University of Oklahoma. While attending school he began his career as a writer, but he also worked as a lecturer in television writing at the University of California, Irvine, between 1967 and 1968; a coordinator of a seminar in business aspects of the arts from 1969 to 1970; and a writer-in-residence at Chapman College in Orange, California. Teaching professional writing part-time at various universities gave Duncan the satisfaction of passing on practical advice about the craft and about marketing, though he decided that writing per se and a love of language and order cannot be taught. From 1972 to 1980, he was an associate professor of journalism at the University of Oklahoma School of Professional Writing.

Duncan said that he knew he wanted to be a novelist and nothing else when he read Ellery Queen at the age of twelve and that realizing that dream allowed him to indulge his curiosity about the world and to travel extensively. He went on book promotion tours in New Zealand and Australia, visited the South Pacific, and did research in Denpasar, Bali; Jakarta; Bangkok; and Moscow. He thought of himself as more an "international writer than an American" and used his writings "as a way of affirming the conviction that individual belief, translated into action, can be effective in solving some of the problems of the world which, on first glance, seem beyond solution." His method was first to engage in travel and research, then to allow a gestation period for sorting out his impressions. He found that, given a bit of time, characters and situations begin to form; he got glimpses of scenes and flashes of dialogue until these nebulous elements finally coalesced into a solid story. Sometimes he toyed with an idea for more than forty years, as he did with China Dawn (1988).

ANALYSIS

Robert L. Duncan's novels are marked by convincing, highly detailed backgrounds, with Tokyo and resort areas in Japan a favorite, but all the Far East is familiar territory in his novels. In the Enemy Camp (1985), for example, focuses on Indonesia, its people, its politics, its past, and its present struggles. The exotic music of the gamelan, the intricately staged Balinese dance, and the lush tropical villas of the rich are set against the dangerous alleyways of Jakarta and the pencak silat fighters battling over bets. In The Queen's Messenger (1982), the action ranges from the jungles of Thailand to the Mongolian capital of Ulan Bator, from Hong Kong and Bangkok to the London offices of the British intelligence service, and involves Thai police, American deserters from the Vietnam War era, Britishers gone native, and a rogue agent driven by nightmarish memories of Russian-paid Thai torturers. The hero in Brimstone (1980), in contrast, remains in the United States but flees cross-country, frequently switching cars and planes, from Pennsylvania to Nebraska, from California to Nevada, experiencing the flavor of each on his way.

Such movement allows for what Duncan says he finds most exciting: the clash of cultures. A majority of his novels involve the collision of different groups, whether members of contrasting nations or of competing cultures within one nation, such as humanists versus militarists or professional intelligence operatives. These clashes may be minor, for the sake of characterization or background information: a working-class midwesterner's sense of inferiority and clumsiness in the face of the "snobbish grace" of San Francisco's urbane and mannered executives; the unbridgeable gap between a twenty-year-old sex queen and her middle-aged sugar daddy; the contrast between Amish traditionalists and their modern neighbors. The clashes may also be central to the action and to the message, as is the conflict between civilian and military values in The Day the Sun Fell (1970), The February Plan (1967), and Brimstone, or that between Western and Asian logic in The Day the Sun Fell, The Queen's Messenger, Fire Storm (1978), and China Dawn. The military logic usually involves well-intended ends but monstrous means: plots by high-level superpatriots to assure political stability or peace by using nuclear or neutron bombs. In contrast, Asian logic seems clear at first but then proves inscrutable, an illusion shielding an illusion. The hero of Fire Storm, for example, has worked in Asia for years, but he admits that he does not and never will understand the Japanese mind; he might be able to project with some accuracy what the Japanese might do, but he will never understand why they would do it. The Japanese highway system with its real police interspersed amid numerous police mannequins baffles him, as do the taxi drivers who never pay attention to addresses, and the justice system, which builds on illusion and indirection. One Japanese police inspector, who later proves corruptible, defends his system as complex and difficult for Westerners to understand but still capable of "a high batting average." The attempt of representatives from different cultures and different value systems to understand one another's minds and emotions, nevertheless remaining continually at odds in niggling ways, is a mainstay of Duncan's canon.

In Temple Dogs, as in so many of Duncan's novels, a key feature is the conflict between a single individual and the organization. In Fire Storm, another big-business novel, a Japanese port is deliberately incinerated as part of an international plot, and the American shipbuilding executive who witnesses the destruction finds himself forced to battle both corrupt Japanese officials and his own former associates. In Brimstone, a computer technician accidentally calls up maps of Russian towns, part of project Brimstone, a secret operation connected with the missing eighteen-minute segment of Richard Nixon's White House tapes, and finds himself caught up in an ongoing military conspiracy. In The Dragons at the Gate, an honest operative in the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) struggles to avoid being sacrificed by his own apparatus to assure the economic dominance of the United States. Despite imprisonment and interrogation, he ultimately forces the CIA to cancel a morally repugnant operation. This ability of one individual to make a difference in an overwhelmingly corrupt world accounts in large part for the appeal of Duncan's novels.

At times Duncan's descriptions border on the satiric, especially when they relates to the villains: the military "hawk" whose technical expertise exists “only in the phenomenal work of the legislative aide who wrote speeches for him,” the urbane and internationally respected British lord who conspires with terrorists, the references to genuine military and intelligence operations such as experiments with LSD (lysergic acid diethylamide) in the 1960’s, and the military focus on “gamesmanship” as real events transpire. One hero, in disgust, postulates that this is “the age of the accountants” and that the true autocrat is that “watchdog of the watchdogs,” the CIA, while others declaim against those who refuse to get involved, whether the bureaucrats who allow decisions by default or the ordinary citizen who lacks compassion or a sense of patriotic duty. Duncan clearly believes that the world has changed for the worse. His villains are often figures reminiscent of Dr. Strangelove, yet carefully grounded in real events and real personages. The novels tend to build on problems that were major moral and social concerns when they were written: for example, bribery of Japanese businessmen by American corporations in Temple Dogs (1977), written shortly after the actual scandals.

LONERS AS HEROES

Duncan’s heroes tend to be loners, working for a large organization but always psychologically on the fringe, independent and stubborn in their defense of the right. Sometimes they are troubleshooters for a large multinational company, as in Temple Dogs and Fire Storm. Inevitably they end up struggling against a large, powerful organization—sometimes their own, sometimes one closely related to their own, but always one corrupt at its core. Sometimes they have been set up as scapegoats by their own superiors. These heroes are usually believers in “old-fashioned” values such as honor and loyalty, in contrast to their opponents, who are motivated by self-interest, economic pragmatism, or computer-generated decisions. The hero in The Queen’s Messenger, for example, bears the scars of enemy torture and feels compelled to rescue a captured compatriot from a similar fate.

In spite of the international settings, Duncan’s protagonists have much in common with the traditional hero of the American Western: They are men, neither old nor young, and somewhat alienated from society, especially the society of women. Although intelligent and articulate when the occasion calls for it, they tend toward the taciturn. Like the cowboy hero, they often feel little initial responsibility toward other people, but become involved after suffering repeated indignities at the hands of an arrogant and mechanistic organization. The nastier and more impossible the odds against them, the more stubbornly they pursue their nemesis. They may verbally vacillate, but when it comes to action, they feel as does the hero of Fire Storm, who makes a partial truce with a kamikaze member of a Japanese terrorist group to undermine the enemy behind the enemy, the amoral and murderous corporate heads of several “American” multinational oil companies: “In my own way, I’m a dyed-in-the-wool revolutionary. They’re trying to take over by killing some enemies who I happen to believe are worthwhile people. I mean to change things.” Heroes are accompanied in this battle by strong but often unhappy women, who, compelled by love, loyalty, a sense of right, or a need for truth, join forces with them and find some measure of comfort at the resolution.

Unlike the cowboy hero, Duncan’s protagonists prefer mental weapons to physical ones, using an array of talents that no computer can match. Typically, the hero must decode a cryptic document, a confused set of circumstances or relationships, a puzzling message, or a tape, using scholarly or parascholarly skills. Often, the opposition has concocted an array of forged documents that, taken as a package, seem to constitute absolute proof. Next, the protagonist must make sense of the plot or scheme behind the code, and sometimes his initial interpretation must be revised or modified in the face of new evidence that reveals even subtler possibilities than those first conceived. Sometimes an incongruity of detail or of character sets him on the right track, but both logical conclusions and intuitive insights put him in mortal danger. An extended and exciting chase scene results, with the setting varying from downtown Tokyo to Japanese ski resorts to the American Southwest, and the territory covered ranging from city streets to the entire Pacific Ocean. Duncan liked to set manhunts in resort areas, with the dragnet taking place against pleasant rural vistas, the hero’s agonies invisible to the tourists enjoying the scenery.

Whatever the setting, the hero is always ingenious and unpredictable in his escape strategies, usually foiling the computer-based thoroughness and rationality of his would-be captors. Pamela Marsh of The Christian Science Monitor sums up the typical Duncan action: "Our hair is kept constantly on end as searches, captures, escapes, hunts, follow in rapid series with corpses beginning to accumulate and an inevitable World War III but days away." The hero must resist the temptation to panic and force himself to use reason against the manhunters' mechanistic thoroughness. Sometimes, a selfish, spoiled woman abets the escape only to attempt a betrayal, but the hero overcomes this impediment. Sometimes thieves fall out, and he benefits from the results. He may be offered bribes or even his life; he may be "reasoned with" through physical force, psychological pressure, or philosophical debate, but conflict only makes him stronger in his convictions, in contrast to those around him who prove weaker and more yielding. Pressure and the need to become involved transform the hero into a force with which to be reckoned.

PLOTS AND RESOLUTIONS

Duncan's originality resides in his choice of situations and protagonists as well as thematic concerns: In The Q Document, for example, a biblical scholar is caught up in a conspiracy as he investigates documents that purport to show Christianity as based on fraudulence and false prophets. In The Burning Sky (1966), Evan Cummings, a field anthropologist working in the Arizona desert, must find a colleague missing in no-man's-land and in the process searches for Indian ruins that other scholars have rejected as fantasy. Duncan's later works adhere more closely to the conventions of the detective genre but remain unique in focus and in control of setting. Newgate Callendar, a critic for The New York Times, points out that a writer as skillful as Duncan can use "the most conventional of materials" and still devise fresh and intriguing plots: In Temple Dogs, a retired American general depends on assassination, blackmail, terrorism, and the threat of war to protect his Far Eastern corporate interests while the protagonist works to expose him and undermine his activities.

Duncan favored neat conclusions, with all plot strands satisfactorily resolved. Moreover, these resolutions usually provide the reader with an intellectually satisfying surprise. Emotionally, on the other hand, his novels can be disappointing. There are simply too many characters who refuse to see the facts that confront them, who refuse to become involved with other people, and who are weakened and undone by the powerful machinery of a company or a party. Furthermore, often the innocent prove victims, and the curious suffer for their vice. Sightseers are blown to bits; bystanders get shot. A child dies from a stray bullet, a fishing village bursts into flame, a young girl is butchered to force information from her father, and a friendly cabby is eliminated for being in the wrong place at the wrong time. Sometimes the hero's young assistant is killed, as in The Dragons at the Gate (1975) and Temple Dogs. In the psychological thriller In the Blood (1984), several young women are mutilated and murdered simply because their profiles match an image engraved in the mind of a deranged ax murderer; moreover, the author raises questions of innocence, guilt, and personal responsibility as both the psychotic killer and the persistent New York police officer who pursues him through peaceful Pennsylvania Dutch farmland are driven to atone for the sins of their Jewish fathers, one by ritualistic murder, the other by learning to understand and forgive. In like manner The Day the Sun Fell contrasts the cruelty, stubbornness, madness, and humanity of two warring nations as Nagasaki is bombed.

THE SERPENT'S MARK

The individual, however, is also capable of profound malice. In his last novel, Duncan again singles out an individual for heroic action, this time through the manipulations of a messianic mass murderer—one man against another. The Serpent's Mark (1989) features Peter Stein, a retired police detective who once specialized in apprehending serial killers and is now a consultant trying to live quietly for the sake of his family's safety. He is ironically driven out of retirement not by his desire to return to action and find the killer but by the killer's own determination to roust Stein from inaction. Refusing to be lured or threatened, Stein finally responds to the killer's baiting when a young girl is kidnapped and tortured. Mutilation and murder follow in rapid repetition as Stein pursues his mad quarry. The killer is finally discovered, but only after numerous innocents and Stein's own family are placed in grave danger.

Andrew F. Macdonald
Updated by Janet Alice Long

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: The Q Document, 1964 (as Roberts); The Burning Sky, 1966 (as Roberts); The February Plan, 1967 (as Roberts); The Day the Sun Fell, 1970; The Dragons at the Gate, 1975; Temple Dogs, 1977; Fire Storm, 1978; Brimstone, 1980; Sphere, 1981; The Queen's Messenger, 1982 (with Wanda Duncan; as W. R. Duncan); In the Blood, 1984; In the Enemy Camp, 1985; China Dawn, 1988; The Serpent's Mark, 1989

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: If It Moves Salute It, 1961; The Voice of the Stranger, 1961; The General and the Coed, 1962

SHORT FICTION: The Dicky Bird Was Singing, 1952; Buffalo Country, 1959

NONFICTION: Castles in the Air: The Memoirs of Irene Castle, 1958 (with Wanda Duncan); Reluctant General: The Life and Times of Albert Pike, 1961

SCREENPLAY:

Black Gold, 1962

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Callendar, Newgate. "Crime." Review of Brimstone, by Robert L. Duncan. The New York Times, November 23, 1980, p. A37. Callendar praises Duncan's novel, saying that the author makes the events credible and the adventure involved make the novel suitable for filming.

Hitz, Frederick P. The Great Game: The Myth and Reality of Espionage. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004. Hitz, a former inspector general of the Central Intelligence Agency, compares fictional accounts of espionage with actual cases. Although Duncan is not mentioned, the book provides an understanding of the genre in which he wrote.

Oliver, Myrna. "Obituaries: Robert Duncan; Novelist, TV Screenwriter." Los Angeles Times, February 5, 1999, p. 27. Obituary of Duncan notes his mysteries, his writings as James Hall Roberts, his writings with his wife as W. R. Duncan, and his work for television, which included many Westerns.

Priestman, Martin, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Crime Fiction. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003. An excellent, all-around trove of information for the reader. Contains a full chapter devoted to the spy novel. Another chapter addresses the thriller.

Williams, Gene. "It's Murder, They All Write." Review of The Serpent's Mark, by Robert L. Duncan. The Plain Dealer, July 22, 1990. Williams reviews several books that he sees as similar to those of Thomas Harris. He finds Duncan's work memorable and suspenseful but feels he is an inferior writer to Harris.

JOHN DUNNING

Born: Brooklyn, New York; January 9, 1942

Types of plot: Amateur sleuth; hard-boiled; historical

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Cliff “the Bookman” Janeway, 1992-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

CLIFF JANEWAY owns a used bookstore, specializing in rare books and first editions. A retired Denver police officer, he has begun a new life as a small-business owner with a passion for expensive books. The behind-the-scenes details and the diverse characters inhabiting the book world provide interesting and sometimes even fascinating twists to the stories. Janeway is a more cerebral, more sensitive, more modern representative of the hard-boiled detective tradition. He can be disarmingly charming and physically intimidating by turns, like Dashiell Hammett’s Sam Spade, but his intellect and sensibilities are more like Robert B. Parker’s Spenser.

CONTRIBUTION

John Dunning has shone a bright light on the arcane world of book collecting, unintentionally making the job of the used book dealer much harder. Booked to Die (1992), the first title in the Janeway series, was an instant success largely achieved through word of mouth via the vast underground network of bibliophiles. The novel dealt with collecting books and searching for rare books and the collectors themselves, and it cross-bred the hard-boiled tradition with the BiblioMystery. Dunning found a literate, largely untapped audience; a series hero who appealed equally to men and women; and a reason to keep writing novels when he was on the brink of giving up.

Dunning found early success in the mystery genre with two titles, Looking for Ginger North (1980) and Deadline (1981), both nominated for Edgar Awards. However, it was eleven long years between Deadline and Booked to Die, which won a Nero Wolfe Award. During those years, Dunning operated a bookstore in Denver and has said he would have been content to remain on the selling side of the book business.

Before the Janeway series, Dunning had written five titles, three of them mysteries. He had met with limited success, but his circle of Denver literary acquaintances urged him to keep writing. Warwick Downing, a friend and fellow Denver author, suggested that he write a book about a dealer in rare books. Booked to Die is dedicated to Downing. Dunning’s Janeway series foreshadowed a recent trend and no doubt influenced the publication of popular and more recent titles focused on the world of rare books, including Arturo Perez-Reverte’s El club Dumas (1993; The Club Dumas, 1996) and Ian Caldwell and Dustin Thomason’s The Rule of Four (2004).

BIOGRAPHY

John Dunning was born in Brooklyn, New York, in 1942. He grew up in Charleston, South Carolina, where he earned a General Educational Development (GED) certificate. Despite his lack of formal education, he was an avid writer from a young age. Dunning’s early literary influences included the Edward Stratemeyer Syndicate’s Hardy Boys, Rover Boys, and Tom Swift series. He was even more influenced by Walter Farley’s Black Stallion series. However, Dunning found it difficult to find an audience for his writing as he lacked the proper credentials. He entered the U.S. Army but was quickly discharged because of a broken eardrum. Subsequently, he worked as a glass cutter in Charleston and then in Denver. His interest in horses drew him to a local track, where he was hired as a groomer. Five years as a groomer, sleeping in tack rooms and traveling the western United States opened Dunning’s eyes to a simpler life and an easy camaraderie among horse trainers, jockeys, and his fellow groomers. Dunning still wanted to earn a living by writing, so he made repeated requests for work at the Denver Post.

Dunning began as a copy boy at the Denver Post and slowly rose to copy boy/reporter, writing book reviews and covering the police beat. After years of persisting, he was appointed a member of the newspaper's three-man investigative team. Working as an investigative reporter introduced Dunning to police detectives and helped him hone his research skills.

Dunning's first published novel was the mystery The Holland Suggestions (1975), a book that blended the subjects of history and hypnosis. However, he sent his follow-up mystery novel, Looking for Ginger North (1980), to twenty-two publishers before one accepted it. Its original title was Bloodline, but the book took so long to reach publication that in the meantime, Sidney Sheldon published his own Bloodline (1978), and Dunning's book had to be renamed. Dunning's third mystery title, Deadline (1981), had a completely different reception. Written in only a few months, the book was sold to the first publisher who read it.

After Deadline, Dunning hit a rough eleven-year patch of publisher rejections. He had sold a non-mystery novel, Denver (1980), and he was successful in publishing a book about one of his other passions, old-time radio. Dunning eventually wrote a second reference book on old-time radio, a one-volume work that is still considered the definitive source on the subject. For twenty-five years, he broadcast a radio show in Denver featuring old-time radio programs. Using his knowledge of old-time radio, he helped score Robert Altman's 1974 film Thieves Like Us. Dunning and his wife, Helen, bought Old Algonquin Books in Denver, a shop that served as the real model for Janeway's fictional Twice Told Books. The shop in Denver was closed after Booked to Die was published, but Old Algonquin Books became an online retailer.

ANALYSIS

John Dunning has attention deficit disorder, which was undiagnosed for most of his life. This condition probably explains why he did not finish high school and why his writing process is slow. Dunning has said that it sometimes takes him ten hours to get two hours of work done. Despite his condition, he has written best-selling novels and a number of nonfiction works.

For most of his writing career, Dunning wrote on a manual typewriter, saying the personal computer was a left-brained tool trying to do a right-brain job. In many ways, he is a throwback to earlier times when authors such as James M. Cain (Dunning's favorite mystery writer), Cornell Woolrich, and Raymond Chandler wrote tight plots with terse, fast, hard-hitting dialogue. Dunning's hero, Cliff Janeway, however, has more modern sensibilities than those authors' lonely detectives in the knight-errant tradition. For example, he can relate to a woman without necessarily having to rough her up.

The Janeway series appeals to the intellect without being overly erudite and is suited for the reader who enjoys fast-paced action and solid dialogue and can appreciate the insights that Dunning offers based on his own experiences. To read an author is to share his passions: Dunning's novels about rare-book collecting, journalism, old-time radio, and horse racing are all reflections of his own world and experiences. The art of the novel lies in the ability to present one's world in an honest, compelling, dynamic way that connects with the reader's own intellect.

DEADLINE

In Deadline, Dunning's third mystery novel, Dalton Walker is a reporter covering a circus-tent fire in which an eight-year-old girl has died. The fire story runs parallel to another assignment, an interview with dancer Diana Yoder, who was raised in the Amish faith. These two seemingly different stories intertwine. Except for the hero Walker, the characters, especially some of the women, are not as cleverly drawn as those in the Janeway series. Despite this flaw, this is a tightly written novel with plenty of Dunning's typically well-researched background. Dunning has stated an intent to write a sequel to Deadline, which was written in less than two months and sold to the first publisher to see it.

BOOKED TO DIE

The first title in the Cliff Janeway series, Booked to Die (1992) met with great reviews. After reading the novel, which was full of details about the book trade, readers who were lovers of books were converted overnight into part-time book scouts (a person who finds bargain books and sells them to bookstores for less than full value). In the book, police officer Cliff Janeway is forced off the force and opens a little bookstore to pursue his hobby and make some money. Jackie Newton, a local man Janeway loathes, becomes a suspect in the murder of book scout Bobby Westfall. The terse, tight prose combined with the revelations about the book trade made Booked to Die a valuable book among collectors. Original hardback editions more than quadrupled in value.

THE BOOKMAN'S WAKE

In The Bookman's Wake (1995), Janeway returns to try to save an ingenue book scout who has jumped bail and is suspected in the theft of a priceless edition of Edgar Allan Poe's The Raven, a book some experts claim was never even printed. The book scout, who calls herself Eleanor Rigby, has purportedly stolen the rare edition printed by master printers Darryl Grayson and Richard Grayson and has run off to Seattle. The Grayson brothers died under mysterious circumstances years earlier when fire destroyed their business. Janeway joins with Trish Aandahl, the biographer of the Grayson brothers, and determines that the fire in the Grayson publishing house was no accident. Digging even deeper, they discover a serial killer who may have committed five other murders. The Bookman's Wake attempts to do for fine printing what Booked to Die did for book collecting. The reader certainly learns a great deal about the printing process and bookbinding.

THE BOOKMAN'S PROMISE

Nine years after the second installment in the Janeway series, The Bookman's Promise (2004) finds Cliff Janeway counting the money he made from his career in The Bookman's Wake. What should he do with this windfall? Of course, he buys an expensive book. He buys Richard Francis Burton's famous account of his travels to Mecca and Medina. Janeway is fascinated by the eighteenth century explorer and is reveling in the purchase of his book when the rightful owner inconveniently shows up in his bookstore. Josephine Gallant, who is in her nineties, is the granddaughter of Charles Warren, companion to Burton during his pre-Civil War visit to the United States. She once had a great collection of Burton titles but was cheated out of her collection by Dean Treadwell and Carl Treadwell, unscrupulous book dealers in Baltimore. The chase takes Janeway east and to the past. Dunning takes the reader to 1861, when Burton, presumably on a secret mission at the bidding of Britain's prime minister, lands in South Carolina. Strangely, though Burton's travels have been extensively chronicled, there appears to be no existing account of this trip. Dunning has Burton meeting with Abner Doubleday, and they discuss the possible defense of Fort Sumter.

During the years between the second and third novels in the series, Dunning was working on the reference work On the Air: The Encyclopedia of Old-Time Radio (1998). Because of this commitment, he delayed the third installment in the Janeway series even as his many fans demanded more. Although he had allowed significant gaps to form between publishing the first three novels in the Janeway series, Dunning completed the next two books in the series in rapid succession: The Sign of the Book (2005) and The Bookwoman's Last Fling (2006).

Randy L. Abbott

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

CLIFF JANEWAY SERIES: Booked to Die, 1992; The Bookman's Wake, 1995; The Bookman's Promise, 2004; The Sign of the Book, 2005; The Bookwoman's Last Fling, 2006

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Holland Suggestions, 1975; Looking for Ginger North, 1980; Deadline, 1981; Two O'Clock Eastern Wartime, 2001

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVEL: Denver, 1980

NONFICTION: Tune in Yesterday: The Ultimate Encyclopedia of Old-Time Radio, 1925-1976, 1976; Deadly Deviates, 1986; Mystical Murders, 1989; Cryptic Crimes, 1990; Mindless Murders, 1991; Carnal Crimes, 1991; Madly Murderous, 1991; Truly Murderous: Horrific Modern Murders Reconstructed, 1991; Mysterious Murders, 1991; Occult Murders: Chilling Accounts of Satanic Crimes, 1997; Strange Deaths: A Chilling Collection of Terrifying Murders, 1997; Murderous Women: Shocking True Stories of Women Who Kill, 1997; On the Air: The Encyclopedia of Old-Time Radio, 1998

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Dickinson, Jane. "Keeping a Promise After Ten Years, Dunning Delivers Sequel." Denver Rocky Mountain News, March 12, 2004, p. 24D. Written on the occasion of The Bookman's Promise, the article discusses the nine-year gap since the previous series title.

Dunning, John. "The Bookman's Eye." Interview by Charles L. P. Silet. The Armchair Detective 28, no. 2 (1995): 124-133. This is a far-ranging interview done just before the release of The Bookman's Wake, the second title in the Janeway series.

_____. "The Bookman's Progress." Interview by Charles L. P. Silet. Mystery Scene 84 (March 1, 2004): 26-29. This interview discusses Dunning's historical mystery novel Two O'Clock Eastern Wartime, his nonfictional reference works on radio history, and the background research done for The Bookman's Promise.

Lambert, Pam. "The Thrill of the Hunt." People Weekly 23, no. 43 (June 12, 1995): 27. Written soon after the release of Booked to Die, the article discusses book collecting and Dunning's background as a dealer in rare books.

Old Algonquin Books. <http://www.aldalgonquin.com>. The Web site for the online store run by Dunning and his wife, Helen, contains a good deal of biographical information about Dunning and publication information on each of his titles.

Scaggs, John. Crime Fiction. New York: Routledge, 2005. Contains chapters on hard-boiled mysteries and historical crime fiction that shed light on Dunning's work.

FRIEDRICH DÜRRENMATT

Born: Konolfingen, Switzerland; January 5, 1921

Died: Neuchâtel, Switzerland; December 14, 1990

Type of plot: Police procedural

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Hans Bärlach, 1950-1951

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

HANS BÄRLACH, the inspector of the criminal investigations department of the Bern Police, has spent much of his life abroad. Never married, he has made a name for himself as an expert in the detection of crime, first in Constantinople and later in Germany, where he has been in charge of the criminal investigation department in Frankfurt-on-Main. In 1933, he returned to his native Bern, because of a conflict with the new Nazi government. Though Bärlach is old and dying of cancer, he goes on to pursue justice. Nothing in this world has made him believe that one day final justice will be achieved through his efforts, but he continues to perform his duty, even on his deathbed.

CONTRIBUTION

The detective novel is not a highly regarded genre in German-speaking countries. Therefore, there were not many twentieth century authors of mystery and detective fiction in German, in spite of some promising beginnings in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries (Friedrich Schiller, E. T. A. Hoffmann, and Annette von Droste-Hülshoff, for example). Mystery and detective novels are considered trivial entertainment for mass audiences. German-speaking readers of detective novels are, therefore, mostly dependent on American, British, French, and Scandinavian authors in translation. Although Friedrich Dürrenmatt was one of the most successful dramatists of the European stage in the 1960's and 1970's, he did not hold detective fiction in the same kind of contempt that his colleagues, critics, and educated audiences were accustomed to display. Dürrenmatt was the only modern German-speaking author of stature to write detective fiction. He employed the detective novel to express his basic concept of justice, of humankind's relationship to justice, and of humankind's duty to work for a better world.

Dürrenmatt's language is economical, deceptively simple, yet philosophically profound. For the most part, his characters are ordinary people, but there are also archvillains who display dimensions of metaphysical evil. His books portray Swiss life and have a strong sense of place, namely the city of Bern and its surroundings. As an author of detective novels, Dürrenmatt has been favorably compared to Arthur Conan Doyle, P. G. Wodehouse, and Georges Simenon. Yet, as Martin Esslin has noted, "unlike those writers, Dürrenmatt's basic purpose is always deeply serious, even philosophical." According to some German critics, Dürrenmatt dealt with the same topics as Dashiell Hammett, Rex Stout, and Raymond Chandler, namely with the conflict of two parties, one of which is represented by the individual detective. Working in this tradition, Dürrenmatt surpassed his models in terms of moral and metaphysical issues raised.

BIOGRAPHY

Friedrich Dürrenmatt was born on January 5, 1921, in Konolfingen, near Bern, the son of a Protestant minister and the grandson of a Swiss Nationalrat, a member of the national parliament. In 1935, the family moved to Bern, where Dürrenmatt attended the local high school. Originally he had wanted to become a painter, but after studying German literature, art history, science, and philosophy at the Universities of Zurich and Bern, he eventually turned to writing, achieving his first success with his play Es steht geschrieben (pr., pb. 1947; revised pr., pb. 1967, as Die Wiedertäufer; The Anabaptists, 1967), which caused a minor scandal when it premiered in Zurich in 1947.

Also in 1947, Dürrenmatt married Lotti Giessler, an actress. In 1952, they moved to a home in Neuchâtel. His career as a writer was mainly that of a dramatist. By 1965, Dürrenmatt had achieved international fame with his plays Der Besuch der alten Dame (pr., pb. 1956; The Visit, 1958) and Die Physiker (pr., pb. 1962; The Physicists, 1963).

The first of Dürrenmatt's detective novels, Der Richter und sein Henker (The Judge and His Hang- man, 1954), was first published serially in a Swiss periodical in 1950. It was followed by Der Verdacht (1953; The Quarry, 1961), also published serially, and Das Versprechen: Requiem auf den Kriminalroman (1958; The Pledge: Requiem for the Detective Novel, 1959). All three have been reprinted frequently and have been made into films. They are favorite school texts in German-speaking countries, and they are frequently read in German-language classes at American universities. More than two million copies of The Judge and His Hangman have been sold.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

During his career, Dürrenmatt received many prestigious literary awards and honorary degrees. To commemorate his approaching sixtieth birthday, in 1980 his Swiss publisher brought out a thirty-volume edition of Dürrenmatt's collected works. His dramatic work, including adaptations and radio dramas, is collected in seventeen volumes. Six volumes are devoted to his novels and short stories. The final seven volumes contain his nonfiction and a bibliography. He died in December, 1990.

ANALYSIS

According to Friedrich Dürrenmatt, part of his business as a modern writer was to reach a mass audience through his detective novels, promoting the one main idea that informs most of his other writings: the pursuit of justice. His production of mystery and detective fiction was, however, relatively small in comparison to his other literary endeavors. His detective novels make up only two of the thirty volumes of his collected works of 1980.

THE JUDGE AND HIS HANGMAN

Dürrenmatt began his career as writer of detective fiction with the Hans Bärlach series. In The Judge and His Hangman, a lieutenant of the Bern police department has been murdered. Inspector Bärlach gets the case, but because he is old and sick, he requests that a younger police officer, named Tschanz (in English, Chance), be assigned to assist him. They discover a mysterious character, a man named Gastmann, who has some connection with the murdered lieutenant. Tschanz is for the hard-boiled approach, but Bärlach restrains him. Bärlach recognizes Gastmann as a master criminal, a man whom he has been trying to trap without success for decades. According to a commentary by one of the characters, Gastmann represents evil. For Gastmann, evil is not the expression of a philosophy or an instinct, but of his freedom, the freedom of a nihilist. Bärlach characterizes him as a devil in human disguise. Once, Gastmann had killed a man in broad daylight in front of Bärlach, only to prove that the detective would not be able to pin the crime on him. This murder had been the result of a blasphemous wager. Since that time, Gastmann had tried to become an even more elusive criminal, while Bärlach had tried to become an even better detective to trap his satanic opponent.

Bärlach now realizes that the murdered lieutenant had also been on Gastmann's trail in an illegal international arms deal. Bärlach uses Tschanz to go after Gastmann, who is killed with his two servants during a shoot-out. The gun that killed the lieutenant is found in the hand of one of the servants. Yet this is not the solution to the case. In fact, Tschanz is the real murderer. He killed the lieutenant to take his place on the force and to acquire his car and his girlfriend. From the beginning, Bärlach has been aware of Tschanz's involvement in the crime, but he set him up against Gastmann, dog against dog. Bärlach appoints himself the judge and Tschanz the hangman. After his metaphysical opponent has been defeated, the old detective does not bother to arrest Tschanz. He leaves Tschanz's punishment to chance: The murderer is accidentally killed in a car-train accident.

THE QUARRY

The Quarry, the second and last novel of the series, is another story of Bärlach and his refusal to abandon the pursuit of justice. His illness, which is considered terminal, confines him to the hospital and forces him to retire from the Bern police department. He is expected to live out his life with stoic resignation and dignity. On his deathbed, Bärlach recognizes an unpunished war criminal from a photograph in Life magazine. The war criminal is a concentration camp doctor who continues his evil practices in a sanatorium in Bern. Bärlach has himself transferred to this sanatorium to trap the sadistic doctor and to deliver him to justice. Bärlach, however, becomes trapped by his opponent, who schedules him for an operation without anesthesia. Only at the last moment, Bärlach is saved by a former concentration camp victim who comes to his rescue. The evil doctor is forced to commit suicide. If it had not been for Bärlach, a dying man who was no longer on the police force, the war criminal would have escaped his punishment. His search for justice never ends, regardless of retirement or cancer.

These two novels allowed Dürrenmatt to establish himself as a serious writer of mystery and detective fiction. After The Quarry, however, the short life expectancy of the principal series character put an untimely end to this series. There is not much to write about a series character who has only one year to live.

THE PLEDGE

Dürrenmatt found a new voice with The Pledge. The novel tells of a grisly murder of a little girl. A police inspector who has received a prestigious appointment abroad gets involved in this case. He is obsessed with the idea that he must solve the crime because he has “pledged” himself to do so to the mother of the murdered child. A peddler, who has admitted to the crime after exhaustive police interrogations, commits suicide. Thus, for the police, the case is closed. The police inspector, however, insists on pursuing the case, because he considers the peddler innocent. Even after he has been discharged from the police for his obsessive behavior, he continues to investigate and set up a trap for the real murderer. His hunches are correct, he has logic on his side, but he ultimately fails; he has not accounted for coincidence. The criminal dies in an automobile accident on the way to committing his next crime.

The novel is a demonstration of the role of chance and illustrates humankind’s inability to understand the world by means of logic only. It is a requiem for the detective novel because, according to Dürrenmatt, the nineteenth century detective novel was based on a logical plot structure and crime was presented as solvable, like a chess game, by logical analysis. Dürrenmatt’s criticism is that pure chance, or coincidence, was not taken into account. The Pledge is the demonstration of the failure of a police officer who conducts an investigation like a nineteenth century detective and must therefore necessarily end in failure. He becomes a victim of his own brilliant logical reason, and he ends up a dropout and a drunkard. Although the criminal does not escape punishment, his crime is never exposed. It is a failure of justice both in the legal sense and on the level of poetic justice. It is also the failure of a genre, as the subtitle indicates.

THE ASSIGNMENT

Der Auftrag (1986; The Assignment: Or, On the Observing of the Observer of the Observers, 1988), Dürrenmatt’s novella about a psychiatrist, the mysterious rape and murder of his wife, and a filmmaker who is hired to investigate the murder, appears to be a pure language experiment. This text meets the challenge to write a novella in twenty-four sentences, each chapter consisting of one sentence. Although the means of detection, like film cameras and binoculars, have become more refined, the identification of criminals has become even more difficult. The same observation appears to apply to language as a means of detection. The refinement of language does not make it easier to discover the truth.

Dürrenmatt’s novels are parables about the fight against evil, and their revelations deal less with the detection and arrest of the criminal than with the chance for justice and truth in this world. In this fight, human reason has to account also for the role of coincidence and irrationality in its search for the truth, but there is the hope that justice will prevail as long as people are willing to pursue its cause.

Ehrhard Bahr

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

HANS BÄRLACH SERIES: Der Richter und sein Henker, 1950 (The Judge and His Hangman, 1954); Der Verdacht, 1953 (The Quarry, 1961)

NONSERIES NOVELS: Die Panne, 1956 (Traps, 1960; also known as A Dangerous Game); Das Versprechen: Requiem auf den Kriminalroman, 1958 (The Pledge: Requiem for the Detective Novel, 1959); Aufenthalt in einer kleinen Stadt: Fragment, 1980; Der Auftrag, 1986 (The Assignment: Or, On the Observing of the Observer of the Observers, 1988); Justiz, 1985 (The Execution of Justice, 1989)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Griechen sucht Griechin, 1955 (Once a Greek . . ., 1965); Der Sturz, 1971 (The Coup, 2006)

SHORT FICTION: Der Hund, 1952; Der Tunnel, 1952; Die Stadt, 1952; Smithy, 1976; Das Sterben der Pythia, 1976; Mr. X Macht Ferien, 1978; Nachrichten über den Stand des Zeitungswesens in der Steinzeit, 1978; Abu Chanifa und Anan Ben David, 1978; Aus den Papieren eines Wärters, 1980

PLAYS: 1947-1960 • Es steht geschrieben, pr., pb. 1947 (revised pr., pb. 1967, as Die Wiedertäufer; The Anabaptists, 1967); Der Blinde, pr. 1948, pb. 1960; Romulus der Grosse, pr. 1949 (second version pr. 1957, pb. 1958, third version pb. 1961; Romulus the Great, 1961); Die Ehe des Herrn Mississippi, pr., pb. 1952, second version pb. 1957 (The Marriage of Mr. Mississippi, 1958); Ein Engel kommt nach Babylon, pr. 1953, pb. 1954 (second version pb. 1957; An Angel Comes to Babylon, 1962); Herkulus und der Stall des Augias, wr. 1954, pr., pb. 1959 (radio play), pr., pb. 1963 (staged; Hercules and the Augean Stables, 1966); Der Besuch der alten Dame, pr., pb. 1956 (The Visit, 1958); Komödien I-III, pb. 1957-1972 (3 volumes); Frank der Fünfte: Opera einer Privatbank, pr. 1959, pb. 1960 (libretto; music by Paul Burkhard)

1961-1970 • Die Physiker, pr., pb. 1962 (The Physicists, 1963); Four Plays, pb. 1964; Der Meteor, pr., pb. 1966 (The Meteor, 1966); König Johann, pr., pb. 1968 (adaptation of William Shakespeare's play King John); Play Strindberg: Totentanz nach August Strindberg, pr., pb. 1969 (adaptation of August Strindberg's play The Dance of Death; Play Strindberg: The Dance of Death, 1971); Portrait eines Planeten, pr. 1970 (revised pr., pb. 1971; Portrait of a Planet, 1973); Titus Andronicus, pr., pb. 1970 (adaptation of Shakespeare's play); Urfaust, pr., pb. 1970 (adaptation of Johann Wolfgang von Goethe's play)

1971-1983 • Der Mitmacher, pr. 1973, pb. 1976 (The Conformer, 1975); Die Frist, pr., pb. 1977; Achterloo, pr., pb. 1983

RADIO PLAYS: Der Doppelgänger, wr. 1946, 1961; Der Prozess um des Esels Schatten, wr. 1951, 1958 (based on Christoph Martin Wieland's Die Abderiten; The Jackass, 1960); Stranitzky und der Nationalheld, 1952; Das Unternehmen der Wega, 1955; Die Panne, 1956 (adaptation of his novel; The Deadly Game, 1963); Gesammelte Hörspiele, 1961

NONFICTION: Theaterprobleme, 1955 (Problems of the Theater, 1958); Theater-Schriften und Reden, 1966 (Writings on Theatre and Drama, 1976); Gespräche, 1961-1990, 1996 (interviews; Heinz Ludwig Arnold, editor)

MISCELLANEOUS: Stoffe I-III, 1981; Plays and Essays, 1982; Werkausgabe in 30 Bänden, 1982 (30 volumes); Friedrich Dürrenmatt: Selected Writings, 2006 (3 volumes)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Arnold, Armin. Friedrich Dürrenmatt. New York: F. Ungar, 1972. A biography of Dürrenmatt, covering his life and works. Bibliography.
- Birkerts, Sven. Foreword to The Inspector Barlach Mysteries: "The Judge and His Hangman" and "Suspicion." Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2006. Overview of Dürrenmatt's mystery fiction in general and of the two works printed in this volume in particular.
- Crockett, Roger A. Understanding Friedrich Dürrenmatt. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1998. A biography and critical analysis of Dürrenmatt and his works. Bibliography and index.
- Dürrenmatt, Friedrich. Friedrich Dürrenmatt: Selected Writings. Translated by Joel Agee. 3 vols. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2006. A selection of essays by Dürrenmatt about his craft, as well as fiction and dramatic works. Bibliographic references.
- Scanlan, Margaret. Plotting Terror: Novelists and Terrorists in Contemporary Fiction. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 2001. Includes a chapter on Dürrenmatt's The Assignment. Bibliographic references and index.
- Tiusanen, Timo. Dürrenmatt: A Study in Plays, Prose, Theory. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1977. A critical study of the works and theory of Dürrenmatt. Bibliography and index.
- Whitton, Kenneth S. Dürrenmatt: Reinterpretation in Retrospect. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1990. An examination of the works and life of Dürrenmatt. Bibliography and indexes.

E

MIGNON G. EBERHART

Born: University Place, Nebraska; July 6, 1899

Died: Greenwich, Connecticut; October 8, 1996

Type of plot: Amateur sleuth

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Sarah Keate and Lance O'Leary, 1929-1932

Sarah Keate, 1942-1954

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

SARAH KEATE, a middle-aged, unmarried nurse, is intelligent and plucky. She has, along with the wit to solve baffling crimes, a penchant for complicating their solutions by stumbling into perilous situations.

LANCE O'LEARY is a promising young police detective who works with Nurse Keate. Described as being extremely observant, he also has a knack for extricating Keate from the situations into which she repeatedly blunders.

CONTRIBUTION

Mignon G. Eberhart's first five novels, which featured nurse Sarah Keate and police detective Lance O'Leary, reflect the early influence of Mary Roberts Rinehart on Eberhart's writing. Breaking from this influence after the publication of her fifth Keate-O'Leary novel, Eberhart found her own voice in an extensive series of novels that combine murder and detection with elements of the gothic romance. Formula-written for the most part but remarkably free from the mechanical sterility of ordinary formula fiction, the Eberhart novels are unique in that the traditional classic detective story is presented in the context of a gothic romance's eerie atmosphere of impending danger.

BIOGRAPHY

Mignon G. Eberhart was born Mignon Good on July 6, 1899, in University Place, Nebraska, the daughter of William Thomas Good and Margaret Hill Bruffey Good. Eberhart attended Nebraska Wesleyan University from 1917 to 1920, but left before she was graduated. She married Alanson C. Eberhart, a civil engineer, on December 29, 1923. The Eberharts were remarried in 1948, following their divorce and Mrs. Eberhart's marriage to John Hazen Perry in 1946.

Eberhart began writing in the late 1920's, primarily as an escape from the boredom resulting from traveling with her husband as he pursued his career as a civil engineer. Beginning with short stories, Eberhart switched to novels when her short stories stopped selling regularly. Her first published novel was The Patient in Room 18, which appeared in 1929.

In 1930, Eberhart received the five-thousand-dollar Scotland Yard Prize for her second novel, While the Patient Slept. She was given an honorary doctorate by her alma mater, Nebraska Wesleyan University, in 1935, and in 1971 won the Mystery Writers of America's Grand Master Award. In 1994, she received the Malice Domestic Award for Lifetime Achievement. She died in Greenwich, Connecticut, on October 8, 1996.

ANALYSIS

Mignon G. Eberhart began her career with a series of five detective novels that featured Sarah Keate, a never-married nurse turned amateur detective, and Lance O'Leary, a promising young police detective. These first novels, which were written in the Mary Roberts Rinehart tradition, have been described by Joanne Harrack Hayne as "reminiscent of Rinehart at her most mediocre," with Nurse Keate exhibiting the paradoxical "pluckiness and stupidity which are characteristic of the worst of the 'Had-I-But-Known' narrators." In many ways, Nurse Keate's penchant for stumbling into perilous situations from which Detective O'Leary must rescue her anticipates the typical heroine of the later Eberhart novels, except that the romantic element is absent in the Keate-O'Leary novels.

For a brief period during the 1930's, the Keate-O'Leary novels were very popular with Hollywood filmmakers. Between 1935 and 1938, Sarah Keate, renamed Sally Keating and growing progressively younger, appeared in five film adaptations. Even so, the Keate-O'Leary novels do not constitute a particularly significant contribution to the corpus of detective fiction.

Nurse Keate, without O'Leary, reappeared in two later novels, Wolf in Man's Clothing (1942) and Man Missing (1954), and Eberhart experimented with two other amateur detectives, mystery writer Susan Dare and banker James Wickwire, who appeared in their own series of short stories. The Dare stories, which were first collected in The Cases of Susan Dare (1934), are also reminiscent of Rinehart. The Wickwire stories, seven of which are included in Mignon G. Eberhart's Best Mystery Stories (1988), as far as Eberhart's attempts to create a series character are concerned, are the most successful. In the Wickwire series Eberhart seems to have been able to allow more of her own keen sense of humor and eye for the foibles of humanity to come through, and the result is that Mr. Wickwire's is a more rounded characterization than those of Dare and Keate.

After the publication of the fifth Keate-O'Leary novel, Murder by an Aristocrat (1932), Eberhart abandoned the principal series character formula in her major works, having found her own voice in her own unique blending of classic detective fiction and modern gothic romance. This blending is not always successful, and even though Eberhart denied that she wrote gothics, on the ground that "all the changes on Jane Eyre have been done," the gothic overtones have persisted, to the point where one reviewer, after reading Eberhart's Three Days for Emeralds (1988), concluded that the work is "more of a modern-day Gothic romance" than a mystery.

Although this criticism has its own validity, it must be noted, in Eberhart's defense, that the gothic element in Eberhart's work does not stem from a deliberate effort to write in that genre. Eberhart's murders take place in exotic settings because those places have an inherent eeriness that heightens suspense. Eberhart's choice of locations is best explained by one of her favorite quotations from the writings of Robert Louis Stevenson: "There are houses which demand to be haunted, coasts set apart for shipwrecks, and certain dark gardens that cry aloud for murder." There are also, as everyone knows, certain kinds of atmospheric conditions—blizzards, hurricanes, and "dark and stormy nights," that "cry aloud for murder." Eberhart uses these, along with houses, coasts, and shipwrecks, not because they are the standard fixtures of the gothic romance but because they serve to heighten suspense and to provide a background for the psychological development of her principal characters.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Mignon G. Eberhart. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The fact that Eberhart's exotic settings are effective may be attributed to her ability to inject a considerable degree of realism into her descriptions of houses, lands, and circumstances. This is probably attributable to the fact that, as the wife of an engineer, she had traveled widely, so that she was usually able to write from experience. "A good many of these places," she once said, "I've lived in myself." For the most part, Eberhart's settings reflect firsthand experience, and her characters do not enter through doors that do not exist in previous chapters, as her preliminary work on a novel often included the drawing of detailed house plans. This attention to detail—in her words, “walking the tight-rope” between too much and too little realism—has resulted in a body of work that has accurately been described as “plausible and entertaining.”

Like the exotic settings, the budding romances that characterize a typical Eberhart mystery are not introduced because of Eberhart’s deliberate attempt to employ the elements of gothic fiction. Rather, the romance appears because of Eberhart’s conviction that romance is, unavoidably, a fact of life. “Take any small group of twelve to fifteen people,” she once told an interviewer, “and show me one such group where there is not a romance.” As a result, the standard Eberhart novel, which often includes twelve or fifteen characters, will invariably feature at least one romance.

Obviously, the combination of an exotic setting and a budding romance will suggest gothic romance to the casual observer, but that which distinguishes an Eberhart detective/gothic novel is that no matter what the setting or how turbulent the romance, murder will quickly intrude and be the dominant factor. Eberhart has been reported as emphatic on this point: “You just can’t write a detective story without at least one murder. Nobody is going to read 300 pages just to find out what became of Lady Emily’s jewels.”

As might be surmised from the preceding comments, the Eberhart novels are primarily formula-written, with the typical Eberhart novel featuring, as noted, an exotic setting, a budding romance, and, inevitably, a murder or series of murders. The context for these murders will usually be, in Eberhart’s words, “a conflict within a group of people who are closely related,” so that “ideally, the motive for murder comes from the conflict, and the resolution of the murder resolves the conflict.”

According to the Eberhart formula, the small group will include a helpless young woman, frequently an orphan, who embodies all Nurse Keate’s ineptitude, often without showing any signs of her pluckiness. This naïve or sometimes merely scatterbrained individual either will be engaged to someone for whom she does not really care or will have been married to a man who has abused or abandoned her and who, even in his absence, exercises psychological control over her. Also within the group will be a potential husband and an older person who opposes the marriage and who also dominates the heroine to some degree. If there is a first husband, he is usually involved in the murder, either as the one murdered or as the murderer. If he is murdered, the innocent young widow will be the prime suspect. Although the heroine generally helps in the final solution, the development of an Eberhart plot depends to a great extent on the heroine’s talent for making matters worse through her own propensity for stumbling into perilous situations, from which she must be rescued by the doggedly determined romantic lead, who eventually solves the murders and is rewarded by being allowed to marry the heroine.

MESSAGE FROM HONG KONG

Eberhart’s handling of this formula may be illustrated by reference to one of her novels. In Message from Hong Kong (1969), for example, the conflict involves four people: Marcia Lowry; her missing husband, David “Dino” Lowry; her father-in-law, Mr. Lowry; and her would-be fiancé, Richard Blake. Dino Lowry has disappeared and is presumed dead, and Richard and Marcia want to be married, but Marcia, an orphan who has been reared by an aunt and befriended by Dino’s father, cannot break the psychological hold of Dino and his father. When a message comes from Hong Kong that suggests to Mr. Lowry that his son is, in fact, alive, Marcia travels to Hong Kong, where she barely misses being the prime suspect in a murder. From Hong Kong, Marcia is pursued by a deadly crew of five smugglers and is not saved from them or from husband Dino until the long-suffering Richard Blake has traveled to Hong Kong, has endured (with Marcia and the five smugglers) a hurricane in Florida, and has, somehow, managed to stop Marcia from periodically undoing all that has been done up to a given point in the story’s development. Eventually, back in the home where it all began, Blake—following the Eberhart formula—effects a resolution of the murders; the conflict is solved, and he and Marcia are free to wed.

With few exceptions, Eberhart’s stories are told from a female character’s point of view. One of those exceptions may be found in Eberhart’s Wickwire stories, which are narrated by James Wickwire, the bachelor senior vice president of a New York bank “within whose walls [he has] spent most of [his] life.” Wickwire, who is “elderly enough to be entrusted with the somewhat difficult chore of advising . . . widows who seem strangely determined to invest in nonexistent uranium ore deposits and dry oil wells,” frequently finds himself embroiled in a murder, largely because of his particular duties at the bank.

NEXT OF KIN

Like the narrators of the Eberhart stories, Eberhart’s murderers are, also with few exceptions, male. When the murderer is female, as in The White Dress (1946) or Next of Kin (1982), either she is transformed from the archetypal Eberhart heroine into a creature displaying all the stereotypical masculine attributes or her crime may be treated as simply another form of the blundering-into-crisis situations characteristic of Susan Keate or Marcia Lowry. In Next of Kin, for example, petite Lettie Channing, after having murdered two men, one of whom was her husband, is whisked off to Australia by an uncle, who apparently subscribes to the belief that Lettie’s murders may be blamed more on his having neglected her than on any particular evil latent in her character. In other words, Lettie has stumbled into crime the way that Nurse Keate, and scores of other Eberhart heroines, stumble into perilous situations.

Eberhart’s last novel, her sixtieth, was published in 1988, when she was eighty-nine. Any reader who attempts to read each one of these books will discover much that is tediously repetitive, primarily because in the totality of her production, the Eberhart formula will become more obvious than her own distinctive skills as a writer. More selective readers, however, taking Eberhart in limited doses, will find that while her plotting is formulaic, her writing is seldom mechanical. Her dialogue is natural and unhurried and serves to reiterate, rather than advance, the plot, permitting Eberhart to intensify the suspense while slowing the pace to allow for character development.

In 1994 Eberhart was awarded the Malice Domestic Lifetime Achievement, and the following year several of her early works were reprinted by the University of Nebraska Press. Critics reassessed Eberhart’s writing and praised both her atmosphere and timing, and an entirely new generation was introduced to Nurse Sarah Keate. Although Sarah’s experiences are tame compared to the exploits of Sue Grafton’s Kinsey Millhone or Sara Paretsky’s V. I. Warshawski, Eberhart’s adventures filled a niche that has nonetheless stood the test of time. Eberhart’s writings may lack some depth in characterization or plotting, but they are pleasantly entertaining and well written. These talents, combined with her ability to inject a note of realism into her exotic settings, make Eberhart an important writer in the field of detective fiction. As Hayne noted, “Within the confines of formula fiction, the novels of Mignon G. Eberhart embody an unusual degree of clarity and intelligence.”

Chandice M. Johnson, Jr.

Updated by Fiona Kelleghan and
Taryn Benbow-Pfalzgraf

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

SARAH KEATE AND LANCE O’LEARY SERIES:

The Patient in Room 18, 1929; The Mystery of Hunting’s End, 1930; While the Patient Slept, 1930; From This Dark Stairway, 1931; Murder by an Aristocrat, 1932 (also known as Murder of My Patient)

SARAH KEATE SERIES: Wolf in Man’s Clothing, 1942; Man Missing, 1954

NONSERIES NOVELS: 1933-1940 • The Dark Garden, 1933 (also known as Death in the Fog); The White Cockatoo, 1933; The House on the Roof, 1935; Fair Warning, 1936; Danger in the Dark, 1937 (also known as Hand in Glove); The Pattern, 1937 (also known as Pattern of Murder); Hasty Wedding, 1938; The Glass Slipper, 1938; Brief Return, 1939; The Chiffon Scarf, 1939; The Hangman’s Whip, 1940

1941-1950 • Strangers in Flight, 1941 (revised as Speak No Evil, 1941); With This Ring, 1941; The Man Next Door, 1943; Unidentified Woman, 1943; Escape the Night, 1944; Wings of Fear, 1945; Five Passengers from Lisbon, 1946; The White Dress, 1946; Another Woman’s House, 1947; House of Storm, 1949; Hunt with the Hounds, 1950

1951-1960 • Never Look Back, 1951; Dead Men’s Plans, 1952; The Unknown Quantity, 1953; Postmark Murder, 1956; Another Man’s Murder, 1957; Melora, 1959 (also known as The Promise of Murder); Jury of One, 1960

1961-1970 • The Cup, the Blade, or the Gun, 1961 (also known as The Crime at Honotassa); Enemy in the House, 1962; Run Scared, 1963; Call After Midnight, 1964; R.S.V.P. Murder, 1965; Witness at Large, 1966; Woman on the Roof, 1967; Message from Hong Kong, 1969; El Rancho Rio, 1970

1971-1980 • The House by the Sea, 1972; Two Little Rich Girls, 1972; Murder in Waiting, 1973; Danger Money, 1975; Family Fortune, 1976; Nine O'Clock Tide, 1978; The Bayou Road, 1979; Casa Madrone, 1980

1981-1988 • Family Affair, 1981; Next of Kin, 1982; The Patient in Cabin C, 1983; Alpine Condo Crossfire, 1984; A Fighting Chance, 1986; Three Days for Emeralds, 1988

OTHER SHORT FICTION: The Cases of Susan Dare, 1934; Five of My Best: "Deadly Is the Diamond," "Bermuda Grapevine," "Murder Goes to Market," "Strangers in Flight," "Express to Danger," 1949; Deadly Is the Diamond, 1951; Deadly Is the Diamond, and Three Other Novelettes of Murder: "Bermuda Grapevine," "The Crimson Paw," "Murder in Waltz Time," 1958; The Crimson Paw, 1959; Mignon G. Eberhart's Best Mystery Stories, 1988

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

PLAYS: 320 College Avenue, pb. 1938 (with Fred Ballard); Eight O'Clock Tuesday, pb. 1941 (with Robert Wallsten)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Brandt, Carl D. Introduction to Wolf in Man's Clothing. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1996. This introduction to Eberhart's novel was written by the author's longtime literary agent and adviser.
- Cypert, Rick. America's Agatha Christie: Mignon Good Eberhart, Her Life and Works. Cranbury, N.J.: Associated University Presses, 2005. Comprehensive study arguing for Eberhart's central place in the American mystery canon. Bibliographic references and index.
- Dubose, Martha Hailey, with Margaret Caldwell Thomas. Women of Mystery: The Lives and Works of Notable Women Crime Novelists. New York: St. Martin's Minotaur, 2000. Although Eberhart is just mentioned, her fellow female Golden Age writers are discussed at length, which provides context for understanding Eberhart.
- Eberhart, Mignon G. Interview by J. Mercier. Publishers Weekly 206 (September 16, 1974): 10-11. Brief but interesting interview with the author.
- Gussow, Mel. "Mignon Eberhart, Novelist, Ninety-seven: Blended Mystery and Romance." The New York Times, October 9, 1996, p. D19. Obituary of Eberhart written by an influential theater critic, whose opinion could make or break careers.

UMBERTO ECO

Born: Alessandria, Italy; January 5, 1932

Types of plot: Historical; metaphysical and metafictional parody

CONTRIBUTION

Umberto Eco was a well-known academician when his first novel, Il nome della rosa, was published in Italy in 1980. By the time the book was translated into English by William Weaver as The Name of the Rose in 1983, Eco had achieved literary superstardom. With its medieval setting, Sherlock Holmes-like main character, and seemingly traditional detective plot, The Name of the Rose was a popular and critical success, later made into a film starring Sean Connery and Christian Slater.

In addition to achieving worldwide popularity, the novel was also a sort of philosophical treatise, a place for Eco to test his own theories of signs and language. The Name of the Rose clearly demonstrates the influence of Jorge Luis Borges, the great Argentine writer who also reveled in both philosophy and detective fiction.

Eco followed this novel in 1988 with Il pendolo di Foucault, translated into English by William Weaver and published as Foucault's Pendulum in 1989. This volume does not fit easily into the mystery and detective genre because it is in many ways a parody; nevertheless, the book, with its endless array of esoteric clues and obligatory corpses has led many critics to see in it the inspiration for Dan Brown's 2003 The Da Vinci Code.

Although Eco has offered only two novels to the field of mystery and detective fiction, his contribution has nonetheless been enormous, largely because of the way he has both expanded and subverted the traditional conventions of the genre.

BIOGRAPHY

Umberto Eco was born on January 5, 1932, in Alessandria, Italy. He attended the University of Turin, studying medieval philosophy and aesthetics. He became fascinated with semiotics, the study of signs and symbols and their interpretation. This early interest would emerge not only in his academic work but also in his later popular successes, The Name of the Rose and Foucault's Pendulum.

Eco completed his doctoral work in 1954, publishing his dissertation on Saint Thomas Aquinas in 1956. During the same year, he began his academic career by accepting a post as a lecturer at the University of Turin, a position he held for the next eight years. At the same time, Eco also worked in radio and television in Italy as a cultural editor. He met many influential avant-garde writers and artists. Together, they became the heart of the Italian intellectual community.

In 1962, Eco published Opera aperta (The Open Work, 1989), a seminal book on text and meaning. In this book, Eco argues for the open text, a work that requires the reader to piece together meaning through an examination of the clues left by the writer. As a result, open texts do not have one, enduring meaning but rather many meanings, depending on the reader and the context of the reading. These concepts, while sophisticated and complex, are essential for understanding Eco as a writer of detective fiction. Indeed, for Eco, mystery and detective fiction offers a vehicle to illustrate these very concepts.

During the 1960's and 1970's, Eco found himself in increasing demand as a lecturer, writer, and editor. He wrote for some of the most important, if widely diverse, periodicals in Italy. Beginning in 1959, he was a senior editor at Bompiani publishers in Milan, a position he held through 1975. In 1971, it appeared that Eco had reached the pinnacle of success as a scholar when he accepted a position as the first professor of semiotics at the University of Bologna. He also became the vice president of the International Association for Semiotic Studies in 1979, founding and editing VS, the journal of semiotics. Throughout the next two decades, he wrote some of the most important works to date on the study of semiotics.

In 1978, Eco began work on the novel that would become The Name of the Rose. Even Eco was surprised over the attention garnered by his book. The popular reading public enjoyed the riveting mystery, while critics and scholars found the religious, philosophical, and historical content of the story to be worthy of study. In 1988, Eco published Il pendolo di Foucault, published in translation as Foucault's Pendulum in 1989. This novel, set in the modern world, draws in the esoteric mythology of the Knights Templar for its plot. This novel was also both a critical and popular success.

After the publication of Foucault's Pendulum, Eco wrote three more novels as well as many books on language, semiotics, and literature. In addition, he has continued to contribute columns to magazines and journals.

ANALYSIS

As a semiotician, Umberto Eco is particularly interested in the study of signs and symbols and how the interpretation of signs and symbols is affected by cultural contexts. In this, he has been influenced by Jorge Luis Borges, who turned to mystery and detective fiction as a means of exploring signs and symbols. Eco, like Borges before him, knows well the conventions and readers' expectations of detective fiction, and like Borges, he uses these conventions to subvert the very stories he tells.

In a number of his theoretical works, Eco examines detective-fiction writers such as Edgar Allan Poe,

G. K. Chesterton, and Ian Fleming to flesh out his theory of signs. He uses his knowledge to both extend and undermine the genre, creating in the process what some critics have termed the “antidetective” novel. In effect, Eco creates a parody of traditional detective fiction by demonstrating the ways that conventions can both reveal and conceal, lead and mislead.

In addition, Eco demonstrates the role that readers play in determining the meaning of a text. For Eco, a text’s meaning is not definitive but is rather a function of a reader approaching a text from a particular cultural context. Writers, according to Eco, produce work out of their own “encyclopedia,” or collection of knowledge. Likewise, readers bring to a text their own particular encyclopedia. The meaning of a text for a particular reader, therefore, takes place in the nexus of the reader and writer encyclopedic intersection, the place where there is an overlapping knowledge base. Necessarily, then, not all readers will take the same meaning from a book because their encyclopedias differ. Moreover, in his detective fiction, Eco uses his main character as a stand-in for the reader, someone who must make a cohesive story out of the many signs and symbols strewn along the way, interpreting these signs through the context of his own knowledge.

By explicitly using his own philosophical work concerning texts, readers, and language within the conventions of detective fiction, Eco has opened the genre dramatically. Eco’s books are nothing if not intertextual: by using references to other works, philosophers, historical figures, and genres, Eco increases the possibilities for interpretation. Unlike the classic detective story where everything is revealed in the final pages, Eco creates stories that, although they appear to be of the genre, actually do not lead a reader to a final interpretation. Instead, readers are left to find their own paths through the labyrinth, leading to a place of possible, but not conclusive, interpretation.

THE NAME OF THE ROSE

The Name of the Rose is Eco’s first foray into mystery and detective fiction. In this novel, he uses his deep knowledge of medieval philosophy and his ongoing interest in the study of semiotics to produce an intertextual work that combines a number of unlikely genres, ranging from biblical exegesis, medieval history, literary theory, and detective fiction. Eco populates the novel with puns, allusions, puzzles, and play, in spite of the violence and hysteria that also fill the pages.

Eco was deeply influenced by the work of Jorge Luis Borges in this novel; indeed, Eco’s inclusion of a blind librarian named Jorge of Borgos is an intentional and direct link to Borges as is Eco’s use of the library, mirrors, and labyrinth, all favorite Borgesian devices. In addition, Borges’s short story “Death and the Compass,” a detective fiction in which the detective incorrectly reads the signs, leading him to his death, provides a model for Eco. Eco also draws heavily on the work of Arthur Conan Doyle, creating a main character remarkably similar to Doyle’s Sherlock Holmes. There is a deliberate mixing of historical and fictional characters in The Name of the Rose, yet another way that Eco plays games with his readers. At its heart, The Name of the Rose is a book about books, and fittingly, the central image in the novel is the labyrinthine library.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Umberto Eco in 2004. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The main action of The Name of the Rose takes place at a northern Italian abbey in 1327. The narrator is Adso of Melk, an aging monk who many years later writes down what he remembers of his visit to the abbey with an English Franciscan, William of Baskerville. The pair are at the abbey to attend an important religious meeting, but the murder of several monks leads William to investigate. The story grows steadily more complicated as William uncovers superstitions, conspiracies, and heresy. Like the reader, William attempts to make sense of all the clues in front of him, weaving them together into a coherent story. However, unlike most detective mysteries, the clues do not lead to a definitive end. Indeed, although William finally uncovers who is responsible for the murders, it is by accident; his careful reasoning through the clues, while convincing, proves to be utterly wrong.

FOUCAULT'S PENDULUM

In Foucault's Pendulum, Eco draws on his encyclopedic knowledge to create an intertextual work taking as its subject nearly all of human history. The novel is not detective fiction, but does fall loosely into the thriller/suspense genre. His characters find themselves in very dangerous waters because of a mystery they create themselves.

Eco opens the book in Paris in the 1980's. His narrator, Casaubon, a scholar, is hiding in the Musée des Arts et Métiers, in front of physicist Léon Foucault's pendulum, a device to provide evidence for the rotation of the earth. Casaubon is hiding from members of the Knights Templar who he believes have kidnapped his friend, Jacopo Belbo.

From here, the story unfolds in flashback, and readers learn that Casaubon and two of his friends many years earlier decided to invent a conspiracy theory for fun. They imagine a plot started by the Knights Templar in the Middle Ages that would lead to world domination. The three grow increasingly immersed in their imaginary world, calling their plot "The Plan," and providing a detailed history complete with aca-demical references, both real and imaginary. Through a series of very complicated plot devices, The Plan is leaked to outsiders, who believe that it is real. The hidden treasure of the Templars is vast and provides an irresistible motive for assorted sundry evildoers to accost anyone who seems to have a clue concerning its whereabouts. As a result, Casaubon's friends are killed, and Casaubon finds himself in grave danger.

What makes Foucault's Pendulum so compelling (and also sometimes so humorous) is Eco's incredible mastery of countless esoteric details. He intentionally mixes the factual with the fictional, just as his main characters do in their construction of The Plan, demonstrating that his readers can be fooled by material that looks "real," in just the same way that the characters in his story mistake the false conspiracy for the real thing. Indeed, the furor over Dan Brown's runaway hit, The Da Vinci Code, demonstrates the difficulty readers have in decoding fact from fiction. Thus, while Foucault's Pendulum is on one level a suspense thriller of a joke gone awry, it is also a meditation on the power of text to create whole worlds.

Diane Andrews Henningfeld

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: Il nome della rosa, 1980 (The Name of the Rose, 1983); Il pendolo di Foucault, 1988 (Foucault's Pendulum, 1989)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: L'isola del giorno prima, 1994 (The Island of the Day Before, 1995); Baudolino, 2000 (English translation, 2002); La misteriosa fiamma della regina Loana, 2004 (The Mysterious Flame of Queen Loana, 2005)

NONFICTION: 1956-1970 • Il problema estetico in San Tommaso, 1956 (The Aesthetics of Thomas Aquinas, 1988); Sviluppo dell'estetico medievale, 1959 (Art and Beauty in the Middle Ages, 1986); Opera aperta, 1962 (The Open Work, 1989); Apocalittici e integrati, 1964 (Apocalypse Postponed, 1994); Le poetiche di Joyce: Dalla "Summa" al "Finnegans Wake," 1966 (The Aesthetic of Chaosmos: The Middle Ages of James Joyce, 1982); La struttura assente, 1968; Opera aperta, la definizione dell'arte, 1968

1971-1990 • Le forme del contenuto, 1971; A Theory of Semiotics, 1976; The Role of the Reader: Explorations in the Semiotics of Text, 1979; Sette anni di desiderio: Chronache 1977-1983, 1983; Postille a "Il nome della rosa," 1983 (Postscript to "The Name of the Rose," 1984); Semiotics and the Philosophy of Language, 1984; Faith in Fakes, 1986; Travels in Hyper Reality: Essays, 1986; Diario minimo, 1988 (Misreadings, 1993); I limiti dell'interpretazione, 1990 (The Limits of Interpretation, 1990)

1991-2002 • Il secondo diario minimo, 1992 (How to Travel with a Salmon, and Other Essays, 1994); Interpretation and Overinterpretation, 1992; La ricerca della lingua perfetta nella cultura europea, 1993 (The Search for the Perfect Language, 1995); Six Walks in the Fictional Woods, 1994; In cosa crede chi non crede?, 1996 (Belief or Nonbelief? A Confrontation, 2000; with Carlo Maria Martini); Cinque scritti morali, 1997 (Five Moral Pieces, 2001); Serendipities: Language and Lunacy, 1998; La bustina di Minerva, 1999; Kant e l'ornitorinco, 1999 (Kant and the Platypus: Essays on Language and Cognition, 1999); Conversations About the End of Time, 1999; Experiences in Translation, 2001; Dire quasi la stessa cosa: Esperienze di traduzione, 2003; Mouse or Rat? Translation as Negotiation, 2003; Sulla letteratura, 2002 (On Literature, 2004)

EDITED TEXTS: Storia figurata delle invenzioni: Dalla selce scheggiata al volo spaziali, 1961 (The Picture History of Inventions from Ploughs to Polaris, 1963; with G. Zorzoli); Il caso Bond, 1965 (The Bond Affair, 1966; with Oreste del Buono); I fumetti di Mao, 1971 (The People's Comic Book: Red Women's Detachment, Hot on the Trail, and Other Chinese Comics, 1973; with J. Chesneaux and G. Nebiolo); A Semiotic Landscape, 1979 (with Seymour Chatman and Jean-Marie Klinkenberg); The Sign of the Three: Dupin, Holmes, Peirce, 1984 (with Thomas A. Sebeok); Meaning and Mental Representations, 1988 (with Marco Santambrogio and Patrizia Violi); Povero Pinocchio, 1995; Storia della bellezza, 2004 (The History of Beauty, 2004; On Beauty, 2004)

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: I tre cosmonauti, 1988 (The Three Astronauts, 1995)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bondanella, Peter E. Umberto Eco and the Open Text: Semiotics, Fiction, Popular Culture. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1997. Bondanella offers a study of Eco's work, demonstrating how his fiction grows out of his intense study of both medievalism and semiotics.
- Haft, Adele J., Jane G. White, and Robert J. White. The Key to "The Name of the Rose": Demystifying Umberto Eco's Novel, "The Name of the Rose." Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1999. An essential guidebook to Eco's novel. Contains useful chapters on the Middle Ages and semiotics as well as translations of all non-English passages, and a complete bibliography.
- Inge, Thomas M., ed. Naming the Rose: Essays on Eco's "The Name of the Rose." Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1988. A collection of essays by different writers offering critical readings of The Name of the Rose. Also contains a comprehensive list of English-language criticism of the novel.
- Martín, Jorge Hernández. "The Text as Web: A Case for Conjecture in The Name of the Rose." In Readers and Labyrinths: Detective Fiction in Borges, Bustos Domecq, and Eco. New York: Garland, 1995. Provides a discussion of the similarities between Eco's detective fiction and that of Jorge Luis Borges, including the central images of a library and labyrinth. Details the main conventions of detective fiction and the ways that Eco and Borges break these conventions.
- Radford, Gary P. On Eco. Belmont, Calif.: Thomson/Wadsworth, 2003. A short, accessible book that encompasses Eco's life and theories. An excellent place to start for any student of Eco's work.
- Tani, Stefano. The Doomed Detective: The Contribution of the Detective Novel to Postmodern American and Italian Fiction. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1984. A cogent and accessible discussion of the rise of the "antidetective" novel, demonstrating how Eco's work both innovates and undermines the conventional detective novel.

BARRY EISLER

Born: New Jersey; 1964

Type of plot: Thriller

PRINCIPAL SERIES

John Rain, 2000-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

JOHN RAIN is a half-Japanese, half-white American hired killer, who specializes in assassinations and learned his trade serving in the Vietnam War. That morally ambiguous experience explains, in part, why he cannot adjust to a normal, conventional world. Deft plotting and a vivid evocation of the evil world Rain has to confront create extraordinary empathy for a hero who would ostensibly seem not to merit such understanding.

DOX, Rain's affable sidekick, is a superb sharpshooter and the assassin's antithesis. A former Marine, Dox believes in camaraderie. He is constantly annoying Rain because he talks too much and risks their security. At the same time, the extroverted Dox brings Rain partly out of his shell, making it possible for him to become more of a complete human being. Dox is the one operative whom Rain can implicitly trust.

CONTRIBUTION

Seldom has the thriller genre featured such a flawed (morally compromised) and yet attractive figure as Barry Eisler's John Rain. On one hand, he seems amoral; on the other, his sensitivity, especially toward women, is remarkable. Rain also revels in describing the meals he eats and his lovemaking.

Eisler may be Tom Clancy's only serious rival in the creation of techno-thrillers. Like Clancy, Eisler loves to dwell on his hero's use of the latest technology, but unlike Clancy's protagonists, Rain is a more believable human being—conflicted about killing but also aware that governments employ agents just like him, especially when the bureaucracy cannot act quickly. Rain becomes indispensable because the governments who give him assignments cannot go through regular channels.

Unlike the traditional thriller where the hero often does not age (James Bond, for example) or who manages to continue his work without serious internal disturbance, Rain grows increasingly tense about the toll his assassinations have taken on his psyche. Thus the Rain series has a kind of tragic trajectory, and its hero is fast approaching the point where he must leave "the life" and begin a new existence as a law-abiding citizen. Eisler's contribution to the thriller genre is located in the nexus he explores between the individual's state of mind and the geopolitical concerns of global terrorism and government-sponsored violence.

BIOGRAPHY

Barry Eisler, who is deliberately reticent about supplying details about his life, was born in New Jersey in 1964. His father, Edgar, was an entrepreneur, salesman, and president of an office products company. His mother, Barbara, was a painter, poet, sculptor, nonfiction writer, and volunteer in environmental causes. Eisler attributes his interest in solving mysteries to his reading about Harry Houdini. The great magician and escape artist had secret knowledge, and Eisler was thrilled with the idea of a career that would involve this kind of adventure. He began collecting books on lock picking, breaking and entering, and other clandestine and undetectable forms of crime (killing without using weapons) that are a significant part of John Rain's assassination tool kit. Houdini's physical prowess also clearly influenced Eisler, who trained in the martial arts and made these skills another crucial part of Rain's repertoire.

Eisler received a bachelor of arts degree in 1986 and a juris doctor degree in 1989 from Cornell University. He wrote a column on foreign policy for the school newspaper and early on evinced an interest in fiction. He began writing short stories as a teenager. He spent three years (1989-1992) in the Directorate of Operations of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) as a covert operative. He learned spy craft, including surveillance and countersurveillance, antiterrorism tactics, improvising explosive devices, recruiting agents, and interrogation techniques—activities and skills that are crucial to John Rain’s work. Learning Japanese and working in Japan were also part of Eisler’s CIA work.

After leaving the CIA in 1993, Eisler remained in Japan. He studied at Kodokan International Judo Center in Tokyo while immersing himself in the country’s language and culture. His year-long explorations of Tokyo’s streets and back alleys, visiting jazz clubs and whiskey bars, provided him with a feel for the seamier side of the city and of crime that is featured so authentically in his novels. It was through observing this nightlife that Eisler began to think of characters engaged in secret crimes and with connections to both the underworld and to government operatives and corporations. At the same time, his work for the law firm of Hamada and Matsumoto in Tokyo provided him with access to the upper echelons of society and the business world, where in theory an assassin like John Rain might be hired to do high-level assassinations. In 1995, Eisler became in-house counsel for Matsushita Electric and Industrial in Osaka. After two years he returned to the United States.

Eisler’s transition to full-time writing was not easy. He received more than fifty rejections from publishers before his first John Rain novel was published. He rewrote that first novel several times, relying on advice from an agent, before it appeared in print. Like other writers in his field—such as Patricia Cornwell—Eisler does extensive research for his books, making the settings, the characters, and the crimes as real as possible, based on his frequent travels to Japan and other parts of Asia. His work has been translated into twenty languages, demonstrating the international appeal of his thrillers.

ANALYSIS

Barry Eisler’s John Rain, a Japanese American trained in the martial arts, is at home in Japan and other parts of Asia. He provides an international perspective as he involves himself with intelligence agencies such as the Mossad, the Israeli covert organization that uses assassination as a political weapon. Rain realizes that his work will someday result in a reckoning for him even as he searches for ways to retreat from his bloody profession. He has a moral center that he cannot escape; in other words, he is a redeemable character. The problem is how to survive in the dangerous world he has made for himself. In this respect, quite aside from the gruesome details of his trade, his problems are universal. He is involved in the human predicament, attempting to construct not only a viable and authentic identity but also a place for himself in a world that includes love and family. Although his efforts to do right fail, he brutally confronts the nature of his crimes and earns considerable respect.

RAIN FALL

Rain Fall (2002), the first John Rain novel, conveys Eisler’s deep immersion in Japanese culture. As one reviewer put it, the fiction is “rich and atmospheric.” Rain is a Vietnam War veteran, trained by Special Forces. He is an alienated hero, however, not entirely comfortable with his Japanese father or his American mother, and tortured by memories of atrocities he committed in Vietnam.

Rain specializes in making assassinations look like natural events. On a subway, he plants a microchip on the back of a bureaucrat, thus interfering with the frequency of the man’s pacemaker and inducing a fatal heart attack. Rain’s trouble begins when he realizes that he has murdered a man about to expose Japanese political corruption. At the same time, Rain is also at cross-purposes with a CIA agent who was trouble for him in Vietnam. Even worse, he falls in love with his victim’s daughter, Midori, who is an accomplished jazz pianist. The consequences of this assassination and of this love affair, which ends badly, continue to plague Rain in subsequent novels.

Eisler’s evocation of the intricate love-hate relationship between Japan and America, the complexities of the Japanese criminal classes, including a right-wing guru and his spies, and the complications ensuing when a Japanese police officer investigates Rain’s activities, all combine to present a riveting exploration of international intrigue. Some reviewers lauded Eisler’s plotting but felt some of the characters were not very well developed. However, Eisler’s command of procedure—of how crimes are planned and committed—and his portrayal of exotic places made this first novel an impressive achievement.

HARD RAIN

This second novel in the John Rain series, Hard Rain (2003), draws on Eisler's experience in the CIA. Always a loner, Rain seems even more isolated when he is implicated in the agency's efforts to exploit the corruption of the Japanese political and business system. Rain's professionalism and intelligence make him a fascinating figure. At the same time, the wear and tear of his work is beginning to show, and his qualms contribute considerably to mitigating the cold-blooded aspects of his activities. As several reviewers note, the plot is constructed with great literary skill.

Rain relies on Tatsu, a Japanese intelligence officer, whose goal is to rid the Japanese government of corruption. Tatsu's integrity is one of Rain's mainstays. In the shady world of Tokyo, which has been compared to Raymond Chandler's Los Angeles, Rain has few allies on whom he can count. Tatsu is also a kind of mentor. Rain is constantly measuring his actions against Tatsu's example.

RAIN STORM

In Rain Storm (2004), the strain of Rain's work causes him to escape to Brazil. There he believes he can retire from the assassination business. However, the CIA seeks him out, and Rain finds himself plunged once again into international intrigue—this time involving arms deals and South Asian criminal gangs. Rain, expecting a big payday ($200,000), vows that this will be his last job.

Rain soon finds that there is an assassin on his trail. He turns for help to Dox, an easygoing former Marine sniper and a new character who becomes increasingly important in Eisler's next two novels. Dox draws out the loner Rain. With Dox's prodding, Rain begins to confront his own demons. It is very difficult for Rain to trust anyone, but the shrewd Dox is a good complement to the intense, wary Rain.

KILLING RAIN

Set in the Philippines, Killing Rain (2005) finds Rain involved with the Israeli intelligence service, the Mossad. His task is to quietly kill an arms dealer whose work threatens Israeli security. Rain's moral concerns are now beginning to interfere with his work, although he is assisted again by Dox, who becomes essential to Rain's plans when the so-called surgical kill turns into a bloodbath, with Rain himself becoming a target when Israeli security decides that Rain is a liability.

This novel begins to explore the complexity of Rain's character and those of the people he loves, including Midori and the Israeli agent, Delilah. Torn between these two women, Rain is attempting to achieve the impossible: affect a reconciliation with Midori while remaining faithful to Delilah. To even approach Midori may put her in harm's way of the assassin who is after him. To expect Delilah to wait until he settles matters with Midori is asking too much, especially because without Delilah's help, Rain will not be able to extricate himself from the chain of events that has made him a target.

Eisler's developing emphasis on character does not diminish his deft handling of plot and point of view. In this novel, Eisler experiments with using first- and third-person narrators who provide both a sense of immediacy and perspective on the action and the characters.

REQUIEM FOR AN ASSASSIN

In the sixth novel in the John Rain series, Requiem for an Assassin (2007), Rain has to rely on the work of several intelligence agencies to free his friend, Dox, who has been kidnapped by Rain's arch enemy Jim Hilger. Hilger's idea of revenge is to make Rain commit three assassinations to obtain Dox's release. Rain quickly figures out that the third hit will be a setup in which he will be the target. Rain battles not only with Hilger, trying to figure out where Dox is being held, but also with Delilah, a Mossad agent who has fallen in love with him. Is there room for love in his life? Rain wonders. He calls his other self "the Iceman," the killer who cannot allow himself to be distracted by normal feelings such as love and compassion.

Like all Eisler's novels, this one includes intricately choreographed scenes of violence and sex, descriptions of the latest spy technology and weapons. This exciting novel, in which the true nature of Hilger's plot is not revealed until the final pages, speaks directly to contemporary concern with terrorism, the role of the United States in the Middle East, and the extent to which official channels and intelligence agencies are still equipped to cope with threats to Western civilization.

Carl Rollyson

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

JOHN RAIN SERIES: Rain Fall, 2002; Hard Rain, 2003; Rain Storm, 2004; Killing Rain, 2005; The Last Assassin, 2006; Requiem for an Assassin, 2007

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Baker, Tom. "‘Rain’ Maker Barry Eisler Willing to Suffer for His Art." The Daily Yomiuri, August 19, 2006, p. 1. Baker notes how Eisler was involved in an accident when checking out an area of Tokyo that he planned to use in his book and that he used a stun gun on himself to test its effects.

Eisler, Barry. Barry Eisler: The Official Website. <http://www.barryeisler.com>. This is a very comprehensive author Web site. It includes a biography, photo gallery documenting Eisler’s career, access to his blog, descriptions of all his novels, a generous sampling of interviews, a list of awards his books have received, and excerpts from reviews. The author can be contacted directly from this site, and users can sign up for a newsletter.

_____. "PW Talks with Barry Eisler: Paying a Horrible Price." Interview by Robert C. Hahn. Publishers Weekly 253, no. 18 (May 1, 2006): 32. Eisler, a former CIA operative, talks about terrorism and surveillance, as well as his plans for the Rain series.

Hitz, Frederick P. The Great Game: The Myth and Reality of Espionage. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004. Hitz, a former inspector general of the CIA, contrasts spy novels with actual espionage cases. Although it does not mention Eisler’s works, it contains a chapter on assassination, which sheds light on Rain’s possible duties.

Pitt, David. Review of The Last Assassin, by Barry Eisler. Booklist 102, no. 17 (May 1, 2006): 27-28. Reviewer notes that this installment in the series does not have the protagonist’s name in the title and starts with the information that Rain is a father, perhaps marking a change in direction on Eisler’s part.

_____. Review of Requiem for an Assassin, by Barry Eisler. Booklist 103, no. 17 (May 1, 2007): 23. The reviewer wonders about the sustainability of a series in which the hit man wants simply to retire but hopes that Eisler can continue the series for a while.

AARON ELKINS

Born: Brooklyn, New York; July 24, 1935

Types of plot: Amateur sleuth; cozy

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Gideon Oliver, 1982-

Chris Norgren, 1987-

Lee Ofsted, 1989-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

GIDEON OLIVER, a forensic anthropologist, uses his talents to solve murders. The first novels in the series show his struggle with grief over his first wife’s death and his meeting with Julie Tandler, who becomes his second wife and companion for the later adventures.

CHRIS NORGREN, a young antiques expert and curator of Renaissance art at the Seattle Art Museum, applies his knowledge to crimes within the antiques world.

LEE OFSTED, a professional golfer, stumbles over mysteries while working on improving her game and participating in competitions. Her adventures and investigations provide an insider’s view of the golf world.

CONTRIBUTION

Aaron Elkins published his first book, Fellowship of Fear, a Gideon Oliver mystery, in 1982. His main character, Gideon Oliver, is a witty and sensitive forensic anthropologist who, at the beginning of the series, is recovering from the death of his wife from cancer. As the series progresses, he meets, falls in love with, and marries Julie Tendler. Gideon applies his forensic skills to murder victims, following up the clues that he finds in their bones.

The Gideon Oliver novels are an example of a popular subgenre of mystery: the amateur sleuth whose adventures are neither bloodless nor graphically gruesome and who introduces readers to worlds ordinarily closed to them. Elkins and his wife, Charlotte, have traveled all over the world, and the settings of these novels are realistic and informative as well as romantic. Information about forensic anthropology is knit seamlessly into the action.

The Chris Norgren series gives readers a look at the antiques business while the protagonist tracks down killers within the art world. Chris is less developed as a character than Gideon, but his adventures and knowledge are intriguing, especially for readers interested in art. The Lee Ofsted series, created by Elkins with his wife, features light but pleasant mysteries connected with golf; this series is closest to the cozy subgenre. Elkins's nonseries mysteries are tightly structured thrillers with fast-paced action and sympathetic characters.

Elkins's novels are appealing to the mystery reader for several reasons. His novels are a pleasing mixture of both the hard-boiled and the cozy mystery. The plots are highly satisfying, with unpredictable but persuasive conclusions. In addition, the main characters, in particular Gideon, are psychologically convincing as well as likeable. Gideon is a multilayered character with a believable background that gains depth with each novel. Other forensic anthropologists have joined Gideon on the mystery scene, but Gideon presents a the perfect level of forensic detail—not so much science that readers are bored or so little that they are mystified as to the importance of clues. The Oliver mysteries contain enough information to enlighten and teach the reader, but the information is presented as an organic part of the narrative. Similarly, the golf novels and the antiques novels present an insider's view but do not overload the reader with information. The lively dialogue and glints of humor add to the attractiveness of Elkins's work.

BIOGRAPHY

Aaron J. Elkins was born July 24, 1935, in Brooklyn, New York, to Irving Abraham Elkins and Jennie Katz Elkins. He was raised in New York and received his bachelor's degree from Hunter College in 1956, becoming one of the first men to attend what had been a women's college. His graduate degrees include a master's degree from the University of Arizona (1960), a second master's degree from California State University (1962), and a doctorate in education from the University of California at Berkeley (1976). He married Toby Siev in 1959, and they had two children. The marriage ended in divorce, and he married Charlotte Trangmar in 1972. A writer, she has collaborated with Elkins on the novels in his Lee Ofsted series.

Elkins has had many varied careers, from personnel analyst for Los Angeles County to university professor. He has taught in a number of universities including the University of Maryland, Santa Ana College, California State University, and Golden Gate University, and has lectured in various fields including anthropology, psychology, and business. He said he got the idea for Gideon Oliver, the "skeleton detective" who features in his most extensive series, during a class he was teaching in anthropology.

Elkins's work has won important awards, including the 1988 Edgar Award for the novel Old Bones (1987); the 1993 Agatha Award for the best short story for "Nice Gorilla," written with his wife, Charlotte Elkins; and the 1994 Nero Wolfe Award for the novel Old Scores (1993).

ANALYSIS

Aaron Elkins began with Gideon Oliver and keeps returning to this highly appealing figure. Gideon's wit, composure, and basic values make him someone the reader is glad to meet again.

Place is a major component of Elkins's novels, revealing the author's eye for details of culture as well as of place, developed in his travels around the world. In his novels, unlike many series novels, no sense of sameness develops—the locations are so different and the plots involve such a variety of issues and populations that each adventure seems fresh and new. Most series mysteries have a repeated location—a city, perhaps, or a small town—and this may contribute to the sense of familiarity that is a characteristic of the cozy mystery. Although Elkins's novels have a number of continuing characters, the action is spread over the world.

Although Elkins wrote three series, his novels are all different. Although characters develop within a series, his writing does not exhibit a definite evolution over time. In each novel, Elkins divides the emphasis among plot, character, and setting. The plots are often tours de force; the conclusion is so logical when it is revealed, and yet it cannot be discerned earlier. His mysteries are not the classic type that drops clues to the point where the clever reader arrives at the conclusion almost simultaneously with the detective. The plots communicate a sense of the expansiveness and unpredictability of the world—and yet the concluding events fit and satisfy. If there is a difference between the earliest and the latest Elkins books, it might be that the humor is more prevalent and more pronounced in the later works. Also, the setting is more fully developed in the later novels, which sometimes have more exotic backgrounds.

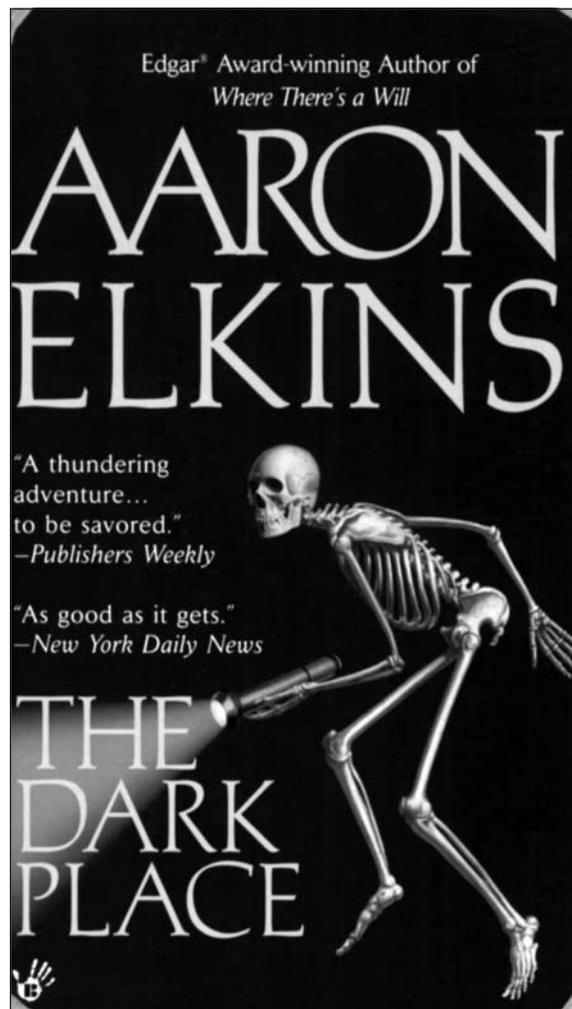

Elkins's frequent theme is the complex interaction between good and evil and the impossibility of separating them completely. Characters are often as morally ambiguous as people tend to be in real life. Heinous acts are committed out of misplaced idealism; good may be done by accident. Another theme is that actions always have consequences and that it is possible to trace the chain of cause and effect back to its root cause, which may be something larger than an individual's desire for revenge or profit. One of the draws of the books is that the story often fits into some larger context.

The romance element tends to be quietly satisfying in Elkins's novels; in the Gideon Oliver books, his falling in love with Julie and marrying her, and her consequent participation in his adventures are part of the background and do not distract from the main action. Elkins's novels often demonstrate the maxim that "old sins have long shadows," but without the total bleakness and sense of fatality that looms over the hard-boiled detective novel.

THE DARK PLACE

The Dark Place (1983) is one of the earlier adventures of Gideon Oliver. Gideon is not yet married to Julie Tandler, who is chief park ranger. The story is set in Washington's Olympic National Park, where hikers have been disappearing. When bones are found, Gideon finds that superhuman strength has been responsible for a young man's death—and his public pronouncement of this finding brings forth all the Bigfoot hunters. The scientific community threatens to discredit him.

This novel involves lost tribes—and cites the case of Ishi, a lost-tribe survivor whose appearance in the early twentieth century caused much public discovery and allowed some major research. The case of Ishi has been well researched and adds a historical dimension to the fiction. The conclusion is satisfying and surprising, and the story is also a chapter in the romance of Gideon and Julie, who are looking forward to their future together at its end.

One of Elkins's main themes is the ambiguity of good and evil. This trait alone separates his works from the cozies, which usually provide a scapegoat villain whose removal will purge society and leave it healthy. Good and evil are inextricably bound in the Elkins novels, including this one, as they are in reality—the conclusion can be only partially a rebirth.

OLD BONES

Old Bones, the winner of the 1988 Edgar Award for the best mystery novel, links present and past in a multilayered tale of family deceit and violence. Set in France, it begins with the drowning of Resistance hero Guillaume de Rocher, who had called his family together at his home to discuss an important but unidentified issue. Shortly thereafter, some bones are discovered in the basement of the de Rocher residence, and Gideon Oliver is called in to examine them. He finds that the bones are from the World War II era, and it is believed that they were from a young man who also had a connection with the Resistance. More and more information turns up, leading to an old story of treachery and Nazi collaboration, which is linked to a murder in the present.

This novel has a complicated plot with many turns and red herrings; the outcome is satisfying if not totally surprising. The war in France, with its maze of loyalties and fears, betrayals and vengeance, is clearly one of Elkins's strong interests, as it is handled differently but equally effectively in Turncoat (2002).

TURNCOAT

Turncoat, one of Elkins's nonseries mystery novels, is a richly textured thriller with a background in World War II, like Old Bones. The story begins on the day President John F. Kennedy was killed, November 22, 1963, when the father of Lily, Pete Simon's French wife, turns up and is turned away rudely by his daughter. Shortly afterward Lily's father is killed, and Lily disappears. Trying to understand what happened, Pete pursues several leads about the past of his wife and her father. He finds himself in Europe investigating the Nazi horrors and the confusing aftermath of the war in France, when Resistance fighters tried to ferret out Nazi collaborators and punish them. Some of the collaborators fled to Spain, where Pete must go in search of the truth of this complex matter. The involvement of his wife's family in the war must be clarified before the tension can begin to be resolved and the villains and victims determined.

Turncoat intersperses tension with humor in an entertaining fashion; however, it also educates the reader about the aftermath of the war. Few modern readers know about the confusion that followed the war and the pursuit of collaborators that lasted until the amnesty in the 1950's pardoned all but the most involved and ruthless collaborators. Moreover the accounts of what it meant to be a collaborator or to be a member of the Resistance help sweep away stereotypes and oversimplifications.

GOOD BLOOD

In Good Blood (2004), Gideon Oliver and his wife, Julie, visit an island in Lake Maggiore, Italy, owned by the family of their good friend Phil. The action in this novel takes place partly in the town of Stresa and partly on the family island, where things have remained the same for a long time. When the padrone's son Achille is kidnapped and some old bones are found by a construction team, Gideon must uncover the sins of the past that have led to the current situation. Setting is powerfully depicted in this novel, and the Italian family structure is precisely sketched. The vivid snapshots of Stresa and the Lake Maggiore islands are interspersed with hard-hitting and tense action. Elkins's typical mixture of humor and drama permeate the story as Gideon follows his investigations to their conclusion. Once again good and evil are intertwined, so that there is no scapegoat but rather a realistic conclusion.

Janet McCann

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

GIDEON OLIVER SERIES: Fellowship of Fear, 1982; The Dark Place, 1983; Murder in the Queen's Armes, 1985; A Deceptive Clarity, 1987; Old Bones, 1987; Curses!, 1989; Icy Clutches, 1990; Make No Bones, 1991; Dead Men's Hearts, 1994; Twenty Blue

Devils, 1997; Skeleton Dance, 2000; Good Blood, 2004; Where There's a Will, 2005; Unnatural Selection, 2006; Little Tiny Teeth, 2007

CHRIS NORGREN SERIES: A Deceptive Clarity, 1987; A Glancing Light, 1991; Old Scores, 1993

LEE OFSTED SERIES (WITH CHARLOTTE ELKINS): Wicked Slice, 1989; Rotten Lies, 1995; Nasty Breaks, 1997; The Golf Mystery, 2003; Where Have All the Birdies Gone?, 2004; On the Fringe, 2005

NONSERIES NOVELS: Loot, 1999; Turncoat, 2002

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Brunsdale, Mitzi M. Gumshoes: A Dictionary of Fictional Detectives. Greenwood Press, 2006. A thick, well-researched book with articles centering on the detectives. Includes Gideon Oliver as well as lists of mystery awards and other information for research.

Elkins, Aaron. "Douglas Owsley." Smithsonian 36, no. 8 (November, 2005): 105-106. The author profiles a forensic anthropologist who is studying Kennewick man. Sheds light on where Elkins may get some of his ideas and scientific knowledge.

_____. "Have Contract, Will Travel." The Armchair Detective 27, no. 2 (1995): 200-205. This essay on how Elkins uses his travel experience in his writing is especially useful for writers.

Elkins, Aaron, and Charlotte Elkins. "Charlotte and Aaron Elkins: A Marriage Shaped by Murder." Interview by Amanda Smith. Publishers Weekly 242, no. 48 (November 27, 1995): 47-48. Interview looks at the collaborative process, Charlotte's love of golf, and how their marriage works.

Genge, Ngaire. The Forensic Casebook: The Science of Crime Scene Investigation. New York: Ballantine Books, 2002. This reference work includes many true-crime stories. Provides an understanding of what forensic anthropologists such as the fictional Gideon Oliver do.

Pederson, Jay P., ed. St. James Guide to Crime and Mystery Writers. Detroit, Mich.: St. James Press, 1996. This guide covers 650 English-language writers of the crime and mystery genre. Contains solid material on the genre and its practitioners, including Aaron Elkins. Biographical and critical material are provided as well as bibliographies.

Schulze, Sydney. "Gideon Oliver: Skeleton Detective of America." Clues 13, no. 1 (1992): 81-89. An informative essay on the development and characteristics of Gideon Oliver throughout the series.

STANLEY ELLIN

Born: Brooklyn, New York; October 6, 1916

Died: Brooklyn, New York; July 31, 1986

Types of plot: Private investigator; psychological; thriller; amateur sleuth

PRINCIPAL SERIES

John Milano, 1979-1983

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

JOHN MILANO, a private investigator, is single, in his mid-thirties, cosmopolitan in his general awareness but decidedly ethnic in his deeper sensibilities, particularly in the self-assured, quiet pride he takes in his New York Catholic, Italian American heritage. Milano is a keen observer, particularly of the quirks in human nature. He views society with a general hopefulness, although it is tinged with cynicism. He combines a strong sense of professional integrity with an active social conscience.

CONTRIBUTION

Indisputably a master of plot structure in both the short story and the novel, Stanley Ellin is more highly regarded by many critics for the ingenious imagination at work in his short fiction. His mystery novels, however, have a wide and loyal following, and it is in his novels that Ellin most effectively demonstrates his opposition to the view that crime fiction is at best merely escapist fare. Ellin identifies not only with Dashiell Hammett, Raymond Chandler, Agatha Christie, and Arthur Conan Doyle but also with Fyodor Dostoevski and William Faulkner, who also dealt with the theme of crime and punishment. Ellin simultaneously works within and transcends the traditional formulas of mystery and crime detection, creating, quite simply, serious fiction on the problem of evil—in all of its psychological complexity.

BIOGRAPHY

Stanley Bernard Ellin was born on October 6, 1916, in the Bath Beach section of Brooklyn, New York, the son of Louis Ellin and Rose Mandel Ellin. He was an only child, and his parents were intensely devoted to him and to each other. His childhood was extremely happy, and his parents served as excellent role models, approaching life with simplicity and integrity.

Ellin was a bright and somewhat precocious student. After graduation from New Utrecht High School, he attended Brooklyn College, where he edited and wrote for the school literary magazine. He was graduated, at nineteen, in 1936, during the height of the Depression. Following graduation, he worked as a dairy farm manager, a junior college teacher, a magazine salesperson and distributor, a boilermaker's apprentice, and a steelworker. In 1937, he married Jeanne Michael, a freelance editor and former classmate. They had one child. Although he tried unsuccessfully to sell his fiction during the difficult years of the Depression, he had, not unhappily, reconciled himself to a career as a shipyard and construction worker.

After a short stint in the Army at the end of World War II, Ellin saw his literary fortunes change. Discharged in 1946, he decided once again to attempt a career as a writer. Combining his veteran's unemployment allowance with his wife's editing income, Ellin became a full-time writer. His first published short story, "The Specialty of the House," appeared in 1948 in Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine and won the Ellery Queen Award for the best first story of that year. Also in 1948, Simon and Schuster published his first novel, Dreadful Summit. Altogether, Ellin published fourteen novels and four collections of short stories. He was a three-time winner of the Mystery Writers of America's Edgar Allan Poe Award, twice for short stories in 1955 and 1957, and in 1959 for his novel The Eighth Circle (1958). In 1974, the French edition of Mirror, Mirror on the Wall (1972) won Le Grand Prix de Littérature Policière. In 1981, Ellin received the Mystery Writers of America's Grand Master Award. With the exception of some travel abroad and some time spent in Miami Beach, Ellin lived all of his life in Brooklyn, where he died at Kings County Hospital of complications following a stroke, on July 31, 1986.

ANALYSIS

Although generally acknowledged as a master of the well-constructed plot, Stanley Ellin actually placed considerably greater emphasis on the value of characterization. In a brief essay titled "Inside the Mystery Novel," published in the 1982 edition of The Writer's Handbook, Ellin offers what is for him the basic principle of fiction writing: "Plot is the skeleton, characterization the flesh, everything else the clothing." He further states that there are two vital elements in "putting the story across": "the characterization of the protagonist—demonstrated in his pursuit of his goal—and the ambience of the locales through which he moves." Although the plot is undoubtedly essential, it is the center of attention for the literary critic rather than for the reader, and as Ellin indicates, its failure is far more notable than its success:

[The author] must provide a plot for his story that makes dramatic sense, but if he achieves this, he will not be judged by it. If, however, he totally fails to construct a sound plot, he will be judged by it in very unkind terms.

DREADFUL SUMMIT

In his first novel, Dreadful Summit, Ellin illustrates these precepts. The plot is relatively simple: A bartender is taunted and sadistically beaten by a customer. His teenage son witnesses the beating and determines to avenge his father's (and his own) humiliation. Focusing on the development of the teenage protagonist, Ellin creates a three-dimensional character whose youthful sense of responsibility is distorted by the emotional effects of profound humiliation and the desire for vengeance. The result is an admirable study of adolescent psychology, a story in which a Dostoevskian protagonist struggles with and is all but overwhelmed by impulsive and destructive vindictiveness.

THE KEY TO NICHOLAS STREET AND STRONGHOLD

In his second novel, The Key to Nicholas Street (1952), Ellin expands beyond the concentration on a central protagonist to a narrative of shifting viewpoints, revealing how five characters are variously affected when the woman next door is found dead at the bottom of her cellar stairs. Once again the mechanism of the plot, although expertly contrived, is subtly overshadowed by intriguing characterization. Ellin takes a similar approach to group characterization in Mirror, Mirror on the Wall, in which he explores psychosexual areas relatively new to the mystery novel, and in Stronghold (1975), the story of four escaped convicts, the two women they hold hostage, and the father and son-in-law who fight for the women's freedom. Stronghold, however, is somewhat flawed by its breadth of characterization; it is clearly a novel that needs an effective center, a central protagonist to provide the core of strength, integrity, and sanity through which the actions of such a diversified array of personalities could be more effectively analyzed and interpreted.

THE EIGHTH CIRCLE

Ellin does provide such a protagonist in The Eighth Circle, his third novel and the first to introduce the private investigator as central figure. Murray Kirk is a private eye unlike any of his predecessors in the genre. A disillusioned lawyer who joins Frank Conmy's detective agency as a trainee operative, Kirk soon finds success as a gumshoe; he also puts the agency on a sound fiscal footing, expanding and increasing its efficiency. As the novel opens, Frank Conmy has died and Kirk is in control of Conmy and Kirk. Conmy, however, almost constantly in Kirk's thoughts, maintains a shadowy presence in the novel as father figure and alter ego. Kirk has even taken over Conmy's Manhattan apartment and continues to weigh his daily decisions and actions under the influence of his deceased partner.

The Eighth Circle is on the surface a conventional New York detective story, complete with the requisite illegal gambling and bookmaking operations, police corruption, and politically ambitious district attorney. Yet, on another level, it is a philosophical novel, in which Kirk and his interior ghost of Frank Conmy reflect on such diverse questions as social strata and the effects of the Great Depression on the common person. At heart, Kirk is a cynic, but his self-assurance and personal integrity are unwavering. The world in which he operates is Dante's "eighth circle," the bottom of Hell, populated by pimps, panderers, seducers, sycophants, grafters, thieves, and liars. The Eighth Circle, however, is not without humor, an often-overlooked attribute of Ellin's work. Ellin is particularly adept at portraying social pretensions, and nowhere in his work is he more effective or more entertaining than in The Eighth Circle when a wealthy crime boss, who has left the Lower East Side without having it leave him, offers his philosophy of fine wines and how to select them.

STAR LIGHT, STAR BRIGHT

Many of Ellin's more ardent followers regret that Murray Kirk did not make an appearance in subsequent books. The Kirk characterization is transformed, however, and finally reemerges as John Milano in Star Light, Star Bright (1979) and in The Dark Fantastic (1983). Like Kirk, Milano is an ace detective, highly proficient in observation and deduction. He is also a tougher, more physically formidable version of Kirk. It is difficult to imagine Milano taking the kind of beating that little Billy Caxton, the former bantamweight, gives to Murray Kirk in The Eighth Circle. In the opening pages of Star Light, Star Bright, Milano disarms a fence who has assisted him in recovering stolen property but who also has a flair for extortion at gunpoint, teaching him in emphatic terms that one does not "change the rules in the middle of the game." He is also known and respected by other characters in the novel, who are aware of how he effectively persuaded Frankie Kurtz, the physically abusive manager of an actress, to take up another line of work. In the course of their professional relationship, the actress and Milano have become lovers, although she still fears Kurtz and his "muscle." Milano's solution to the problem is coldly precise in its evident logic:

As for the muscle, I came to the conclusion . . . that my girl must be made to understand that Frankie wasn't the only one ready and willing to use it. It took a little doing to get him up to that Chelsea flat, and with Sharon cowering against its locked door, to provide her with the necessary bloody demonstration.

This side of Milano's character is clearly a throwback to the hard-boiled approach reminiscent of Hammett's Sam Spade. Nevertheless, Milano is not simply a thug opting for the physical solution. Like Murray Kirk, he is a man of high integrity; he is incorruptible, relaxed and at ease at any level of society. Above all, he is a realist, fully aware that his New York, like Kirk's, is the "eighth circle," and he deals with it accordingly. Unlike Kirk, Milano is the consummate realist, with little time or inclination for introspection or cynicism.

VERY OLD MONEY

In addition to his work in the private investigator subgenre, Ellin wrote a collection of densely plotted thrillers that follow a similar pattern: A young man, down on his luck, becomes involved with people of wealth and power who are using him to further some nefarious end. Control of an estate or legacy is frequently the objective. Following this pattern are House of Cards (1967), The Valentine Estate (1968), The Bind (1970), and The Luxembourg Run (1977). Very Old Money (1985) is the final entry in the group, offering a slight variation on the theme: The hapless "young man" becomes a married couple, unemployed schoolteachers hired as domestics to work in a large and mysterious mansion in Manhattan. In two of the novels in this group, the protagonist is a former athlete: Chris Monte, a former Wimbledon champion, in The Valentine Estate, and Reno Davis, a former heavyweight boxer, in House of Cards.

HOUSE OF CARDS

The design of House of Cards is a fairy-tale motif, in which a knight-errant, Davis, risks all to save a beautiful princess, Anne de Villemont, from the Parisian mansion where she and her nine-year-old son, Paul, are being held captive. Anne is independently wealthy, but her former husband's family is slowly but steadily drawing on her funds to finance a fascist overthrow of the world's democratic governments. Davis rescues the distressed Anne, initiating a chase by train, boat, and car over most of France and at least half of Italy. It is no surprise to readers of Ellin that Davis ultimately rescues the lady, retrieves her son, and aborts the entire world revolution. It is one of Ellin's strong points as a writer of suspense thrillers that he effectively renders situations that defy credulity eminently believable.

Richard Keenan

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

JOHN MILANO SERIES: Star Light, Star Bright, 1979; The Dark Fantastic, 1983

NONSERIES NOVELS: Dreadful Summit, 1948 (also known as The Big Night); The Key to Nicholas Street, 1952; The Eighth Circle, 1958; The Winter After This Summer, 1960; The Panama Portrait, 1962; House of Cards, 1967; The Valentine Estate, 1968; The Bind, 1970 (also known as The Man from Nowhere); Mirror; Mirror on the Wall, 1972; Stronghold, 1975; The Luxembourg Run, 1977; Very Old Money, 1985

OTHER SHORT FICTION: Mystery Stories, 1956 (also known as Quiet Horror and The Specialty of the House, and Other Tales); The Blessington Method, and Other Strange Tales, 1964; Kindly Dig Your Grave, and Other Wicked Stories, 1975; The Specialty of the House, and Other Stories: The Complete Mystery Tales, 1948-1978, 1979

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

SCREENPLAY: The Big Night, 1951 (with Joseph Losey, Hugo Butler, and Ring Lardner, Jr.)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Barzun, J., and W. H. Taylor. Introduction to The Key to Nicholas Street. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1952. This introduction to one of Ellin's earliest novels places it in the context of contemporary work.

Horsley, Lee. The Noir Thriller. New York: Palgrave, 2001. Scholarly, theoretically informed study of the thriller genre. Includes discussion of Ellin's Dreadful Summit.

Keating, H. R. F., ed. Whodunit? A Guide to Crime, Suspense, and Spy Fiction. New York: Van Nostrand Reinhold, 1982. Examination of generic conventions that helps one understand Ellin's work in terms of those conventions.

Panek, Leroy Pad. An Introduction to the Detective Story. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1987. This history of the detective story contains a brief mention of Ellin.

Penzler, Otto. Introduction to The Eighth Circle. New York: Random House, 1958. Discussion of Ellin's work by the editor of The Armchair Detective and proprietor of New York City's Mysterious Bookshop.

JAMES ELLROY

Lee Earle Ellroy

Born: Los Angeles, California; March 4, 1948

Types of plot: Hard-boiled; police procedural; private investigator; inverted

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Lloyd Hopkins trilogy, 1984-1986

L.A. quartet, 1987-1992

American Underworld trilogy/Underworld USA trilogy, 1995-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

LLOYD HOPKINS is a Los Angeles Police Department detective in his forties. Blessed with a brilliant mind and a natural instinct for investigative work, Hopkins enjoys his job but hates music because it disrupts his thought processes. An imposing physical specimen, he is highly protective of women. Because of his special intuitive talents, he is typically assigned to match wits with repeat criminals, such as serial killers and bank robbers. Hopkins is not averse to using extreme violence in the course of bringing his opponents to justice.

DUDLEY LIAM SMITH is an Irish detective who rises into the upper echelons of the Los Angeles Police Department between the late 1930's and the late 1950's. A soft-spoken man with a large vocabulary, he is in the habit of calling junior officers "Lad." Smith, a corrupt manipulator, works from within law enforcement to secure financial and political power for himself. He ruthlessly eliminates impediments by playing off legal and criminal elements against one another. A racist with a particular antipathy for African Americans, Smith engineers drug heists, murders, blackmail and extortion schemes, pornography rings, and other malfeasance while pursuing his own objectives. Smith, introduced in Clandestine (1982), appears in three of the four books of the L.A. quartet.

WAYNE TEDROW, JR., is a young police officer with the Las Vegas force in the early 1960's to early 1970's. While carrying out a chain of dubious assignments, he becomes enmeshed with mobsters, mogul Howard Hughes, the Ku Klux Klan, J. Edgar Hoover, the Kennedy clan, Richard Nixon, and other real and imaginary characters during a volatile time. Tedrow appears in the latter two books of the American Underworld/Underworld USA trilogy.

CONTRIBUTION

James Ellroy's first hard-boiled novel, Brown's Requiem (1981), and his first series, the Lloyd Hopkins trilogy (1984-1986), were set in the present. Of varying quality when viewed through the perspective of time, these novels sold well and established two of the author's characteristics: a pessimistic outlook blended with romanticism and shocking violence mixed with dark humor. In the years that followed, Ellroy was recognized for his skill in resurrecting the feel of postwar Los Angeles. The Black Dahlia (1987), a fictionalized account of a genuine, still-unsolved 1947 murder, launched his best-selling noir-flavored L.A. quartet.

Beginning with American Tabloid (1995), Ellroy has moved beyond the confines of Southern California. His American Underworld/Underworld USA trilogy forges creative links between real and imagined figures connected to crimes surrounding major historical events of the 1960's and 1970's.

Since Ellroy arrived on the literary scene, his novels have been critically acclaimed for the author's innate, if quirky, storytelling abilities. The novels have been commercially successful as well: Six Ellroy works have been made into well-received motion pictures, and several others are potentially forthcoming.

Though his plots have become more intricate, Ellroy's real concern has always been the contradictory nature of character. He closely examines the evils that good people do in the pursuit of justice and the good hidden in the worst of society's inhabitants. His insights into criminal behavior, his intricate plotting, his ear for dialogue, and his stripped-down, rhythmic prose have lifted Ellroy into an elite class: one of only a few modern crime writers whose work transcends genre and approaches literature.

BIOGRAPHY

James Ellroy was born Lee Earle Ellroy on March 4, 1948, in Los Angeles, the son of Armand Ellroy, a part-time accountant and full-time anti-Semite, and Geneva Odelia "Jean" Hilliker Ellroy, a registered nurse. Ellroy's parents, married in 1940, were divorced in 1954. His mother, reputedly a promiscuous alcoholic, was granted custody and moved with her son to El Monte, then a working-class suburb.

A defining moment of young Ellroy's life occurred on June 22, 1958, when his mother was found murdered. Afterward, James lived with his father, who inspired the future writer with a birthday gift: a written history of the Los Angeles Police Department, which the boy studied. An obsessive reader, Ellroy fed his habit by frequenting libraries and stealing crime, detective, and mystery fiction from bookstores.

Ellroy attended largely Jewish Fairfax High School but was expelled in 1965 after parroting his father's Nazi philosophy. He joined the U.S. Army but quickly realized he was not military material. After faking a stutter, he soon received a general discharge. Ellroy's father died shortly after his son returned home.

For a time, Ellroy lived on the streets, surviving by shoplifting and burglary. He drank, used drugs, and squatted in deserted houses. Between 1965 and 1977, Ellroy was arrested many times for intoxication, theft, and trespassing. Convicted of numerous offenses, he spent eight months in jail. After his release, he held menial jobs, such as passing out flyers and working as a mailroom clerk and a cashier at a pornographic bookstore. He continued to drink and abuse nasal inhalers. After contracting pneumonia and suffering paranoid delusions, Ellroy submitted to treatment, achieving a measure of sobriety by 1975. He found steady work as a caddy at golf and country clubs and, following intensive sessions at Alcoholics Anonymous, began writing.

Ellroy's first novel, Brown's Requiem, a semi-autobiographical crime novel in the Raymond Chandler style, revolves around Fritz Brown, a former police officer and recovering alcoholic who has become a private eye. Brown is sucked into a world of arson, extortion, and pornography after being hired to follow a caddy's sister. Ellroy's follow-up novel, Clandestine (1982), in which a former police officer relentlessly pursues the killer of a former lover, was nominated for an Edgar Award.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

James Ellroy. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Since his debut, Ellroy has turned out a steady stream of hard-hitting crime novels. He began to hit his stride with the Lloyd Hopkins trilogy (Blood on the Moon, 1984; Because the Night, 1984; and Suicide Hill, 1986) and quit caddying in 1984 to write full time. After a disturbing side trip, the first-person narrative of a serial killer, Killer on the Road (1986), Ellroy began the L.A. quartet (The Black Dahlia, 1987; The Big Nowhere, 1988; L.A. Confidential, 1990; and White Jazz, 1992), which brought him national and international prominence. The Big Nowhere garnered the 1990 Prix Mystère Award. L.A. Confidential was made into an Academy Award-winning film in 1997, The Black Dahlia became a film in 2006, and White Jazz was optioned for development.

Between 1993 and 2004, Ellroy contributed fictional and nonfictional pieces to GQ magazine. These were collected in such volumes as Hollywood Nocturnes (1994), Crime Wave: Reportage and Fiction from the Underside of L.A. (1999), and Breakneck Pace (2000; an electronic book known during auction as Widespread Panic). His GQ piece "My Mother's Killer" was expanded into his memoir-cum-nonfictional murder investigation chronicle, My Dark Places: An L.A. Crime Memoir (1996).

Ellroy's American Underworld/Underground USA trilogy postulates that manipulations among mobsters, governmental agencies, and political action groups were behind major national events of the late 1950's through the early 1970's, including the John F. Kennedy and Martin Luther King, Jr., assassinations.

Twice married and divorced (from Mary Doherty and Helen Knode), James Ellroy in 2005 moved from New Canaan, Connecticut, to Los Angeles.

ANALYSIS

James Ellroy's earliest works represent his attempt to come to grips with crimes of the sort that touched his life—especially the murder of his mother and his own antisocial behavior after the death of his father—and his efforts to find his voice as a writer. The Chandler homage, Brown's Requiem, and the thinly disguised initial exploration of his mother's murder in Clandestine are manifestations of a talented writer's growing pains while settling on topics worthy of exploration and developing the proper perspective and tone in the telling. He rapidly learned his craft in making the transition from novice to author of stature.

With the publication of Blood on the Moon, the first entry in his Lloyd Hopkins trilogy, Ellroy discovered the value of series characters. In The Black Dahlia, the first novel in his L.A. quartet, he found his niche as a fictional chronicler of the recent past. In American Tabloid (1995), the opening salvo in his American Underworld/Underground USA series, he broadened his horizons from local to international events.

An outspoken fan of the Los Angeles Police Department, Ellroy does not always portray the force in a favorable light. Especially in the Hopkins and L.A. quartet novels, he details the legwork, procedures, and collaborative efforts necessary to solve crimes and unravel the overarching mystery. Solutions to baffling puzzles follow a crooked rather than a straight line, and truths are hidden under layers of subterfuge.

From the beginning, Ellroy has exhibited skill in drawing fully rounded characters that blur the lines between hero and villain. In later novels, his fictional creations interact with historical personalities. Virtually all of Ellroy's crime solvers are professionals: current or former police officers or deputies, former agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) or Central Intelligence Agency, often depicted as brilliant in their ability to make leaps of deduction. Antagonists—mafia bosses, corrupt politicians, thugs, criminal masterminds, and rogue police officers—are devious, vicious, and determined. The combatants are capable of anything in the pursuit of their goals.

Ellroy frequently incorporates newspaper clippings or other documents to aid narrative flow or to provide information that could not be included by other means. He has generally eschewed extensive use of literary pyrotechnics, such as simile or metaphor. Though there are occasional mildly amusing set pieces and instances of broad parody, Ellroy cannot truly be called a humorous writer. His style has become more clipped and staccato over time; his language is pared to its essence, and sentences are often reduced to fragments. His slangy, pungent, and profane dialogue relentlessly propels his narrative forward in a manner that is both distinctive and compulsively readable.

Ellroy's works have grown panoramic in scale and epic in length. Complex stories may involve dozens of characters and play out over weeks, months, or years. He deals with a full range of crimes, from corruption in high places to perversion and from robbery to murder. He constantly reminds readers that extreme violence and its corroding influence are just a heartbeat away.

BLOOD ON THE MOON

Part thriller, part police procedural, part psychological study, Blood on the Moon (1984) follows the paths of two disparate individuals who must inevitably collide. The first is Teddy Verplanck, a weakling and would-be poet who is raped by a bullying classmate. Unhinged by the experience, Teddy reshapes himself into an efficient killing machine. Over fifteen years, he murders a succession of young women by a variety of methods to avoid detection. Teddy commemorates each crime by sending roses and anonymous poems to his beloved, a beauty from his former high school with whom he has long been secretly infatuated. The second individual is Lloyd Hopkins. A National Guardsman about to enter the police academy, Hopkins undergoes his baptism of blood during the Watts riot of 1965. By the time he catches on to the pattern of Teddy's crimes, Hopkins—assisted by Captain Arthur “Dutch” Pelz, Hopkins's mentor, surrogate father, and loyal disciple—has risen to detective sergeant, meanwhile gaining a reputation for his genius in solving difficult cases. The suspenseful novel intertwines the movements of the two men as they spiral toward a final, violent confrontation.

L.A. CONFIDENTIAL

A dense neo-noir novel, evocative of the 1950's, L.A. Confidential connects panoplies of crimes to a single horrific event: a mass murder in a late-night diner. The complicated, multilayered story is told through the perspectives of three vastly different officers in the Los Angeles Police Department. Ed Exley is an educated, ambitious officer, eager to surpass the legacy left by his father, a former police officer who became a wealthy construction magnate. Jack “Trashcan” Vincennes is a sleazy vice officer who accepts bribes from a scandal magazine to dig up dirt on Hollywood celebrities. Wendell “Bud” White, who as a child watched his father beat his mother to death, is a brutal officer who explodes into violence whenever he witnesses abuse of women.

Though initially working at cross-purposes, the three officers form an uneasy alliance to pool their special skills in unraveling a tangled skein of crimes. In the course of pursuing seemingly unrelated events that lead to intertwined conspiracies, they uncover perversions of the rich and famous, gangland schemes, and widespread corruption among political and police officials.

Richly textured and well-paced, steeped in the prejudices of the times, and populated with a wealth of fascinating secondary characters—including the slippery, Machiavellian Dudley Smith—L.A. Confidential is one of Ellroy's most accessible and popular novels.

AMERICAN TABLOID

A sprawling novel that encompasses the years 1958 to 1963, American Tabloid is the first volume in the American Underworld/Underworld USA trilogy. The novel is structured similarly to L.A. Confidential in that it is presented through the eyes of three main characters. Pete Bondurant, a former Los Angeles County deputy sheriff, is now a hit man and Howard Hughes employee. FBI special agent Kemper Boyd is a J. Edgar Hoover confidant and troubleshooter. Ward Littell, another FBI agent, is assigned to infiltrate the Communist Party of the United States.

The three men are sometimes separate, sometimes combined, as pawns in a power struggle among the mob, politicians, government agencies, unions, and other powerful forces that covertly and overtly engineer elections, invasions, and assassinations. Massive, convoluted, yet plausible, American Tabloid is one of Ellroy's most accomplished works.

MY DARK PLACES

My Dark Places is Ellroy's attempt to finally put the ghost of his murdered mother to rest. Divided into four sections, the book explores the crime and its aftereffects from the perspectives of the victim, survivors, law enforcement, and possible culprits. In the final section, Ellroy details his work with the original investigating officer, retired detective Bill Stoner, as they minutely reexamine original evidence from the case in a fruitless effort to identify viable suspects.

A fascinating study of police procedure, My Dark Places also provides a revealing glimpse into the author's psyche and troubled early life.

Jack Ewing

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

LLOYD HOPKINS TRILOGY: Blood on the Moon, 1984; Because the Night, 1984; Suicide Hill, 1986

L.A. QUARTET SERIES: The Black Dahlia, 1987; The Big Nowhere, 1988; L.A. Confidential, 1990; White Jazz, 1992

AMERICAN UNDERWORLD/UNDERWORLD USA TRILOGY: American Tabloid, 1995; The Cold Six Thousand, 2001

NONSERIES NOVELS: Brown's Requiem, 1981; Clandestine, 1982; Killer on the Road, 1986 (also known as Silent Terror)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

SHORT FICTION: Hollywood Nocturnes, 1994 (also known as Dick Contino's Blues); Crime Wave: Reportage and Fiction from the Underside of L.A., 1999; Destination: Morgue!, 2004

NONFICTION: Murder and Mayhem: More than Seventy-five Case Histories of Heinous Crimes, 1991; My Dark Places: An L.A. Crime Memoir, 1996

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ellroy, James. "My Mother and the Dahlia." Virginia Quarterly Review 82, no. 3 (Summer, 2006): 213-222. Ellroy talks about his mother and her death and how he conceptualized The Black Dahlia based on his feelings about his mother.

Farley, Terry McCarthy. "James Ellroy Confidential."

Time 157, no. 20 (May 21, 2001): 89-91. A profile of Ellroy that examines his opinions on American culture and politics in the 1960's. Also deals with his feelings about his mother's death.

Grobel, Lawrence. Endangered Species: Writers Talk About Their Craft, Their Visions, Their Lives. Cambridge, Mass.: Da Capo Press, 2001. A collection of essays and interviews conducted with a dozen authors, including a lengthy, revealing conversation with Ellroy.

Haut, Woody. Heartbreak and Vine: The Fate of Hard-boiled Writers in Hollywood. London: Serpent's Tail, 2002. An examination of the experiences of living and deceased authors who have worked with the film industry in Hollywood, including Ellroy. Indexed with filmography.

_____. Neon Noir: Contemporary American Crime Fiction. London: Serpent's Tail, 1999. The story of American crime fiction and related films as told through the work of such writers as Ellroy. Indexed with filmography.

Jakubowski, Maxim, ed. One Hundred Great Detectives: Or, The Detective Directory. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1993. A collection of essays that includes an appreciation of Ellroy's multifaceted creation, Dudley Smith.

Silet, Charles L. P. Talking Murder: Interviews with Twenty Mystery Writers. New York: W. W. Norton, 1999. In one chapter of this work, Silet, an interviewer for Mystery Scene and Armchair Detective, talks with Ellroy about his work and his life.

Terr, Lenore. Unchained Memories: True Stories of Traumatic Memories, Lost and Found. New York: Basic Books, 1995. A psychological study of five cases of repressed memory, including a chapter about the effect of his mother's murder on Ellroy. Indexed.

LOREN D. ESTLEMAN

Born: Ann Arbor, Michigan; September 15, 1952

Types of plot: Private investigator; hard-boiled; historical; inverted

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Amos Walker, 1980-
Peter Macklin, 1984-
Detroit, 1990-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

AMOS WALKER is a rugged, ruffled Detroit private investigator. The divorced loner is a tough guy amused by his toughness. He cannot resist a witty comeback no matter what the circumstances. Walker is also a Vietnam War veteran, though his memories of the war and military metaphors play a less significant role as the series progresses. He hates hypocrisy but is less cynical than he pretends to be. His creator has said that Walker has an instinct for survival rivaling that of Bugs Bunny. As the series progresses, he becomes less cocky and more world-weary.

PETER MACKLIN is freelance professional assassin operating out of Detroit. He tries to retire and ease into domestic life but cannot seem to separate himself from violence. Macklin is a vaguer character than Walker because blandness is an excellent cover for his work.

CONTRIBUTION

Loren D. Estleman is one of the most stylish followers of the hard-boiled detective tradition invented by Dashiell Hammett, refined by Raymond Chandler, and imitated by hundreds of others. Although many hard-boiled detective-fiction writers strain for effect or lapse into parodies of the genre, Estleman is rarely self-conscious, allowing the colorful descriptions and humorous quips to emerge from the characters and situations rather than being clumsily imposed on his material.

Detroit and its environs are even more central to Estleman's fiction than to that of fellow Michigan native Elmore Leonard, to whom he is often compared. In all three of his series, Estleman portrays the city as an urban playground for decay and violence. Amos Walker's nostalgia for the past is in part a reaction to what has happened to a once-great city. Estleman treats Detroit inhabitants more sympathetically than he does the spoiled, even more dangerous folks who have fled to the affluent suburbs. Just as it is difficult to imagine Hammett without San Francisco and Chandler without Los Angeles, Estleman owns the Motor City.

Estleman's many awards include American Mystery Awards from Mystery Scene Magazine for Downriver (1988) and Whiskey River (1990) and four Shamus Awards from the Private Eye Writers of America for Sugartown (1984) and the short stories "Eight Mile and Dequindre" (1984), "The Crooked Way" (1988), and "Lady on Ice" (2003), and he was twice named Outstanding Mystery Writer of the Year by Popular Fiction Monthly. He was honored by the Michigan Foundation of the Arts in 1987 and received the Michigan Author Award from the Michigan Library Association in 1997. He earned several other honors for his Western fiction. Estleman received an honorary doctorate from Eastern Michigan University in 2002.

BIOGRAPHY

Loren D. Estleman was born in Ann Arbor, Michigan, on September 15, 1952, to Leauvett Charles Estleman, a truck driver, and Louise Milankovich Estleman, a postal clerk. He grew up in an 1867 farmhouse whose upper floor, including his bedroom, was unheated. He began submitting short stories to publications when he was fifteen and received 160 rejections over the next eight years. After his father became disabled, Estleman's mother went to work to support the family. To reduce expenses, Estleman commuted to Eastern Michigan University, majoring in English and journalism. After graduating in 1974, he worked as a police-beat reporter and editor for the Ypsilanti Press; Community Foto-News in Pinckney, Michigan; Ann Arbor News; and Dexter Leader until becoming a full-time fiction writer in 1980.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Loren Estleman in 1999. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Estleman's early novels include two Sherlock Holmes pastiches, but he found his true voice when he began the Amos Walker series. As a reporter, he spent considerable time with police officers, absorbing their jargon and learning the rhythms of their speech, which he puts to excellent use in his fiction. Estleman had long been fascinated by the criminal world. His Austrian-born grandmother was an acquaintance of Al Capone through frequenting gambling casinos.

Estleman eventually settled in Whitmore Lake, Michigan. He married Carole Ann Ashley, a marketing and public relations specialist, on September 5, 1987, was divorced in 1990, and married mystery and Western writer Deborah Morgan, a descendant of an outlaw in the famous Dalton gang, in 1993.

Estleman has reviewed books for several newspapers, including The New York Times and The Washing- ton Post. He has said that his favorite writers are Edgar Allan Poe, Jack London, Edith Wharton, W. Somerset Maugham, Ernest Hemingway, and Raymond Chandler. The influences of Chandler, Hemingway, Poe, and London are apparent throughout his work.

ANALYSIS

Loren D. Estleman's Amos Walker is a fish out of water, someone who might have been much more comfortable practicing his trade in the 1940's and 1950's, when morality was less ambiguous, than in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. He smokes, drinks, winds down by listening to jazz singer Anita O'Day, and watches George Sanders as the Falcon on television. Walker is bemused when he encounters a twenty-five-year-old receptionist who does not recognize the name Al Capone.

The city where Walker lives is central to his life; Estleman has said that the detective would be only half a character without Detroit. The Walker series gives a complex view of Detroit and its suburbs, presenting drug dealers, prostitutes, pornographers, automotive executives, television personalities, bounty hunters, killers of police officers, reporters, politicians, and jazz singers.

Although racial tensions are important in Estleman's fiction, the author is equally concerned with the class differences between the wealthy who have abandoned the city and those left behind who simply want to live what passes for normal lives. Anyone who exploits these people, from dirty police officers to corrupt politicians, is a target of the writer's ire. Though Estleman uses crime as a metaphor for the ills of society, he keeps sociology simmering in the background, never letting it overshadow his plots and characters.

Although the roughhewn Walker could easily be on the other side of the law, hit man Peter Macklin is successful at his work because he seems so ordinary. Macklin finds himself encountering terrorists in Kill Zone (1984), guards a television evangelist in Any Man's Death (1986), and becomes the target of another killer in Roses Are Dead (1986).

Originally planned as a trilogy, the Detroit series looks at the city's flamboyant history during the early twentieth century in Thunder City (1999), the 1920's and 1930's in Whiskey River (1990), the 1940's in Jitterbug (1998), the 1950's in Edsel (1995), the 1960's in Motown (1991), the 1970's in Stress (1996), and the 1990's in King of the Corner (1993). The topics range from labor unions to organized crime to racism in the police department to the origins of the automobile industry, with a few characters appearing in more than one novel. Estleman uses the city to embody the promise of the American Dream and those who find the quest unattainable.

Estleman's fiction is crammed with popular-culture references, particularly to films. Everyone from Willie Best, the black character actor of the 1930's and 1940's, to Fred Astaire is mentioned. A house in Birmingham, Michigan, is said to resemble the Mount Rushmore residence of James Mason in Alfred Hitchcock's North by Northwest (1959), a hint that danger lurks there. The framed, original Casablanca (1942) poster in Walker's office lets readers know he is a tough guy with a romantic, even sentimental streak.

King of the Corner features a former relief pitcher for the Detroit Tigers, and Estleman's books frequently have references to the baseball team representing the best of the city's achievements. Hall of Fame outfielder Al Kaline, who played for the Tigers from 1953 to 1974, is an important touchstone for Estleman.

Estleman has written almost as much about the West as about crime and is equally acclaimed in that genre. Historical figures such as Buffalo Bill Cody, Will Bill Hickok, and Pat Garrett appear frequently in his Westerns. His U.S. Marshal Page Murdock series resembles his mysteries with its colorful characters and snappy dialogue.

DOWNRIVER

Considered one of the best in the Walker series, Downriver finds the detective hired by former convict Richard DeVries, who has just completed a twenty-year sentence. During the 1967 Detroit riot, DeVries threw a firebomb while an armored-car robbery was taking place nearby. Framed for the robbery, he wants Walker to locate the $200,000 stolen during the heist, which he feels he deserves.

The trail leads Walker to an unlikely suspect, Alfred Hendriks, an executive with Marianne Motors. Hendriks, Walker discovers, is far from the only person involved in the case who is not exactly what he seems.

Downriver is one of the surprisingly few Estleman novels to involve the automotive industry for which Detroit is most famous. Estleman is sympathetic toward Timothy Marianne, who simply wants to put out a good product but finds himself surrounded by greedy manipulators. The climactic shoot-out inside Marianne's plant is one of Estleman's best action scenes.

WHISKEY RIVER

Whiskey River, the first title in the historical Detroit series, focuses on importing and selling liquor during the final years of Prohibition. Newspaperman Connie Minor, who appears in several Detroit titles and is an intimate of gangster Jack Dance, narrates the events from the perspective of 1939.

Minor uses this friendship and his inside knowledge to propel himself to prominence as a syndicated crime reporter. Minor even acts as Dance's go-between with the police, with whom he has an uneasy relationship. Dance emerges as a vivid, likable character because of the reporter's fondness for him. Minor may represent Estleman's ambivalent attitude toward the way reporters, police, and criminals intermingle.

A SMILE ON THE FACE OF THE TIGER

Many of the Walker books involve the detective's investigations of events in the past. In A Smile on the Face of the Tiger (2000), Walker is hired to find Eugene Booth, who long ago published Paradise Valley, a fictional account of a 1943 riot that left several African Americans dead. Booth agrees that Louise Starr can republish the book, changes his mind, and disappears. Walker tracks down Booth to discover the writer plans to create a new version of Paradise Valley revealing the truth about the role of the Detroit police in the riot. Booth is murdered, however, before he can complete his revision.

A Smile on the Face of the Tiger is notable for its colorful characters. The son of the artist who illustrated the covers of Booth's books, Lowell Birdsall, Jr., lives in an apartment full of 1950's memorabilia. Though she resides in a nursing home, Fleta Skirrett, a former model for the artist Birdsall, remains larger than life. Glad Eddie Cypress is a retired hit man on a bloody book tour for his autobiography. Through these characters, Estleman explores how the sins of the past live on in the present.

RETRO

Retro (2004) resembles A Smile on the Face of the Tiger in that Walker investigates an old crime involving racial issues. A dying madam hires Walker to find Delwayne, the illegitimate result of a 1949 affair between a black boxer and a white Hollywood starlet. Delwayne, a fugitive from an antiwar bombing case in the 1960's, is then murdered, just as his father was a half century earlier.

While evading the Mafia, Walker must sort through clues from three decades to piece together the truth. Walker learns that the same gun killed both father and son. Estleman excels at exploring the complicated ways in which racism continues to haunt the United States.

LITTLE BLACK DRESS

In Something Borrowed, Something Black (2002), Laurie Macklin thinks she has married a nice, quiet older man only to discover on their honeymoon that he is a retired assassin. In Little Black Dress (2005), she takes Peter Macklin to meet her mother, Pamela Ziegenthaler, who manages a chain bookstore in Toledo, Ohio.

Pamela's store is targeted by a gang of thieves intending to branch out from robbing video stores. Ironically, Pamela's new boyfriend, Ben Grinnell, whom she takes to be as dull as Laurie initially thought her husband, is the gang point man. Grinnell and Macklin quickly spot each other as outlaws, almost mirror images, and move warily through a slowly evolving predicament.

Such Macklin books are a departure for Estleman not only because they focus on a criminal but also because they show domestic life and criminal activity co-existing uneasily. Macklin does not like his obnoxious, bossy mother-in-law, but neither does he want to see her hurt. He has nothing against Grinnell, a fellow professional, but will stop him if necessary.

Little Black Dress, whose title refers to Laurie's sophisticated attire for a book signing at her mother's store, features more overt humor than in the Walker novels. There are colorful, though dangerous, crooks named Wild Bill and Mark Twain to show that the Wild West still lives on in the twenty-first century, and best-selling author Francis Spain is Estleman's satirical attack on those writers who manage to be successful without actually knowing how to write.

Michael Adams

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: Amos Walker: Motor City Blue, 1980; Angel Eyes, 1981; The Midnight Man, 1982; The Glass Highway, 1983; Sugartown, 1984; Every Brilliant Eye, 1985; Lady Yesterday, 1987; Downriver, 1988; General Murders: Ten Amos Walker Mysteries, 1988; Silent Thunder, 1989; Sweet Women Lie, 1990; Never Street, 1996; The Witchfinder, 1998; The Hours of the Virgin, 1999; A Smile on the Face of the Tiger, 2000; Sinister Heights, 2002; Poison Blonde, 2003; Retro, 2004; Nicotine Kiss, 2006; American Detective, 2007

PETER MACKLIN SERIES: Kill Zone, 1984; Roses Are Dead, 1985; Any Man's Death, 1986; Something Borrowed, Something Black, 2002; Little Black Dress, 2005

DETROIT SERIES: Whiskey River, 1990; Motown, 1991; King of the Corner, 1993; Edsel, 1995; Stress, 1996; Jitterbug, 1998; Thunder City, 1999

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Oklahoma Punk, 1976 (also known as Red Highway); Sherlock Holmes vs. Dracula: Or, The Adventure of the Sanguinary Count, 1978; Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Holmes, 1979; Peeper, 1989; The Judge, 1994; The Rocky Mountain Motion Picture Association, 1999

SHORT FICTION: People Who Kill, 1993

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: The Hider, 1978; The High Rocks, 1979; Stamping Ground, 1980; Aces and Eights, 1981; The Wolfier, 1981; Murdock's Law, 1982; Mister St. John, 1983; This Old Bill, 1984; The Stranglers, 1984; Gun Man, 1985; Bloody Season, 1988; Western Story, 1989; Sudden Country, 1992; City of Widows, 1994; Billy Gashade, 1997; Journey of the Dead, 1998; White Desert, 2000; The Master Executioner, 2001; Black Powder, White Smoke, 2002; Port Hazard, 2004; The Undertaker's Wife, 2005; The Adventures of Johnny Vermillion, 2006

SHORT FICTION: The Best Western Stories of Loren D. Estleman, 1989

NONFICTION: The Wister Trace: Classic Novels of the American Frontier, 1987; Writing the Popular Novel, 2004 (with John T. Lescroart)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Estleman, Loren D. "Golden Blonde." Interview by Mary Anna Tennenhouse. Publishers Weekly 250, no. 16 (April 21, 2003): 42. Interview about Poison Blonde, Walker's love-hate relationship with Detroit, and the logo he designed for his books.

_____. "The Man from Motor City." Interview by Keith Kroll. The Armchair Detective 24, no. 1 (1991): 4-11. Interview with Estleman in which he discusses how his police-beat reporting inspired his fiction, the importance of Detroit to his work, and the influence of Raymond Chandler.

_____. "Not Enough to Be a Good Man." Interview by Leonard Picker. Publishers Weekly 254, no. 7 (February 13, 2006): 65. Interview in which Estleman explains how Walker has mellowed over the years and how he differs from Robert B. Parker's Spenser.

Hynes, Joseph. "Looking for Endings: The Fiction of Loren D. Estleman." Journal of Popular Culture 29, no. 3 (Winter, 1995): 121-127. Compares the Walker and Detroit series, analyzing the first three titles in the latter. Concludes that the Detroit books have a more panoramic view than the Walker novels.

Walker, Dale L. "Loren Estleman." Mystery Scene 58 (1997): 56-59, 65. Good overview of Estleman's career as both mystery and Western writer, with emphasis on the latter.

HELEN EUSTIS

Born: Cincinnati, Ohio; December 31, 1916

Type of plot: Psychological

CONTRIBUTION

Helen Eustis has a gift for portraying characters in various states of mental anxiety, ranging from the normal through the highly neurotic to the psychotic. In the post-World War II era, she helped introduce into crime fiction a new quality of realism and sophistication in the portrayal of both the villain and the victim—the guilty and the innocent—which foreshadowed the development of the psychological plot. Her stories show how people placed in threatening circumstances react in bizarre, often incriminating ways.

Influenced by Edgar Allan Poe and Fyodor Dostoevski, to whom she alludes in The Horizontal Man (1946), Eustis adds a note of clinical realism to the gothic terrors experienced by her characters by explaining their behavior in terms of the pathology of the criminally insane. In The Horizontal Man, Eustis combined knowledge of abnormal psychology with mastery of the genre's least-likely-suspect convention to produce a tour de force rivaling Agatha Christie's The Murder of Roger Ackroyd (1926).

BIOGRAPHY

Helen White Eustis was born December 31, 1916, in Cincinnati, Ohio, the daughter of Henry Claypoole Eustis. She spent her childhood in Cincinnati, where she received her early education at Hillside School. She later attended Smith College in Northampton, Massachusetts, from which she was graduated with a bachelor's degree in 1938. While she was at Smith, she won an award for creative writing. Eustis subsequently did graduate work at Columbia University in New York City but did not earn an advanced degree.

When Eustis was at Smith College, she met and was eventually married to a professor in the English Department, Alfred Young Fisher. They had one son, Adam Eustis Fisher. The marriage ended in divorce.

Eustis was married a second time, to Martin Harris, a press photographer, but was also eventually divorced from him.

Although she studied literature as an undergraduate and a graduate student, Eustis did not opt for a teaching career. Her interest in literature has been manifested in exercising her own creative talents. She has written novels, a number of short stories, and children's literature. She has also translated a number of works from French to English, including Georges Simenon's Quand j'étais vieux (1970; When I Was Old, 1971).

Eustis's literary reputation is based on her first book, The Horizontal Man, which was awarded the Mystery Writers of America's Edgar Allan Poe Award for the best first novel in 1947. This novel attracted much attention and elicited much admiration from critics and aficionados of the genre. Nearly a decade later she wrote a second novel, The Fool Killer (1954), which received less critical acclaim. She seems to have preferred the short-story format, for she has written much short fiction over the years. Not all of her stories are mysteries, but all of them involve psychological suspense. Eustis has lived and worked in New York for many years.

ANALYSIS

A critical assessment of Helen Eustis's literary contributions to the genre of crime fiction must be based on her most famous novel, The Horizontal Man.

THE HORIZONTAL MAN

The novel's title is a phrase taken from a poem by W. H. Auden, "Shorts." Eustis quotes only one of the two stanzas that constitute a middle portion of Auden's poem. The entire section, which bears little relation to other parts, reads as follows:

Those who will not reason
Perish in the act;
Those who will not act
Perish for that reason.

Let us honour if we can
The vertical man,
Though we value none
But the horizontal one.

As Richard Hoggart remarked about Auden's early verse, "The epigrams usually enshrine memorable social and psychological observations." Elsewhere, Hoggart claimed that Auden "surveys from a great height the interesting but muddled life of those below; he can see a possible order in the muddle which they do not see, and he would like to help it emerge. He is detached and slightly cynical." The same could be said of Eustis's comments about life and death and the human condition.

For example, one of her less inhibited characters, Freda Cramm, delivers the following remarks on crime and its punishment:

Violence that strikes in our midst shakes us in a strange way. . . . Personally, I think there are not enough murders. They feed us in some way. See how avidly we devour all accounts of crime, or detective stories! And after all, the responsibility of giving death is a small one which we regard so seriously in comparison to the responsibility of giving life, which we take so lightly:

There are two separate pleasures. . . . The pleasure of vicarious violence, and the pleasure at the detection and punishment of the crime of another. In the first we can enjoy the emotional outlet without undertaking the penalty, and in the second we can shiver deliciously with the knowledge that we cannot be found out, since our share in the business was secret, and of the mind.

Surprisingly enough, The Horizontal Man is a roman à clef. At the time it was written, acquaintances of the author were struck by the obvious similarities between the fictional New England women's college it featured, Hollymount, and the author's alma mater, Smith College. Parallels extended beyond the locale to include characters, many of whom were based on well-known campus figures. For example, the villain was rumored to be a composite portrait of two professors from Smith's English department—a well-known modern critic (Newton Arvin) and a medievalist (Howard Rollin Patch). The victim closely resembled the author's husband, Alfred Young Fisher, formerly her professor, whom she was divorcing at the time. According to one source, Eustis began writing The Horizontal Man on the advice of her therapist to exorcize some of her hostility toward her spouse.

Eustis's knowledge of abnormal psychology and psychoanalytic theory is evident in the narrative and helps to create verisimilitude. Essentially a puzzle novel with gothic overtones, The Horizontal Man is a tour de force with an ingenious surprise ending. The spectacular climax exposes the criminal pathology of a schizophrenic killer and completes a complex psychological portrait. Although the clinical details are completely correct, Eustis does not settle for mere psychiatric accuracy. Instead, in the Russian manner, she goes much further to create a disturbing yet compassionate picture of a tortured soul whose tragic suffering is caused by what she calls “the poetry of unreason.” Eustis strives to represent mental illness realistically, not only through clinical detail but also through literary allusion:

But when . . . I've thought of madness, it seems most easily explained to me as poetry in action. A life of symbol rather than reality. On paper one may understand Gulliver, or Kafka, or Dante. But let a man go about behaving as if he were a giant or a midget, or caught in a cosmic plot directed at himself, or in heaven or hell, and we feel horror—we want to disavow him, to proclaim him as far removed as possible from ourselves.

The literary technique is sophisticated. Although the emphasis is placed on characterization, the narrative is as carefully plotted as a detective story must be. The characters are revealed as the investigation proceeds. The mental focus is reminiscent of Dostoevski's Prestupleniye i nakazaniye (1866; Crime and Punishment, 1886), but unlike Dostoevski, Eustis avoids the inverted structure. Instead, she preserves the integrity of the puzzle by shifting the narrative viewpoint among several characters. Both plot and characterization profit from the use of this device, because several characters claim attention while the puzzle is being unraveled.

By skillful employment of the interior monologue, Eustis reveals character while simultaneously sustaining suspense by shifting from one figure to another. As the narrative develops, the reader gains greater insight into the personalities of the various suspects—primarily by means of internal monologue and secondarily through confrontational dialogue. Finally, in a dramatic climax, the killer's identity is disclosed in a direct confession, which functions to solve the puzzle as well as to complete the revelation of character. Eustis's genius lies in her realization that she could combine the conventions of the classic detective novel with her interest in psychological character development to produce an original work. She recognized that the tradition of presenting the murderer as the least likely suspect offered an opportunity to exercise her rare talents for psychological portraiture.

The Horizontal Man concerns the murder of a handsome and brilliant English professor, Kevin Boyle, who is found stretched out on the floor in front of his sitting-room fireplace with a crushed skull. One of the suspects is a young student, Molly Morrison, who is so infatuated with him that she is devastated by his death. She even entertains the delusion that she is responsible for his death because she did not foresee and prevent the attack. Her guilt is so intense that she signs a confession at the police station. Several colleagues also fall under suspicion: Freda Cramm, a local femme fatale who is known to have quarreled with Boyle; Leonard Marks, a gauche junior member of the English faculty who lives in the same apartment house and who was jealous of Boyle; and George Hungerford, a distinguished older scholar whose ability to write seemed to atrophy after his mother's death but who served as friend and mentor to Boyle.

In addition to the suspects, each of whom tries to help solve the crime, several other amateur sleuths are involved in the investigation. The efforts of a homely but intelligent young student, Kate Innes, and an eager young newspaper reporter, Jack Donnelly, serve to complicate matters. Although all these people uncover pertinent information, no one person actually solves the case. The culprit finally confesses to the college psychiatrist, who provides a full explanation for the president in the novel's denouement.

In the course of the narrative, Eustis successfully depicts people in various states of anxiety ranging from the normal through the highly neurotic to the psychotic. Molly's emotional reactions as well as her therapy seem authentic. The normal, if naïve, worldview of the other students accentuates the bizarre outlook of Molly. She, in turn, offers an important contrast to Hungerford and Marks because she is so much younger and simultaneously more vulnerable and more resilient. Because of their age and sex, both Hungerford and Marks seem less seriously disturbed. The plotting is extremely complex—the focus alternates among Molly, Hungerford, and Marks.

In his first appearance in the novel, Hungerford registers a strong death wish. The reader learns that he has attempted suicide and that he finds his life a painful burden: “I know who that is, said his mind. That is Death. That is the old Reaper, gumshoeing behind you. He thought he would turn and shake Death’s hand when Death came abreast of him. . . .” Hungerford’s subsequent hallucinations become more intense and clearly indicate the seriousness of his aberration: “He whirled about and faced the dark room, his hands against the window sill, like a criminal at bay, facing his tormentors. The furniture seemed to take on the appearance of people he knew.”

In contrast to Hungerford’s wild imaginings, Molly’s misinterpretations of reality are laced with rational doubts regarding her own sanity. She becomes objectively analytical and even questions Dr. Forstmann about the difference between hallucinations and delusions. (“Hallucinations, it must be. That’s when you really imagine direct sensation instead of just sort of distant things like persecution, isn’t it?”) Her conviction that she must be mad is followed by dizzy excitement when she discovers the scratch across her wrist that her own bitten fingernails never could have made and realizes that she had not imagined the dreadful attempt on her life. Ironic genius informs her joyous insight: “She was not crazy—except crazy with happiness—someone—some real person had actually tried to strangle her!”

Then there is the poignant moment when Molly, seeking reassurance that she is not insane, runs away from the infirmary and asks Hungerford to tell her what really happened during the interval when she thought she was being attacked—only to be told that he cannot remember, that he is suffering from amnesia. Yet the two compare notes and find comfort in shared feelings of paranoia.

Marks’s fears are projected onto harmless nature in a gothic episode in which he feels threatened by encroaching darkness in the woods and runs in panic from the menacing antagonism of Cramm:

In the woods darkness had already begun. Darkness collected like a mist around the boles of the trees, rose in a vapour from the dead leaves that carpeted the forest floor. . . . The strangeness was too much for him; he could not bear it; he found himself shaking and clutching the trunk of the tree. Then, without his intention, the words formed in his mind: I must get away from here . . .

He ran and ran, blindly stumbling in the ruts of the uneven road. He could see nothing, he only trusted the feel of the ground under him. The road through the wood stretched endlessly—it seemed the trees would never end.

Eustis demonstrates consummate control as her characters move gracefully from moments of panic-stricken fear to tender pathos and gentle humor. The Horizontal Man is an unusual detective story because it embodies the techniques and themes of mainstream literature as it follows the formula of the puzzle novel. It offers sophisticated insights into the human psyche and compassion for the human condition rare in a genre in which rigid conventions usually prevail.

THE FOOL KILLER

Written nearly ten years later, Eustis’s second novel, The Fool Killer, is entirely different. Based on a rural American folk legend, it has been described as “a mystery novel for both children and adults, somewhat consciously imitative of Mark Twain.” In the mid-1960’s, a film was made from the book starring Anthony Perkins, Edward Albert, and Salome Jens.

In The Fool Killer the main character is a young boy named George Mellish, a twelve-year-old orphan rather like Huck Finn or Tom Sawyer who runs away from harsh foster parents and meets Dirty Jim Jelliman. Dirty Jim is a disreputable old man who tells him of the Fool Killer, a great tall fellow—eight feet or over—who carries a sharp ax and kills people. When George meets Milo Bogardus and becomes his traveling companion, he begins to wonder whether he has teamed up with the Fool Killer. Eustis demonstrates considerable craftsmanship in evoking the naïve mentality of the lad and in projecting his growing anxieties. As in The Horizontal Man, in The Fool Killer she reveals great gifts in creating and sustaining psychological suspense.

B. J. Rahn

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: The Horizontal Man, 1946; The Fool Killer, 1954

SHORT FICTION: The Captains and the Kings, and Other Stories, 1949

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: Mr. Death and the Red-headed Woman, 1983

TRANSLATIONS: Cats Don't Care for Money, 1965 (by Christiane Rochefort); To Forget Palermo, 1968 (by Edmonde Charles-Roux); When I Was Old, 1971 (by Georges Simenon)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Barzun, Jacques, and Wendell Hertig Taylor. "Preface to The Horizontal Man." In A Book of Prefaces to Fifty Classics of Crime Fiction, 1900-1950. New York: Garland, 1976. Preface by two preeminent scholars of mystery and detective fiction, arguing for the novel's place in the annals of the genre.

Nover, Peter, ed. The Great Good Place? A Collection of Essays on American and British College Mystery Novels. New York: P. Lang, 1999. Compilation of essays focused on crime fiction set at college campuses or feature academic characters. A valuable source of contextualization for The Horizontal Man.

Peach, Linden. Masquerade, Crime, and Fiction: Criminal Deceptions. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006. Extended study of the theme and portrayal of disguise (both literal and figurative) in mystery and detective fiction. Provides perspective for understanding Eustis's work.

Piekarski, Vicki. Introduction to Westward the Women: An Anthology of Western Stories by Women, edited by Vicki Piekarski. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1988. Includes discussion of Eustis's contributions to genre fiction.

JANET EVANOVICH

Born: Saddle River, New Jersey; April 22, 1943

Also wrote as Steffie Hall

Type of plot: Comedy caper

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Stephanie Plum, 1994-

Alexandra Barnaby, 2004-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

STEPHANIE PLUM is a bumbling, big-haired, brash bounty hunter who lives in the Chambersburg section of Trenton, New Jersey. She is surrounded by colorful characters in both her professional and personal lives. Her complicated love life contributes a romantic element to the series, while her unusual family and business associates provide comic background.

ALEXANDRA "BARNEY" BARNABY is cute, smart, and sassy. Known as Barney to her friends, this Baltimore native relocates to Florida to pursue a life with National Association for Stock Car Auto Racing (NASCAR) driver Sam Hooker and his Saint Bernard. This series, like the Plum series, contains elements of romance and family dysfunction.

CONTRIBUTION

After Janet Evanovich had written for ten years without selling a single book, she took her collection of rejection letters and burned them in the street. Shortly afterward, a publisher called to buy one of her manuscripts. In 1987, she published her first book, Hero at Large, a romance novel. After publishing twelve romance novels in five years, Evanovich decided to pursue another genre and spent a couple of years doing research. She hired a new agent, began spending time with police officers, and learned how to shoot a gun. One night, while watching Midnight Run (1988), a film about a bounty hunter starring Robert DeNiro and Charles Grodin, inspiration struck.

One for the Money, Evanovich's first Stephanie Plum novel, was published in 1994. Evanovich saw an unfilled need for comedy in mystery and detective fiction. She compares her Stephanie Plum books to the television sitcom Seinfeld (1990-1998). Stephanie Plum, like Jerry Seinfeld, is surrounded by a cast of characters who vie for attention and sometimes almost steal the show. For example, Stephanie's Grandma Mazur enjoys visiting funeral homes on a regular basis to compare the corpses' cosmetic makeovers, and her African American coworker Lula is a former prostitute fond of short, tight dresses and blond wigs.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Janet Evanovich. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The titles of the novels in the Stephanie Plum series contain numbers in sequence: One for the Money, Two for the Dough (1996), Three to Get Deadly (1997), and upward. Each book has gained a wider audience for Evanovich. High Five (1999) was the first of her novels to reach number one on The New York Times best-seller list. Stephanie's love life, divided between police officer Joe Morelli and Ranger, a mysterious Cuban bounty hunter, plays an important role in the series. Evanovich's background in romance writing serves her well as the love triangle plays out through the series.

BIOGRAPHY

Early in life, Janet Evanovich wanted to be a painter. She graduated from Douglass College (part of Rutgers) and married her high school boyfriend, Peter Evanovich. The couple had two children, Peter and Alexandra, and lived in New Jersey before moving to Virginia. Her husband, a Navy engineer, became a professor of mathematics, and she became a lingerie buyer. After the children had grown up, Evanovich decided to pursue a new career. Although she had never taken a course in writing, did not know any writers, and had never had a word published, she began writing during her free time. Despite her lack of initial success, her family remained supportive of her efforts.

After several unsold works and years of frustration, Evanovich tried writing a romance novel at the suggestion of a friend. Her romance novels were published under the pen name Steffie Hall. Many of these romance titles have since been re-released under her real name. Evanovich gave up writing romance novels as Steffie Hall because she grew tired of the constraints of the genre and its formats, although she joked that it was because she ran out of sexual positions. Creating Stephanie Plum gave Evanovich a character whose story mirrored important themes in her own life: humor, love, family, friends, and New Jersey. Evanovich did not abandon the romance genre totally, however. In 2002, she began coauthoring romance novels in the Full series with Charlotte Hughes. The first book, Full House, was an expanded version of a romance Evanovich originally published in 1989 under the name Steffie Hall.

The Chambersburg neighborhood of Trenton, New Jersey, is the setting for the Stephanie Plum series. Evanovich was born and raised in Saddle River, a vibrant community much like Stephanie Plum's Burg. Everyone in Evanovich's hometown knew everyone else's business, and children were safe to roam the streets because everyone in the neighborhood was watching. As a child, like Stephanie Plum's niece Mary Alice, the author enjoyed pretending that she was a horse. She grew up listening to the stories of her aunt, her grandmother, and all of their friends, who scanned the local obituaries each day to plan which funeral homes they would visit, much like Stephanie's Grandma Mazur. Evanovich's fiction contains a good deal of autobiography.

For her second mystery series, Evanovich moved the action to Florida. Her heroine, Alexandra "Barney" Barnaby, in Metro Girl (2004) and Motor Mouth (2006) is loosely based on the author, her children, and her interests. The protagonist, Alexandra Barnaby, is named after Evanovich's daughter Alexandra and her daughter's Saint Bernard Barnaby. The series also features a Saint Bernard, and NASCAR (of which Evanovich is a fan) plays a central role in the series. Barney, as the character is known to her friends, has a degree in engineering, works in the pits as a spotter, and moonlights as a research and development expert for her love interest, the NASCAR driver Sam Hooker.

Evanovich, whose sense of humor extends to herself, has said her motivation for writing is always the same: a huge mortgage. Being a mother is important to Evanovich, and her family has been very involved in her professional life. The family has built a cottage industry around her books, with her son, Peter, managing her money, and her daughter, Alexandra, running her Web site.

ANALYSIS

The word madcap might best describe the novels of Janet Evanovich. Her heroines seem to be hanging on to life by a thin thread. Far from the typical self-sufficient loner depicted in hard-boiled mysteries and classic detective fiction, the Evanovich heroine is needy. Taking gross incompetence to an art form, Stephanie Plum bumbles from one botched arrest to another and depends on dumb luck and the men in her life to bail her out.

Evanovich writes to entertain the reader. Her character-driven novels combine generous amounts of romance and comedy. The author draws heavily from her own life and her own interests for the plots and settings of the novels. Like Stephanie Plum, Evanovich once owned a hamster, was born in New Jersey, and enjoys driving fast. The author has compared Stephanie to a younger, more attractive version of herself.

Stephanie's sexual allure is key to the success of the series. The love triangle among Stephanie, Joe Morelli, and Ranger is like a continuing soap opera. The series is reminiscent of Nancy Drew, where the end of each chapter finds the heroine in peril, and the reader speeds through the story only to find once again that the heroine has been saved by her network of fumbling family members and macho protectors. Stephanie's family members—her fertile sister Valerie, the spry and cocky Grandma Mazur, her long-suffering father and doting mother, and her bail bondsman cousin Vinnie, for whom she works—all provide a constant background noise to further complicate her daily life.

HARD EIGHT

Hard Eight (2002) in the Stephanie Plum series is one of Evanovich's better titles. It is a little darker, a little more menacing, and slightly deranged. Eddie Abruzzi, local mob boss with a Napoleon complex, seeks a former bar owner associate who may have stolen property belonging to Eddie. Stephanie enters the scene through the back door, as she had been recruited to find the former bar owner's wife, Evelyn Soder, and her daughter Annie. She has taken on this case for free.

A mad killer in a rabbit costume chases Stephanie around Trenton, blowing up her brand new car. Her apartment is broken into, and she finds a dead man on her couch. Meanwhile, Ranger is showing more interest than ever in Stephanie, although she is spending most of her free time with Evelyn Soder's ineffectual lawyer, Albert Kloughn. The lawyer becomes a love interest for Stephanie's sister Valerie.

In between potentially fatal near misses, Stephanie attempts to capture two bail jumpers, one unusually thin and one unusually fat. These two polar opposites lead to comical complications for Stephanie during the attempted performance of her duties.

TO THE NINES

In the Plum series novel To the Nines (2003), the players of a game murder each other in the process of trying to win the prize, Stephanie. The bounty hunter travels to Las Vegas with Lula in tow. The always lively Lula has become a devotee of the “meat only” diet plan. As a result, her purse is usually stuffed with pork chops and barbecued ribs, and this makes her popular with dogs. Stephanie and Lula are looking for Samuel Singh, who has jumped bail and disappeared, apparently with his girlfriend’s family dog. Singh’s employer, TriBro, is anxious to have him back, since they put up the bail money. The three brothers who own TriBro each have their own secrets.

Meanwhile, life at the Plum family home is hectic. Stephanie’s sister Valerie is pregnant with her third child and has moved in with her parents and grandmother and brought along her two children and the father of her latest child, attorney Albert Kloughn. Stephanie’s father is threatening to move out. Someone is stalking Stephanie and leaving her floral bouquets of red roses and white carnations. Afraid for her life, Stephanie moves in with her boyfriend Joe Morelli and Gramma Bella, who is having visions of someone’s death, maybe Stephanie’s.

Both of Stephanie’s love interests, Joe Morelli and Ranger, along with a few of Ranger’s subordinates, are trying hard to protect her despite the inevitable complications such as crooks falling from roofs, babies being born, and the usual car catastrophes common to Plum series novels.

TEN BIG ONES

Ten Big Ones begins with the robbery of a snack food truck. The perpetrator was on the no-carbohydrates diet and apparently lost all control. The beginning sets the tone for this entry in the Plum series. Stephanie’s sister Valerie is getting married to Albert Kloughn, and the wedding planner is a transvestite bus driver by the name of Sweet Sally. A convenience store is robbed, and Stephanie’s ability to identify the culprit leads to a contract on her life. Ranger offers the comfort and safety of his home. The inner sanctum of Ranger’s life is finally revealed: tastefully furnished rooms and closets full of black clothes. Stephanie’s usual hardships, wrecked cars, and lost handcuffs add a familiar tone. However, an explosive, fresh finish helps save this story from stale predictability.

Randy L. Abbott

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

STEPHANIE PLUM SERIES: One for the Money, 1994; Two for the Dough, 1996; Three to Get Deadly, 1997; Four to Score, 1998; High Five, 1999; Hot Six, 2000; Three Plums in One, 2001; Seven Up, 2001; Hard Eight, 2002; Visions of Sugar Plums, 2002; To the Nines, 2003; Ten Big Ones, 2004; Eleven on Top, 2005; Twelve Sharp, 2006; Plum Lovin’, 2007; Lean Mean Thirteen, 2007; More Plums in One, 2007

ALEXANDRA BARNABY SERIES: Metro Girl, 2004; Motor Mouth, 2006

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Hero at Large, 1987 (as Hall); The Grand Finale, 1988 (as Hall); Thanksgiving, 1988; Manhunt, 1988; Full House, 1989 (as Hall; expanded version as Evanovich with Charlotte Hughes. 2002); Foul Play, 1989 (as Hall); Ivan Takes a Wife, 1989 (also known as Love Overboard); Back to the Bedroom, 1989; Smitten, 1990; Wife for Hire, 1990 (as Hall); Rocky Road to Romance, 1991; Naughty Neighbor, 1992 (as Hall); Full Tilt, 2003 (with Hughes); Full Speed, 2003 (with Hughes); Full Blast, 2004 (with Hughes); Full Bloom, 2005 (with Hughes); Full Scoop, 2006 (with Hughes); Hot Stuff, 2007 (with Leanne Banks)

NONFICTION: How I Write: Secrets of a Bestselling Author, 2006 (with Ina Yalof)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cochran, Tracy. “Jersey Janet Takes on the World: The Creator of the Stephanie Plum Series Branches Out.” Publishers Weekly 250, no. 26 (June 30, 2003): 40-43. Discusses the setting for the Stephanie Plum series and marketing attempts to brand the series through the author’s Web site and various formats.

Evanovich, Janet. “Three to Get Deadly: An Interview with Janet Evanovich, Creator of the Stephanie Plum Novels.” Interview by Pamela James. The Armchair Detective 30, no. 1 (1997): 50-52. A discussion of Evanovich’s first three Plum novels, including her inspiration for the series and writing habits.

Janet Evanovich Online. <http://www.evanovich.com>.

This lively Web site designed and run by the author's daughter provides information on the novels, a short biography, book signing dates, and games.

Nussbaum, Debra. "Imagine Trenton. One Author Did." The New York Times, November 3, 2002, p. 14NJ4. Discusses the author's family, her home in New Hampshire, and her similarities with Stephanie Plum.

Papinchak, Robert Allen. "Janet Evanovich: It's All in the Family." Writer 115, no. 8 (August, 2002): 34-37. Discusses her struggles as a beginning writer and her influences, including Donald Duck's Uncle Scrooge and Junie B. Jones.

Plagens, Peter. "Standing in the Line of Fire: Best-Selling Author Janet Evanovich Faces Down a Critic." Newsweek, July 5, 2004, p. 56. Presents

Evanovich on the occasion of her tenth Stephanie Plum novel and discusses the simplicity of her writing style and the percentages of women versus men who read her novels.

Stern, Kate. "Evanovich, Janet." Current Biography 62, no. 4 (April, 2001): 23-26. A biography of Evanovich that deals with her childhood and what motivates her to write.

Wilson, Leah, ed. Perfectly Plum: An Unauthorized Celebration of the Life, Loves, and Other Disasters of Stephanie Plum, Trenton Bounty Hunter. Dallas: BenBella Books, 2007. Largely positive essays that analyze the Plum series from the perspective of chick lit and examine Plum's propensity for wrecking cars and ability to attract men.

F

LINDA FAIRSTEIN

Born: Mount Vernon, New York; May 5, 1947

Types of plot: Thriller; police procedural

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Alex Cooper, 1996-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

ALEXANDRA “ALEX” COOPER, a tall, single, blond woman in her mid-thirties, is an assistant district attorney in Manhattan, in charge of the Sex Crimes Prosecution Unit. A dedicated, tireless champion for the victims of sexual assault and related violence, Alex often becomes entangled in cases in which her own personal safety is placed in jeopardy.

MIKE CHAPMAN is a tall, lean, dark-haired detective with the New York Police Department (NYPD) Homicide Squad. By turns jovial and hard-boiled, bachelor Mike—who was involved with a woman who died after falling into a crevasse—frequently works with Alex in pursuing cases in which victims of sexual violence have died; he and Alex have a friendly, platonic relationship, filled with good-natured banter.

MERCER WALLACE is a lieutenant with the NYPD Special Victims Squad, a transfer from the Homicide Squad. A very tall, bulky African American in his early forties, Mercer is married and the father of a young daughter. He teams with Alex and Mike, with whom he is in constant contact during the investigation of sexual assault and murder cases.

CONTRIBUTION

As an attorney, Linda Fairstein worked with rape and violent assault victims in New York City. From 1974 until 2002, she worked under District Attorney Frank Morgenthau, becoming chief of the Sex Crimes Prosecution Unit in 1976. During Fairstein’s tenure, she led prosecution teams in many high-profile cases, notably the so-called preppy murder of Jennifer Levin and the beating and rape of the woman known to the media as the Central Park jogger. In the course of her work, Fairstein radically altered the manner in which rape cases were investigated and tried, stressing forensics, pioneering the use of DNA evidence, seeking confessions from perpetrators, and thoroughly questioning victims. A member of many legal and nonprofit organizations advocating for the rights of victims (including the Mount Sinai Hospital Friends of the Rape Crisis Intervention Program, New York Women’s Agenda Domestic Violence Committee, Governor Cuomo’s Task Force on Rape, and President Clinton’s Violence Against Women Advisory Council), Fairstein has been in demand as a lecturer on a variety of topics related to violence, particularly violence against women.

For her efforts as an advocate, Fairstein has garnered considerable local and national recognition, and has served as the model for the character of a prosecutor on several television shows and films. Among dozens of honors she has collected are a Federal Bar Council Award for distinguished public service; a University of Virginia Distinguished Alumna Award; inclusion among the American Bar Association’s Outstanding Young Lawyers; Glamour’s and New Woman’s 1993 Woman of the Year Awards; National Women’s Political Caucus 1994 Achievement Award; Boy Scouts of America 1994 Distinguished Woman of the Year Award; Soroptomists 1996 International Woman of Achievement Award; and the National Conference of Christians and Jews 1996 Humanitarian Award. As one of the United States’ premier experts on sexual and domestic violence, Fairstein has served as a criminal justice consultant to the major television networks and to many cable news programs.

Fairstein’s first book, the nonfictional Sexual Violence: Our War Against Rape, appeared in 1993. With a recap of her career as a prosecutor, a history of public perceptions and treatment of rape cases, and harrowing descriptions of actual crimes, Sexual Violence was tabbed as a New York Times notable book of the year. The book achieved widespread acclaim, both for its timeliness in dealing with a long-neglected subject and for its author's passion and dedication to her cause.

After the success of her book, Fairstein turned to fiction. Her Alex Cooper thrillers—starting with Final Jeopardy (1996)—are essentially extensions of the author's day job. Heroine Cooper resembles Fairstein physically, mentally, and emotionally. Though sometimes taken to task critically for her lack of a distinctive writing style (characterized by a tendency to over-explain police procedures, to lecture about certain topics, and to put wooden dialogue into the mouths of characters), Fairstein has nonetheless achieved acclaim among readers and critics alike for including well-researched information about New York landmarks and lesser known historical or geographic features. Fairstein's plots are typically convoluted, involving dozens of characters and many scene changes. Virtually all Fairstein's novels have achieved best-seller status. Her fourth entry in the Alex Cooper series, The Deadhouse (2001), was nominated for a Macavity Award as best novel.

BIOGRAPHY

Linda A. Fairstein was born of Jewish heritage into an upper-middle-class family on May 5, 1947, in Mount Vernon, New York. She was the daughter of physician Samuel Johnson Fairstein and registered nurse Alice Atwell Fairstein. An eager early reader, Fairstein began writing in childhood and was torn between careers in literature, ballet, and public service as a youth.

Fairstein attended Vassar College, graduating in 1969 with a bachelor's degree in English literature. She afterward entered the University of Virginia School of Law, acquiring her jurisprudence degree in 1972. She immediately joined the Manhattan District Attorney's Office and soon was named an assistant district attorney. Fairstein succeeded Leslie Crocker Snyder as head of the district attorney's Sex Crimes Prosecution Unit in 1976 and served in that capacity until leaving in 2002 to concentrate on writing, lecturing, and serving as a consultant in her specialty. Fairstein in 1987 married Justin N. Feldman—former senior partner in a Manhattan law firm who helped run Robert F. Kennedy's 1964 United States Senate campaign—becoming stepmother to Feldman's three children.

Fairstein's tenure with the District Attorney's Office was frequently marked by controversy. This was because of her penchant for inserting herself into high-profile cases, for claiming credit for legal innovations she did not instigate, and for speaking publicly about them—though she without question did make many inroads into the way rape and domestic violence cases are prosecuted. All these elements were perceived as being indications of her having ambition for higher office, a perception that was exacerbated when she was interviewed in 1993 as a candidate to become U.S. attorney general under President Bill Clinton. Fairstein also feuded with her predecessor, Snyder, with office rivals, with feminists, and with victims' rights groups. She was widely criticized for writing about some of her major cases, thinly disguising them as fiction, while still employed by the District Attorney's Office. Additionally, several of her unit's most successful cases—notably that involving the woman known as the Central Park jogger—were eventually overturned, and their convictions vacated.

Despite such setbacks and occasional public scorn, Fairstein has moved forward. She published the well-received Sexual Violence and followed up with her first novel, Final Jeopardy, in which she introduced protagonist Alexandra Cooper. She has continued to add to the popular Cooper series—virtually all series novels have been on domestic or international best-seller lists, and the fourth was nominated for the Macavity Award—and has also contributed to a collaborative novel, I'd Kill for That (2004), with Rita Mae Brown, Anne Perry, Kathy Reichs, and seven other female writers. With publisher Otto Penzler, Fairstein edited the nonfictional The Best American Crime Reporting 2007 (2007).

ANALYSIS

Linda Fairstein's alter ego is her protagonist Alexandra "Alex" Cooper, a younger, thinner, blonder, but no less outspoken or dedicated version of the author. Like Fairstein, the workaholic Alex heads Manhattan's Sex Crimes Prosecution Unit and is a passionate advocate for victims of sexual assault and domestic violence. Alex typically works with a pair of professional law enforcement officers: hard-as-nails detective Mike Chapman of the NYPD Homicide Squad and Lieutenant Mercer Wallace of the NYPD Special Victims Squad. The prosecutor and the police officers spend considerable time together on and off the job and, over the course of the series, become staunch friends. The three major protagonists are likable, making it easy for readers to root for them as they ferret out the scummy, devious criminals who inhabit Fairstein's novels.

Alex Cooper debuted in Final Jeopardy; the title refers to Alex, Mike, and Mercer's habit when working cases to place bets on which of them will come up with the question for the last answer on the popular television quiz show Jeopardy! (1964-1975, 1978-1979, beginning in 1984). With this novel, Fairstein established a number of conventions that have been followed in later novels in the series. First, she tells each story in first-person, past tense, from Alex Cooper's viewpoint (not a surprising decision, since Alex reflects the impact and result of everyday occurrences from Fairstein's thirty-year career as a prosecutor). Second, each of her stories contains at least one major thread surrounding a sex crime or a crime with a possible sexual subtext (a requirement, given the restrictions of the protagonist's profession) and several lesser crimes, which crisscross in numerous and complicated plot twists before the final denouement. Third, each story offers Fairstein the opportunity to expound on New York's historical or geographic features, with occasional excursions to the author's (and protagonist's) vacation home on Martha's Vineyard. Fourth, every story will provide insights into police and legal procedures. Fifth, all stories will, at some point, put the heroine in peril—a departure from Fairstein's actual experiences during her time with the District Attorney's Office.

The first three of these conventions—the positive characterization of the main protagonist from her own viewpoint, the concentration on crimes of a sexual nature (while continually reminding readers of the heavy caseload under which sex crimes prosecutors labor), and a focus on local or regional landmarks in the course of an investigation—are the strongest hallmarks of Fairstein's work. In the second novel in the series, Likely to Die (1997), for example, the subject under scrutiny is the daily workings of a hospital, following the murder of a Manhattan neurosurgeon. Cold Hit (1999) investigates the sleazy world of unscrupulous art dealers, while highlighting a Fairstein contribution to legal procedures instituted in real life in the same year: a “cold hit” unit in which prosecutors pursue suspects identified from more than sixteen thousand rape kits sitting in storage. One of the stronger entries in the series, The Deadhouse (2001), deals with a murder linked to a genuine New York landmark, Roosevelt Island, site of a nineteenth century smallpox sanitarium, insane asylum, and prison. The Bone Vault (2003) connects a crime with New York's Metropolitan Museum of Art and the Museum of Natural History. The title of The Kills (2004) serves double duty: It describes both a series of sex-related murders and the local name for the venue of the investigation, the numerous creeks and canals that honeycomb lower Manhattan.

Fairstein's main characters mature, though they do not age at a normal rate. Both Alex Cooper and Mike Chapman acquire and lose romantic interests, but such interludes do not deflect them from their purpose: the arrest and conviction of perpetrators of sex crimes. To give recurring characters dimension, Fairstein spends considerable time describing what they wear, what they eat, what they drink, and other habits, which become familiar to the reader.

Character, plot, and setting are Fairstein strengths, but literary style is her weakness. Her documentary-like narratives are often slowed by minutiae of police and legal procedure with which television-weaned readers may be expected to be already familiar. Fairstein sometimes stops a story cold to lecture, to over-describe a scene, and to give unnecessary detail, and the result is sometimes a plodding tale, too long by half. Favorite terminology—like “buccal swabs”—is repeated again and again. Infrequent literary devices, such as similes and metaphors, are labored and awkward. Dialogue is a continual problem: For all Fairstein's experience and authoritative tone when dealing with legal issues and the day-to-day workings of a busy prosecutor's office, she does not have a keen ear for the way in which people converse, and exchanges on occasion sound stilted.

Despite perceived flaws in her literary skills, Fairstein has sufficient verve in those facets of writing that she performs well to have acquired a faithful audience of enviable size willing to suspend disbelief long enough to devour her latest Alex Cooper release. Fairstein's efforts may not produce great literature, but for millions of readers she turns out a satisfying genre product.

THE DEADHOUSE

One of the most interesting entries of the Alex Cooper series, The Deadhouse deals with the murder of King's College professor Lola Dakota who, it turns out, had been conducting an archaeological dig at notorious Roosevelt Island, site of a century-old sanatorium where smallpox victims were sent to die. Filled with fascinating details of a forgotten aspect of New York's past and geography and authoritative in tone when concerning day-to-day prosecutorial business, the plot drags a bit because of a subplot involving the heroine in a love affair, and the resolution is reached somewhat abruptly, leaving several plot threads hanging.

DEATH DANCE

Based on the 1980 real-life disappearance at the Metropolitan Opera House in Lincoln Center of a young violinist who vanished between acts, was murdered during the performance of an opera, and whose body was found in an airshaft, Death Dance (2006) involves Alex Cooper, Mike Chapman, and Mercer Wallace in the investigation into the similar death of an aging ballerina. The story, reflecting Fairstein's long-time interest in ballet, mixes rumor, gossip, legend, and fact while exploring New York's colorful history in the performing arts. Although the background information, as always, is interesting, and the main characters are believable, the dialogue does not ring true, the pace is plodding, and the suspense—mostly confined to the latter quarter of the book—seems contrived.

Jack Ewing

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

ALEX COOPER SERIES: Final Jeopardy, 1996; Likely to Die, 1997; Cold Hit, 1999; The Deadhouse, 2001; The Bone Vault, 2003; The Kills, 2004; Entombed, 2005; Death Dance, 2006; Bad Blood, 2007; Killer Heat, 2008

NONSERIES NOVELS: I'd Kill for That, 2004 (with others)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NONFICTION: Sexual Violence: Our War Against Rape, 1993; The Best American Crime Reporting 2007, 2007 (with Otto Penzler)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bush, Vanessa. Review of The Deadhouse, by Linda Fairstein. Booklist 97, no. 22 (August, 2001): 547.

This highly favorable review focuses on the novel's historical and geographical information about Roosevelt Island.

Dubose, Martha Hailey, with Margaret Caldwell Thomas. Women of Mystery: The Lives and Works of Notable Women Crime Novelists. New York: St. Martin's Minotaur, 2000. Contains a brief entry on Fairstein that notes her position as one of the few women writing legal thrillers.

Fairstein, Linda. Sexual Violence: Our War Against Rape. New York: William Morrow, 1993. This nonfictional work covers Fairstein's experiences as prosecutor, historical perspectives on rape and sex crimes, and depictions of actual sex crimes. Sheds light on Fairstein's motivations for writing and her main protagonist.

_____. "The Trials of Convicting Rapists." Interview by Margaret Carlson. Time 138, no. 15 (October 14, 1991): 11-22. Fairstein describes her daily experiences as a sex crimes prosecutor, noting that "rapists come in every size, shape and background."

Kaminer, Wendy. "What Is This Thing Called Rape?" Review of Sexual Violence, by Linda Fairstein. The New York Times Book Review (September 19, 1993): 1, 42. The review praises the work for its simple language and insightful examination of the prosecution process, but faults it for its episodic structure and awkward-though-earnest style.

Lehman-Haupt, Christopher. "Divergent Views of Rape as Violence and Sex." Review of Sexual Violence, by Linda Fairstein. The New York Times, September 19, 1993, p. C15. The work—part memoir, part history, part legal analysis, and part crime report—notes that for centuries rape and other acts of sexual violence have been underreported, the survivors ignored by legal and medical communities, the nature of the crime misunderstood, and the victims stigmatized. The reviewer mildly faults the author for not including a summary of the psychology of sexual assailants.

Melton, Emily. Review of Likely to Die, by Linda Fairstein. Booklist 93, no. 17 (May 1, 1997): 1460. Though the likable heroine and the forensic details are praised, the reviewer disliked the wandering plotline and the pedantic lectures throughout.

Publishers Weekly. Review of The Bone Vault, by Linda Fairstein. 249, no. 42 (October 21, 2002): 53. A mostly positive review of the work, which is deemed authoritative and filled with facts, though termed heavy-handed in dumping information into dialogue, with a plot resolution that challenges credibility.

WILLIAM FAULKNER

Born: New Albany, Mississippi; September 25, 1897

Died: Byhalia, Mississippi; July 6, 1962

Type of plot: Psychological

CONTRIBUTION

William Faulkner is one of many literary novelists to use violent death (often under mysterious circumstances) as a central plot element. One thinks of Charles Dickens's Bleak House (1852-1853) and The Mystery of Edwin Drood (1870), Fyodor Dostoevski's Prestupleniye i nakazaniye (1866; Crime and Punishment, 1886) and Bratya Karamazovy (1879-1880; The Brothers Karamazov, 1912), Mark Twain's The Tragedy of Pudd'nhead Wilson (1894), Theodore Dreiser's An American Tragedy (1925), and many more. Faulkner differs from those other novelists, however, in that he produced a fairly large body of work, written primarily during the decade of the 1930's, which is identifiable as crime and mystery fiction. Faulkner read and admired the detective novel and wrote his first detective story, "Smoke," in 1930. His story "An Error in Chemistry" won second place in the Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine contest in 1946. At least four of his novels and a number of his short stories employ crime and mystery as the basic structural elements of the plot. Because of the depth of his characterizations and the poetic quality of his prose, Faulkner's crime stories have a resonance that mystery fiction seldom achieves. If one can overcome the natural reluctance to hedge in Faulkner with an epithet, one might argue that he is the most literate and the most American of all the mystery and detective writers.

BIOGRAPHY

William Cuthbert Faulkner was born on September 25, 1897, in New Albany, Mississippi, the son of Murry C. Falkner and Maud Butler Falkner. The eldest of four brothers, William would eventually change the spelling of his family name to Faulkner, which he believed to be its original form. He moved with his family to Oxford, Mississippi, in 1902. There he grew up and was educated, until he left high school without receiving his diploma. He joined the Royal Air Force in Canada in 1918 and trained as a pilot but was never sent to Europe. From 1919 to 1920, Faulkner attended the University of Mississippi. From 1921 to 1924, he served without distinction as university postmaster; he may even have been discharged from the position (the evidence is inconclusive). During this period, Faulkner was primarily writing poetry, and in 1924 The Marble Faun, a book of verse, was privately published. Then he took up a six-month residence in New Orleans, Louisiana, where he became friendly with Sherwood Anderson and wrote sketches for the Times-Picayune and The Double Dealer. Anderson later helped him to publish his first novel, Soldiers' Pay (1926).

After spending some time in Paris and in northern Italy, Switzerland, and England, Faulkner returned to Oxford, where he would live for most of the rest of his life. From 1926 onward, he was a full-time writer. He married Estelle Oldham Franklin in 1929, and they had one daughter. Having published five novels that were qualified critical successes but financial failures, he wrote Sanctuary (1931) expressly to make money. The book gave him a popular reputation for the first time and, because it was adapted as a motion picture, introduced him to Hollywood. He intermittently worked as a Hollywood screenwriter during three separate periods: from 1932 to 1933 for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, from 1935 to 1937 for Twentieth Century Fox, and from 1942 to 1945 for Warner Bros.

Although Faulkner's books sold only modestly for many years, he accumulated a wealth of critical honors, including two O. Henry Awards, two National Book Awards, two Pulitzer Prizes, and the Nobel Prize in Literature. He was elected to the National Institute of Arts and Letters in 1939 and was named writer-in-residence at the University of Virginia in 1957. By the end of his life, he was acknowledged to be, along with Ernest Hemingway, the foremost American novelist of his generation. He died at Byhalia, Mississippi, on July 6, 1962.

ANALYSIS

William Faulkner's eminence is such that his work is not considered in generic terms. He is not considered a regional writer, but he was once so labeled. He is not regarded as a writer of mystery and detective fiction, but a number of his novels and short stories employ the conventions and devices of the genre. Faulkner belonged to the world when in 1950 he accepted the 1949 Nobel Prize in Literature (which had been withheld for a year). One should remember, however, that only a few years earlier he had been regarded as a rather quaint writer with a provincial perspective. As late as 1942, a popular reference work had characterized Faulkner as "a minor Balzac of a subhuman world." The commentator who chose that phrase certainly regarded the southern gothic ambience of some of the books as the paramount quality in the author's work.

William Faulkner. (© The Nobel Foundation)

During much of the 1930's and again late in the 1940's, Faulkner repeatedly used crime, mystery, and suspense as key elements in developing his themes. For example, the theme of Faulkner's best-known (certainly his most anthologized) short story, "A Rose for Emily," is the seductive appeal of the South's dead past. He uses a horrific surprise ending as the final, palpable proof of the force of that past. The story begins at the funeral of Miss Emily Grierson, the last member of an old Jefferson, Mississippi, family. At her death, Miss Emily lived in the once-fine, now dilapidated, family home in a once-fashionable, now seedy, neighborhood. The narrator tells her story through a series of nonchronological flashbacks. Miss Emily's father (the past) protected her with a horsewhip from the attentions of the young men

(the present and the future) of Jefferson. When he died, she refused to release the body for three days, denying that he was dead. Jefferson was both scandalized and vindicated when Miss Emily, too good for any of the local men, took up with a brash Yankee named Homer Barron, who had come to town as foreman of a construction crew. After a courtship that had the locals expecting a wedding, Homer Barron suddenly moved on—apparently. As the years passed, Miss Emily became more and more of a recluse. Following her funeral, the narrator and other townsmen force their way into a locked room upstairs. There they find, on the bed, Homer Barron's desiccated corpse. On the pillow beside him is an indentation in the shape of a head and a long strand of iron-gray hair.

Miss Emily's necrophilia is only the most graphic evidence of her rejection of the present, her embrace of the past. "A Rose for Emily," however, can be read chiefly as a tale of madness and horror. There is also a strong element of the detective story: Miss Emily buys arsenic from the druggist (for "rats"); just before Barron's disappearance, he is seen entering the Grierson house at dusk by the kitchen door; and for a time a dreadful stench surrounds Miss Emily's house. Faulkner furnishes the perceptive reader with all the clues required to anticipate the shocking climax.

SANCTUARY

Sanctuary plays on the deep-seated fear of southern males that their women will be stolen from them and defiled. Temple Drake (whose first name suggests the idealized purity of southern womanhood) is a college girl who accompanies Gowan Stevens, a product of the University of Virginia, to a bootlegger's lair near Jefferson. Stevens, who represents the vanity and ineffectuality of the old southern aristocracy, gets drunk and beaten up, and abandons Temple to Popeye, a psychopathic little gangster from Memphis. Lee Goodwin, the white-trash bootlegger, and Tommy, his feeble-minded and good-hearted flunky, attempt to protect Temple from Popeye, who, despite his impotence, lusts after her. Temple hides, cowering, in a corncrib in the barn. At this point, the narrative becomes very lurid indeed.

Popeye shoots and kills Tommy, rapes Temple with a corn cob, and flees to Memphis with her as his prisoner. In Memphis, Popeye ensconces Temple in Miss Reba's brothel, showering her with clothes, jewelry, and cosmetics. He enlists Alabama Red, another local gangster, as his surrogate and sits panting and drooling at the foot of the bed while Red has intercourse with Temple. Meanwhile, Goodwin has been arrested for Tommy's murder. Ruby, his common-law wife and a former prostitute, portrayed throughout the novel with a limp, comatose baby in her arms, seeks help from the lawyer Horace Benbow. Horace is a good but deluded man who has been dominated for years by his cold wife and even colder sister, Narcissa.

Back in Memphis, Temple's corruption is complete; she develops a wild passion for Red. Popeye's response is to shoot Red between the eyes. Red's funeral at a Memphis roadhouse is a masterpiece of black comedy. Red's lugubrious former employer unwisely gives free liquor to the mourners. They begin to carouse, eventually to fight. When the casket is knocked over, Red loses his cap, and the piece of wax plugging the bullet hole in his forehead pops out. Temple is rescued by those employed by her influential father. To keep the Memphis episode quiet, she gives perjured testimony against Goodwin, who is wrongfully convicted. A mob, inflamed by the introduction into evidence of the offending corn cob, breaks Goodwin out of jail and burns him alive. Popeye, on his annual pilgrimage to his mother's home in Pensacola, Florida, is arrested for the murder of an Alabama police officer (ironically, one of the few he did not commit). Like Goodwin, he is wrongfully convicted and subsequently hanged. Temple goes to Paris with her father to forget the sordid past.

LIGHT IN AUGUST

Light in August (1932) bears some superficial resemblance to Sanctuary. The setting is Faulkner's pied-à-terre, Jefferson, seat of Yoknapatawpha County. The central character, Joe Christmas, is a bootlegger. As the final chapter of Sanctuary summarizes Popeye's life story in flashback, seven of the central chapters of Light in August recount Christmas's unhappy life. Christmas lives and conducts his illegal business on land owned by a reclusive single woman, Miss Burden. She is viewed with suspicion and hostility by the townspeople, owing to her New England abolitionist ancestry. As in Sanctuary, there is an abandoned young woman: Lena Grove has come all the way from Alabama seeking the father of her unborn child. Christmas murders Miss Burden with his razor. He is eventually shot to death and castrated by Percy Grimm, a National Guard officer, who represents the same mentality as did the mob in Sanctuary. The Reverend Hightower, who lives alone and in disgrace, plays the role that Horace Benbow did in the earlier novel: the sensitive and intellectual observer who attempts to draw some meaning from the tragic events he witnesses.

Yet the differences between the two novels are more striking than the similarities. The problem of race is at the heart of Light in August, whereas it is barely touched on in Sanctuary. The orphaned Christmas believes that his father may have been of mixed racial stock. Although no one questions his status as a white man, Christmas occasionally blurts out that he is black. When among blacks, he asserts just as vehemently that he is white. He is not at ease in either culture and compulsively estranges himself from both. At the end of their illicit affair, Miss Burden tries to send Christmas to a black college, where he will be groomed as a leader in the advancement of his people. When he refuses, she attempts to kill him with a Civil War pistol, but he kills her instead.

The prose of Sanctuary is lush, often purple. The prose of Light in August is more restrained, but it is in other ways a less conventional novel. The narrative is more or less chronological, but Faulkner experiments with time in another way—by switching between the past and present tense throughout. The characters' names alone remind the reader that Light in August is a novel of ideas: Christmas, for the sacrificial victim of society's rigid stereotypes; Burden, for the guilt-ridden puritan; Grimm, for the avenging zealot; Hightower, for the fallen minister.

ABSALOM, ABSALOM!

Sanctuary is basically a lurid crime story, emphasizing incident but suggesting certain southern themes. Light in August is a thematic novel that uses crime and violent death to develop those themes. Absalom, Absalom! (1936), however, considered by some critics to be Faulkner's finest novel, is among other things a detective story. Absalom, Absalom! is the story of Thomas Sutpen, who came as a poor white to Jefferson in 1833 and by the time of the Civil War had built a great plantation and a reputation as a gentleman. His story—featuring miscegenation, incest, and two murders—is a mixture of fact, legend, and myth (like southern history itself). The structurally complex narrative employs three distinctly different points of view: that of Rosa Coldfield, Sutpen's sister-in-law (chapters 1 and 4); that of Mr. Compson, son of General Compson, Sutpen's only friend (chapters 2 through 4); and that of Quentin Compson, who narrates "That Evening Sun" and commits suicide in The Sound and the Fury (chapters 6 through 9). Quentin, like a brilliant detective of popular fiction, pieces together the varied and conflicting accounts so as to reconstruct the "truth" about Sutpen's life. He is assisted by his Harvard roommate, Shreve, a matter-of-fact Dr. Watson type. In this case, however, the detective is a victim as well. Quentin regards Sutpen's tragedy as representative. It is the South's tragedy and also his personal tragedy. Quentin will soon take his own life.

During Faulkner's last extended tenure in Hollywood, he worked on screenplays adapted from Raymond Chandler's The Big Sleep (1939), a mystery featuring the hard-boiled private eye Philip Marlowe, and Ernest Hemingway's To Have and Have Not (1937), a tale of rumrunners and bank robbers in Cuba and the Florida Keys. While working on The Big Sleep in 1945, Faulkner began writing a murder mystery of his own. It was published in 1948 as Intruder in the Dust.

INTRUDER IN THE DUST

In Intruder in the Dust, Lucas Beauchamp, a black man, has been charged with murder and jailed. He is in danger of being lynched. Charles Mallison, Jr., the young narrator, and his bombastic uncle, Gavin Stevens, set out to prove Beauchamp's innocence. Following instructions given them by the jailed Beauchamp, they solve the crime and free him. The melodramatic novel is also polemical; it was thought at the time of publication to contain the most direct (and controversial) observations Faulkner had ever made on race relations in the South.

KNIGHT'S GAMBIT

Knight's Gambit (1949) consists of a novella, the title of which gives the book its name, and five previously published detective stories, including "Smoke" and "An Error in Chemistry," which had missed first place in Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine contest by only one vote. Gavin Stevens is the protagonist, the detective, in each story and, as in Intruder in the Dust, Charles Mallison, Jr., is the narrator.

FAULKNER'S RANGE

Faulkner is a writer of tremendous range. His work runs the gamut from the epic and elegiac to the farcical and burlesque. For example, Miss Reba's brothel in Sanctuary is Temple Drake's sordid prison, where Popeye corrupts and debases her, while Miss Reba, totally devoid of a moral perspective, muses over Temple's luck in having Popeye spend so much money on her. The hugely fat and asthmatic madam, constantly swilling beer and gin, veers between episodes of excessive mourning for her deceased pimp and violent outbursts, directed especially against the two lapdogs who constantly leap and snap around her feet. In The Reivers: A Reminiscence (1962), a comic novel and a paean to Faulkner's southern boyhood, the adolescent protagonist visits Miss Reba's brothel in 1905. Even allowing for the fact that Miss Reba is twenty-five years younger in The Reivers, the alteration is remarkable. All the grotesque menace attaching to the madam and her house in Sanctuary is gone. The Miss Reba of The Reivers is more like one of John Steinbeck's whores with a heart of gold. She has become a piece of nostalgia. When tones of horror, suspense, or mystery suit Faulkner's purposes, however, his rank among twentieth century mystery and detective writers must be considered.

Patrick Adcock

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: Sanctuary, 1931; Light in August, 1932; Absalom, Absalom!, 1936; Intruder in the Dust, 1948

SHORT FICTION: Knight's Gambit, 1949

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Soldiers' Pay, 1926; Mosquitoes, 1927; Sartoris, 1929; The Sound and the Fury, 1929; As I Lay Dying, 1930; Pylon, 1935; The Unvanquished, 1938; The Wild Palms, 1939; The Hamlet, 1940; Go Down, Moses, 1942; The Bear, 1942 (novella); Re- quiem for a Nun, 1951; A Fable, 1954; The Town, 1957; The Mansion, 1959; The Reivers, 1962; The Wishing Tree, 1964 (fairy tale); Flags in the Dust, 1973 (original version of Sartoris); Mayday, 1976 (fable)

SHORT FICTION: These Thirteen, 1931; Doctor Martino, and Other Stories, 1934; The Portable Faulkner, 1946, 1967; Collected Short Stories of William Faulkner, 1950; Big Woods, 1955; Three Famous Short Novels, 1958; Uncollected Stories of William Faulkner, 1979

SCREENPLAYS: Today We Live, 1933; To Have and Have Not, 1945; The Big Sleep, 1946; Faulkner's MGM Screenplays, 1982

POETRY: The Marble Faun, 1924; A Green Bough, 1933

NONFICTION: New Orleans Sketches, 1958; Faulkner in the University, 1959; Faulkner at West Point, 1964; Essays, Speeches and Public Letters, 1965; The Faulkner-Cowley File: Letters and Memories, 1944-1962, 1966 (Malcolm Cowley, editor); Lion in the Garden, 1968; Selected Letters, 1977

MISCELLANEOUS: The Faulkner Reader, 1954; William Faulkner: Early Prose and Poetry, 1962

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bleikasten, Andre. The Ink of Melancholy: Faulkner's Novels from "The Sound and the Fury" to "Light in August." Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1990. Concentrating on four of William Faulkner's finest novels, Bleikasten offers a wide-ranging study of the writer and the limits of authorship.

Blotner, Joseph. Faulkner: A Biography. 1964. Reprint. Jackson: University of Mississippi Press, 2005. This extensive but readable biography is the major source for details about Faulkner's life. It contains many photographs and a useful index.

Brooks, Cleanth. William Faulkner: The Yoknapatawpha County. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 1963. This venerable classic of Faulkner criticism is one of the best introductions, treating Faulkner's characteristic themes, historical and social background, and offering detailed readings of the major novels and stories.

Gray, Richard. The Life of William Faulkner: A Critical Biography. Oxford, England: Blackwell, 1994. A noted Faulkner scholar, Gray closely integrates the life and work. Part 1 suggests a method of approaching Faulkner's life; part 2 concentrates on his apprentice years; part 3 explains his discovery of Yoknapatawpha and the transformation of his region into his fiction; part 4 deals with his treatment of past and present; part 5 addresses his exploration of place; and part 6 analyzes his final novels, reflecting on his creation of Yoknapatawpha. Includes family trees, chronology, notes, and a bibliography.

Hobson, Fred, ed. William Faulkner's "Absalom, Absalom!": A Casebook. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003. Extensive treatment of Faulkner's greatest novel, including his use of history, family, race, and other essential southern themes.

Inge, M. Thomas. William Faulkner. New York: Overlook Duckworth, 2006. Part of an illustrated series, this volume examines the life and works of Faulkner.

Marius, Richard. Reading Faulkner: Introductions to the First Thirteen Novels. Compiled and edited by Nancy Grisham Anderson. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 2006. Compilation of lectures originally delivered in a course on Faulkner. Includes separate lectures devoted to Sanctuary, Light in August, and Absalom, Absalom! Bibliographic references and index.

Porter, Carolyn. William Faulkner. New York: Oxford University Press, 2007. Part of Oxford's Lives and Legacies series, this work examines the life of Faulkner and his major works.

Singal, Daniel J. William Faulkner: The Making of a Modernist. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 1997. A study of the thought and art of Faulkner, charting the development of his ideas from their source in his reading to their embodiment in his writing. Depicts two Faulkners: the country gentleman and the intellectual man of letters.

Williamson, Joel. William Faulkner and Southern History. New York: Oxford University Press, 1993. A distinguished historian divides his book into sections on Faulkner's ancestry, his biography, and his writing. Includes notes and genealogy.

KENNETH FEARING

Born: Oak Park, Illinois; July 28, 1902

Died: New York, New York; June 26, 1961

Also wrote as Donald F. Bedford

Types of plot: Inverted; hard-boiled; psychological; thriller

CONTRIBUTION

Kenneth Fearing's best novels are constructed around a core of mystery that seems to become more complex the more carefully it is examined. Set in the mean streets of Manhattan and within the claustrophobic confines of self-enclosed, self-protective organizations, their mood reflects the despair of the Depression and projects the postwar paranoia of the Cold War. Their language is the sometimes brittle, often laconic, rough-edged vernacular of a poet familiar with the underside of existence.

Fearing's characters are isolated people, standing wary and apart from a mechanized world they despise and then driven further into a kind of exile by the loss of the only person on whom they counted for romance. Accurately reflecting the loss of certainty of the modern era, Fearing's protagonists are both victims and avengers, their guilt or innocence never completely established, the ambiguity of their moral position forcing them to make decisions based on the precept that their only means of creating value is through action. In the process of solving the mystery they face, Fearing casts them as versions of the non-aligned detective as existential explorer, aware of the ultimate absurdity of existence, struggling to survive in a nightmare world.

BIOGRAPHY

Kenneth Flexner Fearing was born on July 28, 1902, in Oak Park, Illinois, the same relatively genteel suburb where Ernest Hemingway spent his childhood. He attended public school there while his father worked as an attorney in Chicago. Fearing attended the University of Wisconsin, where he was graduated with a bachelor's degree in 1924. After working briefly in Chicago as an apprentice journalist, he moved to New York City, where he settled in the artists' enclave of Greenwich Village in lower Manhattan. He held several jobs as a salesperson and clerk during the next few years before beginning a career as a publicity writer, a freelance journalist, and an editorial writer for several newspapers in 1927. At the same time, Fearing was contributing stories to pulp magazines and writing poetry regularly. He has been described by Kenneth Rexroth as one of the first "poets of the contemporary American city," and his first book of poems, Angel Arms, was published in 1929. Fearing completed two other books of poetry during the 1930's and was awarded a fellowship in creative writing by the Guggenheim Foundation.

In 1939, drawing on the experiences of his first wife, who was a nurse, Fearing wrote The Hospital, a novel whose multinarrative scheme became his trademark as a writer of fiction. The relative success of this novel enabled Fearing to turn his attention to fiction, and he produced novels steadily through the 1940's, achieving his greatest success with the publication of The Big Clock in 1946. The story was made into a film in 1948.

Fearing continued to write poetry and fiction throughout the 1950's, but aside from Loneliest Girl in the World (1951)—a book that presented trenchant observations about society while describing a giant "talking" computer, the crucial element in the mystery—he was not particularly successful either critically or commercially. He died of cancer on June 26, 1961, a year after the publication of his last novel, an exposé of big business called The Crozart Story.

ANALYSIS

Kenneth Fearing was so determinedly an artist of an avant-garde sensibility that even his most conventional work is marked by some unusual stylistic and structural devices. His concern for the innovative worked against his instinctive gift for constructing an elaborate but ultimately rigorously clear and logical mystery story, and his desire to provide a sympathetic perspective for all of his major characters tended to limit the depth of the central character in each of his novels. At the same time, Fearing's inclination to see events from a consciously unconventional stance contributed to his ability to capture the distinctive psychological ethos surrounding his characters, and this permitted him to portray his protagonists as versions of the modernist rebel/hero wavering on a fault line between legal and criminal behavior.

Fearing's life as an artist anticipated the drift into bohemian patterns of living pursued on a widespread if temporary basis in the 1960's, but although most would-be dropouts in the 1960's went fairly quickly from an extreme radicalism back to a standard job and its concomitant demands, Fearing managed to combine relatively conventional employment with a sustained commitment to his avant-garde artistic credo. While supporting himself as a copywriter, publicist, and editorial writer for several New York newspapers, he wrote poetry steadily, beginning with a Carl Sandburg-influenced voice of the proletariat but gradually shifting toward the style of E. E. Cummings, a neighbor in Greenwich Village. Fearing was published in Ezra Pound's magazine Exiles in the mid-1920's and found his true voice and subject in the reproduction of the moods and rhythms of life in his vision of the city as a great urban wasteland. Described by Rexroth as "rhetorical, denunciatory, agitational in intent," his poems were designed to express the feelings of a normally mute and ignored underclass and are "immersed in the lingo of the mass culture." The world of many of Fearing's poems is the world of the desperate, nighttime streets of Manhattan, a setting of lurking violence, driven inhabitants, and a crazed kind of energy flow that made life exciting if uncertain.

By the time Fearing began to write crime fiction in the 1940's, his empathy for the underdog, his command of the language of the street-corner cynic, and his belief that artistic expression was an important means of establishing value in a chaotic world had all been fairly well developed in his poetry. Latent in his work was a real contempt for middle-American society and organizations, a deep suspicion about the efficacy of the system of criminal justice operating in New York, and a fascination with the psychology of a man under severe stress.

THE HOSPITAL

To explore these motifs further, Fearing realized that he would have to work in an area that gave him the opportunity to develop some of the ideas that he had been asserting in his poetry; because he had already been writing short stories for popular magazines, the extension to a novel was not that great a departure from his previous efforts. Even so, Fearing may have felt more confident handling short narratives, for in his first novel, The Hospital, he created a discontinuous narrative style that became a kind of signature. Each chapter in The Hospital is presented in a first-person voice by a different character. In addition, influenced by the literary experiments of other contemporary poets, Fearing distorted conventional chronology by setting the entire novel at approximately three o'clock in the afternoon.

The repetition of action from different points of view is inherently cinematic and may have accounted for the two successful adaptations of his best novel, The Big Clock. It is also an excellent method for building suspense, as tension accumulates with each successive variation of the core action. The hour around which the action pivots is also the moment when crises in the lives of all the principal characters reach a point of climax. Although some sympathy for each character is dissipated by the continual shift in narrative focus, the Zolaesque sense of gritty, realistic detail and the language that one critic likened to a "staccato prose poem" made the novel generally successful. In spite of some adverse critical commentary (to which Fearing responded by portraying several critics and literary careerists as dilettantes in his 1941 novel Dagger of the Mind), Fearing continued to use a multiple narrative scheme in all of his work.

Paradoxically, although the presentation of narrative action from each character's point of view is supposed to evoke some understanding for everyone's motives, its effect in Fearing's work is actually to undercut sympathy for all the characters; the reader is kept at a distance from the field of action because none of the characters matters that much. The "objectivity" offered as a virtue is actually the bogus impartiality of an observer who conceals his position so totally that commitment is absent in a moral crisis that demands an individual response. According to Rexroth, Fearing was convinced that "Western civilization was already dead on its feet, a walking corpse bled of all value," and the appearance of authorial diffidence undercut the response he intended. That is particularly true in those novels in which Fearing excludes himself so completely from the action that he has no close correspondence with any character.

Reluctant to give up a narrative strategy in which he evidently believed (Clark Gifford's Body, published in 1942, has thirty separate narrators), Fearing, in his best work, made his protagonist the primary narrator, the voice that begins and concludes the narrative, and put his or her fate at the center of the narrative. In this way, his scorn for society, an attitude he shared with such hard-boiled writers of mystery and detective fiction as Raymond Chandler and Dashiell Hammett and such contemporary novelists as Ernest Hemingway and Henry Miller, formed the narrative sensibility from which the action unfolded. This embedded an edgy vibrancy in the "voice" and enabled Fearing to use his talent for constructing an ingenious, compelling mystery without the distraction of the other narrative threads he had to weave around the plot in his weaker work. Instead, the core of the mystery was contained within the life of the principal narrator.

DAGGER OF THE MIND

Fearing's three strongest novels—Loneliest Girl in the World, Dagger of the Mind, and The Big Clock—operate on this principle. In each case, the narrator is an outsider. What sets him (or her, in Loneliest Girl in the World) apart is a sense that the values of mainstream society are worthless and that an individual's personal resources are the only things on which one can rely. In a sense, this person shares, with the Hemingway "Code Hero," a set of personal principles, developed through some testing situation, which form the basis for behavior under conditions of intense pressure. Once they have been drawn into the mystery that becomes the absolute center of their lives, the characters exhibit behavior similar to that of a detective operating as the existential outsider.

For Fearing, however, the main narrator is never actually a detective. Instead, he is a person pulled into the world of criminal activity by two factors. One is an apparently random combination of circumstances that seem to have been initiated for no discernible reason but that close like a snare on the narrator. The other stems from a curious fascination for life beyond laws that seem inadequate or ludicrous. Once the narrator becomes involved, both his interest in the mystery as a challenge and his need to face a threat to his survival engage his deductive abilities. Yet rational thinking, no matter how impressively organized, is never sufficient, as forces beyond the narrator's control and sometimes beyond his understanding seem to be at work to thwart his most ingenious designs.

Of Fearing's two best books, the narrator of The Big Clock survives—for the moment. The narrator of Dagger of the Mind does not. In each case, his "guilt" is debatable, but there is no way he could be considered completely innocent. In each case, mitigating circumstances, the complicating factors always present in a world where loose ends remain loose and no mess is ever really cleaned up, undermine any attempt at a clear definition of right or wrong. For Fearing, who was writing in the same Zeitgeist that led Albert Camus to his thoughts on the absurdity of existence, no one is free of guilt, because the act of living in an absurd universe precludes the possibility of establishing standards of behavior that could justify universal judgments of human action.

Thus, the character George Stroud tries to get a few steps ahead of "the Big Clock," which Fearing uses as a symbol of an indifferent, inexplicable cosmos that eventually grinds everything within its wheels. Although he frequently disregards the letter of the law, Stroud draws the line at murder and survives. Christopher Bartel, the artist who narrates Dagger of the Mind, does not consciously plan to kill but commits three murders. He is convicted and executed. In Fearing's world, the fate of the two men could easily have been reversed. In fact, Stroud's relief at his escape is tempered by his feeling that "the big, silent, invisible clock . . . would get around to me again. Inevitably. Soon." Bartel, as he faces death, shares with Camus's Meursault an exceptional keenness of mind and a sense of revelation about to occur.

The ultimate destinies of the two men, then, are not presented as a judgment on their lives. Actual survival is dependent on too many things beyond human control. What matters is the manner in which each man reacts to the unfolding events in the process of his struggle to locate the key to the mystery. The choices they make, especially those regarding the temptation to resort to violence, to bludgeon their way through perplexing problems, become the measure of the morality of their character. Both men are the most accomplished of all the principal characters in the arts of detection, and in that sense they have the greatest opportunity to choose alternative courses of action. If their choices fully involve their intelligence, diligence, perception, insight, and ability to hold contradictory forces in suspension while organizing people, ideas, and events into an investigation, then they have the potential to be "heroic" (inasmuch as that word applies at all in Fearing's world).

The fact that these characters are pulled into the investigation when a person they love is murdered adds to the gravity and importance of the situation and also makes the solving of the mystery a method for restoring some sense of solidity to their lives. Although both men have families, their participation in the process of detection is clearly the most vivid and satisfying aspect of their lives. Like Camus's absurd hero, they can create value in a universe of random events by applying logic, by trusting their minds, even when their instincts tell them that hunch and chance are as likely to lead to a conclusion as their plans.

Although Dagger of the Mind works well as a psychological thriller, or, as one reviewer put it, as a "study in abnormal psychology," the fact that Christopher Bartel, the primary narrator, is himself the murderer and the fact that the mystery depends on the withholding of this information from the reader destroys the tension of the narrative at the point when it should be most gripping.

THE BIG CLOCK

In Fearing's finest work, The Big Clock, there are no such seams through which narrative tension might escape. The development of a situation of almost unbearable suspense is plotted so well that it has served as the basis for two good films, the 1948 version of the same title directed by John Farrow and the riveting No Way Out (1987), which reaches too far for an unnecessary double-reverse conclusion but captures the essential drama of George Stroud's frantic efforts to avoid exposure. Stroud is the editor of a specialty magazine, Crimeways, in a Henry Luce-like publishing empire. The magazine covers the criminal world, reporting, investigating, sometimes inducing, and occasionally inventing crimes. When he falls in love with his employer's mistress, Pauline Delos, in an encounter so powerful that the normally wary, slightly cynical Stroud is overwhelmed, his reserves are removed to reveal that he, like Philip Marlowe, has a hidden romantic nature. When Earl Janoth, the chief executive of the organization that publishes Crimeways, accidentally kills Pauline Delos, Stroud has just left her and is the only witness to Janoth's presence at the scene of the crime. Janoth sees someone but does not recognize that it is Stroud. Because he knows that he has been spotted, Janoth decides to utilize the full investigative power of the organization to find the witness and silence him. As Mary M. Lay puts it, "The reader knows that George cannot escape his own pursuit; the suspense comes from wondering how long he can avoid the investigators he has assigned to help in the search."

What makes the book so compelling is that Stroud's attempts to shield himself, implicate Janoth, and maintain a front of nonconcern while intimately being involved in every detail of the investigation and while personally enraged by the murder are rendered in remarkably vivid terms. A complex manhunt is kept comprehensible so that the reader is caught up in the case, and Stroud, although never becoming a figure of cheap sentiment, is nevertheless presented as relatively likable and decent—much like actor Kevin Costner's conception of the character in the film No Way Out.

As the investigation narrows its focus toward Stroud himself, every element of his character is tested. His acuteness, his organizational strategy, and his sense of justice are all engaged so that he is both frightened and fully alive. As his options are removed, Stroud becomes more responsive to some of the things (his nice family, challenging job, life in the great city) that had grown stale for him and begins to cherish them when faced with their destruction. The irony of his increasing desperation is underscored by the fact that he is trying to preserve a life that he would have discarded for his lover. The irony of his dilemma—that he must appear to be avidly pursuing the investigation while actually trying to subvert it—is reinforced by the fact that chance and luck keep altering everyone's plans.

Unlike the world of Ross Macdonald, the world of Fearing discloses no "connections" that ultimately make sense of his characters' lives. Stopping just short of nihilism, Fearing offers the temporary pleasures afforded by quirks of character, fine art, the elusive possibility of love, and the excitement of a formidable mental challenge. It is the film noir world of the 1940's, in which the voice of the narrator delivers opinions, observations, and wry humor through a haze of cigarette smoke that drifts across a table covered with half-empty whiskey glasses. It is past midnight and it is raining. It has been for quite some time.

Leon Lewis

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: Dagger of the Mind, 1941 (also known as Cry Killer!); The Big Clock, 1946; Loneliest Girl in the World, 1951 (also known as The Sound of Murder); The Generous Heart, 1954; The Crozart Story, 1960

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: The Hospital, 1939; Clark Gifford's Body, 1942; John Barry, 1947 (as Donald F. Bedford, with Donald Friede and Henry Bedford-Jones)

POETRY: Angel Arms, 1929; Poems, 1935; Dead Reckoning: A Book of Poetry, 1938; Collected Poems, 1940; Afternoon of a Pawnbroker, and Other Poems, 1943; Stranger at Coney Island, and Other Poems, 1948; New and Selected Poems, 1956; Complete Poems, 1993

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Barnard, Rita. The Great Depression and the Culture of Abundance: Kenneth Fearing, Nathanael West, and Mass Culture in the 1930's. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1995. Analyzes the political and social views of Fearing and Nathanael West and relates them to the history of American literature and popular culture. Includes bibliographical references and index.

Burns, Jim. Beats, Bohemians, and Intellectuals. Nottingham, Nottinghamshire, England: Trent Editions, 2000. Fearing is one of the figures to whom a chapter is devoted in this study of American popular culture of the 1950's. Bibliographic references and index.

Deutsch, Babette. "Flooded with the Immediate Age." The Nation 149 (August 19, 1939): 201-202. An essay that contends that Fearing is an ideal spokesperson for his age. Deutsch considers his poetry in technical terms, concentrating on tone and rhythm in particular, but his analysis can be used to understand the place of his detective fiction in American culture as well.

Horsley, Lee. The Noir Thriller. New York: Palgrave, 2001. This scholarly treatise on the thriller genre discusses Fearing's The Big Clock. Bibliography and index.

Kalaidjian, Walter. American Culture Between the Wars: Revisionary Modernism and Postmodern Critique. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993. Discusses Fearing's avant-garde approach to text. Primarily a poetic study, but important to an understanding of all Fearing's writings. Bibliographic references and index.

E. X. FERRARSMorna Doris Brown*Born: Rangoon, Burma; September 6, 1907Died: Place unknown; March 30, 1995Also wrote as Elizabeth FerrarsTypes of plot: Amateur sleuth; police procedural; cozyPRINCIPAL SERIES

Toby Dyke, 1940-1942

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

TOBY DYKE, an upper-class university graduate of about twenty-five, employed as a journalist. His air of indolence and amused detachment conceals a shrewd intelligence.

CONTRIBUTION

E. X. Ferrars cannot be considered one of the major innovators of detective fiction. Nevertheless, she had a solid core of admirers, who included the late Anthony Boucher, mystery reviewer for The New York Times. Her work was in the classic British tradition: The principal characters belong to the upper or the middle class, great emphasis is placed on intricate plotting, and the story aims principally at unraveling a puzzle. In contrast to many other classic authors, Ferrars was an excellent analyst of character, and her stories often turn on psychological points. She avoided depicting violence in any detail; her style is clear and efficient, with an occasional resort to literary quotation.

BIOGRAPHY

E. X. Ferrars was born Morna Doris MacTaggart on September 6, 1907. Although born in Rangoon, Burma (at that time a British protectorate), she lived most of her life in Scotland and was in character and style firmly British. She attended Bedales School in Hampshire from 1918 to 1924 and University College, London, from 1925 to 1928. She received a diploma in journalism from the latter institution in 1928.

In 1940, MacTaggart (Ferrars) married Robert Brown, a Scottish academic. In the year of her marriage, she began her long career as a writer of detective fiction, adopting her mother's maiden name, Ferrars, as her pseudonym.

Besides her prolific output of novels and stories, Ferrars played an active role in organizations of crime writers. She was a founding member of the Crime Writers' Association in 1953. She was also a member of the Detection Club and the Mystery Writers of America. Throughout her career, Ferrars continued to produce a similar type of story. Her writing career lasted for more than forty-five years.

ANALYSIS

E. X. Ferrars's career may be conveniently divided into an early and late phase. At first, her novels were high-spirited and often humorous, with one episode following another in quick succession. Later, her novels became more down-to-earth, and the psychological complexity of her characters assumed a greater importance. The differences between the two stages should not, however, be exaggerated. All of her mysteries have been of a traditional type, in which the principal goal of the work is to disguise from the reader the identity of the criminal.

DON'T MONKEY WITH MURDER

An examination of one of Ferrars's first novels, Don't Monkey with Murder (1942), will illustrate both her early pattern and some constants throughout her career. (The work appeared in the United States under the title The Shape of a Stain.) Its main character, Toby Dyke, has the odd habit of turning up when friends of his have just been murdered. He seems at first to be a member of the idle rich, whose alleged employment as a journalist hardly disguises his indolence. Dyke finds it relatively easy, however, to pinpoint the murderer of the man he had visited and discovered dead, the owner of a castle in Scotland. Like most of Ferrars's early novels, this work features a brisk pace, frequent humorous episodes, and a large cast of characters. Dyke enters into a platonic romance with a young woman who, as the reader quickly realizes, can have nothing to do with the crime, in spite of appearances to the contrary. Ferrars's story is in fact so "packed with matter" that following its twists becomes difficult.

Because of the crowded nature of the book and its emphasis on humor, characterization here takes a back seat. The reader does get a vivid impression of Dyke, but his constant quips place him within British tradition (particularly during the 1930's and 1940's) of witty male protagonists and thus impede his being seen as an individual. The profusion of his witticisms makes Dyke reminiscent of Dorothy L. Sayers's Lord Peter Wimsey and even the Jeeves of P. G. Wodehouse.

On the strength of her early work, Ferrars might have become a practitioner of the humorous detective story, along the lines of her modern Henry Cecil. Such was not to be the case, however, for her career evolved in a much more conventional fashion.

THE WANDERING WIDOWS

A characteristic novel of her later period is The Wandering Widows (1962), whose main character is once again a young man, Robin Nicholl. Nicholl is, however, a much more serious, and incidentally more middle-class, figure than Dyke. Robin has a few weeks available before starting a new job, and he decides to spend his time by vacationing on the island of Mull, one of the Hebrides. His reason for choosing this island is his preference for solitude: It is a romantic, isolated place, whose atmosphere is conducive to long, pensive walks. Ferrars, who clearly knows the Hebrides well, skillfully uses the geography and ambience of Mull to suggest the main features of Robin's personality.

Robin's desire for a few weeks of peace in which, like Heraclitus, he could "seek for himself," is thwarted by his encounter with the Wandering Widows. These are four melancholic women who roam the island, wearing expensive jewels. They soon prove to have personalities as strange as their attire, and, as one might anticipate, murder is in the offing.

From this description, a similarity between Ferrars's earlier work and her subsequent endeavors leaps to one's attention. Here, as before, a bizarre element is present. Oddness is not, however, emphasized for its own sake. Rather, Ferrars devotes considerable care to her depiction of the personalities and difficulties of the widows. The reader has a vivid sense of each as a genuine person rather than a stereotyped comic character.

HANGED MAN'S HOUSE

Ferrars showed her ability to vary from her usual

pattern of domestic intrigue leading to murder in Hanged Man's House (1974). This novel represents her closest approach to an espionage story. In this novel, Dr. Charles Gair, a scientist working at the Martindale research establishment, is found hanged. It soon transpires that he was not killed by hanging but had died before. Subsequently, a second body is discovered in Gair's house—this one perfectly mummified. This victim turns out to be a foreign visitor who had been missing for a year. What does his death have to do with Gair's? Why is the latter's passport missing? These are among the questions confronting the book's protagonist, Inspector Patrick Dunn.

From the material so far presented, a reader might expect that an espionage tale would follow, but appearances can mislead, and they often do in Ferrars's work. She never deviated too much from her usual sort of story. Here, as before, there is a handsome, shrewd, kind young man who solves the crime. Further, the plot has nothing at all to do with espionage, whatever expectations the story's setting may have aroused. A romantic entanglement, involving among others the wife of the research center's administrative officer and Gair's estranged wife, lies at the center of the plot.

ALIVE AND DEAD

Similarly, in another novel published in the same year as Hanged Man's House, Alive and Dead, Ferrars only superficially departs from her usual donnée. Alive and Dead is set in a home for unwed mothers. Ferrars does not use this setting, however, as an opportunity to comment on the controversial social issues of poverty and abortion. Quite the contrary, a traditional story once more ensues. A young woman working at the home finds oddities in the patterns of referral the home employs. She does not allow her dismissal from the home to impede her attempt to get to the bottom of the strange referrals—but murder soon muddies the waters.

If, once more, Ferrars has not much altered her course, it does not follow that she was uninterested in women's issues. Her female characters often tend to be well-educated career women, whose pursuit of a career does not take second place to romance and marriage. Her emphasis on strong, independent female characters allies her more with later writers such as P. D. James than with her slightly older contemporaries

Agatha Christie and Ngaio Marsh. Still, Ferrars cannot be viewed as a particularly ardent advocate of women's rights. The question of women's position is treated in her novels more as a matter of nuance than as a major theme. She cannot in this regard be compared to Gladys Mitchell, for whom the place of women was all-important.

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT

In the works so far discussed, Ferrars stressed plot much more than character, however much her approach to the latter increased in seriousness and depth over the years. A change took place in some of Ferrars's later works, beginning with Last Will and Testament (1978). Here a new character is introduced, Virginia Freer, who reappears in Frog in the Throat (1980). She is a woman in her mid-thirties who has had to divorce an irresponsible husband, who has some connection, never fully specified, with the criminal underworld. Ferrars analyzes at considerable length Virginia's attitudes toward her former husband, demonstrating a remarkable skill in the depiction of precise shadings of emotion. Sometimes, Virginia admires him; at others, she resents him; more frequently, she does both at once. Yet, although her attitude toward him is never unreservedly hostile and her problems as a divorcée are candidly mentioned, she never seriously entertains the thought of reuniting with him. She is no romantic cutout, but a realistically conceived person whose personality elicits a shock of recognition from the reader.

Unlike P. D. James and Ruth Rendell, however, Ferrars resisted firmly any tendency to move from detective fiction to a standard novel. If Virginia is a personality one might easily come across in a novel, her fellow characters are not. Her former husband, for example, has many of the traits of Ferrars's familiar heroes, including good humor and remarkable powers of intuition and detection. Although he finds it at least as difficult to speak truthfully as most people do to tell a significant lie, he is nevertheless a likable character. Further, the story itself is fairly conventional. Virginia's husband has been promised a legacy, but interfering and malicious relatives of the old woman who has died soon complicate matters. The elderly benefactress has not died a natural death but has been murdered.

In summary, Ferrars was a hardworking professional within a well-established literary genre. Paradoxically, as the style of detective fiction she practiced went out of fashion, her work became more original simply by remaining constant. In the 1940's, Ferrars was but one of many writers of classic mysteries; by the 1970's and 1980's, when mystery fiction rarely followed the conventions once customary in the English detective story, she came to seem unique.

Ferrars's style is direct and to the point. She displayed a wide familiarity with literature, although she did not clutter her pages with allusions to the classics in the style of Sayers. Characters will sometimes quote a line or two of appropriate verse; Walter de la Mare is a frequent source, although generally not explicitly named.

One characteristic of her style sharply distinguished Ferrars from many contemporary mystery writers. Although her stories involve murder, violence is never described; the details are left entirely to the reader's imagination. Although she was no prude, she avoided the modern custom of explicitly describing sexual encounters. Her characters all speak in educated English, and she displayed no interest in portraying members of other classes whose characteristic form of expression would differ from this. Vulgar or abusive language is also conspicuous by its absence. If the world she portrayed was a limited one, it was nevertheless one she thoroughly explored with persistence and ingenuity over her long career.

David Gordon

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

TOBY DYKE SERIES: Give a Corpse a Bad Name, 1940; Remove the Bodies, 1940 (also known as Rehearsals for Murder); Death in Botanist's Bay, 1941 (also known as Murder of a Suicide); Don't Monkey with Murder, 1942 (also known as The Shape of a Stain); Your Neck in a Noose, 1942 (also known as Neck in a Noose)

VIRGINIA FREER SERIES: Last Will and Testament, 1978; Frog in the Throat, 1980

NONSERIES NOVELS: 1945-1960 • I, Said the Fly, 1945; Murder Among Friends, 1946 (also known as Cheat the Hangman); With Murder in Mind, 1948;

The March Hare Murders, 1949; Hunt the Tortoise, 1950; Milk of Human Kindness, 1950; Alibi for a Witch, 1952; The Clock That Wouldn't Stop, 1952; Murder in Time, 1953; The Lying Voices, 1954; Enough to Kill a Horse, 1955; Always Say Die, 1956 (also known as We Haven't Seen Her Lately); Murder Moves In, 1956 (also known as Kill or Cure); Count the Cost, 1957 (also known as Unreasonable Doubt); Furnished for Murder, 1957; Depart This Life, 1958 (also known as A Tale of Two Murders); Fear the Light, 1960; The Sleeping Dogs, 1960

1961-1970 • The Busy Body, 1962 (also known as Seeing Double); The Wandering Widows, 1962; The Decayed Gentlewoman, 1963 (also known as A Legal Fiction); The Doubly Dead, 1963; Ninth Life, 1965; No Peace for the Wicked, 1966; Zero at the Bone, 1967; The Swaying Pillars, 1968; Skeleton Staff, 1969; The Seven Sleepers, 1970

1971-1984 • A Stranger and Afraid, 1971; Breath of Suspicion, 1972; Foot in the Grave, 1972; The Small World of Murder, 1973; Alive and Dead, 1974; Hanged Man's House, 1974; Drowned Rat, 1975; The Cup and the Lip, 1975; Blood Flies Upward, 1976; Murders Anonymous, 1977; The Pretty Pink Shroud, 1977; In at the Kill, 1978; Witness Before the Fact, 1979; Experiment with Death, 1981; Thinner than Water, 1981; Skeleton in Search of a Cupboard, 1982 (also known as Skeleton in Search of a Closet); Death of a Minor Character, 1983; Something Wicked, 1983; Root of All Evil, 1984

OTHER SHORT FICTION: Designs on Life, 1980

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

EDITED TEXT: Planned Departures, 1958

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adrian, Jack. "Obituaries: Elizabeth Ferrars." The Independent, April 19, 1995, p. 14. Obituary of this founding member of the Crime Writers' Association notes her popularity in the United States and her writing of cozies.

Ferrars, Elizabeth. "The Canceling of Mrs. Arbutnot." In Julian Symons at 80: A Tribute, edited by Patricia Craig. Helsinki, Finland: Eurographica, 1992. One of Ferrars's last stories, written as part of a tribute to a fellow mystery writer and therefore an important example not merely of her craft but also of her portrayal of that craft to her peers.

Herbert, Rosemary. Review of Something Wicked, by E. X. Ferrars. Library Journal 109, no. 4 (March 1, 1984): 511. A professor comes to an English village where he discovers that the snow covers hatred and evil stemming from the long-ago death of a neighbor. Reviewer notes the “intriguing characterization.”

Horsley, Lee. Twentieth-Century Crime Fiction. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005. Very useful overview of the history and parameters of the crime-fiction genre; helps place Ferrars’s work within that genre.

Klein, Kathleen Gregory. Great Women Mystery Writers: Classic to Contemporary. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994. Contains a biocritical essay on Ferrars and deals at length with many of her contemporaries.

ROBERT L. FISH

Born: Cleveland, Ohio; August 21, 1912

Died: Trumbull, Connecticut; February 23, 1981

Also wrote as Robert L. Pike; Lawrence Roberts

Types of plot: Police procedural; thriller

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Captain José da Silva, 1962-1975

Police Lieutenants, 1963-1976

Kek Huuygens, 1967-1976

Carruthers, Simpson, and Briggs, 1968-1979

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

CAPTAIN JOSÉ DA SILVA, the swarthy, romantic, mustachioed captain of police in Rio de Janeiro, is independent, intuitive, witty, and courageous. He is also the liaison between the Brazilian police and Interpol.

WILSON, an undercover agent from the United States embassy in Rio, acts as da Silva’s assistant. A friend and generous supporter of the captain, he is both a help and a major source of frustration to the officer.

LIEUTENANT CLANCY of the Fifty-second Precinct in New York and LIEUTENANT JIM REARDON of San Francisco are representatives of the demanding and dangerous life of the professional law enforcement officer. Clancy is the older veteran, and Reardon is the younger and more passionate officer. Both are humane and resourceful men who face personal problems and tough decisions as they resolve their cases.

KEK HUUYGENS, an international smuggler, is a man of cultivated tastes, a collector of fine art, and a master of his calling; he appears in several novels and short stories.

CARRUTHERS, SIMPSON, and BRIGGS are a set of intriguing and reprobate former writers of detective fiction whose exploits are recorded with amusement and tolerance.

CONTRIBUTION

As Robert L. Fish said in numerous interviews and speeches, his work was written with the view to entertain. He wanted his characters to be realistic and their locales to be authentic, however, and believed that he wrote best when describing that with which he was familiar. His lifetime of travel and work throughout the world permitted him to achieve this authenticity naturally. With wit and charm, Fish informed his public of the relentless demands and scant rewards of the professional law enforcement agencies, the importance of one dedicated individual in a moment of crisis, and the universality of human foibles.

Fish’s craftsmanship is immediately apparent: His well-defined characters change and grow in sophistication and maturity in his series; his plots are constructed with care; and his prose is economical, cogent, and polished. His impressive body of work includes pastiche/parody, thrillers, and delightful short stories as well as his celebrated series.

BIOGRAPHY

Robert Lloyd Fish was born in Cleveland, Ohio, on August 21, 1912. He received a bachelor of science degree from the Case School of Applied Science, later Case Western Reserve University, in 1933 and served in the Ohio National Guard from 1933 to 1936. He married Mamie Kates in 1935, and the couple had two daughters. Fish's career as an engineer was highly successful. He held numerous managerial positions in major companies, including Firestone Tire and Rubber. He was a consultant on vinyl plastics in many parts of the world—Korea, Mexico, Taiwan, and Venezuela, among others. When he submitted his first effort at detective fiction to Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine in 1960, he was forty-eight years old and had lived with his family in Rio de Janeiro for ten years.

Fish was to have as successful a career in writing as he had in engineering. Several popular series established his reputation after he received the Mystery Writers of America's Edgar Allan Poe Award for The Fugitive, written in 1962. He collected two more Edgars from that organization and served as its president in 1978. Two of his stories were made into films. Mute Witness (1963) was the basis for Bullitt (1968), starring Steve McQueen and Robert Vaughn, and The Assassination Bureau (1963), which was the completion of a Jack London spy story, was made into an English film with Diana Rigg, Telly Savalas, and Curt Jurgens; the film, however, departs so far from the original as to be unrecognizable.

Failing health did not deter Fish. He had open heart surgery in 1971 but continued to work at his Connecticut home until his death on February 23, 1981, when he was found in his study, pen in hand. A moving tribute from his friends in a memorial section of The Armchair Detective indicates that he was also a humane and compassionate man. In 1984, the Mystery Writers of America established the Robert L. Fish Memorial Award, sponsored by the author's estate. The award honors the best mystery short story by a previously unpublished author.

ANALYSIS

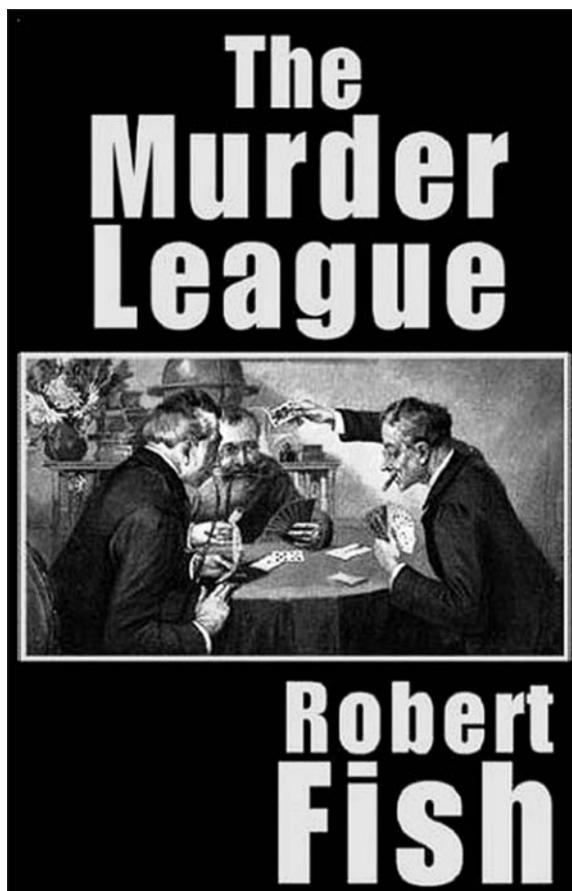

Robert L. Fish's career began in 1960 with a short story, "The Case of the Ascot Tie," which introduced the memorable character of Schlock Homes. Eleven more Homes stories were written between 1960 and 1966, all of which first appeared in Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine. Clearly, Fish was a student of Arthur Conan Doyle and knew the canon well enough to use the latter's style and devices both creatively and comically. His stories are, in the opinion of most critics, excellent pastiches and parodies of Doyle's work. Schlock has a friend and narrator, Dr. Whatley; Mrs. Essex lovingly keeps house; Schlock is frequently confronted by the evil plans of Professor Marty; and much of the action takes place at 221B Bagel Street. Inevitably a worried or desperate person appears hoping to win the assistance of the great detective. Questioning these clients in a manner that does credit to his model, getting at the pertinent facts by the most logical of deductive reasoning, Schlock is nearly always wrong in every particular.

The tales are laced throughout with puns that are described by every critic as outrageous. Fish had a reputation among his friends for puns and could string together dozens of them in a matter of minutes. Excellent examples of this penchant for puns may be found in the titles of the stories. When Homes offers his help to a group of Polish men, the result is "The Adventure of the Danzig Men." The tale of a British aristocrat forced by his conduct to resign from his clubs is dubbed "The Adventure of the Dismembered Peer." It is noteworthy that no member of the Baker Street Irregulars protested the fun; evidently, they recognized that the parodies were a form of affectionate tribute. The Mystery Writers of America awarded a prize to "The Case of the Ascot Tie," arguably the best of the Homes stories.

THE FUGITIVE

Fish's first full novel, The Fugitive, was more serious in tone. With this book, which concerns Nazis who have escaped to South America, Fish introduced the most popular of his heroes, Captain José da Silva of the Rio de Janeiro police force. Da Silva, a large, swarthy, pockmarked man with black, curly hair and a fierce mustache, evokes the image of a romantic highwayman and immediately captures the reader's attention. As the plot develops, it is evident that da Silva's dramatic presence is less important than the gifts of intelligence, humanity, and sensitivity with which he is endowed. Yet his character remains credible. Although he is vulnerable to women, he is realistic in his assessment of them in the course of his investigations. He has an almost obsessive fear of flying, certain that any flight he endures will be his last. He can never relax on an airplane, which interferes with his appreciation of the attendants' physical charms and his partaking of the available libations. In moments of great physical danger, he knows fear and dreads dying.

In Fish's 1968 novel The Murder League, three former mystery writers take up contract killing, only to discover that performing actual murders is far more difficult than writing about murders.

Nevertheless, da Silva is a man of extraordinary courage. It has been suggested that the earlier volumes in the series, particularly Isle of the Snakes (1963), in which da Silva must contend with several poisonous reptiles, and The Shrunken Head (1963), which involves him with bands of head-shrinking Indians, tend to emphasize the primitive facets of his homeland, while the later volumes describe the wealth and culture of the cities, the other face of Brazil. Brazilian Sleigh Ride (1965) emphasizes that da Silva is at home even on the sidewalks of New York, as he confronts a gambling syndicate in Manhattan.

POLICE LIEUTENANTS SERIES

One trait that seems a constant in the makeup of Fish's detectives is first explored in da Silva's character: He is remarkably independent. Although he holds the rank of captain, he is a part of a bureaucracy. He wastes little time with authority, however, and acts on his own. Clancy and Reardon of the Police Lieutenants series operate in much the same fashion on their respective police forces but are more conscious of the penalties that independence carries. Clancy is well aware that his duty may be complicated by superiors and politically ambitious prosecutors. Reardon's superiors seem convinced of his ability and value, yet his independence makes them nervous, and he is often closely questioned. Nevertheless, each of Fish's operatives displays a willingness to assume great risk in following his own best ideas to achieve the end.

WOMEN AND HUMOR

The female characters in Fish's novels are not as well defined as the men, which is not to imply that they are denigrated. Many of them are professionals. Reardon's female friend, for example, is an architect. Although their relationship is intimate, it does not provoke steamy bedroom scenes. Reardon's problems with her center on the conflict caused by his profession, which may mean that a long-awaited dinner at a favorite restaurant is interrupted. Reardon is always being called away on his current case. Fish's detectives are clearly attracted to beautiful women, but they are never blinded to the fact that such women may be culprits in a given case. None of these men reacts in a hard-boiled manner, as do some famous detectives. Women are not "dames" in this author's work, and the female criminal is often viewed with sympathy and is always treated fairly. Sex is a fact of life in Fish's work, but it is never the major theme.

Humor is not abandoned in the police procedural works. Da Silva is paired with a somewhat mysterious figure, Wilson, an American agent of considerable ability. His intelligence sources are never revealed, but he is always well-informed about da Silva's cases. Although he is no Watson, he serves as a sounding board for da Silva's observations and deductions. He is also used to exchange banter with da Silva, where humor, usually subtle, is always present. In all Fish's novels, principal characters find a backup in the department or a friend who fulfills the twin assignment of assisting in the crucial moment and sharing remarkably witty repartee. It would seem that Dr. Watson's usefulness in Doyle's stories left a lasting impression.

CARRUTHERS, SIMPSON, AND BRIGGS SERIES

The later characters of the Carruthers, Simpson, and Briggs series are more humorous in their adventures. More frequent and obvious use of humor is characteristic of this group. Incidents and actions are played for greater comic effect, and the three older men are essentially rogues. Indeed, humor was fundamental to Fish's outlook, as is illustrated by a well-known incident in his career. Fish disagreed with his publisher concerning the pseudonym under which he would write his Police Lieutenants series. He wanted to write as A. C. Lamprey, with the projected plan of doing a subsequent series as D. C. Lamprey, a brother of the first author. He lost this battle and wrote as Robert L. Pike.

The craftsmanship of Fish's plots is evident in his novels and his excellent short stories, though some are more successful than others. Once the crimes are delineated, the plots unfold and the clues add up in a convincing manner. In his best stories, the ultimate clue is something very small and tantalizing that eludes the detective for a period of time. Some fleeting scene, some insignificant thing out of its normal place, suddenly remembered, brings the pattern to completion.

One of Lieutenant Reardon's cases is an excellent example. What appears to be an accident in which a pedestrian is killed on a darkened street by a repentant driver, proves to be premeditated murder involving theft and smuggling. With the murderer dead after a chase through San Francisco streets and a fog-shrouded harbor, his accomplice escapes safely. The mental image of a bottle of milk left on the table instead of being returned to the refrigerator, however, is enough to lead the officer to the accomplice.

Fish's critics have noted that he is a writer who describes action with a cinematographer's eye. It is no accident that Bullitt, based on one of his novels, features one of the most spectacular car chases ever filmed. Fish's descriptive passages are rich because he knows his scene. The authenticity of his Brazilian landscapes, for example, is a result of his having lived more than a decade in that country. One reviewer commented on Fish's creation of a genuine ethnic detective in da Silva. Fish created da Silva because he knew Brazilians like him, not to make a social statement. When he had no contact with an area, he traveled to see it before attempting to describe it. He researched The Gold of Troy (1980) during a long sojourn that took him to several parts of the world, and he did not write Pursuit (1978) until he had traveled to Israel to gain a sense of the people and the land.

His characters are appealing because they, too, are authentic. They are not larger than life but seem very much like ordinary people, with strengths and weaknesses, problems and disappointments, and they sometimes experience moments of reward and great happiness. The author liked people and had friends around the world. Yet he was direct, blunt, and outspoken, often labeled contentious. One friend spoke of his belligerent integrity, a trait that might also describe some of his creations. His plots are sound and satisfy the reader. Although nicely timed surprises sometimes catch his public off guard, he does not make the reader wait until the end of the book to learn the details of the plot. Instead, he reveals the evidence gradually, and the timing of his clues is excellent.

Above all, Fish believed mystery writers are given too little credit for their contribution to literature. His long association with the Mystery Writers of America made him their champion. He encouraged young writers and fought for writers struggling with their publishers, insisting on the worth of crime and mystery fiction. No one can describe Fish's creed better than he did himself:

I write to entertain; if it is possible to inform at the same time, all the better, but entertainment comes first. I like to write using places I have been and enjoyed as the background location for my stories and books. I write the kind of stories and books I like to read, and if I can get a reader to turn the page, I feel I have succeeded in what I started out to do.

Anne R. Vizzier

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

CAPTAIN JOSÉ DA SILVA SERIES: The Fugitive, 1962; Isle of the Snakes, 1963; The Shrunken Head, 1963; Brazilian Sleigh Ride, 1965; The Diamond Bubble, 1965; Always Kill a Stranger, 1967; The Bridge That Went Nowhere, 1968; The Xavier Affair, 1969; The Green Hell Treasure, 1971; Trouble in Paradise, 1975

POLICE LIEUTENANTS SERIES (AS PIKE): Mute Witness, 1963 (also known as Bullitt); The Quarry, 1964; Police Blotter, 1965; Reardon, 1970; The Gremlin's Grampa, 1972; Bank Job, 1974; Deadline 2 A.M., 1976

KEK HUUYGENS SERIES: The Hochmann Miniatures, 1967; Whirligig, 1970; The Tricks of the Trade, 1972; The Wager, 1974; Kek Huuygens, Smuggler, 1976

CARRUTHERS, SIMPSON, AND BRIGGS SERIES: The Murder League, 1968; Rub-a-Dub-Dub, 1971; A Gross Carriage of Justice, 1979

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Assassination Bureau, 1963; Trials of O'Brien, 1965; A Handy Death, 1973 (with Henry Rothblatt); Pursuit, 1978; The Gold of Troy, 1980; Rough Diamond, 1981

OTHER SHORT FICTION: The Incredible Schlock Homes, 1966; The Memoirs of Schlock Homes, 1974

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS (AS ROBERTS): Weekend '33, 1972 (with Bob Thomas); The Break In, 1974; Big Wheels, 1977; Alley Fever, 1979

NONFICTION: Pelé, My Life and a Wonderful Game, 1979 (with Pelé)

EDITED TEXTS: With Malice Toward All, 1968; Every Crime in the Book, 1975

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Boucher, Anthony. Introduction to Kek Huuygens, Smuggler. New York: Mysterious Press, 1976. This introduction to Fish's novel is written by an expert in genre fiction: a fellow mystery writer and editor of science fiction.

Horsley, Lee. Twentieth-Century Crime Fiction. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005. Examines a broad range of crime fiction from a wide variety of critical perspectives—from formalist to post-colonial. Designed to introduce students to the academic analysis of popular detective and crime literature. Provides perspective on Fish's work.

Pronzini, Bill, and Marcia Muller. 1001 Midnights: The Aficionado's Guide to Mystery and Detective Fiction. New York: Arbor House, 1986. This reference work for fans places Fish's novels in their proper context.

"Robert Fish: In Memoriam, 1912-1981." The Armchair Detective 14, no. 2 (1981): 118-121. Obituary in a leading crime-fiction journal, detailing Fish's contributions to the genre.

Rosenthal, Marilyn. Review of Schlock Homes: The Complete Bagel Street Saga, by Robert L. Fish. Library Journal 115, no. 10 (June 1, 1990): 191. Review of this reprint, which combines two volumes of stories originally printed in Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine, notes that Fish was a respected member of the Mystery Writers of America.

Sutton, Michael, and Anthony Fingleton. Over My Dead Body. New York: Dramatists Play Service, 1998. This play was inspired by and represents a reinterpretation of and commentary on Fish's The Murder League.

IAN FLEMING

Born: London, England; May 28, 1908

Died: Canterbury, Kent, England; August 12, 1964

Also wrote as Robert Markham

Type of plot: Espionage

PRINCIPAL SERIES

James Bond, 1954-1966

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

JAMES BOND, thirtyish, a special agent in Great Britain's secret service, is one of the few with a double-zero prefix (007) on his identification number, giving him permission to kill. A knight-errant of the Atlantic alliance, he brings his adversaries to bay through superior endurance, bravery, resourcefulness, and extraordinarily good luck.

"M," Admiral Sir Miles Messervy, K.C.M.G., the head of the secret service, is Bond's boss and father figure. A cold fish with "grey, uncompromising eyes," he sends his agents on dangerous missions without showing much concern, or, in case of mishap, remorse. Nevertheless, Bond finds him lovable.

FELIX LEITER, an agent for the Central Intelligence Agency, joins forces with Bond from time to time to provide support in the war against the enemies of Western civilization. Bond has great affection for him.

CONTRIBUTION

Through a masterful suspension of disbelief, Ian Fleming fashioned the exploits of his flashy and conspicuous hero in the mold of earlier fictional adventurers such as Candide, Baron Münchhausen, and Phileas Fogg. Unlike these predecessors, however, James Bond is not freelance. He is a civil servant and does what he does for a living. In performing his duties for the British government, he also acts as a protector of the free world. Fleming's creation has gained an international coterie of fans, from John F. Kennedy and Allen Dulles to Prince Philip and, more important, among countless members of the hoi polloi who have bought his books in the multimillions, making James Bond (with much interest generated by the film adaptations) the greatest and most popular fantasy figure of modern times. Fleming attributed his stunning success to the lack of heroes in real life. "Well, I don't regard James Bond precisely as a hero," he added, "but at least he does get on and do his duty, in an extremely corny way, and in the end, after giant despair, he wins the girl or the jackpot or whatever it may be."

BIOGRAPHY

Ian Lancaster Fleming, from an upper-middle-class Scottish family, was brought up, as he said, "in a hunting-and-fishing world where you shot or caught your lunch." His was a conservative and patriotic environment in which "Rule Britannia" was accepted both as a duty and as a right conferred by God. Ian's father, Major Valentine Fleming, was a Tory member of Parliament from South Oxfordshire who lost his life on the Somme in 1916. His obituary in The Times was written by Winston Churchill.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Ian Fleming. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Fleming received an education in conformity with the traditions and expectations of his place in society: first at Eton College, for which he was presumably registered for admission at birth, then at the famous Royal Military College at Sandhurst, where he learned to shoot well enough to participate on the school's rifle team when it competed against West Point. He became a second lieutenant, but the prospect of serving in a modern mechanized army gave him little joy: "A lot of us decided we didn't want to be garage hands running those bloody tanks." He resigned his commission and, following his mother's advice, began to prepare for a career in the diplomatic service.

Fleming attended the Universities of Geneva and Munich to learn French and German. He placed seventh in the foreign-service entrance examination, but diplomatic postings were rare and only the top five were selected. In 1931, Fleming joined Reuters as a foreign correspondent. He was sent to Moscow, where he learned Russian and, on one assignment, reported the trial of some British engineers accused of espionage. He later described the whole Soviet experience as "fun . . . like a tremendous ball game."

In the next four years, Fleming rose to the position of assistant general manager for the news agency's Far East desk. The job did not pay well, however, and in 1933 he decided to earn some money by going into investment banking. He remained a stockbroker until the outbreak of World War II in 1939, when he secured a commission in the Royal Navy.

During the war, Fleming served in the key post of personal assistant to the director of naval intelligence, Rear Admiral J. H. Godfrey, who became the model for the character "M" in Fleming's later fiction.

Fleming's return to civilian life marked his return to journalism. From 1945 to 1959, he was with the Kemsley Press, principally as foreign manager of The Sunday Times. By the time of his resignation, he was already famous as the creator of James Bond. From the appearance of his first book, Casino Royale, in 1953, Fleming managed to turn out one volume per year, writing at the rate of two thousand words a day. A heavy smoker—usually consuming three packs a day—Fleming suffered his first heart attack in 1961. Three years later, his second coronary proved fatal.

ANALYSIS

Ian Fleming refused to take his work seriously and had few pretensions about its literary merit, although he was always thoroughly professional in his approach to writing. He claimed that his sort of fiction reflected his own adolescent character: "But they're fun. I think people like them because they're fun."

Critics, however, seldom take authors at their own word. Ernest Hemingway, countering those who were searching for hidden meanings in his The Old Man and the Sea (1952), snapped, "If you want a message, go to Western Union." Similarly, Fleming had to protest against those who insisted that his works were more than entertainment. "My books have no social significance, except a deleterious one; they're considered to have too much violence and too much sex. But all history has that."

This disclaimer has not prevented critics from analyzing the Bond books in terms of Freudian psychology, or as a reflection of the decline of Western society, or as a working out of the "phallic code," or even as an expression of an intent "to destroy the modern gods of our society which are actually the expressions of the demonic in contemporary disguise."

Reviewers have split into two general camps: those who refuse to take the stories seriously and those who do. The former category might be represented by L. G. Offord of the San Francisco Chronicle, who wrote of Doctor No (1958): "Hardly anything could make critics look sillier than to fight over a book like this. . . . [It is] so wildly funny that it might almost be a leg-pull, and at the same time hair-raising in a loony way." Representing the other point of view is Paul Johnson, who, also writing about Doctor No in a lead article in the New Statesman, said that he had never read a nastier book. He criticized it specifically for pandering to the worst forms of English maladies: "the sadism of a schoolboy bully, the mechanical, two-dimensional sex-longings of a frustrated adolescent, and the crude, snob-cravings of a suburban adult."

Though he may not have realized it, Johnson's attack explains Fleming's popularity. Most James Bond readers would probably agree with Fleming's own statement that his work possesses no special significance, and they would see nothing reprehensible in reading about cruelty. Maybe they would even find adolescent sex-longings desirable and the possession of a bit of snobbery attractive and necessary. In any case, what difference does it make as long as the work provides suspense and fast-paced action? One of Fleming's greatest admirers, the writer Kingsley Amis, remarked that the strength of Fleming's work lies "in its command of pace and its profound latent romanticism."

MOONRAKER

Fleming—as he would have been first to admit—does not rank with the major writers of his age, but he wrote well and with great individuality, and he especially knew how to set a scene with style. Note, for example, his description of the dining room at Blades just before the famous bridge game in Moonraker (1955):

The central chandelier, a cascade of crystal ropes terminating in a broad basket of strung quartz, sparkled warmly above the white damask tablecloths and George IV silver. Below, in the centre of each table, branched candlesticks distributed the golden light of three candles, each surmounted by a red silk shade, so that the faces of the diners shone with a convivial warmth which glossed over the occasional chill of an eye or cruel twist of a mouth.

Moonraker was Fleming's third Bond adventure. By this time, his main character had achieved his definitive persona—that of the suave, dashing, indestructible, not-so-inconspicuous secret agent—the quintessential cop of the Western powers. Fleming originally had intended him to be otherwise. "When I wrote the first one [Casino Royale] in 1953," Fleming related, "I wanted Bond to be an extremely dull, uninteresting man to whom things happened; I wanted him to be the blunt instrument." Fleming explained that the name of his character was taken from the name of the author of Birds of the West Indies, and that he had chosen it because it struck him as the dullest name he had ever heard. "Now the dullest name in the world has become an exciting one."

Indeed, fictional heroes can develop lives of their own and grow in importance and become transformed in the act of creation. Their exploits can also evolve, becoming, as in Bond's case, more fanciful and increasingly wild and extravagant. In Casino Royale, Le Chiffre wants to recoup his losses at the gaming table to pay back the money he has stolen from the Soviet secret service. Bond beats him at baccarat and Le Chiffre is ruined. In Moonraker, however, Hugo Drax's ambition is to destroy the city of London with an atomic missile. In Goldfinger (1959), the title character wants to steal all the gold from Fort Knox. Emilio Largo in Thunderball (1961) is involved with hijacking nuclear bombs and threatening to destroy British and American cities if Washington and London do not pay an appropriate ransom. In On Her Majesty's Secret Service (1963), Blofeld wants to infect Great Britain with a virus to wipe out its crops and livestock.

Part of the allure of such a series is having a well-described, morally reprehensible villain, and Fleming does not disappoint. Some of his villains are self-employed, but most of them are members of villainous organizations: either SMERSH, a Soviet terror organization, or SPECTER, a private international criminal consortium. Fleming knew the advantages of reworking basic themes and formulas, the most fundamental being a dramatization of the struggle between good and evil. He makes Bond the agent of divine retribution, who, like his ancient Greek counterparts, exhibits certain character flaws to emphasize his humanity. The villains also possess certain classical vices, chief among these being hubris, which predictably contributes to their downfall.

The books follow a common organizational pattern by being divided into two sections. In the first, there is the identification of the villain and the discovery of his evil scheme. Next, the protagonist plots and carries out a strategy to bring the wrongdoer to destruction. The book ends with the restoration of an equilibrium—to exist, presumably, until the next adventure. In a sense, the story line of the books is as obvious as that of a Hollywood Western. In fact, this very predictability compensates for Fleming's frequently weak plotting.

JAMES BOND SERIES

The reader is comfortable in his knowledge that James Bond will duel with his adversaries over women, money, pride, and finally over life itself, and that Bond will humiliate them on all these levels. He will best them at the gaming tables and on the playing fields. He will expose them for not being gentlemen, outwit them,

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Sean Connery (lying down) as James Bond in the 1964 film Goldfinger, adapted from Ian Fleming's novel. Gert Frobe (standing) plays Auric Goldfinger.
(Museum of Modern Art, Film Stills Archive)

and uncover their essential boorishness. Thus, it is no surprise that he emerges triumphant in golf and canasta in Goldfinger, wins at bridge in Moonraker, and takes the chemin-de-fer pot in Thunderball and Casino Royale. The villains cheat, but Bond outcheats them—exactly what an honest man should do in a dishonest situation. Assuredly, the hero will attack his adversaries sexually by taking away their women, as he does from Goldfinger, Largo, and Mr. Big.

All this standard competition paves the way for the ultimate, surrogateless, life-or-death showdown. Bond must now rely on his own bravery and on his intellectual and physical prowess. In this supreme trial he must successfully withstand the test of courage and pain—a kind of latter-day Pamino with his magic flute making his way through a dangerous land toward the safety of the golden temple. Bond's test, however, is never over; he must prove himself in one assignment after another.

Bond's rewards come from playing the game. Certainly the monetary rewards are not great. Bond is not particularly wealthy, nor does he seek great wealth. (He even turns down a million-pound dowry offered by father-in-law Michel-Ange Draco in On Her Majesty's Secret Service.) Occasionally, he experiences a windfall, such as the fifteen thousand pounds he wins at bridge when playing Drax, but he seems to care little about accumulating much money for his retirement. Bond does not think about such mundane things.

He is a dedicated workaholic. His identity with his job is so complete that he hates to take vacations. If he does not have anything official to do, he soon becomes restless and disoriented. In short, he is a rather humorless man of few inner resources, possessing a great disdain for life that comes too easy. This attitude includes a great disgust for the welfare state, a system that, he believes, has made Great Britain sluggish and flabby. The expensive pleasures that he enjoys—fine wines, gourmet foods, posh hotel rooms—come almost entirely as perks in the line of duty, as, indeed, does his association with women.

Part of the appeal of the Bond fantasy series comes from the hero's sexual prowess. Bond beds women but only once does he marry. (His bride, Tracy, in On Her Majesty's Secret Service, is killed shortly after the wedding.) Thus, he appears to be a veritable Don Juan. In fact, on an episode-by-episode basis, his conquests are modest—one, not more than two—virtual monogamy. What he misses in quantity, however, he makes up in quality. Bond's women are the stuff of which modern dreams are made. They are energetic, athletic, resourceful, beautiful . . . and submissive. They can be passive, but they are perfectly capable of initiating sex. All are longing to be dominated by a man. Thus, as Bond sizes up Domino Vitali in Thunderball:

The general impression, Bond decided, was of a willful, high tempered, sensual girl—a beautiful Arab mare who would allow herself to be ridden by a horseman with steel thighs and velvet hands, and then only with a curb and saw bit—and then only when he had broken her to bridle and saddle.

This rather trite metaphor, shifted to a nonsexual context, sums up Bond's relationship with his employers, who have most certainly succeeded in bridling him to their will. His superiors, specifically M, give his life the fundamental sense of purpose that he in turn must give to his female companions. Women are the means through which he can compensate for his loss of control to the British establishment. Bond responds well, however, to such direction, coming from a society that dotes on hierarchies and makes a virtue of everyone knowing his or her place.

Fleming also manages to pour into his character the nostalgia that he must have felt for the heyday of the British Empire. His works evoke the Rupert-Brookean vision of England as the land "where men with splendid hearts must go."

Wm. Laird Kleine-Ahlbrandt

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

JAMES BOND SERIES: Casino Royale, 1953 (also known as You Asked for It); Live and Let Die, 1954; Moonraker, 1955 (also known as Too Hot to Handle); Diamonds Are Forever, 1956; From Russia, with Love, 1957; Doctor No, 1958; Goldfinger, 1959; For Your Eyes Only: Five Secret Occasions in the Life of James Bond, 1960; Thunderball, 1961; The Spy Who Loved Me, 1962; On Her Majesty's Secret Service, 1963; You Only Live Twice, 1964; The Man with the Golden Gun, 1965; Octopussy, and The Living Daylights, 1966

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVEL: The Diamond Smugglers, 1957

SCREENPLAY: Thunderball, 1965 (with others)

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: Chitty-Chitty-Bang-Bang, 1964-1965

NONFICTION: Thrilling Cities, 1963; Ian Fleming Introduces Jamaica, 1965

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Comentale, Edward P., Stephen Watt, and Skip Willman, eds. Ian Fleming and James Bond: The Cul- tural Politics of 007. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2005. Anthology of cultural criticism, both of Fleming's novels and of the trajectory of his most famous creation outside the pages of those novels.

Lane, Sheldon, comp. and ed. For Bond Lovers Only. New York: Dell, 1965. This book contains eleven articles by different writers on aspects of the James Bond phenomenon, from books to films, including one by Jack Fishman quoting Fleming directly on his views about his literary creation.

Lycett, Andrew. Ian Fleming: The Man Behind James Bond. London: Weidenfeld & Nicolson, 1995. A definitive work about the author.

McCormick, Donald. 17F: The Life of Ian Fleming. London: P. Owen, 1993. An attempt to capture Fleming's extraordinary life, written by a friend of the author. Details his work as a journalist, as a spy, and as both at once, as well as his second life as a famous novelist.

Pearson, John. The Life of Ian Fleming, Creator of James Bond. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1966. Pearson attempts to separate the author from his creation and also show the similarities.

Winder, Simon. The Man Who Saved Britain: A Personal Journey into the Disturbing World of James Bond. New York: Farrar, Straus and Giroux, 2006. Close study of the James Bond character, both as a person and as a representation of the Cold War mentality. Bibliographic references.

Wolf, Michael. "Ian Fleming's Enigmas and Variations." In Spy Thrillers: From Buchan to Le Carré, edited by Clive Bloom. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1990. Reading of James Bond that seeks to place the superspy within the lineage of more realist Cold War espionage fiction.

Zeiger, Henry A. Ian Fleming: The Spy Who Came in with the Gold. New York: Duell, Sloan and Pearce, 1965. A biography of Fleming, from his boyhood to his success as an author.

JOAN FLEMING

Joan Margaret Gibson

Born: Horwich, Lancashire, England; March 27, 1908

Died: London, England; November 15, 1980

Types of plot: Psychological; amateur sleuth; historical

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Nuri Iskirlak, 1962-1965

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

NURI ISKIRLAK is an impoverished scholar and philosopher of some repute in Istanbul. A bachelor, his goal in life is to visit Oxford, where he believes must lie the answers to all of life's important questions. He becomes an amateur sleuth not of his own volition but because circumstances demand it.

CONTRIBUTION

Part of the fun of reading mystery fiction is the discovery of an author with whom one was previously not familiar. Joan Fleming's work is unique in that with each of her novels one has that same sense of discovery. It is not possible to be comfortable with Fleming if what one expects is to be able to anticipate familiar patterns, characters, settings, or turns in plot. It is possible to become assured, however, that each novel will have been painstakingly crafted, that it will be charmingly English, and that it will be altogether delightful.

Fleming's goal appears to have been to write as well as she possibly could, and that she wrote well, there is no doubt. What the reader can question is whether it was her intent to write category novels or whether she meant to write well-crafted novels in which she could choose to use a crime or a mystery as a means of moving her characters from place to place and giving them something on which to act and against which to react. It would seem that the latter is true, for scene and character are what the reader comes to care about in Fleming's novels. More than with "who" or "how," one's curiosity is absorbed with "why."

BIOGRAPHY

Joan Fleming was born Joan Margaret Gibson, the daughter of David and Sarah Elizabeth (née Suttcliffe) Gibson. She was born in Horwich, Lancashire, England, on March 27, 1908. Her education was at Brighthelmston School, Southport, Lancashire, and in Switzerland at Grand Belle Vue, Lausanne, and Lausanne University. She worked in London as a secretary to a doctor from 1928 to 1932, when she married Norman Bell Beattie Fleming. They had three daughters and a son. Her husband died in 1968.

Fleming wrote more than thirty novels that are classified as mysteries (some are historical mysteries), at least five works of juvenile fiction, and a nonfictional volume concerning William Shakespeare. In 1962, she received the Gold Dagger Award given by the Crime Writers' Association for that year's best mystery publication, When I Grow Rich. She won the award again in 1970 for her novel published that year, Young Man, I Think You're Dying. Fleming died on November 15, 1980.

ANALYSIS

Writers are advised always to write about that which they know and with which they are familiar. Joan Fleming knew about many things; she wrote competently in her mysteries about subjects as varied as rare antique books, ancient Chinese porcelain, modern art dealers, receivers of stolen goods, drug addiction, Oxford's academic community, and life and values in exotic places, to name only a few. One senses that Fleming was intent on giving herself as much pleasure in the writing as she hoped her readers would find in her work, and that it was toward such an end that she put new characters in new settings in almost every one of her novels. Even Nuri Iskirlak, as the principal, has a different set of characters to play against in each of the two mysteries in which he appears (When I Grow Rich and Nothing Is the Number When You Die, 1965).

Emphasis in Fleming's work is on character. Her protagonists are often forced into positions or situations for which they have had little or no preparation, but in which they handle themselves gracefully. The best example of this is Nuri Iskirlak, the Turk who, seeking to help his friends and to see justice done, forfeits his own goals to put a stop to the link that the ancient Miasma has provided in the flow of opium-based drugs between his country and Europe.

NOTHING IS THE NUMBER WHEN YOU DIE

Another well-defined character is the English aunt of Tamara, the woman Nuri loves in Nothing Is the Number When You Die. Nuri meets the eighty-two-year-old eccentric while he is in England to search for Tamara's missing son. Lady Mossop first appears pushing a wheelbarrow loaded with horse manure with which she intends to dose her magnolia tree. Lady Mossop is described as "an enormously tall old woman wearing brown corduroy slacks, tied with twine at the knee." Nuri says that her face is "by no means handsome," but he likes the fact that she smiles at him, something Turks seldom do for foreigners. When Nuri reveals to Lady Mossop his fear that Tamara's son, like some of his acquaintances at Oxford, may have become addicted to drugs, she assures him that the longing for affection is stronger than the longing for drugs can ever be. One is sure that Lady Mossop would have never been exposed to the world of drugs, nor would she have had any knowledge of it, had she not felt affection for the young man whom Nuri seeks. Lady Mossop is not happy about the situation, but with good grace she determines to participate in bringing about the reunion of Tamara and her son, meanwhile protecting him from his father's murderer.

HOW TO LIVE DANGEROUSLY

Another appealing Fleming character is Martin Pendle Hill (How to Live Dangerously, 1974). For thirty-five years he has lived comfortably in an eleven-room maisonette above the flat of elderly Miss Smite, who owns the building, which had been her family home before its conversion to separate units on the death of her parents. Pendle Hill decides to ask Miss Smite whether he might take in lodgers, as his unit is much too large for his needs. Once her shock and dismay have subsided, the two of them develop a brief but pleasant relationship. Pendle Hill, meanwhile, wonders to himself again and again why he had spent so many years avoiding Miss Smite, when during all that time they could have been good friends. Miss Smite is murdered, and Pendle Hill discovers the body. Despite his years of retirement and the pain of a broken hip on the mend, he feels compelled to discover the reason for her death. He, too, is one of Fleming's innocent bystanders, thrust into an unpleasant situation but capable of rising to its demands.

A strong characterization in the same novel is that of Mrs. Rafferty, Pendle Hill's housekeeper and devoted defender. She boasts that she knows him "through and through," and Pendle Hill is sure that the hardship would have been greater for him had she been the one with the broken hip. Mrs. Rafferty is deeply troubled when her master succeeds in taking a lodger over Miss Smite's objections, because she fears that he will suffer because of it—and eventually he does. Mrs. Rafferty provides contrast in the novel to the somewhat stuffy Pendle Hill. Her language is that of the English tradesman, full of colorful slang, as is that of her husband, who listens dutifully to her concerns about Pendle Hill. The Raffertys remain loyal long after others, out of fear, have deserted the home of the late Miss Smite.

WHEN I GROW RICH

The settings of Fleming's novels are most often England; sometimes the action takes place in large cities and sometimes in rural villages, as it does in The Man from Nowhere (1960) and in Midnight Hag (1966). From all accounts, Fleming's personal travels were the sources for her foreign settings. Whether it was her own experience or the accounts of others that inspired the use of Istanbul in at least two of her novels (When I Grow Rich and Nothing Is the Number When You Die), the city is given special treatment by this imaginative and capable writer. In When I Grow Rich, one's sympathies are drawn to the city of Istanbul. One looks forward to more intimate knowledge of it on reading an early description of it: "Neither Eastern nor Western, it has a strange exotic flavour of its own, at times deadly dull and at other times causing such a penetrating wave of emotion that those who feel it never forget it nor do they get quite the same thrill anywhere else." The reader suffers sudden culture shock when Nuri, approaching the home of his friend, Miasma, sees in the distance what appear to be bundles or sacks of rags in the road. Only when he hears from that same source the sounds of a funeral chant does he recognize that the bundles are not rags but human beings. In another scene, Nuri kicks a kitten aside when it cries in hunger, "because in Istanbul no one takes any more notice of a starving kitten than of a fallen leaf." Whether Fleming uses for the setting of her story the city of Helsinki (You Won't Let Me Finish, 1973), or Paris (The Good and the Bad, 1953), or a Portuguese fishing village (Death of a Sardine, 1963), the place is so important a part of many of the novels that it can be said to play the role of at least a minor character. That is true even of the house in which Pendle Hill has lived for so long.

For what is often a psychological approach to fiction, in which she examines the underlying feelings of those who must react in some way to a crime that has occurred, Fleming is sometimes compared to Patricia Highsmith, an American considered by some to be the best of her time at using human relationships to develop her crime plots.

Paula Lannert

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NURI ISKIRLAK SERIES: When I Grow Rich, 1962; Nothing Is the Number When You Die, 1965

NONSERIES NOVELS: 1949-1960 • Two Lovers Too Many, 1949; A Daisy-Chain for Satan, 1950; The Gallows in My Garden, 1951; The Man Who Looked Back, 1951 (also known as The Cup of Cold Poison); Polly Put the Kettle On, 1952; The Good and the Bad, 1953; He Ought to Be Shot, 1955; The Deeds of Dr. Deadcert, 1955 (also known as The Merry Widower); Maiden's Prayer, 1957; You Can't Believe Your Eyes, 1957; Malice Matrimonial, 1959; Miss Bones, 1959; The Man from Nowhere, 1960

1961-1970 • In the Red, 1961; Death of a Sardine, 1963; The Chill and the Kill, 1964; Midnight Hag, 1966; No Bones About It, 1967; Hell's Belle, 1968; Kill or Cure, 1968; Young Man, I Think You're Dying, 1970

1971-1978 • Grim Death and the Barrow Boys, 1971 (also known as Be a Good Boy); Screams from a Penny Dreadful, 1971; Alas, Poor Father, 1972; Dirty Butter for Servants, 1972; You Won't Let Me Finish, 1973; How to Live Dangerously, 1974; Too Late! Too Late! the Maiden Cried: A Gothick Novel, 1975; . . . To Make an Underworld, 1976; Every Inch a Lady, 1977; The Day of the Donkey Derby, 1978

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: Dick Brownie and the Zaga Bog, 1944; Mulberry Hall, 1945; The Riddle in the River, 1946; Button Jugs, 1947; The Jackdaw's Nest, 1949

NONFICTION: Shakespeare's Country in Colour, 1960

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Boucher, Anthony. Review of The Chill and the Kill, by Joan Fleming. The New York Times Book Review 70 (November 1, 1964): 26. Review of an unorthodox mystery mixing imagination and murder.

_____. Review of No Bones About It, by Joan Fleming. The New York Times Book Review 72 (September 3, 1967): 20. Review provides analysis of one of her more popular novels.

Dubose, Martha Hailey, with Margaret Caldwell Thomas. Women of Mystery: The Lives and Works of Notable Women Crime Novelists. New York: St. Martin's Minotaur, 2000. Does not deal directly with Fleming but helps to place her among other female mystery writers.

Horsley, Lee. Twentieth-Century Crime Fiction. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005. Comprehensive overview of the development of crime fiction in the twentieth century helps place the nature and importance of Fleming's distinctive contributions.

Symons, Julian. Mortal Consequences, a History: From the Detective Story to the Crime Novel. New York: Harper & Row, 1972. This history of detective fiction, written by a successful novelist in his own right, places Fleming's work in the context of the evolution of the genre from one concerned with puzzles and detection to one focused on the portrayal of crime and criminality.

J. S. FLETCHER

Born: Halifax, Yorkshire, England; February 7, 1863

Died: Dorking, Surrey, England; January 30, 1935

Also wrote as A Son of the Soil

Type of plot: Private investigator

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Ronald Camberwell, 1931-1937

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

RONALD CAMBERWELL is a private inquiry agent in London in partnership with a former inspector of the Criminal Investigation Department. A self-effacing man, Camberwell cooperates with Scotland Yard and local constabularies and lets his partner, Chaney, or their associates, Chippendale and Fanny Pratt, reap the glories of success. Though Camberwell's primary role is that of reporter in the manner of Dr. Watson, he and the others share the legwork in their cases.

CONTRIBUTION

Though J. S. Fletcher often utilizes traditional rural English settings in his detective fiction, his novels also are notable for an urban realism that is lacking in most of his contemporaries' works. He can be depended on, too, to offer complex and original problems with an extensive array of rapid-paced incidents and logical, and yet surprising, conclusions. He also brought a journalist's skill to the writing of crime fiction; because only a small proportion of his output was part of a series, his books offer more variety of characterization than is typical of the form. Despite the rapidity with which he turned out his whodunits (seventeen in one three-year period), reviewers in the 1920's lavished praise on his works and marveled at his seemingly inexhaustible imagination. By that time, he had become a best-selling author on both sides of the Atlantic. His major achievement is The Middle Temple Murder (1919), one of the few Fletcher whodunits still being read; it is historically significant because its young detective, Frank Spargo, is one of the first newspaperman-sleuths, a type that later became popular in England and in the United States. During his career, Fletcher created many young sleuths, men in their twenties and thirties, whose energy and dedication compensated in part for their lack of experience.

BIOGRAPHY

Joseph Smith Fletcher was born on February 7, 1863, in Halifax, Yorkshire; his father, John Fletcher, was a Nonconformist clergyman. Orphaned as a child, Fletcher was reared by a grandmother and educated at Silcoates School and by private tutors. By the time he was twenty, he had published four books, including three volumes of poetry, and had gone south to London. There he wrote about rural life for newspapers and magazines, using the pseudonym "A Son of the Soil." He also produced editorials for the Leeds Mercury and began to write biographies, historical studies, and romances. By 1898, he had decided to forsake journalism and devote himself solely to books. For the next thirty-seven years—until his death on January 30, 1935, at Dorking, Surrey—Fletcher published at least three books per year, gaining renown as a historian of his native Yorkshire for such works as A Picturesque History of Yorkshire (1899-1901), The Cistercians in Yorkshire (1919), The Reformation in Northern England (1925), and Yorkshiresmen of the Restoration (1921). For these and other historical works, he was made a fellow of the Royal Historical Society. He also was a chronicler of racing and continued to write poetry throughout his life. He was married to Rosamond Langbridge, the daughter of the canon of Limerick, and they had one son.

At the beginning of the twentieth century, Fletcher began writing mystery fiction, which became his primary literary activity in the last decades of his life. About the origin of his work in the genre he said:

I believe I got my interest in criminology right from the fact that a famous case of fraud was heard at the Quarter Sessions at a town where I was at school—its circumstances were unusual and mysterious and the truth hard to get at; oddly enough, I have never yet used this as the basis of a story. Then, when I left school, I meant to be a barrister and I read criminal law and attended a great many queer trials for some time. But turning to journalism instead, I knew of a great many queer cases and mysteries, and now and then did "special commissions" for various big papers on famous murder trials. Also, I learnt a good deal about criminology in conversations with the late H. B. Irving, the famous actor, who was an expert.

ANALYSIS

In the late 1800's, J. S. Fletcher began writing short fiction. Within a decade, he published six volumes of stories; one of them was The Adventures of Archer Dawe, Sleuth-Hound (1909), an undistinguished collection of puzzlers. Much better is Paul Campenhaye, Specialist in Criminology (1918), ten stories narrated by a likable private investigator who not only labels himself a specialist in criminology but also says that he is not a detective and has nothing to do with the police. Indeed, Campenhaye works with only a clerk and a mysterious man about London, and some of his cases do not lead to police or legal action, partly because of his generosity toward women. Though most of the stories are set in London—about which Campenhaye is singularly knowledgeable—some cases take him as far north as Yorkshire. (Fletcher favored London and his beloved Yorkshire for his settings throughout his career.) A master of disguise as well as an astute observer of people and places, he nevertheless succeeds purely by chance, as in "The Champagne Bottle" and "The Yorkshire Manufacturer." There is little doubt that Fletcher had Arthur Conan Doyle's Sherlock Holmes in mind when he wrote the Campenhaye stories, but such imitation was commonplace with aspiring detective-fiction writers at the time.

Not until 1931 did Fletcher again create a serial sleuth. Ronald Camberwell, a London private eye, debuted in Murder at Wrides Park and was the narrator-sleuth in ten more novels, two of which were published after Fletcher died in 1935.

MURDER OF THE NINTH BARONET

A typical example of the Camberwell series is Murder of the Ninth Baronet (1932). Fletcher whodunits frequently center on a disappearance that is followed years later by an unexpected reappearance. In this novel, however, John Maxtondale disappears again, within a day of his return after a decades-long disappearance. As a young man, the eldest son of a Warwickshire baronet, he had eloped with Lucy, a tenant farmer's daughter, and completely dropped out of sight. Because worldwide efforts to locate him were fruitless, John's younger brother Stephen inherited the title when the baronet died, but with the provision that if John ever returned, both title and estate would revert to him. The mystery of John's second disappearance is solved when his body is found on the family estate. Among the several suspects are Sir Stephen and his son Rupert (John was childless), a dismissed workman, and a man who years earlier had vowed vengeance on John for his elopement with Lucy. When this would-be avenger and Sir Stephen are murdered, the focus of attention shifts to the dismissed workman, who has disappeared. Then Camberwell and his team learn that Rupert has secretly married the gamekeeper's daughter and is living part of the time in London with her and their son under assumed names. With its action shifting between country and city, the book proceeds at a rapid pace, each brief chapter full of stirring action and surprising revelations. Camberwell's efforts not only take him from country to city and back again but also have him shifting back and forth between the past and the present. The basic elements of the narrative—property, an inheritance, and longstanding rivalries—are commonplace, but Fletcher's deft handling results in a compelling mind teaser.

THE EBONY BOX

The Camberwell books were so popular that although Fletcher retired the sleuth after eight "Case-books," he brought him back within a year. The first of the new series was The Ebony Box (1934). Having retired from the detective life, Ronald Camberwell—a self-described "dull and retiring old bachelor" of thirty-one—becomes steward of a Yorkshire baronet's estate. Within a month, however, his master is dead, having mistakenly drunk potassium cyanide, which was stored in a brandy bottle in his photographic laboratory. This death initiates a series of events that center on a missing ebony box filled with jewels and negotiable securities that Sir John had given to his mistress. Camberwell, having lost his post as steward after a conflict with the family solicitor, drifts back to his old firm and joins the search for the box and for the baronet's missing valet. This difficult and dangerous quest, which includes local police and Scotland Yard, leads to the discovery of the murdered valet as well as the box and its contents.

Even more than in his other books, Fletcher's detectives in The Ebony Box join so many chases and stalking missions that they have little time for reflection. Camberwell and his former partner Chaney, particularly, are so caught up in the hunt that they fail to assimilate information; as a result, they make hasty judgments that are quickly proved wrong. They are little more than legmen in this case, and when Chaney is ready to concede failure, unwilling to waste any more of his time on a futile case, his new partner Chippendale must rally the group. Camberwell, whose retirement led to Chippendale becoming Chaney's partner in the firm, has high praise for the young man's abilities:

He was a typical specimen of the naturally sharp-witted Londoner, whose native acuteness had been further accentuated and deepened by a good deal of experience in quarters where readiness of perception and quickness of resource were necessary—moreover, before ever entering our service, he had been a solicitor's clerk and had acquired a legal outlook on things.

Chippendale solves the case, demonstrating that he has more of a natural instinct for detection than do his partners and the police. As for Camberwell, though he again narrates the book and is involved in the investigation, he reveals even less intellectual acumen in this novel than in earlier ones. Luck, legwork, and the perceptiveness of a junior partner are what lead to the apprehension of the thief-murderer, Smorfitt; nevertheless, The Ebony Box concludes with key questions unanswered:

I have never been able to decide in my own mind between two possible theories. Did Smorfitt find out, somehow, that Marsh had stolen the contents of the ebony box?—or did Marsh, having stolen them, . . . turn for help in getting rid of his swag to the sly and cold-hearted scoundrel who coolly murdered him?

Once again, Fletcher has created a marvelous puzzle to challenge the reader, but missing is the awesome intellect of a Holmes or a Hercule Poirot to orchestrate a solution that provides the expected enlightenment.

The Eleventh Hour (1935) was the second of the new series of Camberwell novels, but Fletcher died before he completed the third. Edward Powys Mathers, known by the pen name Torquemada, finished it, and it was published in 1937 as Todmanhawe Grange in England and as The Mill House Murder in the United States.

THE MIDDLE TEMPLE MURDER

The popularity of this series notwithstanding, Fletcher's best detective novel is The Middle Temple Murder. Praised by President Woodrow Wilson on its American publication, it became a best seller and established Fletcher's reputation in the United States. In 1951, Howard Haycraft and Ellery Queen included the book in their Definitive Library of Detective-Crime-Mystery Fiction as a cornerstone selection. Fletcher's fluent style, realistic urban setting, and unusually complex puzzle offered jaded mystery readers a fresh approach to the genre; these qualities also attracted many readers who had scorned crime fiction as an inferior literary form. In a sense, he can be said to have made the reading of whodunits respectable.

The story begins when London newspaperman Frank Spargo happens on a murder scene in Middle Temple Lane: An old man has been bludgeoned to death. His curiosity aroused, Spargo starts to work on the case, first with a Scotland Yard detective, later independently. Using the columns of his paper to seek witnesses and information, he identifies the victim as John Marbury, recently returned to England from Australia. Later, however, Spargo determines that Marbury actually is John Maitland, a convicted bank embezzler who disappeared after serving a prison term. A barrister friend of Spargo, Ronald Breton, coincidentally turns out to be Maitland's son (though Breton has always believed that he was an orphan whose maternal aunt entrusted his upbringing to a barrister). Stephen Aylmore, a member of Parliament and the father of Breton's fiancé, is charged with Marbury-Maitland's murder (under a different name, Aylmore had been a prison mate of the dead man). Spargo's investigation (which takes him to Yorkshire) eventually clears Aylmore, establishes Marbury-Maitland's innocence (as he claimed at his trial years earlier), and exposes Breton's aunt as the murderer of her brother-in-law, whom she hated.

Too many coincidences surface at crucial times in the book, a recurring problem in Fletcher's work as a whole, but the multifaceted problem is replete with unexpected twists, and everything meshes neatly. Like Ronald Camberwell, Frank Spargo is a pleasant chap who is more akin to Watson than to Holmes, but the reporter's diligence compensates for any lack of ratiocinative skills. The reader cannot help but be pleased at the end of the novel, when Spargo seems ready to make a match with Jessie Aylmore.

THE CHARING CROSS MYSTERY

A 1923 novel, The Charing Cross Mystery, is the only other Fletcher work that continues to attract interest, perhaps as much for its similarities to The Middle Temple Murder as for its own merits. Fletcher's sleuth again is a young man, this time a wealthy barrister named Hetherwick who spends more time pursuing his private interests than he does his profession. Like Spargo, he accidentally comes on a crime and engages in an investigation increasingly independent of the police. The book also has its share of coincidences, including the fact that one of Hetherwick's friends is from the same town as the first victim and knows his granddaughter. At the end of the novel, Hetherwick and this heiress are about to marry. There are more similarities between this novel and The Middle Temple Murder, including the pervasive influence of the past on the present and the disappearance of a key character who emerges years later with a new identity. As in the earlier novel, this reappearance opens old wounds and spawns new crimes. The Charing Cross Mystery is a weaker book, however, for the villains are unrealistic, and the resolution is predictable. Finally, although there are dramatically realistic London and Yorkshire moors sequences, many scenes lack verisimilitude.

Given the prodigious output that Fletcher maintained for so many years, there are bound to be similarities in plot, technique, characterization, and setting from one novel to another, though some are indigestible to the form. His skill as a puzzler, however, cannot be denied, and while he worked within the bounds of traditional English detective fiction, Fletcher's books are written in a distinctive style, feature young sleuths who are engagingly different from the typical eccentrics of his contemporaries, and accurately present aspects of Great Britain's landscape, both rural and urban.

Gerald H. Strauss

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

RONALD CAMBERWELL SERIES: Murder at Wrides Park, 1931; Murder in Four Degrees, 1931; Murder in the Squire's Pew, 1932; Murder of the Ninth Baronet, 1932; Murder of the Only Witness, 1933; Mystery of the London Banker, 1933; Who

Killed Alfred Snowe?, 1933; Murder of the Secret Agent, 1934; The Ebony Box, 1934; The Eleventh Hour, 1935; Todmanhawe Grange, 1937 (with Torquemada; also known as The Mill House Murder)

NONSERIES NOVELS: 1892-1910 • Old Lattimer's Legacy, 1892; The Death That Lurks Unseen, 1899; The Golden Spur, 1901; The Three Days' Terror, 1901; The Investigators, 1902; The Secret Way, 1903; Marchester Royal, 1909; Hardican's Hollow, 1910

1911-1920 • The Pinfold, 1911; The Bartenstein Case, 1913; The Ransom for London, 1914; The Shadow of Ravenscliffe, 1914; The Wolves and the Lamb, 1914; The King Versus Wargrave, 1915; Lynne Court Spinney, 1916; The Annexation Society, 1916; Malvery Hold, 1917; The Rayner-Slade Amalgamation, 1917; The Amaranth Club, 1918; The Chestermarke Instinct, 1918; The Borough Treasurer, 1919; The Middle Temple Murder, 1919; The Seven Days' Secret, 1919; The Talleyrand Maxim, 1919; The Valley of Headstrong Men, 1919; Dead Men's Money, 1920; Exterior to the Evidence, 1920; Scarhaven Keep, 1920; The Herapath Property, 1920; The Lost Mr. Linthwaite, 1920; The Orange-Yellow Diamond, 1920; The Paradise Mystery, 1920

1921-1930 • The Root of All Evil, 1921; The Markenmore Mystery, 1922; In the Mayor's Parlour, 1922; Ravensdene Court, 1922; The Heaven-Kissed Hill, 1922; The Middle of Things, 1922; Rippling Ruby, 1923; The Ambitious Lady, 1923; The Charing Cross Mystery, 1923; The Copper Box, 1923; The Million-Dollar Diamond, 1923; False Scent, 1924; The Cartwright Gardens Murder, 1924; The Kang-He Vase, 1924; The Mazaroff Mystery, 1924; The Safety Pin, 1924; The Time-Worn Town, 1924; Sea Fog, 1925; The Great Brighton Mystery, 1925; The Mill of Many Windows, 1925; The Stolen Budget, 1926; The Green Rope, 1927; The Mortover Grange Affair, 1927; The Murder in the Pallant, 1927; The Passenger to Folkestone, 1927; The Strange Case of Mr. Henry Marchmont, 1927; Cobweb Castle, 1928; The Double Chance, 1928; The Wild Oat, 1928; The Wrist Mark, 1928; The Box Hill Murder, 1929; The House in Tuesday Market, 1929; The Matheson Formula, 1929; The Secret of Secrets, 1929; The Borgia Cabinet, 1930; The Dressing Room Murder, 1930; The

South Foreland Murder, 1930; The Yorkshire Moorland Murder, 1930

1931-1938 • The Guarded Room, 1931; The Burma Ruby, 1932; The Grocer's Wife, 1933; The Murder in Medora Mansions, 1933; And Sudden Death, 1938

OTHER SHORT FICTION: The Fear of the Night, 1903; The Diamonds, 1904 (also known as The Diamond Murders); The Adventures of Archer Dawe, Sleuth-Hound, 1909 (also known as The Contents of the Coffin); Paul Campenhaye, Specialist in Criminology, 1918 (also known as The Clue of the Artificial Eye); The Secret of the Barbican, and Other Stories, 1924; Green Ink, and Other Stories, 1926; Safe Number Sixty-nine, and Other Stories, 1926; The Massingham Butterfly, and Other Stories, 1926; Behind the Monocle, and Other Stories, 1928; The Ravenswood Mystery, and Other Stories, 1929 (also known as The Canterbury Mystery); The Heaven-Sent Witness, 1930; The Malachite Jar, and Other Stories, 1930 (also known as The Flamstock Mystery); The Marrendon Mystery, and Other Stories of Crime and Detection, 1930; The Man in No. 3, and Other Stories, 1931; The Man in the Fur Coat, and Other Stories, 1932; Find the Woman, 1933; The Carrismore Ruby, and Other Stories, 1935

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: 1879-1900 • The Bride of Venice, 1879; Frank Carisbroke's Stratagem: Or, Lost and Won, 1888; Andrewlina, 1889; Mr. Spivey's Clerk, 1890; The Winding Way, 1890; When Charles the First Was King, 1892; The Quarry Farm: A Country Tale, 1893; The Wonderful Wapentake, 1895; Where Highways Cross, 1895; At the Gate of the Fold, 1896; Mistress Spitfire, 1896; God's Failures, 1897; The Builders, 1897 (also known as The Furnace of Youth); The Making of Matthias, 1898; At the Blue Bell Inn, 1898; The Paths of the Prudent, 1899; Morrison's Machine, 1900; The Harvesters, 1900

1901-1910 • Bonds of Steel, 1902; The Arcadians: A Whimsicality, 1902; Anthony Everton, 1903; Lucian the Dreamer, 1903; Owd Poskitt, 1903; The Air-Ship, 1903; David March, 1904; The Pigeon's Cave, 1904; Grand Relations, 1905; The Threshing-Floor, 1905; A

Maid and Her Money, 1906; Highcroft Farm, 1906; Daniel Quayle: A Morality, 1907; Mr. Poskitt, 1907; The Harringtons of Highcroft Farm, 1907; The Queen of a Day, 1907; Mothers in Israel, 1908; The Harvest Moon, 1908; The Mantle of Ishmael, 1909

1911-1923 • The Adventures of Turco Bullworthy, His Dog Shrimp, and His Friend Dick Wynyard, 1912; The Fine Air of Morning, 1912; The Golden Venture, 1912; The Town of Crooked Ways, 1912; I'd Venture All for Thee!, 1913; The Secret Cargo, 1913; Both of This Parish, 1914; The Marriage Lines, 1914; Leet Livvy, 1915; Families Repaired, 1916; The Perilous Crossways, 1917; Many Engagements, 1923

SHORT FICTION: Pasquinado, 1898; From the Broad Acres: Stories Illustrative of Rural Life in Yorkshire, 1899; For Those Were Stirring Times!, and Other Stories, 1904; The Ivory God, and Other Stories, 1907; The Wheatstack, and Other Stories, 1909; Mr. Poskitt's Nightcaps: Stories of a Yorkshire Farmer, 1910

PLAY: Hearthstone Corner, pr. 1926

POETRY: The Juvenile Poems of Joseph S. Fletcher, 1879; Songs After Sunset, 1881; Early Poems, 1882; Poems, Chiefly Against Pessimism, 1893; Ballads of Revolt, 1897; Collected Verse, 1881-1931, 1931

NONFICTION: 1884-1900 • Anima Christi, 1884; Deus Homo, 1887; Jesus Calls Thee!, 1887; Our Lady's Month: A Manual of Devotion for the Month of May, 1887; A Short Life of Cardinal Newman, 1890; Through Storm and Stress: Being a History of the Remarkable Adventures of Richard Fletcher of York, 1892; The Remarkable Adventure of Walter Trelawney, 1893; The Wonderful City, 1894; Where Shall We Go for a Holiday?, 1894; In the Days of Drake, 1895; Life in Arcadia, 1896; A Picturesque History of Yorkshire, 1899-1901; Baden-Powell of Mafeking, 1900

1901-1920 • The History of the St. Leger Stakes, 1776-1901, 1902; A Book About Yorkshire, 1908; The Enchanting North, 1908; Recollections of a Yorkshire Village, 1910; Nooks and Corners of Yorkshire, 1911; Memories of a Spectator, 1912; Memorials of a Yorkshire Parish, 1917; The Making of Modern Yorkshire, 1750-1914, 1918; Leeds, 1919; Sheffield, 1919; The Cistercians in Yorkshire, 1919; Harrogate and Knares-

borough, 1920; Pontefract, 1920

1921-1932 • Yorkshiremen of the Restoration, 1921; Halifax, 1923; The Life and Work of St. Wilfrid of Ripon, Apostle of Sussex, 1925; The Reformation in Northern England, 1925; The Solution of a Mystery: Documents Relative to the Murder of Roger Maidment at Ullathwaite in the County of Yorkshire in October 1899, 1932

MISCELLANEOUS: One of His Little Ones, and Other Tales in Prose and Verse, 1888

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Barnes, Melvyn. "J(oseph) S(mith) Fletcher." In Twentieth-Century Crime and Mystery Writers, edited by John M. Reilly. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1980. Combined biography, bibliography, and criticism of Fletcher and his works.

Kestner, Joseph A. The Edwardian Detective, 1901-1915. Brookfield, Vt.: Ashgate, 2000. This tightly focused reading of fifteen years of British detective fiction is crucial for placing Fletcher's early work and for understanding his overall career's trajectory.

Rzepka, Charles J. Detective Fiction. Malden, Mass.: Polity, 2005. This overview of detective fiction focuses on the relationship between literary representations of private detectives and the cultures that produce those representations. Sheds light on Fletcher's writing.

The Saturday Review of Literature. Review of Murder at Wrides Park, by J. S. Fletcher. 7 (July 18, 1931): 981. Review of the first book in Fletcher's Camberwell series. Provides a contemporary perspective on this popular series.

_____. Review of Murder of the Ninth Baronet, by J. S. Fletcher. 9 (August 13, 1932): 47. Contemporary review of the fourth work in Fletcher's Camberwell series novel in an influential critical magazine.

Turnbull, Malcolm J. Victims or Villains: Jewish Images in Classic Detective Fiction. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1998. Contains some discussion of Fletcher's works and his portrayal of Jewish figures.

PAT FLOWER

Patricia Mary Bryson

Born: Kent, England; February 23, 1914

Died: Australia; September 15, 1977

Types of plot: Police procedural; psychological

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Detective Inspector Swinton, 1958-1966

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

DETECTIVE INSPECTOR BERT SWINTON, of the Sydney police force, is a moral, somewhat naïve man, not an intellectual. He uses close examination of detail and intuition to solve crimes, though he considers himself an unimaginative man. He is middle-aged and a bit thick about the waist, relies on Australian meat pies for sustenance and comfort, and lives with his wife, Mary, and their family in the suburbs of Sydney.

CONTRIBUTION

Pat Flower wrote within two mystery traditions: the police procedural and the novel of psychological suspense. Her novels featuring Detective Inspector Bert Swinton, however, have little in common with the gritty realism of novels by such police-procedural writers as Ed McBain. There is a playfulness about the series, evidenced first by the titles, all but two of which allude to Flower's surname, yet there is also often a disturbing undercurrent to the action that does not disappear with the resolution of the case. Flower enjoys foiling the reader's expectations; Swinton is not always correct in his deductions. Twists of plot and surprise endings are the norm, and characters tumble in and out of being the most unlikely suspect.

Flower's psychological suspense novels have their share of surprise endings, but the overall mood is much darker and the novels more successful. In these stories, murder is almost incidental; Flower's emphasis is not on detection but on the revelation of character. She depicts characters caught in webs of their own making, their images of themselves destroyed by circumstances, their self-delusions exposed; or she portrays seemingly normal people who are gradually revealed to be mad.

Flower is not well known in the mystery field and her books received few reviews, but certainly her novels of psychological suspense deserve more attention than they have yet received.

BIOGRAPHY

Pat Flower was born Patricia Mary Bryson in Kent, England, on February 23, 1914. At the age of fourteen, she moved to Australia, where she spent the rest of her life and where most of her mysteries are set. She created the character of Inspector Swinton with her first novel, Wax Flowers for Gloria, published in 1958. In the 1970's, Flower turned to novels of psychological suspense, producing eight novels in as many years. Flower was also active in the Australian entertainment industry, writing numerous radio and television plays between the late 1940's and the 1960's. One of her plays, The Tape Recorder (pr. 1966), was chosen for inclusion in Best Short Plays, 1969, and was the first play to be produced in color on British television. She won acclaim for her screenwriting, receiving an award for the film From the Tropics to the Snow (1965), written with her husband, Cedric Flower, and earning the Mary Gilmore Award for Tilley Landed on Our Shore (pr. 1968), a one-hour television play. She also published a book of verse, Pistils for Two, in 1963. Flower died in 1977.

ANALYSIS

Comments from the brief reviews that Pat Flower has received for her mysteries have ranged from "unputdownable" to "clever and unobvious" to "a poor show." Her writing does vary in quality, with her later novels more successful than early efforts. She uses, however, similar techniques in both her police procedurals and her later psychological mysteries. Her plots are complex and take surprising turns, she aims for comic and ironic effects, she avoids the omniscient voice, and she misleads the reader by telling the story from the point of view of an uninformed or psychologically unstable character. Flower is ultimately interested in what lies beneath the surface of events and characters; in A Wreath of Water-Lilies (1960), she writes, "Once the surface gave way anywhere that part of the wall would collapse in chaos. Just as in this situation there were cracks in the surface . . . now the smooth civilized top layer was unreliable."

Unlike many mystery novels, however, Flower's mysteries, especially her novels of psychological suspense, do not reassure the reader that order will be restored, that the unjust will be punished and virtue rewarded. Indeed, her suspense novels often end with the disturbing notion that madness lies close at hand. Her police procedurals are only occasionally more comforting; the criminals are usually caught, but in such novels as Goodbye, Sweet William (1959), three murderers, who have, in Flower's ingenious plot, all independently killed the same man, go unpunished in a curious ironic twist. In Fiends of the Family (1966), three old women share the family trait of being a psychotic murderer. In A Wreath of Water-Lilies, the criminals are caught, but through no effort of Inspector Swinton, the ostensible detective, who has been on the wrong track through most of the book.

A WREATH OF WATER-LILIES

A Wreath of Water-Lilies breaks other conventions in addition to having a detective who comes up with the wrong answers. In it, Flower combines strong elements of farce with the expected progression of a mystery. Inspector Swinton of the Sydney police is sent to France to handle a sensitive matter involving a French diplomat and the scent of scandal. After he finishes his business and still regretting not being able to meet the great Inspector Maigret of the Sûreté, Swinton travels to Provence on a sightseeing tour. In a small village outside Marseilles, while quietly becoming drunk on Pernod, he meets Martha Tilley, an expatriate Australian who insists that he must stay a night at the château of her employer, Pearl Langham. The next morning, Swinton finds another of Pearl's guests, Ricard, dead in a pond; he knows immediately that it is murder, though the other guests assume that it was an accident.

The farcical plot elements surface on Swinton's first night at the château, and Flower makes it clear that this is her intent: Swinton comments that he feels part of "one of those English bedroom farces where the siren turns out to be engaged in some ridiculous business for a foreign power and the trusting, bumbling hero is saved by his own clumsiness and stupidity." The setting of a country house is perfect for a farce, and characters enter and exit rooms quickly, chatting brightly and drinking to excess. Swinton must endure two ludicrous seduction scenes. Echoing Aristophanes, Flower even introduces a nightly chorus of frogs, a sly comment on the follies of the characters.

The elements of coincidence that make a farce entertaining are, however, deadly to a mystery. Much of the plot of A Wreath of Water-Lilies depends heavily on coincidence: Swinton's meeting Martha in the village, overhearing bits of conversations, witnessing assassinations, and spotting two of the suspects in the village on the day they claim to have spent in Marseilles. The most difficult plot element to accept is that the French police would let Swinton run an unofficial investigation at all, yet they apparently give him their blessing and a reception that borders on adoration. Flower proceeds, however, to turn all these situations to farce as well: Swinton really is the “trusting, bumbling hero [who] is saved by his own clumsiness and stupidity.” He avoids being killed because he believes the murderer when he claims to be a police officer on the trail of an art-fraud ring.

A Wreath of Water-Lilies is ultimately frustrating because the reader must depend on the misled Swinton for clues to the mystery. Flower pokes fun at the conventions of the mystery at the expense of logic. She does provide enough information for the reader to be able to deduce the art-fraud scheme, but Swinton’s misinterpretations of character prevent a logical guess at the murderer. Underneath the farce, too, Flower’s preoccupation with warped psychology surfaces in many of the characters. Pearl is an alcoholic who lives in a fantasy world, complaining of her suffering under a Nazi occupation of the house that never occurred, clutching at the “friends” who abuse her hospitality. Jean, another of Pearl’s guests, is a lonely middle-aged woman who feels out of place among the others’ sophisticated talk of art and wine, and when her one attempt at seduction is cruelly transformed by a note passed under Swinton’s door, she clutches at him in boozy despair. The reader finishes the book uneasy at its portrayal of humankind, despite Swinton’s hearty goodness.

Flower’s novels of psychological suspense are even more disturbing. Several of these novels portray characters on the edge of madness; others portray characters caught in webs of their own making from which they cannot extricate themselves. Flower employs surprise endings to good effect in these novels: Although the turn in the plot catches the reader off guard, the development is nevertheless believable. Murder is usually involved but is not the basis for the novel; there are no detectives following up clues here. Flower often uses an unreliable point of view in these novels, though they are usually written in the third person; the reader only gradually becomes aware that perception is skewed.

CAT’S CRADLE

Cat’s Cradle (1973) is told from the perspective of a tubercular invalid who may also be a paranoid. Rich Jane Fenton has returned to England from Australia to nurse her illness and restructure her life. Soon, however, she becomes dependent on the companionship of a young man she once saw in Australia, and they are married, though he admits being interested in her money. Simon Pacey manipulates Jane into returning to Australia by publicly announcing “their” plans and apparently spreading the rumor that she is mentally unstable. Once back in Australia, Jane begins plotting revenge.

Flower keeps the reader off balance by portraying Simon’s obvious manipulations; it is only as the book progresses that the reader begins to wonder about his object. Yes, he wants money, but is Jane more of a skinflint than she portrays herself to be? Is she interpreting his motives correctly? When Jane murders Mrs. Barnes, her slovenly housekeeper, by pushing her into a pool of water to drown, and when she later kills Simon by thrusting her embroidery scissors into his ear while they are on an outing at the beach, the reader suddenly must reinterpret the entire novel. Jane no longer seems a trustworthy commentator. Yet Jane’s perceptions of persecution may still be entirely correct: At the end of the novel, Monica, Simon’s former wife, volunteers to take care of Jane. She asks Jane’s lawyer to draw up a will under which Monica would inherit, saying that these are Jane’s instructions. Even that, however, is told from Jane’s perspective, and she may be inventing it all.

SLYBOOTS

Slyboots (1974), too, is told from the point of view of an unreliable character. Slyboots is not as successful at building suspense as Cat’s Cradle, but the method of plot development is the same: the slow revelation of events that throw suspicion on the main character’s version of reality. One begins Slyboots thinking that the main character, Rick Coleman, is an opportunist, but he seems sane enough. By the end of the novel, however, he has killed two people, one of them a child, and Flower suggests that he has previously killed several others as well. As the novel progresses, one realizes that Rick seems to be believing his own lies, so that again, as in Cat’s Cradle, the reader must reinterpret pret everything that has gone before. Though disturbing in its final scene of hallucinatory madness, Slyboots has a sense of closure that Cat's Cradle does not, which oddly makes it less successful.

SHADOW SHOW

Like Cat's Cradle, Shadow Show (1976), Flower's last novel, ends with the sense that the novel is not really over: The plot will continue to work itself out after the reader closes the book. Shadow Show portrays a man who becomes trapped by fear. Richard Ross discovers unethical business practices at his work but does not report his suspicions immediately, because he has no proof. Instead, he visits the man he suspects is running the deal, Athol Cosgrove. Cosgrove apparently has devised a plan to implicate Ross in a burglary of his flat and by extension in the fraudulent dealings. A neighbor boy is accidentally murdered during the plan's execution, and Ross becomes a suspect in the killing as well. In Shadow Show, none of the characters is mad, but Flower portrays the deterioration of Ross's ethics under the strain of being a murder suspect. By the end of the novel, Ross, who has self-righteously prided himself on his moral code, has become a liar, a heavy drinker, and nearly a murderer. He has trapped himself with his own self-protective lies.

Flower's view of the world is a dark one filled with self-deceiving characters and psychological as well as physical violence. Though her books are quite well written and her mastery of the suspense form obvious, little attention has been paid to her work, perhaps because her books are so relentlessly disturbing in their view of human nature. Her police procedurals are often amusing, but in these, and more so in the suspense novels, her vision of what lies below the "smooth civilized top layer" seems to find no redeeming grace there.

Casey Schmitt

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

DETECTIVE INSPECTOR SWINTON SERIES: Wax Flowers for Gloria, 1958; Goodbye, Sweet William, 1959; A Wreath of Water-Lilies, 1960; One Rose Less, 1961; Hell for Heather, 1962; Term of Terror, 1963; Fiends of the Family, 1966

NONSERIES NOVELS: Hunt the Body, 1968; Cobweb, 1972; Cat's Cradle, 1973; Odd Job, 1974; Sly-

boots, 1974; Vanishing Point, 1975; Crisscross, 1976; Shadow Show, 1976

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

PLAYS: This Seems as Good a Time as Any, pr. 1948; Love Returns to Umbrizi, pr. 1949 (with Cedric Flower); From the Tropics to the Snow, pr. 1965 (with Cedric Flower); Anonymous, pr. 1966; Done Away With, pr. 1966; Easy Terms, pr. 1966; Marleen, pr. 1966; The Empty Day, pr. 1966; The Lace Counter, pr. 1966; The Prowler, pr. 1966; The Tape Recorder, pr. 1966; The V.I.P.P., pr. 1966; Tilley Landed on Our Shore, pr. 1968

POETRY: Pistils for Two, 1963

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Klein, Kathleen Gregory. Great Women Mystery Writers: Classic to Contemporary. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994. Contains some reference to Flower and helps place her among her contemporaries.
- Knight, Stephen. Continent of Mystery: A Thematic History of Australian Crime Fiction. Melbourne, Vic.: Melbourne University Press, 1997. Study of the dominant themes and concerns distinctive to the crime fiction of Australia. Sheds light on Flower's works. Bibliographic references and index.
- Macdonald, Virginia. "Pat Flower." In Twentieth-Century Crime and Mystery Writers, edited by John M. Reilly. 2d ed. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1985. Discussion of Flower's crime fiction, its relative merit, and its relation to both British and Australian culture.
- Nile, Richard. The Making of the Australian Literary Imagination. St. Lucia: University of Queensland Press, 2002. Discussion of prevalent features of Australian writing and the cultural and geographic influences on the continent's literary history; provides perspective on Flower's work.
- Wilde, William H., Joy Hooton, and Barry Andrews. The Oxford Companion to Australian Literature. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985. General overview of Australian literature and culture. Creates a background for understanding Flower. Bibliographic references and index.

KEN FOLLETT

Born: Cardiff, Wales; June 5, 1949

Also wrote as Martin Martinsen; Symon Myles;

Bernard L. Ross; Zachary Stone

Types of plot: Espionage; historical; thriller

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Apples Carstairs, 1974-

Piers Roper, 1974-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

APPLES CARSTAIRS is a successful businessman who is forced to become an amateur detective.

PIERS ROPER is an ambitious and effective industrial spy who becomes involved in hostile takeovers and corporate battles.

CONTRIBUTION

Ken Follett writes exciting tales of espionage and adventure set in various locales and periods. Thoroughly researched, his novels mix historical fact and colorful protagonists to create intelligent—if not intellectual—entertainments. He also presents complex, believable characters whose personal lives are often as chaotic as their social and political milieus. He has consciously courted bestsellerdom by employing vivid heroines to appeal to female readers. Although his work resembles the tradition of Helen MacInnes and Alistair MacLean more than that of Eric Ambler and Graham Greene, Follett's novels are carefully crafted and generally well written in a deceptively simple style. Of all the espionage writers since the heyday of Ian Fleming, Follett writes perhaps the easiest plots to follow—without skimping on complexity and ambiguity of motive.

BIOGRAPHY

Kenneth Martin Follett was born on June 5, 1949, in Cardiff, Wales, the son of Martin D. Follett and Lavinia C. Evans Follett. His father was an Inland Revenue clerk and later a lecturer at a school for tax inspectors. After growing up in Cardiff, Follett studied philosophy at the University of London. He married

Mary Emma Ruth Elson in 1968, and their son, Emanuele, was born later that year. A daughter, Marie-Claire, was born in 1973. Follett's wife worked as a bookkeeper while he continued his education. After he graduated in 1970, he worked as a reporter and popular-music columnist for the South Wales Echo in Cardiff. In 1973, he became a crime reporter for the Evening News in London for a year. Follett's switch from journalism to fiction resulted from financial necessity. His daughter had just been born and the family had recently bought a house when Follett's car broke down. Because a fellow journalist had made some quick money by selling a mystery novel, Follett hurriedly wrote The Big Needle (1974), a mystery about drug dealers. The book paid Follett's car repair bill and encouraged him to continue pursuing fiction.

In 1974, Follett joined the staff of Everest Books, a modest London publisher, to learn the essentials of writing best sellers. He spent the following years rising to deputy managing director of the firm and writing nine more books—mysteries, thrillers, and children's mysteries—under his own name and a series of pseudonyms, earning about five thousand dollars for each. Follett told the Los Angeles Times that he learned to create good books “by writing mediocre ones and wondering what was wrong with them.” He also attempted to make some of these early efforts at least different from the flood of popular fiction, with industrial spying the subject of The Shakeout (1975) and The Bear Raid (1976).

Follett's breakthrough came with The Eye of the Needle (1978). The novel, which resulted from an English publisher's request for an adventure novel having something to do with World War II, was an international success. It sold more than ten million copies and won the Edgar Allan Poe Award of the Mystery Writers of America. It established Follett as a novelist. After publishing Triple with Arbor House in 1979, he signed a three-million-dollar deal for three more books with New American Library/William Morrow. He then took his family to a village near Nice, France, where they lived until returning to England in 1982.

During the 1980's, Follett continued to write spy novels but also ventured into other fields. The success of the American industrialist H. Ross Perot's company in rescuing hostages from the Iranian government provided the material for Follett's On Wings of Eagles (1983), a nonfictional book. In 1989, he published his first historical novel, The Pillars of the Earth, a family saga involving the building of a medieval cathedral. Despite the book's controversial sexual content, it was judged one of England's best one hundred novels by a British Broadcasting Company poll in 2003. Owing in part to that novel's success, Follett signed a deal with Dell Publishing Company to write two more books for $12.3 million. However, although Dell was pleased with A Dangerous Fortune (1993), it was less enthusiastic about A Place Called Freedom (1995), a saga set in the United States. Eventually Crown Publishers negotiated a deal with Dell and published the book, enabling Follett to retain authorial control of his work.

Meanwhile, during the 1980's, Follett and his wife divorced. Afterward, Follett married Barbara Broer, who was a Labour Party member of Parliament for Stevenage, England, where the couple settled.

ANALYSIS

The Eye of the Needle and Ken Follett's subsequent spy novels clearly illustrate the fruits of his apprentice period. His fiction is economically written, with few wasted words, scenes, or characters. Compared with the espionage novels of John le Carré, Len Deighton, Frederick Forsyth, and Robert Ludlum, Follett's books are tightly constructed and remarkably easy to follow, yet Follett displays the intelligence, ambiguities, subtleties, and didacticism associated with the best spy fiction. Despite a quiet socialism that distrusts the rich and powerful and sides with the oppressed and disadvantaged, Follett never allows his concerns to get in the way of telling an exciting story.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Ken Follett (center) with South African novelist Nadine Gordimer (left) and American mystery writer Donna Leon at an international book event in Germany in 2003. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Unlike most of his contemporaries, Follett does not limit himself to specific times and places. His novels take place in World War II Britain and Egypt, Israel in the 1960's, England in the days leading up to World War I, and the Afghanistan of the early 1980's, with side trips to Germany, Russia, France, and the United States. His protagonists are spies, military men, revolutionaries, prostitutes, and homemakers. He occasionally includes historical personages, such as Sir Winston Churchill and a young Anwar al-Sadat. Unafraid to resort to the unusual, unexpected, or unlikely, Follett, in Triple, has Israeli intelligence enlist the aid of a Mafia don to hijack a shipload of uranium.

Incident and character are the major elements in Follett's fiction. Each novel has at least one brilliantly conceived and executed sequence. One of the best and most cinematic action scenes occurs in The Key to Rebecca (1980), when the motorcycle-riding hero chases the running villain through the streets of Cairo. A different but equally gripping sequence appears in Lie Down with Lions (1985). When that novel's pregnant heroine witnesses a young Afghan boy's loss of a hand to a mine, she rips off her blouse to bind the wound, and begins carrying the boy to medical help. On the way, she is beaten by an anti-Western Afghan outraged by her nakedness. She continues struggling to reach the doctor, her husband, only to be left alone when her labor begins prematurely. Her daughter is later delivered by an ignorant midwife. Follett touches on a wide range of emotions throughout this series of events.

Follett's plots are crammed with details to assist in creating setting, mood, and verisimilitude. He writes, in The Man from St. Petersburg (1982), about Russian expatriates in pre-World War I London as if he had firsthand knowledge of their lives. Follett pays as much attention to the day-to-day details of life in a remote Afghan village as he does to the action of Lie Down with Lions. In the latter, he even includes a bibliography, listing the sources of his Afghan information.

Although Follett's protagonists may not be as fully realized as those in the works of le Carré or Deighton, he is never satisfied with mere stereotypes, carefully delineating the characters' social, political, economic, psychological, and sexual motives. His heroes are nagged by doubts about themselves, their work, and their worlds. Nat Dickstein, the Mossad agent in Triple, and Ellis Thaler, the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) operative in Lie Down with Lions, hate their jobs, feeling trapped in webs of deceit. Follett's villains are always interesting, with a thin line often separating the good from the bad. In The Key to Rebecca, the novelist draws numerous parallels between his English hero and German antagonist. The Russian anarchist of The Man from St. Petersburg is portrayed as both hero and villain.

Follett plans each of his novels with the advice of his agent and his editor, calculations aimed at producing best sellers. Realizing that the readership of espionage fiction is predominantly male and desiring to make his books more attractive to female readers, he has placed a strong woman character at the center of each book. This character is an average woman, non-professional, frustrated romantically, with whom many female readers can identify. She is also intelligent, courageous, and resourceful—the moral center of the novel, given to expressing some of Follett's social and political views. This heroine either assists the hero in foiling the villains or does so on her own. That she can be counted on to save the day makes Follett's novels somewhat formulaic. This woman can also expect sexual fulfillment, leading to graphically erotic scenes, especially in Lie Down with Lions.

Follett offers a fictional theory of sorts in his 1979 Writer essay "Books That Enchant and Enlighten." Claiming that most popular writers aim too low, while their more serious colleagues wallow in "the trivia of middle-class life," Follett asks novelists to refuse to settle for merely "exciting trash or thoughtful tedium." He attacks the entertainers for creating wooden characters and writing carelessly and the aesthetes for dispensing with plot and "the world outside the mind," suggesting that each type of writer incorporate elements of both popular and serious approaches:

The underwater knife fight is more exciting, not less, if it's described in graceful, powerful prose; the plot has more drama if it depends on character development as much as [on] external events; the romance is more thrilling if the tall dark hero nurses a genuine, credible sadness behind that handsome-but-cruel smile.

Writing successful fiction, according to Follett, is presenting numerous elements correctly, and he encourages novelists “to discover new things to get right.”

THE EYE OF THE NEEDLE

All the elements of Follett’s fictional formula appear in The Eye of the Needle, and his later books have offered variations on his achievement in this first major success. The Germans’ best spy, Heinrich von Müller-Güden, has been an undercover agent in England since before World War II. His code name is Die Nadel (the needle), after the stiletto he uses to dispatch those who get in his way. This master spy, called Henry Faber (one of his British aliases) throughout the narrative, is a consummate professional who never allows anything to interfere with his duties, cutting himself off, as much as possible, from human emotions.

Faber has learned that the Allied base in Norfolk is a hoax, nothing but skeleton barracks, plywood tanks, rubber ships, and dummy aircraft. This stratagem is intended to convince the Germans that the inevitable invasion of the Continent will be at Pas de Calais. Faber must take his photographic evidence to Adolf Hitler in person so that all efforts will be directed farther down the French coast at Normandy. British intelligence must stop him before he reaches the submarine sent to pick him up somewhere off the coast of the United Kingdom.

Assigned to stop Faber are Professor Percival Godliman and Frederick Bloggs, a former Scotland Yard inspector. Godliman, who served in military intelligence during World War I, has engulfed himself in medieval studies following the death of his wife. Bloggs is also a widower, his wife, an ambulance driver, having been killed during the Blitz. Bloggs’s pursuit of Die Nadel is made more personal because he blames Faber for his wife’s death, since the spy’s reports have determined where German bombs are to fall.

Like Faber, Godliman and Bloggs are lonely men who retreat into their work as a substitute for their missing emotional lives. Ironically, both find refuge in the current chaos. The war simplifies moral issues and negates the daily banalities of ordinary existence. Follett’s characters have a need for the extraordinary to rescue them from the mundane. It is impossible to see them working in offices and living in the suburbs.

The other protagonists are Lucy and David Rose. David lost both legs in a traffic accident on their wedding day in 1940, just before he was to become a fighter pilot. Unlike Godliman and Bloggs, he has found no outlet for his frustrations and has become embittered, unable to escape his self-pity. He raises sheep on Storm Island, off the coast of Aberdeen, Scotland, where he and Lucy live with their son, Jo, and an elderly shepherd. Jo was conceived before the wedding, and the couple have not had sexual relations since the accident. David refuses to let Lucy touch him, but she has become reconciled to her life in this remote, bleak spot. Like Faber, she knows nothing but isolation.

The Roses’ lives are disrupted by the arrival of the fugitive Faber. Attempting to reach the U-boat and flee Bloggs, he has stolen a boat during a gale, only to be shipwrecked on Storm Island. Faber has been celibate for seven years, since any emotional involvement would distract him from his work, but he immediately senses a kinship with the lonely farmwife. Lucy is also drawn to the stranger whose kindness and humor are so different from her husband’s sullenness.

Lucy and Faber begin an affair, but the suspicious David finds the spy’s photographic negatives and confronts him. Their cliffside fight to the death is one of the most harrowing in all Follett’s fiction. Die Nadel has more difficulty killing this legless man than he has ever had with any of his other victims.

When Lucy discovers that her husband is dead, she retains her composure, even to the point of making love to her husband’s murderer. Escaping with Jo to radio for help, Lucy is pursued by Faber, and a bloody battle ensues. She takes an ax to Faber’s hand when he breaks into the cottage; then, she keeps him from contacting the submarine by sticking her fingers into a light socket to knock out the radio. Finally, she chases Faber to the shore and shoots him.

Lucy’s amazing determination does not come out of nowhere; Follett has painstakingly painted a believable picture of her troubled marriage, showing the courage she has needed simply to live with David. She draws on her unfulfilled needs in her passion for the stranger and finds similar strength growing out of her repression when she kills the man she loves but knows she must destroy.

The most interesting achievement in The Eye of the Needle, however, is Follett's convincing portrait of the German spy. Faber is an outsider who thinks that he can control the violent world around him. He has never joined the National Socialist Party, feels scorn for everyone in authority in Germany, dares to include sarcastic remarks in his reports because of his belief in his invulnerability, and provides false information to prevent the bombing of St. Paul's Cathedral because he respects it as a work of art.

Faber considers himself cool and dispassionate, yet he vomits whenever he kills someone. Attempting to turn his weaknesses into strengths, he realizes that he can use his fears and insecurities to advantage in his profession, since a spy mistrusts everyone and everything. His instinct for survival fails him only when he drops his defenses with Lucy. He can accomplish his mission and win the war for the country he loves if he kills her, but he cannot bring himself to murder the person who has reminded him of his human frailties.

Although Follett may admire Faber's efficiency as a spy, he does not intend for him to be a sympathetic character. He never allows his reader to forget that Die Nadel is a representative of one of the world's greatest evils, even if Faber does not think of himself as a Nazi. Follett's goal is to make the character a recognizable human being, to avoid the cardboard villain so common in escapist fiction. Follett's ability to create such believable, interesting characters is perhaps his greatest strength.

THE MAN FROM ST. PETERSBURG

The Man from St. Petersburg begins with a meeting between Stephen Walden, a British aristocrat, and Winston Churchill, a government minister, who asks Walden to negotiate an agreement between Russia and Great Britain on the eve of the outbreak of World War I. Although out of power and a political rival of Churchill, Walden patriotically agrees to represent Britain and deal with his wife's nephew, Prince Aleksy Andreyevich Orlov, the Russian envoy. The spy in enemy territory is Feliks Kschesinsky, a fearless anarchist whose torture and banishment to Siberia have made him despise authority and whose goal is the assassination of Orlov and the prevention of a Russian/British alliance. Muddying the waters is the fact that Charlotte, whom Walden believes is his daughter, is really the child of Lydia and Feliks, who once had a clandestine affair. When Charlotte, whose radical, liberal temperament resembles her mother's, meets Feliks, she is drawn to him because of his liberal politics and even helps him try to kill Orlov.

Within the first few chapters Follett establishes the conflicts: Labour versus Conservative parties, youth versus age, radical extremists versus upholders of the status quo, patriarchal men versus liberated women, and upper class versus lower class. Although both Feliks and Walden love people and want to help them, that "love" is in the abstract. Walden is a decent man but callously dismisses a pregnant, unwed servant, and Feliks does not fear death because he does not love anyone in particular, only the "masses" whom he thinks he serves. At the beginning of the novel Feliks is the predator and Orlov and Walden the prey, but after Walden's first attempt fails, he sets a trap for Feliks, only to have the talented and resourceful spy escape. From that point, Feliks becomes the hunted, and without Charlotte's help he would fail. Charlotte brings Feliks to Walden's mansion, where Orlov is staying, and in the conflagration that he starts, Feliks successfully kills Orlov but discovers Charlotte is trapped in her room. Walden and Feliks, who now realize that he truly loves his daughter and puts her escape ahead of his own, save Charlotte, but Feliks perishes in the attempt. Walden and Lydia discover that they are in love, and he realizes that he has been distant and aloof. Follett has it both ways: His spy is successful, but the treaty is not forestalled by Orlov's death because Churchill orders that history will record that the death was caused by the fire, not by Feliks's bullet.

THE KEY TO REBECCA

Perhaps the most "literary" of Follett's novels, The Key to Rebecca is tied to Daphne du Maurier's Rebecca (1938), a novel about the difficulties a young woman has fitting into the aristocratic world of her husband, whose dead wife seems to haunt their home. Like Rebecca, Elene Fontana feels unworthy of the cultured, privileged man she loves, and her Jewish/Bedouin culture differs sharply from that of the British expatriate colonists. William Vandam, the British intelligence officer she loves, is pitted against Alexander Wolff, a master German spy intent on aiding a German victory in North Africa. Initially, things go Wolff's way as he enlists the aid of a seductress who succeeds in getting information from a weak British officer, but gradually Wolff is the pursued, and Vandam, who has to contend with an officious and ineffective commanding officer, gains the upper hand. His capture of Wolff, however, depends on Elene's collaboration and the plucky behavior of his son Billy. As in most Follett novels, the "hero" is merely a public servant determined to do his job despite repeated setbacks, not a suave superman who is control throughout the story. As in many Follett novels, the emotionally arid hero learns to love and becomes a more complete human being.

LIE DOWN WITH LIONS

In Lie Down with Lions, two spies operate in Afghanistan. Ellis Thaler, the American CIA agent, is working against the Russians, and Jean-Pierre, a French communist whose father's past has shaped his son's political convictions, is working with the Russians. Caught in the middle is Jane Lambert, who first loves Ellis but spurns him when she discovers his CIA identity and who later marries Jean-Pierre and goes with him to Afghanistan, where he works as a doctor to the Afghans, whom he betrays. When Jane finds out that her husband is a traitor, she turns against him; and when Ellis turns up in Afghanistan, her love for him is rekindled. Ellis, earlier divorced from a wife who believed him to be cold and aloof, slowly allows his feelings for Jane to develop. When he and Jane flee from Jean-Pierre and his Russian comrades, it is Jane who assumes control of the plot. She refuses to bomb the young Russian soldiers who pursue them because she thinks of their mothers, but later it is she who kills Jean-Pierre so they can escape.

Like other spy novels, Lie Down with Lions is a love story about a strong woman, a man who finally allows his emotions to develop, and a villain whose past explains his behavior. It is also a political story about the contrasts between the Afghans and the Russians and between liberals and conservatives. The comparison between the American experience in Vietnam and the Soviet experience in Afghanistan is drawn, and the futility of both suggests the end of colonialist incursions in the rest of the world. The moral superiority of women over men in historical affairs is also part of the message: diplomacy, not weapons, is the answer.

WHITEOUT

In Whiteout (2004), Follett abandons the spy novel and returns to espionage, this time a search for a stolen biochemical weapon that is being sent to terrorists. Toni Gallo, chief of security at a pharmaceutical company, is pitted against three malevolent but somewhat comic thugs and the son of the company's president, Stanley Oxenford, the older man she loves and from whom she is separated by class, income, and age. There are chase scenes, violent acts, interference from incompetents, and nods to historical events, but the novel essentially takes place during one day at the Oxenford home, where the family, dysfunctional at best and beset by friction, comes together as ostensibly weak men gain their courage and children gain maturity in order to defeat the villains. More so than in the other novels, family seems paramount and reconciliations between men and women and parents and children is the focus. As in the first few Follett novels, the technical information tends to overwhelm and ultimately disappoint Follett fans.

Michael Adams

Updated by Thomas L. Erskine

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

APPLES CARSTAIRS SERIES (AS MYLES): The Big Needle, 1974 (also known as The Big Apple); The Big Black, 1974; The Big Hit, 1975

PIERS ROPER SERIES: The Shakeout, 1975; The Bear Raid, 1976

NOVELS: The Modigliani Scandal, 1976 (as Stone); The Eye of the Needle, 1978; Triple, 1979; The Key to Rebecca, 1980; The Man from St. Petersburg, 1982; Lie Down with Lions, 1985; Night over Water, 1991; A Dangerous Fortune, 1993; The Third Twin, 1996; The Hammer of Eden, 1998; Code to Zero, 2000; Jackdaws, 2001; Hornet Flight, 2002; Whiteout, 2004

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Amok: King of Legend, 1976 (as Ross); Paper Money, 1977 (as Stone); Capricorn One, 1978 (as Ross); The Pillars of the Earth, 1989; Pillars of the Almighty, 1994; A Place Called Freedom, 1995; World Without End, 2007

NONFICTION: The Heist of the Century, 1978 (with René Louis Maurice; also known as The Gentlemen of 16 July; revised 1986 as Under the Streets of Nice: The Bank Heist of the Century); On Wings of Eagles, 1983

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: The Secret of Kellerman's Studio, 1976; The Power Twins and the Worm Puzzle: A Science Fantasy for Young People, 1976 (as Martinsen); The Mystery Hideout, 1991

SCREENPLAYS: Fringe Banking, 1978; A Football Star, 1979 (with John Sealey); Lie Down with Lions, 1988 (adaptation of his novel)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Follett, Ken. Interview. Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine, December, 1978, 95-96. Brief but revealing interview published early in Follett's writing career.

Freeman, Lucy, ed. The Murder Mystique: Crime Writers on Their Art. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1982. Includes a chapter in which Follett comments on his early fiction and the craft of writing. Provides useful insights into Follett's early novels.

Ken Follett: A Reader's Checklist and Reference Guide. Middletown, Conn.: CheckerBee, 1999. Paperback book containing brief plot summaries of all Follett's fiction through 1999, along with a short biography of the author.

Ramet, Carlos. Ken Follett: The Transformation of a Writer. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1999. Mixture of biography and analysis of the novels, quite helpful.

Turner, Richard C. Ken Follett: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996. Using a variety of critical approaches, Turner provides an indispensable analysis of all Follett's major works. Includes a biography and a bibliography of Follett's works and the secondary works about his fiction.

C. S. FORESTER

Cecil Lewis Troughton Smith

Born: Cairo, Egypt; August 27, 1899

Died: Fullerton, California; April 2, 1966

Types of plot: Inverted; psychological; thriller

CONTRIBUTION

Apart from the Hornblower saga, for which he is best known, C. S. Forester wrote modern naval fiction, historical biographies, travel books, war adventures set on land, a romantic adventure, several allegories set in Africa, and, early in his career, three psychological crime thrillers. Although the mystery contributions have always been overshadowed by the hugely successful adventure novels that followed, they present compelling stories in their own right. Not content to follow the classical detective format, Forester wrote inverted mysteries that penetrate the superficial mechanics of crime to reveal the psychologies of the perpetrators. Forester never achieved any great measure of critical success, nor did he aspire to literary acclaim. He was well received by the public and will be remembered as a writer of good stories with fast-paced plots and meticulously researched details.

BIOGRAPHY

C. S. Forester, also known as Cecil Scott Forester, was born Cecil Lewis Troughton Smith on August 27, 1899, the youngest of five children in the family of George Smith, a British official in Cairo, Egypt, and Sarah Troughton Smith. He adopted the pen name when his family strenuously opposed his career change to writing. His mother returned to England with her children when he was two. Young Cecil found Great Britain cold and inhospitable. He was placed in council infants school at the age of three, by which time he was already able to read and write. Although he was an academic prodigy, his education was not without difficulties; he was a slight child who made an easy target for bullying classmates. His older siblings won scholarships, however, and he was expected to do the same.

C. S. Forester. (Library of Congress)

Denied the usual childhood outlet of street play, Cecil turned to books, starting a lifelong habit of reading at least one a day. During World War I, the seventeen-year-old youth tried to enlist in the British army but failed the physical examination as a result of a heart irregularity. He began medical studies at Guy's Hospital, where, for the first time, his marks suffered. As a means of escape, he began to write small pieces for the hospital gazette and discovered that he enjoyed writing more than practicing medicine. Despite his parents' wishes, he made a clean break from medicine to become a full-time author. His first novel, a work he later admitted was "atrociously bad," was the product of a frantic, two-week effort; it was never published. He was to write three novels before the third one, A Pawn Among Kings, was accepted for publication in 1924. What followed were several Napoleonic histories before Forester returned to fiction with a mystery tale, Payment Deferred, published in 1926.

Forester married Kathleen Belcher, a sports instructor, in 1926. They later had two sons, John and George. Payment Deferred received favorable attention and was converted to a successful screenplay. The royalties from this book cemented his new occupation. Forester ultimately moved to California, where his fame grew. In 1943, Forester was stricken with arteriosclerosis, a painful affliction that made him a virtual invalid. A year later, he and Kathleen were divorced. He married Dorothy Ellen Foster in 1947. His body was crippled, but he continued to write as crisply as ever until suffering a stroke in 1964. He lingered until dying of heart disease on April 2, 1966.

ANALYSIS

Although C. S. Forester is best known, and will most be remembered, for his Hornblower series and other tales of dashing military actions, he served his apprenticeship writing mystery thrillers that are well worth reading. Of these, Payment Deferred and Plain Murder (1930) are the most successful. Both works follow the inverted format; that is, the stories are told from the viewpoint of the criminal. His protagonists are ordinary working-class people who somehow summon the nerve to commit murders, then suffer the disrupting consequences of their acts. Avoiding a common failing of classical mysteries, Forester put life into the plots by logically developing the complications and tension that consume criminals' lives after they perform these desperate acts. His mysteries then chronicle the killers' descent into the horrors that inevitably follow. Forester would have nothing of the classical English tea cozies with their bloodless victims, parades of clues, and faintly comedic overtones.

PAYMENT DEFERRED

William Marble, a shabbily dressed bank clerk who serves as the protagonist of Payment Deferred, is a man on the ragged edge of destitution, sorely pressed to pay the debts looming over his rented house in a dreary London suburb. He holds to a thin thread of respect from his coworkers and his family, a frail, weak-willed wife named Annie and two children. He would be an alcoholic but for the fact that he cannot afford to buy enough whiskey. Opportunity knocks one blustery evening in the form of Jim Medland, a distant nephew from Melbourne. Jim has come to visit his only surviving family since the death of his mother. He makes the mistake, however, of flashing a wad of bank notes in his wallet. Marble's mind churns at the possibilities, and the reader is surprised to discover a mind capable of strong focus, at least for brief periods of time. This mental nimbleness under pressure is characteristic of all Forester's mystery protagonists and goes a long way toward rounding out their personalities. The same powers of superhuman concentration are also an important element of Forester's later series hero, Horatio Hornblower, a much more sympathetic character.

Marble offers drinks from his last precious bottle to young Jim and hints at the possibility of an inter-family loan, a prospect that Jim dodges most firmly. Now comes the crux of Marble's life: Feigning that he has heard someone cry out, he rushes upstairs, still holding the glass of whiskey he has been pouring for Jim. While there, Marble laces the drink with potassium cyanide from a cabinet of photographic chemicals. He returns with the glass and urges Jim to drink; death comes quickly for young Jim. As the body must be disposed of, that night Marble digs up a dormant flower bed in his rear garden and buries Jim. No one will miss the visitor from Australia or disturb the weedy gravesite—except in Marble's mind.

Now the story truly begins. Forester paints one man's degeneration into all-consuming obsession of which Edgar Allan Poe would have been proud. Marble gives Annie money to pay off the most urgent bills, but he withholds the larger denominations from Jim's wallet for fear that they will be somehow traced back to the missing Australian. Marble's need for money heightens when he realizes that his landlord could someday put him out of his house. New tenants might dig up the garden and discover the body. Nevertheless, Marble rises to meet this crisis as well. His job at the bank involves dealing with foreign currency exchange, and he puzzles out a risky but wildly profitable plan to trade on the volatile French franc. He uses a local bookmaker to front for him, buys into the exchange market at a strong leverage, and exits the next day a newly rich man. Forester invents the scheme's workings with a marvelous richness of detail, giving the reader a sense of looking over Marble's shoulder as he follows the market's fluctuations. Readers cannot help being drawn into plots so carefully researched and written; this strength of Forester's writing goes far in explaining his great popularity.

At this point, all would seem well for Marble. The money, however, does not buy happiness. Gradually, he concludes that there is no escape for him even after buying the house. He purchases an extensive library of crime and forensic books, brooding over them for hours while drinking and watching the muddy tangle of weeds in his back garden. In a desperate attempt at diversion, he has a brief affair with a predatory dressmaker, Madame Collins. Annie finally realizes that her husband is a murderer, plunging Marble into a fresh paroxysm of terror that she will betray him. He pays her more attention, the very thing for which she has hungered, and for a time the Marbles are closer than ever—until Madame Collins sends a letter threatening to expose her affair with Marble unless he pays her off.

When Annie catches influenza and is put into a sickbed, Marble refuses the doctor's advice to get nursing help. Annie discovers the blackmail letter by mistake, its contents throw her into despair, and she crawls to the photographic cabinet for the cyanide. Her suicide is assumed to be murder at the hands of her husband, leading to a conviction for his wife's murder, which he has not committed, rather than for his nephew's murder. Marble has therefore not escaped payment for Jim's murder; it was merely deferred, with interest in the form of years of anguish over the horrible secret.

The genius of this book lies not in the tight, well-crafted plot but in the portrayal of the characters, particularly Marble. He is not only a sluggish and pathetic man who bullies his sitting-duck wife from the dubious comfort of a Victorian chair; but he is also the nervy, collected man who conceives and carries out the murder of a relative, all the while entertaining the victim. He is the man who can crack the code of international finance and parlay his modest spoils of murder into a small fortune. He is also, however, the man who buries the body directly behind his house and spends the rest of his life in abject terror that a careless gardener or stray dog will uncover the bones. Marble is a marvelously developed character capable of brilliance as well as stupidity. It is this element of the book that sets it apart and, most likely, led The Times of London to include Payment Deferred on its list of the ninety-nine best crime stories.

ONE WONDERFUL WEEK

One Wonderful Week (1927) followed quickly after Forester's first commercial and critical success, but it is flawed by an uneven tone that rebounds unsettlingly among light comedy, slapstick, and crime. Where Payment Deferred maintains a consistent pace of degeneration into obsession, this book reminds the reader that it is, after all, only words printed on a page. It is a decided departure from Forester's usual mastery of verisimilitude.

PLAIN MURDER

Plain Murder returns to the format of Payment Deferred with a story of three clerks at an advertising firm who murder their superior because he has learned of their bribe taking and intends to report them to the firm's owner. Morris, their ringleader, comes to distrust the weakest conspirator and contrives his death by an apparent motorcycle accident. Oldroyd, the other surviving conspirator, fears Morris but cannot seek police protection, for obvious reasons. As in all of Forester's works, the plot flows smoothly and logically. It leads to a flawed ending, however, in which Oldroyd, the weaker character, steps unconvincingly out of the role Forester created for him to save himself and Morris's wife from being killed.

With all three of Forester's mysteries, readers might object to a few elements of style that today seem somewhat quaint. The books suffer from frequent shifts in points of view, even though Forester handles them smoothly. Another minor irritant comes in the form of heavy-handed authorial intrusions such as the one concluding chapter 11 of Plain Murder, "Those that read to the end of this book may better take their choice of these conflicting opinions." In Forester's defense, however, these lapses from modern stylistic standards were considered quite proper when he wrote them.

OTHER WORKS

Leaving the world of mystery, Forester turned to novels featuring equal measures of history and adventure. The General (1936) featured a British officer who reflected the World War I military philosophy of dogged, frontal assaults and trench warfare. On a slightly deeper level, the book is a bitterly ironic comment on the stupidities of war. Another important work is The African Queen (1935), the romantic adventure of a cockney mechanic and a never-married missionary in equatorial Africa, which was made into the classic Humphrey Bogart-Katharine Hepburn film. During World War II, at a time when England needed its spirits lifted, Forester wrote several rousing tales of modern naval fiction; the best of these, The Good Shepherd (1955), was not actually published until after the war.

For all the merit of Forester's crime fiction, he will be most remembered for his Hornblower series. Read voraciously in the United States as well as in England, Horatio Hornblower came to dominate Forester's efforts much the same as Sherlock Holmes dominated those of Arthur Conan Doyle. Forester ultimately wrote ten Hornblower novels (plus The Hornblower Companion, 1964, a book of naval charts and miscellany surrounding the entire saga) and was working on the eleventh when he died. Nevertheless, the book was published complete to the point at which illness stopped his work. In some ways, Hornblower's roots can be traced to William Marble of Payment Deferred. In spite of Marble's capacity for quick thinking at critical moments, the balance of his brutish personality sours his life. When Forester coupled this same trait of decisive thought with Hornblower's essential nobility, he crafted a character with whom readers are proud to identify.

Forester relished burdening his hero with the awesome responsibility of command, terming him "The Man Alone." Forester's use of this device, however, did not spring to life with the Hornblower saga. In The Hornblower Companion, he credits this concept as first having been used in Payment Deferred, writing, "The murderer, who, having committed his crime, dare confide in nobody and must plan his future actions without assistance, is one example of the single-handed man." Thus he had William Marble exercising his ironic command long before Hornblower walked the quarterdeck. Another strength of Forester's later writing first seen in Payment Deferred is his deft infusion of technical material into the plot, charging readers with a sense of being present at the scene of the story and leaving them believing that they have learned something. International finance was the subject in that early mystery; square-rigger seamanship and naval warfare were later detailed in the Hornblower series.

Unquestionably, Forester's characters are fascinating, and his verisimilitude is brilliant. These strengths alone may be enough to explain his popularity, or perhaps he wove some other magic through the pages that is too subtle to identify. Either way, one thing is certain: Forester's works provide escapist literature in the best sense of the term.

Richard E. Givan

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: Payment Deferred, 1926; One Wonderful Week, 1927 (also known as The Wonderful Week); Plain Murder, 1930

SHORT FICTION: The Man in the Yellow Raft, 1969; Gold from Crete, 1970

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: A Pawn Among Kings, 1924; Brown on Resolution, 1929; Death to the French, 1932 (also known as Rifleman Dodd, 1942); The Gun, 1933; The Peacemaker, 1934; The African Queen, 1935; The General, 1936; Beat to Quarters, 1937 (also known as The Happy Return); Ship of the Line, 1938; Flying Colours, 1938; The Captain from Connecticut, 1941; The Ship, 1943; Commodore Hornblower, 1945; Lord Hornblower, 1946; The Sky and the Forest, 1948; Mr. Midshipman Hornblower, 1950; Randall and the River of Time, 1950; Lieutenant Hornblower, 1952; Hornblower and the Atropos, 1953; The Good Shepherd, 1955; Admiral Hornblower in the West Indies, 1958; Hornblower and the Hotspur, 1962; Hornblower and the Crisis, 1967

SHORT FICTION: The Nightmare, 1954

NONFICTION: Napoleon and His Court, 1924; Josephine, Napoleon's Empress, 1925; Louis XIV: King of France and Navarre, 1928; Nelson, 1929; The Bar- bary Pirates, 1953; The Age of Fighting Sail, 1956 (history); Last Nine Days of the Bismarck, 1959 (history; pb. as Hunting the Bismarck in England); The Hornblower Companion, 1964; Long Before Forty, 1967

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Forester, C. S. Long Before Forty. London: Michael Joseph, 1967. Forester wrote this posthumously published autobiography early in his life. Although it is an unreliable account of his early life, it provides fascinating glimpses into how he wrote his first books.

Forester, John. Novelist & Storyteller: The Life of C. S. Forester. 2 vols. Lemon Grove, Calif.: Author, 2000. By far the fullest biography of C. S. Forester, this book self-published by his oldest son is a richly detailed, iconoclastic, and often painfully revealing account of Forester's inner life. Although often difficult to read because of the son's obvious bitterness about his father's dishonesty, this is an important contribution to understanding Forester as a writer that will influence all future studies of the author.

Rzepka, Charles J. Detective Fiction. Malden, Mass.: Polity, 2005. An important entry in the cultural studies of police and detective fiction, looking at the genre both as revealing of and influencing the cultures that produce it. Provides context for understanding Forester's work. Bibliographic references and index.

Sternlicht, Sanford. C. S. Forester. Boston: Twayne, 1981. Part of Twayne's English Authors series; provides a full study of Forester's life and works as well as history and criticism of his career.

Symons, Julian. "The Golden Age: The Thirties." In Mortal Consequences: A History, from the Detective Story to the Crime Novel. London: Faber and Faber, 1972. Discusses Forester's contributions to the British detective fiction of the 1930's and the relation between that period and the overall progression of the crime-fiction genre.

_____, ed. The Hundred Best Crime Stories. London: The Sunday Times, 1959. Places Forester's Payment Deferred as one of the hundred best crime stories of all time.

FREDERICK FORSYTH

Born: Ashford, Kent, England; August 25, 1938

Type of plot: Thriller

CONTRIBUTION

Frederick Forsyth's novels may best be described as the weaving of recent historical fact and imaginative fiction into intricate tales of thrilling suspense. Highly professional yet unorthodox heroes often find themselves in conflict with large organizations or well-known individuals. Detailed descriptions provide an air of authority and authenticity to the story, while complex plots and subplots, initially unconnected, gradually and inexorably mesh. Suspense is a major aspect of the plots, for the reader does not know until the final pages how the story will be resolved. Even then, Forsyth always adds an ironic twist to the ending. The success of his writing is indicated by his international readership, with sales of more than 35 million copies of his books in more than two dozen languages.

BIOGRAPHY

Frederick McCarthy Forsyth was born in Ashford, Kent, England, on August 25, 1938, the son of Frederick William Forsyth and Phyllis Green Forsyth. While at the Tonbridge School in Kent, he was a voracious reader, reading "anything I could get my hands on that had to do with adventure." He also developed a keen interest in foreign languages, learning French, German, and Spanish as well as some Russian and Italian. He frequently vacationed on the Continent, where he polished his language proficiency. He was also an avid motorcyclist, bullfighter, and airplane pilot. His formal schooling ended when he was seventeen. Only a few days after his seventeenth birthday, Forsyth had qualified for a pilot's license, and he joined the Royal Air Force (RAF) in May of 1956. He soon became the youngest fighter pilot in the RAF.

Forsyth left the military in 1958 to become a journalist, claiming that "it was the only job I could think of that might enable me to write, travel and keep more or less my own hours." He worked for the Eastern Daily Press in Norfolk, England, for three years. He then joined Reuters, the international news service, as a reporter and was posted to Paris, where he covered the Secret Army Organization (OAS) campaign against French president Charles de Gaulle.

At the age of twenty-five, Forsyth was appointed chief reporter of the Reuters East Berlin bureau, where he was Reuters's sole representative covering events in East Germany, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary. In 1965, he became a radio reporter for the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC); in 1967, he became an assistant diplomatic correspondent for BBC television. He was assigned to cover the civil war in Nigeria for the BBC, but his concern for the Biafrans made it difficult for him to follow the official position toward the conflict. He resigned and remained in Biafra as a freelance journalist for Time magazine, the Evening Standard, and the Daily Express. His experiences resulted in his first book, The Biafra Story, in 1969.

With his mind a repository of experiences, Forsyth turned to writing fiction. Using his observations of the 1962-1963 political crisis in France, he wrote The Day of the Jackal (1971). The book was rejected by several publishers before being picked up by Hutchinson. Nevertheless, it became a best seller and earned the Mystery Writers of America's Edgar Allan Poe Award. This work was quickly followed by The Odessa File (1972), a novel about neo-Nazi Germans, and The Dogs of War (1974), a novel set in a post-independence African nation.

Although Forsyth had declared that he would write only three novels, in 1979 he published The Devil's Alternative, a novel set in 1982 that offers insights into Soviet national and agricultural problems. The Fourth Protocol (1984) investigated the possibility of nuclear terrorism and international politics. In addition to his mystery novels, Forsyth has published No Comebacks: Collected Short Stories (1982), a collection of his mystery short stories, and The Shepherd (1975), a long short story for young adults about a ghostly plane helping a lost pilot.

The enormous success of Forsyth's novels has allowed him to live comfortably. He left England in 1974 to escape heavy taxation on his earnings, spending one year in Spain and five years in a mansion outside Dublin, Ireland. On his return to England in 1980, he moved into a large house in a fashionable section of London. He married Carole Forsyth, a former model, and they had two sons.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Frederick Forsyth (left) with historian Andrew Roberts (center) and novelist John Mortimer in late 2006. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

ANALYSIS

Frederick Forsyth is a writer of suspense thrillers based on historical events. His novels are a fictional slice of life in a given place at a given time. Truth is blended with fiction in such a way that the reader rarely knows where one ends and the other begins. Forsyth uses his background as a journalist to create in his novels an atmosphere of “being there” for the reader. His general style is also that of the journalist: crisp, factual, and clear paragraphs that efficiently convey information.

Although each work by Forsyth stands individually, there are certain similarities which may be described as his stylistic formula for success: There is always an efficient hero who is at odds with the establishment; a historical backdrop frequently places the hero in contact with known public figures in known historical situations; intricate detail is offered, lending authenticity to the work; and ingenious plots, which resemble large jigsaw puzzles of seemingly disconnected actions or events, are developed. Other writers use one or more parts of the formula, but it is these four facets that, when used collectively, distinguish a Forsyth work.

The heroes of Forsyth’s novels are not unlike Forsyth himself was when he first created them. They are in their thirties, articulate, and bright. They do not suffer fools lightly, especially when the fools are in the organizational hierarchy at a higher level than the hero. Forsyth, however, is not antiestablishment; for each fool there is an individual who helps, trusts, or believes in the hero. The establishment is neither good nor evil, only human. Still, the hero is usually forced to overcome not only the villains but also those on his own side. Fortunately, the hero is a man of action who is not bound by conventions, and he prevails.

THE DAY OF THE JACKAL

In Forsyth's first three novels, it is the hero who sets the pace and is the focal point of the action. Deputy Commissaire Claude Lebel, in The Day of the Jackal, is the ultimate professional detective; his antagonist, the Chacal, is the ultimate professional assassin. Only they can appreciate each other's thoroughness; only a Lebel is able to counter the actions of the Jackal.

The Day of the Jackal provides an example of how Forsyth uses known persons, events, or issues to establish the immediate background for the setting and to authenticate his story. There were several assassination attempts made by the OAS against de Gaulle. Although the reader knows that de Gaulle was never assassinated, the plotline of The Day of the Jackal is so compelling that suspense is maintained until the final lines of the book.

Forsyth also provides detail to add to the authenticity of his novels: Each book is a cornucopia of "how to" material, ranging from how to arrange an assassination to how to prepare a sunburn salve. Although the detail at times seemingly interferes with the pace of the story, it is a necessary aspect of the Forsyth formula, for it substantiates the action and informs and instructs the reader. For The Day of the Jackal, Forsyth interviewed assassins, a gun maker, and passport forgers, among others, to learn the techniques of assassination. His own interviews from the period provided intimate details regarding various participants. In each case, the trust developed by the reader for Forsyth's message is a by-product of the emphasis on detail.

THE ODESSA FILE

Peter Miller, in The Odessa File, is a highly competent crime reporter who, through dogged persistence and despite official opposition, counters the harsh professionalism of ODESSA, a German organization of former SS men seeking to undermine the Jewish state. It is known that there were secret organizations of former SS men in Germany after World War II, and there was a Captain Eduard Roschmann who had commanded a concentration camp at Riga, Latvia. Was there, however, a plot by such a group against Israel? The Odessa File makes a convincing case that it could have happened as described. The novel offers a short course on the Holocaust as well as one on bomb making. Cat Shannon, a mercenary with ideals, apparently works for a giant corporation to overthrow a corrupt African regime; however, he is also working for Africans to improve their future.

THE DOGS OF WAR

The Dogs of War was the result of Forsyth's concern about the fate of Africa under Marxist incompetents. His Biafran experiences and his contempt for the greed of Western businesses that had long exploited Africans provided the plot for the novel. The Dogs of War informs the reader, at length, about international financial machinations, weapons procurement and export, and mortar-shell trajectories. In his first three novels, Forsyth hoped that the reader would ask, "Is this the way that it happened?"

THE DEVIL'S ALTERNATIVE

After mining his personal experiences for his first three novels, Forsyth turned to the future. The Devil's Alternative, The Fourth Protocol, and The Afghan (2006) reflect intimate knowledge of subject matter; instead of known historical events, however, Forsyth poses questions regarding the future.

In The Devil's Alternative and The Fourth Protocol, the heroes are similar to earlier ones, but events and other characters become more significant. Adam Monro and John Preston are as active as earlier heroes, but the plot lines of each novel tend to focus more on world significance than on the abilities of the main character. The Devil's Alternative has as its background a famine-threatening grain crop failure in the Soviet Union. A faction in the Politburo suggests that the military be used to take the grain that it needs. The hijacking of an oil supertanker by Ukrainian nationalists, Kremlin infighting, and a beautiful Soviet spy provide the backdrop for the hero's efforts to ensure that the Soviets would get the grain they needed. In this novel, Forsyth wonders how the West can effectively deal with dedicated nationalist terrorist groups and how the Soviet Union can contend with its own myriad problems. He introduces national leaders and national problems of which the reader should be aware and interweaves them into the plot. He describes in detail smuggling in the Soviet Union, flaws in the Soviet system, and giant oil tankers.

THE FOURTH PROTOCOL

The Fourth Protocol centers on a secret plot by an element within the Soviet State Security Committee (KGB) to detonate a nuclear weapon near an American air base in England. Such an incident would benefit the far-left wing of the Labour Party and would undermine the very foundation of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization (NATO). Although the hero travels the globe to unravel the plot, the message is as important as is the hero. Through this novel, Forsyth poses chilling questions about British domestic politics, the stability of NATO, and nuclear weapons. He describes how to assemble a nuclear bomb; even more disturbing are Forsyth's memoranda from Kim Philby regarding the Labour Party in British politics.

THE AFGHAN

An outspoken opponent of the Iraq War and the Tony Blair government, Forsyth withheld his opinions in The Afghan, while portraying people, places, and events that adhere so closely to their real counterparts that the reader is forced to question whether Forsyth had inside information. Again, the style is such that the reader should ask: "Could this actually happen?"

PLOTS AND RESOLUTIONS

The most significant element of the Forsyth formula is the plot. Each of his plots might be described as a jigsaw puzzle or as an intricate machine. Before assembly, each appears to be far too complex for anyone to make sense of it. To introduce his plots and subplots, Forsyth uses time reference to show parallel developments that are, at first, seemingly unrelated. In a Forsyth novel, there is always a hidden pattern governing the events, a pattern of which even the participants are unaware, yet Forsyth is able to interweave his persons, places, and events with his plot, at an ever-quickening pace, until the dramatic conclusion is reached. Adding to the drama is Forsyth's habit of never neatly ending a story. There is always a piece or two left over, which adds an ironic twist to the ending.

As a writer, Forsyth should be remembered for his mastery of the historical thriller. His fiction is certainly popular literature, as sales figures have indicated, but is it great literature? Forsyth himself answers that question in self-deprecating fashion:

I'm a writer with the intent of selling lots of copies and making money. I don't think my work will be regarded as great literature or classics. I'm just a commercial writer and have no illusions about it.

His fiction, however, stands out from the typical products of its genre. Forsyth is greatly concerned about certain issues of the day and is informing readers while tantalizing them with a story. The discerning reader of Forsyth's novels will learn about history and begin to understand the great issues of the post-World War II world. However, Forsyth is no moralizer, for, to him, there are no absolutes.

William S. Brockington, Jr.

Updated by Fiona Kelleghan and Janet Alice Long

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: The Day of the Jackal, 1971; The Odessa File, 1972; The Dogs of War, 1974; The Devil's Alternative, 1979; The Fourth Protocol, 1984; The Negotiator, 1989; The Deceiver, 1991; The Fist of God, 1994; Icon, 1996; The Phantom of Manhattan, 1999; Avenger, 2003; The Afghan, 2006

SHORT FICTION: No Comebacks: Collected Short Stories, 1982; Used in Evidence, and Other Stories, 1998; The Veteran, 2001

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

SHORT FICTION: The Shepherd, 1975

NONFICTION: The Biafra Story, 1969 (revised 1983 as The Making of an African Legend: The Biafra Story); Emeka, 1982; I Remember: Reflections on Fishing in Childhood, 1995

EDITED TEXT: Great Flying Stories, 1991

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bloom, Bernard H. "In '94 Forsyth Novel, Hard-Hitting Truth of Today." Times Union, June 2, 2007, p. A6. Notes an intelligence report in Forsyth's 1994 The Fist of God that spells out what is likely to happen if Saddam Hussein's regime is toppled and remarks on how closely it matches what occurred in real life. Provides evidence of Forsyth's realistic, journalistic style.

Forsyth, Frederick. Frederick Forsyth. Http://www .booksat transworld.co.uk/frederickforsyth. The official Web site for Forsyth. Offers a biography, publication history, and links to interviews with the author.

Hitz, Frederick P. The Great Game: The Myth and Reality of Espionage. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004. Hitz, a former inspector general of the Central Intelligence Agency, compares fictional accounts of espionage with actual cases. Contains some discussion of Forsyth's The Day of the Jackal.

Jones, Dudley. "Professionalism and Popular Fiction: The Novels of Arthur Hailey and Frederick Forsyth." In Spy Thrillers: From Buchan to le Carré, edited by Clive Bloom. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1990. Offers close critical scrutiny of Forsyth's "faction"— the blending of fact and fiction, particularly in his early work. Forsyth's use of footnotes and other gimmicks in Day of the Jackal create a novel that mimics the real world, while the narrative reflects an assassin's sociopathic detachment.

Pitt, David. Review of The Afghan, by Frederick Forsyth. Booklist 102, no. 22 (August, 2006): 50. Reviewer notes Forsyth's realistic style, which adds to the suspense of this novel about a terrorist plot.

Priestman, Martin. The Cambridge Companion to Crime Fiction. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003. Contains an excellent discussion of the spy thriller, including Day of the Jackal and The Fourth Protocol, describing the conventions of detective fiction in the wider context of Cold War conspiracies.

DICK FRANCIS

Born: Lawrenny, near Tenby, Pembrokeshire, Wales; October 31, 1920

Types of plot: Amateur sleuth; private investigator

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Sid Halley, 1965-
Kit Fielding, 1985-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

SID HALLEY, a former champion steeplechase jockey, was forced to leave racing after an accident that cost him the use of his left hand. He then went to work as a consultant to a detective agency, eventually becoming an independent private investigator.

CHRISTMAS "KIT" FIELDING, a successful steeplechase jockey, is involved in mysteries as an amateur sleuth, first to help his sister and then to help the owner of the horses he rides.

CONTRIBUTION

Dick Francis's distinctive formula has been the combination of the amateur sleuth genre with the world of horse racing. Despite his reliance on these fixed elements of character and setting, he has avoided repetitiveness throughout his more than two dozen novels by working in horse racing from many different angles and by creating a new protagonist for almost every book. His extensive research—one of the trademarks of his work—enables him to create a slightly different world for each novel. Although many of his main characters are jockeys and most of his stories are set in Great Britain, he varies the formula with other main characters who work in a wide range of professions, many only peripherally connected with racing, and several of the books are set outside Great Britain—in America, Australia, Norway, South Africa, and the Soviet Union.

BIOGRAPHY

Dick Francis was born Richard Stanley Francis on October 31, 1920, in Lawrenny, near Tenby in southern Wales to George Vincent Francis and Catherine Mary (née Thomas) Francis. His father and grandfather were both horsemen, and Francis was riding from the age of five. He began riding show horses at the age of twelve and always had the ambition to become a jockey. Francis interrupted his pursuit of a riding career to serve as a pilot in the Royal Air Force during World War II, but in 1946 he made his debut as an amateur jockey and turned professional in 1948. At the peak of his career, Francis rode in as many as four hundred races a year and was ranked among the top jockeys in Great Britain in every one of the ten years he rode. In 1954, he began riding for Queen Elizabeth; in 1957, he retired at the top of his profession and began his second career.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Dick Francis in 1990. (AP/Wide World Photos)

Francis began writing as a racing correspondent for the London Sunday Express, a job he held for the next sixteen years, and started work on his autobiography, The Sport of Queens: The Autobiography of Dick Francis (1957). Although he had dropped out of high school at the age of fifteen, he refused the services of a ghostwriter, relying only on his wife, Mary Margaret Brenchley, a former publisher's reader to whom he had been married in 1947, for editorial help, a job she performed for all of his books until her death in 2000. Reviewers were pleasantly surprised by Francis's natural and economical style, and he was encouraged to try his hand at other writing. He produced his first mystery novel, Dead Cert, in 1962, immediately striking the right blend of suspenseful plotting and the racing setting that has structured his books since. His work was an immediate popular and critical success, and he received the Crime Writers' Association's Silver Dagger Award for For Kicks (1965) and the Mystery Writers of America's Edgar Allan Poe Award for Forfeit (1968) in 1970, Whip Hand (1979) in 1981, and Come to Grief (1995) in 1996. From 1973 to 1974 he was the chairman of the Crime Writers' Association, and in 1989 he received that organization's Cartier Diamond Dagger for lifetime achievement. In 1996 Francis received the Grand Master Award from the Mystery Writers of America, and in 2000 he received the Malice Domestic Award for Lifetime Achievement.

ANALYSIS

Dick Francis's novels, like those of most prolific mystery writers, rely on a relatively fixed range of predictable major elements within which the author achieves variation by the alteration and recombination of minor elements. The outstanding major feature for writers in the genre is usually the fixed character of the protagonist, who provides the guarantee of continuity in the series that is necessary to attract and maintain a steady readership. Variety is provided by the creation of a new cast of minor characters and a new criminal, though these new elements can usually be seen to form fairly consistent patterns over the course of an author's work, as can the different plots developed by an author. Well-known examples of the amateur sleuth series in this mold are Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's Sherlock Holmes stories and Agatha Christie's Hercule Poirot and Miss Marple novels. Francis, however, breaks with this tradition by creating a new main character for every book, with the exceptions of Sid Halley and Kit Fielding. Francis achieves the continuity and consistency expected of him by his large and loyal public through the use of a general character-type rather than through one principal series character, and through a strong and stable emphasis on his customary setting, the world of horse racing.

THE FRANCIS HERO

Even though Francis seldom uses any character more than once, his two dozen or so protagonists are sufficiently similar that a composite picture of the paradigmatic Francis hero can be sketched. The only invariable rule is that the hero be a white male (no doubt because Francis, who has written all of his books in the first person, is reluctant to risk the detailed and extended portrayal of a character outside his own race and gender). The female characters in his work have drawn favorable reactions from feminist critics, who see his writing as going beyond the gender stereotypes common in most mystery and detective writing.

Allowing for a few exceptions to the rest of the features of the model, the hero is British; in his thirties; ordinary in appearance; of average or smaller than average stature; a member of the middle class economically, educationally, and socially; and interested in few pursuits outside his work. In other words, Francis's heroes do not initially appear exceptional or heroic at all, but almost boringly average. The appeal of Francis's books to a wide international audience is at least partly the result of the very ordinariness of his characters, which allows for a broad range of readers to identify readily with them, to feel that they, too, could be heroic under certain circumstances, just as Francis's protagonists are. That these characters nevertheless arrive at a sort of heroic stature by the end of the book is not so much the result of special skills, training, or intelligence as it is the result of a combination of dedication to the job and a mental toughness, an ability to withstand psychological as well as physical pain (which may be a result of emotional hardships to which they have been subject). One of the few statistically extraordinary features shared by these protagonists is that they often have an irregular, unsettled, or otherwise trying family background: They tend to be orphans, or illegitimate, or widowers, or divorced, or even if married, burdened by a disabled wife or child.

Another distinctive characteristic of the Francis heroes is that their work is usually connected with horse racing, most often as steeplechase jockeys (Francis's own first career for a decade). Francis's later novels especially, however, are likely to feature some other profession, one that is peripherally or accidentally connected with racing. His heroes have been journalists (Forfeit), actors (Smokescreen, 1972), photographers (Reflex, 1980), bankers (Banker, 1982), wine merchants (Proof, 1984), writers (Longshot, 1990), architects (Decider, 1993), painters (To the Hilt, 1996), and glassblowers (Shattered, 2000). His extensive research into these professions results in detailed and realistic characterizations and settings. The reader of a Francis novel expects to be informed, not merely entertained—to learn something interesting about an unfamiliar professional world.

REFLEX

One of Francis's more successful integrations of this detailed exposition of a profession with the archetypal Francis racing character occurs in Reflex. Philip Nore is thirty years old, a moderately successful steeplechase jockey, and an amateur photographer. He is a quiet, agreeable man, fundamentally unwilling to make a fuss or fight—that is, a typical Francis Everyman. As an illegitimate child who never learned his father's identity, Nore has had the usual rocky personal life: He was shuttled through a series of temporary foster homes by his drug-addicted mother and eventually was reared by a homosexual couple, one of whom (an eventual suicide) taught him about photography. At the beginning of the book, Nore hardly seems heroic—he occasionally agrees to lose a race on purpose to help his boss win bets—but by the end he finds himself stronger than he believed himself to be.

This change in character has been triggered by his discovery of a series of photographic puzzles left behind by a murdered photographer. They appear to be simply blank or botched negatives or plain sheets of paper, but by the application of somewhat esoteric photographic technology each can be developed, and each turns out to contain material that could be, and in some cases evidently has been, used for blackmail. One of the fundamental rules for the Francis hero is that knowledge involves responsibility, and Nore cannot simply ignore this evidence once he has found it. His possession of the photographic evidence is discovered, which poses a threat to the past and potential victims of the scheme to the extent that attempts are made on his life and he undergoes a brutal beating. (The suffering of severe physical abuse is a stock element in all Francis's books, and the stoical refusal to give in to it a stock attribute of all Francis's heroes.) Having broken each collarbone six times, his nose five times, and an arm, wrist, vertebra, and his skull once each, Francis is an authority on injury and pain, and in his novels such scenes are usually depicted in naturalistic detail. The sadistic damaging of Sid Halley's already maimed left hand in Odds Against (1965) provides a particularly chilling example. More often than not, however, the hero exacts a fitting revenge on the villain, a staple means of satisfying an audience that has come to identify closely with the hero/narrator.

The blackmail proves to have been in a good cause—the victims are all criminals, and the extorted money goes to charity—and Nore himself blackmails the last victim (for evidence against drug dealers) and adopts the career of his murdered predecessor, becoming a professional photographer with a girlfriend, a publisher whom he has met during the course of his investigations, who acts as his agent. The fairly clear Freudian outlines of the plot are not stressed but rather are left for the reader to fill in imaginatively, as are the details of the romantic subplot. Francis usually avoids the overly neat endings common in popular fiction (the murdered photographer in whose footsteps Nore follows could easily have proved to be his real father) and never dwells on sexual scenes or sentimental romance. The fusion of the photography lesson with the complicated plot and the relatively complex character of the protagonist are typical of Francis's better work.

FRANCIS AND THE RACING WORLD

The setting is always nearly as important as character and plot in these novels, and Francis's intimate knowledge of the racing world enables him to work it into each book in a slightly different way, usually from the jockey's point of view but also from that of a stable boy (For Kicks), a racing journalist (Forfeit), a horse owner's caterer (Proof), or a complete outsider who is drawn into the racing milieu by the events of the mystery. Horse racing, unfamiliar to most readers, plays much the same role of informing and educating the audience as do the introduction of expertise from other professions and, especially in the later novels, the use of a variety of foreign locations, all of which Francis visits at length to ensure accuracy of detail. Francis and his wife traveled seventy-five thousand miles on Greyhound buses across America researching the setting of Blood Sport (1967).

Although some reviewers have complained that Francis's villains tend to be evil to the point of melodrama, his other characters, minor as well as major, are generally well drawn and interesting, not the stock role players of much formula fiction. His plots are consistently suspenseful without relying on trick endings or unlikely twists, and his use of the horse-racing environment is imaginatively varied from one book to another.

William Nelles

Updated by Fiona Kelleghan

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

SID HALLEY SERIES: Odds Against, 1965; Whip Hand, 1979; Come to Grief, 1995; Under Orders, 2006

KIT FIELDING SERIES: Break In, 1985; Bolt, 1986

NONSERIES NOVELS: 1962-1970 • Dead Cert, 1962; Nerve, 1964; For Kicks, 1965; Flying Finish, 1966; Blood Sport, 1967; Forfeit, 1968; Enquiry, 1969; Rat Race, 1970

1971-1980 • Bonecrack, 1971; Smokescreen, 1972; Slayride, 1973; Knockdown, 1974; High Stakes, 1975; In the Frame, 1976; Risk, 1977; Trial Run, 1978; Reflex, 1980

1981-1990 • Twice Shy, 1981; Banker, 1982; The Danger, 1983; Proof, 1984; Hot Money, 1987; The Edge, 1988; Straight, 1989; Longshot, 1990

1991-2007 • Comeback, 1991; Driving Force, 1992; Decider, 1993; Wild Horses, 1994; To the Hilt, 1996; Ten-pound Penalty, 1997; Second Wind, 1999; Shattered, 2000; ; Win, Place, or Show, 2004; Triple Crown, 2005; Dead Heat, 2007 (with Felix Francis)

SHORT FICTION: Field of Thirteen, 1998

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

SCREENPLAY: Dead Cert, 1974 (adaptation of his novel)

NONFICTION: The Sport of Queens: The Auto-

biography of Dick Francis, 1957 (revised 1968, 1974, 1982, 1988); A Jockey's Life: A Biography of Lester Piggott, 1986

EDITED TEXTS: Best Racing and Chasing Stories, 1966-1969 (with John Welcome); The Racing Man's Bedside Book, 1969 (with Welcome); The Dick Francis Treasury of Great Racing Stories, 1990 (with Welcome); Classic Lines: More Great Racing Stories, 1991 (with Welcome; also known as The New Treasury of Great Racing Stories)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Barnes, Melvin. Dick Francis. New York: Ungar, 1986.

A study of Francis's contributions to detective fiction.

Davis, J. Madison. Dick Francis. Boston: Twayne,

1989. A biography, offering analysis of major novels, an overview of critical opinion, and a good bibliography of primary and secondary sources.

Fuller, Bryony. Dick Francis: Steeplechase Jockey. London: Michael Joseph, 1994. Biography of Francis during his years as a professional jockey, looking ahead to his later career as a writer.

Lord, Graham. Dick Francis: A Racing Life. London: Little, Brown, 1999. This well-researched biography claims that Francis's wife, Mary, wrote (or cowrote) the novels.

Swanson, Jean, and Dean James. The Dick Francis Companion. New York: Berkley, 2003. Useful handbook includes everything from plot summaries of Francis's mysteries to lists of Web sites devoted to the author.

ANTONIA FRASER

Antonia Margaret Caroline Pakenham

Born: London, England; August 27, 1932

Types of plot: Amateur sleuth; cozy

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Jemima Shore, 1977-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

JEMIMA SHORE, a celebrated investigative British television reporter, is unmarried, in her early thirties, stylish, and intelligent. Her television programs provide her with high visibility, a variety of settings, and plenty of opportunity to pursue her amateur detecting.

CONTRIBUTION

Lady Antonia Fraser has followed the tradition of such British mystery writers as Dorothy L. Sayers, Emma Lathen, Ruth Rendell, P. D. James, and Patricia Highsmith. Using her knowledge of the British aristocracy, history, Parliament, royalty, entertainment and literary circles, television, and contemporary affairs, she has introduced various issues along with a rich blend of characters. As a heroine, Jemima Shore is a mixture of the traditional and contemporary woman caught up in often extraordinary circumstances. Some of these adventures are handled with black humor; all are dramatic and suspenseful. Developing a mystery series after writing several successful historical biographies has helped Fraser provide richness of characters and settings. The drama of real life has been successfully transferred to the mystery setting, and readers will perceive the changes in contemporary Great Britain much more easily after reading this series, which has captured the sense and complexity of that modern society.

BIOGRAPHY

Antonia Fraser's father was Francis Aungier Pakenham, who became the seventh earl of Longford in 1961. Her mother was Elizabeth Harman, related to the Chamberlains. Both parents went to Oxford University, belonged to the Labour Party in the 1930's, and converted to Catholicism in the 1940's. Lady Longford became an early mentor and model. Fraser, the first of eight children, grew up in Oxford amid politics and war. Her formal education began at the Dragon School in 1940-1944, and she already showed a fascination with Mary, Queen of Scots. From 1946 to 1948, she went to school at St. Mary's Convent, in Berkshire, where she converted to Catholicism. From 1950 to 1953, she attended Oxford University, receiving her bachelor's and master's degrees there. After graduation, she worked for Lord Weidenfeld's publishing house, which published her first book in 1954. In 1956, she married Sir Hugh Charles Patrick Joseph Fraser. Fifteen years her elder, he was a handsome, charming Scottish nobleman. They were active in politics and reared a family in London and Scotland. By the mid-1960's, she was a celebrity, appearing in society pages and on television shows.

With a contract from Weidenfeld and Nicolson, Fraser began research for Mary, Queen of Scots. Published in 1969, it was one of five books written by the literary Pakenhams that year and received the James Tait Black Memorial Prize for biography, thus assuring her a position in literary circles. A best seller in eleven languages, Fraser's first attempt at biography gave her a devoted international readership. She continued to write biographies, including The Six Wives of Henry VIII (1992), Boadicea's Chariot: The Warrior Queens (1988), and Marie Antoinette: The Journey (2001), which was adapted for a popular film in 2006.

In 1975, however, Fraser dramatically changed her lifestyle, moving in with the playwright Harold Pinter. After both the Frasers and Pinters were divorced, Pinter and Fraser were married in a civil ceremony. During this same period, the Jemima Shore mystery series was begun, and Fraser became active in various literary organizations. Her work on the seventeenth century earned the Wolfson History Prize and the Prix Caumont-La Force. In addition, Hull University awarded her an honorary doctorate in 1986. For her Jemima Shore books, the Crime Writers' Association bestowed on her the Gold Dagger Award in 1996.

ANALYSIS

Antonia Fraser grew up in an England bound by class distinctions from which she benefited. Her mother, Lady Longford, has stated that Fraser was the most precocious of all her children, showing an early interest in history, biography, and genealogy. It was Lady Longford who provided the early support and model for all her children, most of whom are writers. Fraser's brother, Thomas, has written that in a large family of talkers and few listeners it is not surprising that writing should provide an outlet. Family members made their first impression on England in politics, but their greatest accomplishment has been in the literary field.

Fraser and her mother have often served as each other's critics, and Fraser dedicated The Weaker Vessel (1984) to her mother, calling her a most excellent heroine. Critics respect both women for their impressive research and readable style, although Fraser's primary strength lies in her narrative skill. This has sometimes been criticized as a storybook approach to history, but it also assures the popularity of her biographies. She seems to be at her best when writing on subjects to which she has some personal commitment, as may be seen in Mary, Queen of Scots and The Weaker Vessel as well as in her earlier children's writings and anthologies.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Lady Antonia Fraser and her husband, playwright Harold Pinter, following her investiture as CBE (Commander British Empire) at Buckingham Palace, in 1999. (Photoshot/Landov)

JEMIMA SHORE

In 1975, when Fraser left her marriage for a new relationship with Pinter, she also began working in a new literary genre, the mystery. Despite the changes, however, Fraser's narrative style and research methods have not been abandoned. The free-spirited Jemima Shore, a kind of fantasy figure, first appeared in Quiet as a Nun (1977). In her first appearance, Shore was in her early thirties, stylish and intelligent, and had carved out a niche for herself as an investigative reporter for the British Megalith Television after wartime schooling in a convent and at Oxford. It is tempting to see much of Fraser's own life reflected in her heroine. The locales are familiar; for example, Fraser's own convent education at St. Mary's in Berkshire is drawn on in this first full-length mystery novel, and her experience with British television serves her well in her portrayal of Shore's career.

For English audiences, the heroine's name itself has some interest; Jemima rings of Puritan virtue, while Shore reminds one of a king's mistress. Here is a verbal mixture of the traditional and modern virtues and vices. To the American reader, however, the names produce images of the South and popular entertainers. Nevertheless, despite the varying reaction to the name, the television adaptation in 1978 popularized Jemima Shore on both sides of the Atlantic.

Fraser has followed the example of such eminent writers as Sayers and James. It is also tempting to think of a young Miss Jane Marple in some of the situations in which Jemima Shore finds herself. Sayers believed that detectives should follow clues, not love, but an unmarried Jemima Shore finds time to fit love in with her investigations. Often, the love subplot seems to reflect the post-World War II generation's disillusionment, making Jemima Shore very much a contemporary figure.

The unmarried Jemima Shore has a greater freedom of action, reflecting some of the same freedoms discovered after World War I, but she does not have to be elderly or a widow to gain her liberty. Although Fraser follows in the British tradition of mystery writers, her use of the contemporary scene has allowed a greater range for her heroine. Jemima Shore can still get into extremely dangerous situations, even life-threatening ones, only to be rescued by traditional gallantry. She often depends on her intuition, but she usually is right in trusting to her instincts. She can disguise her nosiness with her television role, while other female detectives have had to rely on their age as an excuse. A confrontation with a person not suspected of the crime can endanger Jemima, but either a third person intervenes or the criminal acts in a more subtle way than the rough-and-tumble American male detectives. More is left to the reader's imagination, although the conventions of the detective novel are followed and are clearly understood by Fraser.

Fraser's use of black humor is reminiscent of Edgar Allan Poe, while the sense of justice that pervades her works recalls the themes in Fyodor Dostoevski's novels, such as Prestupleniye i nakazaniye (1866; Crime and Punishment, 1886) and Leo Tolstoy's Voskreseniye (1899; Resurrection, 1899). Jemima Shore seems to have more in common with Sherlock Holmes or Lord Peter Wimsey than Lew Archer or Bulldog Drummond. There is a trace of the romantic in the very modern Jemima Shore which would be recognizable to devotees of Georgette Heyer, Ellis Peters, and Josephine Tey. Jemima Shore's cat, Midnight, recalls the role animals play in the mystery novel and the writings of individuals such as Dick Francis or Ngaio Marsh. The English love of animals is legendary, and nothing sets off an English work better than a sympathetic handling of animals, which often show greater sense than their humans.

In addition to rich association of characters in different locales, contemporary issues are raised in several of the books, including public housing, religious freedom, press coverage, animal rights, feminist and educational issues, and the changing role of the aristocracy and royalty, to name only a few. By keeping in touch with the ongoing political scene, Fraser has been able to enrich her mystery novels. Her knowledge of the entertainment field has enabled her to delineate the stresses of both legitimate-theater and pop performers, especially in Cool Repentance (1982).

OXFORD BLOOD

Probably the book Oxford Blood (1985) can most nearly be compared with Sayers's Gaudy Night (1935). Oxford University at the time of the commencement balls at various colleges in June is the setting of Oxford Blood. Shore's television program is to highlight the young aristocrats and cash in on the popularity of the television series Brideshead Revisited. Instead, it displays a young, privileged group of young people living dissolute lives full of drugs and alcohol, while England is faced with high unemployment and the world must deal with widespread famine. The tension grows, while an aristocratic inheritance is jeopardized by jealousy and vengeance.

YOUR ROYAL HOSTAGE

Jemima Shore's First Case, and Other Stories, a collection of short stories published in 1986, introduces the young Jemima Shore, who at the age of fifteen and in a convent school, is solving her first mystery. Fraser displayed drama and suspense, as well as some black humor, in these stories. Such humor also appears in Your Royal Hostage (1988), with its animal rights group, international interest in a royal wedding, high drama, suspense, and backdrop of London and its contemporary life.

One result of Fraser's interest in character is that the reader cares about Jemima Shore's future. Her own interest in contemporary issues reflects the modern scene and also reflects a change from the disillusionment and dissipation of the post-World War II generation, a change that includes a concern with material well-being but also nurtures those values that feed the spirit and the soul.

POLITICAL DEATH

British politics, in which Fraser was steeped from a young age, is fertile ground for stories of intrigue. Political Death (1996) illustrates her admission that powerful figures in government are more fascinating to her than actual policy. An aging actress, stricken with alcoholism and dementia, threatens to point a finger at a popular politician. Scandal, a skeleton, and an apparent suicide ensue—a scenario fit for any era. Fraser, however, endows her heroine with a thoroughly modern set of investigative tools—a television camera and a high-profile position as a BBC journalist.

Fraser's ability to combine the traditional with the contemporary expands her appeal. Jemima Shore, like Peter Wimsey, can be enjoyed by both male and female readers. The richness of the characterizations in each work displays the biographical skills of the writer. Fraser's knowledge of various writing styles and modern issues provide depth to the standard mystery format. The descriptive details of specific locales delight the traveler, recalling individual memories and experiences. The veneer of civilization is shown to be quite thin at times, allowing the barbaric to take place, yet there is a return to those enduring ideals and standards which have allowed the human race to persevere and triumph over adversity.

Mary-Emily Miller

Updated by Janet Alice Long

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

JEMIMA SHORE SERIES: Quiet as a Nun, 1977; The Wild Island, 1978; A Splash of Red, 1981; Cool Repentance, 1982; Oxford Blood, 1985; Jemima Shore's First Case, and Other Stories, 1986; Your Royal Hostage, 1988; Cavalier Case, 1990; Jemima Shore at the Sunny Grave, and Other Stories, 1992; Political Death, 1996

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

RADIO PLAYS: On the Battlements, 1975; Penelope, 1976; The Heroine, 1976

TELEPLAYS: Charades, 1977; Mister Clay, Mister Clay, 1985

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table, 1954; Robin Hood, 1957

NONFICTION: Dolls, 1963; A History of Toys, 1966; Mary, Queen of Scots, 1969; Cromwell, Our Chief of Men, 1973 (also as Cromwell, the Lord Protector); King James VI of Scotland, I of England, 1974; Mary, Queen of Scots, and the Historians, 1974; King Charles II, 1979 (also as Royal Charles); The Weaker Vessel, 1984; Boadicea's Chariot: The Warrior Queens, 1988 (also known as The Warrior Queen, 1989); The Six Wives of Henry VIII, 1992 (also known as The Wives of Henry VIII, 1992); Faith and Treason: The Story of the Gunpowder Plot, 1996 (also known as The Gunpowder Plot); Marie Antoinette: The Journey, 2001; Love and Louis XIV: The Women in the Life of the Sun King, 2006

EDITED TEXTS: Scottish Love Poems: A Personal Anthology, 1975; The Lives of the Kings and Queens of England, 1975; Love Letters, 1976; Heroes and Heroines, 1980; Mary, Queen of Scots: An Anthology of Poetry, 1981; Oxford and Oxfordshire in Verse, 1982

TRANSLATIONS: Martyrs in China, 1956 (by Jean Monsterleet); Dior by Dior: The Autobiography of Christian Dior, 1957

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Craig, Patricia, and Mary Cadogan. "A Curious Career for a Woman?" In The Lady Investigates: Women Detectives and Spies in Fiction. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1981. A somewhat dated but still informative article, written at a time when women writing in the detective genre tended toward gentility.

Klein, Kathleen Gregory, ed. Great Women Mystery

Writers: Classic to Contemporary. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994. Discusses more than one hundred women writing in the mystery genre, including Fraser.

Knight, Stephen. Crime Fiction, 1800-2000: Detection, Death, Diversity. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004. Devotes a chapter to gender in detective fiction. Knight contrasts "designer-style" Jemima Shore with her more hard-boiled rivals, such as Val McDermid's Kate Brannigan.

Mann, Jessica. Deadlier than the Male: Why Are So Many Respectable English Women So Good at Murder? New York: Macmillan, 1981. The author, herself a well-known member of the cohort she examines, probes the lives of Christie, Sayers, Marsh, and others of a remarkably similar background. Fraser unquestionably belongs in this unlikely club.

Rowland, Susan. From Agatha Christie to Ruth Rendell: British Women Writers in Detective and Crime Fiction. New York: Palgrave, 2001. While this study does not discuss Fraser at length, it does provide context and relevant exploration of gender and colonialism.

NICOLAS FREELING

F. R. E. Nicolas

Born: London, England; March 3, 1927

Died: Mutzig, France; July 20, 2003

Types of plot: Police procedural; thriller

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Inspector Van der Valk, 1961-1972

Henri Castang, 1974-1996

Arlette Van der Valk, 1979-1981

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

INSPECTOR PIET VAN DER VALK is a middle-aged Dutch police officer. Caught within a bureaucracy he dislikes and distrusts, he reflects on the relationship between society and crime and believes that "criminal" is an arbitrary designation. Tough, realistic, and given to a quietly ironic humor, he is unorthodox, irreverent, and successful at his job.

ARLETTE VAN DER VALK, Van der Valk's French wife, is attractive, sexy, outspoken in expressing her amusement at Dutch conventionality, and generally opinionated. A fine cook, she has taught Van der Valk to appreciate good food. After Van der Valk's death, she marries a British sociologist and operates a private investigation service in Strasbourg. She and Van der Valk have two sons and an adopted daughter.

HENRI CASTANG is a thoughtful, tough veteran of the French National Police, an elite investigation corps that works something like Scotland Yard. Castang is a devoted husband and father and a police officer who is given to analysis as well as action. Sometimes unconventional, he is always suspicious of the bureaucracy he serves.

VERA CASTANG, Castang's Czech wife, was a talented gymnast, but an accident left her paralyzed for several years; Castang patiently helped her regain mobility. Now she has a noticeable limp that may even enhance her Slavic beauty, and she has become a successful artist. The couple has a daughter.

ADRIEN RICHARD, the divisional commissaire, is a talented police officer and a good administrator; his integrity has left him well placed in the corps, but he lacks the ability to maneuver to the highest ranks. He respects Castang, and the two work well together.

CONTRIBUTION

Nicolas Freeling objected to comparisons of his work with that of Georges Simenon (Van der Valk hates jokes about Jules Maigret), and the reader can see that Freeling's work has dimensions not attempted by Simenon. Nevertheless, there are points of similarity. In both the Van der Valk and the Castang series, Freeling offered rounded portraits of realistic, likable police officers who do difficult jobs in a complicated, often impersonal world. Freeling's obvious familiarity with a variety of European settings, ranging from Holland to Spain, also reinforced his place as a writer of Continental novels. His concerns, however, were his own. Freeling stated his conviction that character is what gives any fiction—including crime fiction—its longevity, and he concentrated on creating novels of character. Van der Valk changed and grew in the course of his series, and Castang did the same. In A Long Silence (1972), Freeling took the startling step of allowing his detective to be killed halfway through a novel. Freeling's style evolved in the course of his career, and he relied increasingly on dialogue and indirect, allusive passages of internal narrative.

BIOGRAPHY

Nicolas Freeling was born F. R. E. Nicolas in Gray's Inn Road, London, on March 3, 1927. He was educated in England and France, and he attended the University of Dublin. He served in the Royal Air Force from 1945 to 1947. After leaving the military, he spent more than a decade as a professional cook in European hotels and restaurants. In 1954, he married Cornelia Termes; they had four sons and a daughter. Freeling lived all of his adult life on the Continent.

Freeling's first mystery, Love in Amsterdam (1962), began the Van der Valk series. In it, a central character is jailed for several weeks for a murder he did not commit. The novel may partly have been inspired by Freeling's experience of having been wrongly accused of theft. The work marked the beginning of a prolific career in which Freeling published a novel almost every year. Gun Before Butter (1963) won Le Grand Prix de Roman Policier in 1965. The King of the Rainy Country (1966) won the Mystery Writers of America's Edgar Allan Poe Award for 1967. Freeling died in France in 2003.

ANALYSIS

From his very first novel, Love in Amsterdam, and continuing throughout his career, Nicolas Freeling's dual concerns with character and society dominated his work. He obviously enjoyed the personalities he created: Piet Van der Valk and Arlette Van der Valk and Henri Castang and Vera Castang, as well as the people who surround them. The verisimilitude of those characters has been underscored by Freeling's strong sense of place; his attention to details of personality and setting ultimately define his concern—the conflicts between the individual and modern bureaucracy, clashes among social castes, contrasts among national types, and the social structures that allow, even encourage, the committing of crime. Freeling's interest in his characters required that he allow them to grow and change, and those changes, joined with the complexities of Freeling's own vision, are largely responsible for his works' great appeal.

The Van der Valk novels are dominated by the personalities of Van der Valk and his wife, Arlette. The inspector looks at his country through the eyes of a native. The child of a cabinetmaker, an artisan—a fact that he never forgets—Van der Valk is too smart not to recognize his own foibles when in Strike Out Where Not Applicable (1967) he celebrates his promotion by dressing like the bourgeoisie. He is well aware of the significance of such things in a country where social class is clear-cut and important to everyone.

Arlette's French presence in the series adds a second level to this picture of Dutch life. In a mostly friendly way, Arlette mocks Dutch orderliness and insistence on conformity. Although living among the Dutch, she nevertheless maintains French standards, as in her cooking. Her self-assurance and her support reinforce her husband's willingness to risk failure while coping with the bureaucratic order that seems so congenial to most Dutchmen, but so life-denying to Van der Valk.

STRIKE OUT WHERE NOT APPLICABLE

Class is a constant issue for Freeling's characters. In Strike Out Where Not Applicable, for example, all the characters are aware of the social hierarchy at the riding school that forms the novel's central setting. Without sinking to stereotypes, Freeling looks at the defensiveness of the girl of Belgian peasant stock who has married the successful bicycle racer. Sympathetically, Freeling points up their uneasy position at the edge of a society that will never accept them. The couple is compared to the Van der Valks themselves, another couple who will never truly join the upper middle class. The novel's victim is a successful restaurateur. When his very proper wife must arrange his funeral, Freeling gives significant attention to her dealings with the undertaker as she tries to ensure that everything will seem acceptable to the town gossips.

DOUBLE-BARREL

In Double-Barrel (1964), the town of Zwinderin—self-satisfied, rigid, repressive, relentlessly Protestant—becomes a character in its own story when its smugness is shaken by a writer of poison-pen letters. In a small town whose citizens spend their free time watching the shadows on other people's curtains, little escapes the grapevine; although Van der Valk continues to rely on Arlette for information, she herself is a major topic for discussion. The town both creates and shelters the very crime that must be investigated.

A DRESSING OF DIAMOND

The concern with class issues also appears in the Castang novels. A Dressing of Diamond (1974) concerns the revenge kidnapping of a child. The sections of the novel devoted to the child's experiences mainly record her confusion at the behavior of her peasant captors: She is puzzled by the dirt and chaos in which they live, but most of all, she is bewildered by their constant quarrelsomeness and their shouted threats. Brutality is something that bourgeois children rarely meet.

Other levels of social relationships also come under scrutiny in Freeling's work. In Wolfnight (1982), Castang must deal with the upper class and a right-wing political conspiracy. In The King of the Rainy Country, Van der Valk has to cope with the seductions offered both literally and figuratively by the very rich. Like Castang, he is acutely conscious of the vast distance that lies between the police officer and the aristocrat.

A CITY SOLITARY

One of Freeling's most subtle examinations of the ambiguities of social bonds occurs in A City Solitary (1985), a nonseries novel that explores the relationship between captive and captor. In it, a novelist and his faithless wife are taken hostage by an adolescent thug who has broken out of jail. They are joined by a young female lawyer who had expected to represent the young criminal in court but who has also stumbled into his power. What happens between predators and their victims? The novel examines their involuntary bonding as they manipulate one another while fleeing across the Continent.

Significantly, when Freeling's characters suffer real damage, it is done by members of the upper classes. At the end of The King of the Rainy Country, Van der Valk is seriously wounded by one such aristocrat, and in A Long Silence he is killed by a privileged madman. In Wolfnight, Castang's apartment is attacked and his wife is kidnapped by the upper-class members of a political conspiracy. The representatives of social order seem to have greater power to harm than the thugs and peasants can ever obtain.

FREELING'S DETECTIVES

Although Freeling assigns ranks and offices to his detectives and they have associates and make reports, he had little interest in the day-to-day grit of police work. When Van der Valk or Castang is compared with Ruth Rendell's Reginald Wexford or J. J. Marric's George Gideon, one realizes how little time Freeling's characters spend on writing reports or fruitless interviewing. Instead, their work proceeds as a result of countless conferences, of conversations that have been planned to appear coincidental, even of unexpected bits of information. In this sense, Freeling's novels are not strictly police procedurals (Freeling himself has protested the various categories into which fiction, including crime fiction, is often thrust). As Van der Valk's death suggests, however, Freeling intended his work to be realistic. Accordingly, Van der Valk and Castang share the theory that any good police officer must occasionally take the law into his own hands if justice is to be done. Thus, in Strike Out Where Not Applicable, Van der Valk pressures a murderer to confess by implying that he will use force if necessary. In Wolfnight, Castang kidnaps a prisoner from jail to use as a hostage in the hope of trading her for his wife, who is also being held hostage.

Van der Valk's murder is the strongest testimony to Freeling's sense of realism. In "Inspector Van der Valk," an essay written for Otto Penzler's The Great Detectives (1978), Freeling commented on the real police officer's vulnerability to violence, using that fact to defend his decision to kill his detective. He then went on to discuss the issue from the novelist's point of view, implying that he believed that he had developed the character as far as he could. The problem was accentuated by the fact that Freeling no longer lived in Holland and thus felt himself gradually losing touch with Van der Valk's proper setting.

It is interesting to compare Freeling's second detective with his first. Like Van der Valk, Castang dislikes bureaucracy, maintains a wry skepticism about what he is told, and spends time reflecting on his world and its problems. Also like Van der Valk, Castang enjoys attractive women but—most significantly—turns to his wife for intellectual as well as physical comfort. In addition, Arlette and Vera are not native to their societies and thus can see societal problems more acutely; both women are strong willed, emotional, and intelligent. Both are devoted to their husbands without being submissive. Nevertheless, Castang is more complex than Van der Valk; he is more given to theorizing and speculation, and the very nature of his job creates a greater variety in his experience. Similarly, Vera, with her Eastern-Bloc youth, injury, and life as an artist, is a more complex character than Arlette. Even the setting seems more complex. Although Van der Valk sometimes left Holland, most of his stories emphasized Holland's insularity; part of the European community, it was nevertheless set apart and aloof. France may behave the same, but it still has many borders, and the Castang characters seem to cross them regularly.

Only Freeling's plots lean toward simplicity. He was not given to maps and timetables. Instead, he typically used elements of character to unlock the mystery. Using an omniscient point of view, he sometimes revealed the guilty person well before the detective could know his identity, for Freeling's interest lay in the personalities he created rather than in the puzzles.

STYLE CHANGES

Freeling's sacrifice of Van der Valk was made in response to his awareness of change, and some of the change is reflected in Freeling's own style. It became more complex and allusive than in his early novels. Freeling always relied heavily on omniscient narration, and he always used passages of interior monologue, but this element expanded in the post-Van der Valk novels, perhaps in Freeling's effort to break with some of his earlier patterns. The resulting style, as some reviewers noted, made more demands on its readers than did the earlier one, but it offered more rewards in its irony and its possibilities for characterization. This passage from Wolfnight occurs just after Castang has learned of his wife's kidnapping:

There was more he wanted to say but he was too disoriented. That word he found; a good word; but the simple words, the ones he wanted, eluded him. It was too much of a struggle.

Dreams? Did he dream, or better had he dreamt? Couldn't say, couldn't recall. Not that I am aware. This is my bed. This as far as can be ascertained is me.

Everything was now quite clear. He reached up and turned on the light. I am clear. I am fine. Slight headache; a couple of aspirins are indicated. What time is it?

Small struggle in disbelief of the hands of his watch. Midnight, not midday. Have slept eleven hours.

This evolution of style, particularly its choppiness, its fragments, and its shifting point of view, seems simply one more indication of the increasing complexity of Freeling's vision. The number of works Freeling produced and the span of years covered by his writing career testify to the rightness of his insistence that he be allowed to go on changing with the rest of his world.

Ann D. Garbett

Updated by Fiona Kelleghan

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

INSPECTOR VAN DER VALK SERIES: Love in Amsterdam, 1962 (also known as Death in Amsterdam); Because of the Cats, 1963; Gun Before Butter, 1963 (also known as Question of Loyalty); Double-Barrel, 1964; Criminal Conversation, 1965; The Dresden Green, 1966; The King of the Rainy Country, 1966; Strike Out Where Not Applicable, 1967; This Is the Castle, 1968; Tsing-Boum, 1969; Over the High Side, 1971 (also known as The Lovely Ladies); A Long Silence, 1972 (also known as Auprès de Ma Blonde); Sand Castles, 1989

HENRI CASTANG SERIES: A Dressing of Diamond, 1974; What Are the Bugles Blowing For?, 1975 (also known as The Bugles Are Blowing); Lake Isle, 1976 (also known as Sabine); Gadget, 1977; The Night Lords, 1978; Castang's City, 1980; Wolfnight, 1982; The Back of the North Wind, 1983; No Part in Your Death, 1984; Cold Iron, 1986; Lady Macbeth, 1988; Not as Far as Velma, 1989; Those in Peril, 1990; Flanders Sky, 1992 (also known as The Pretty How Town); The Seacoast of Bohemia, 1994; You Know Who, 1994; A Dwarf Kingdom, 1996

ARLETTE VAN DER VALK SERIES: The Widow, 1979; One Damn Thing After Another, 1981

NONSERIES NOVELS: Valparaiso, 1964; A City Solitary, 1985; One More River, 1998; Some Day Tomorrow, 2000

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NONFICTION: Kitchen Book, 1970 (also known as The Kitchen); Cook Book, 1972; Criminal Convictions: Errant Essays on Perpetrators of Literary License, 1994; The Village Book, 2001

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bakerman, Jane S. "Arlette: Nicolas Freeling's Candle Against the Dark." The Armchair Detective 16 (Winter, 1983): 348-352. Contemporary review of Freeling's novel, Arlette, comparing it to earlier works and comparing the title character to her fictional husband, Van der Valk.
- Benstock, Bernard, ed. Art in Crime: Essays of Detective Fiction. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1983. Includes an essay on Freeling and his contributions to the detective genre.
- Dove, George N. The Police Procedural. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1982. Discusses the distinctive features of Freeling's police novels and their influence on the genre.
- Freeling, Nicolas. The Village Book. London: Arcadia, 2002. Biography of the Freeling family and history of the village in which they lived, written by Freeling himself. Provides invaluable background on Freeling's cultural heritage.
- Hausladen, Gary. Places for Dead Bodies. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2000. This study of the settings of crime fiction includes a chapter discussing Freeling's representation of provincial France. Bibliographic references and index.
- Oates, Joyce Carol. "The Mysteries of Literature." The New York Times Book Review, October 2, 1994, p. 735. Oates uses this review of Freeling's collection of nonfictional essays on detective fiction, Criminal Convictions, to discuss the author's own work, as well as his critical views on the genre.
- Penzler, Otto, ed. The Great Detectives. Boston: Little, Brown, 1978. Argues for Van der Valk's place among the pantheon of fiction's greatest detectives.
- Schloss, Carol. "The Van der Valk Novels of Nicolas Freeling: Going by the Book." In Art in Crime Writing, edited by Bernard Benstock. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1983. Essay on Freeling's most famous detective-fiction series, exploring the author's particular craft of writing.

R. AUSTIN FREEMAN

Born: London, England; April 11, 1862

Died: Gravesend, Kent, England; September 28, 1943

Also wrote as Clifford Ashdown

Types of plot: Inverted; private investigator

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Dr. Thorndyke, 1907-1942

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

DR. JOHN EVELYN THORNDYKE, a resident of 5A King's Bench Walk, Inner Temple, London, is a barrister and expert in medical jurisprudence. He investigates cases as a consultant to the police or private figures. He relies primarily on scientific knowledge and analysis to solve cases and is a remarkably handsome, humorless man.

NATHANIEL POLTON, a domestic servant, inventor, and watchmaker, works wonders in Thorndyke's laboratory and workshop. An older man, he is also an excellent chef, preparing food in the laboratory (as 5A has no kitchen). Utterly devoted to Thorndyke, Polton grows through the years from servant to partner and adviser.

CHRISTOPHER JERVIS, a medical doctor, Thorndyke's associate and chronicler, is a man of average intelligence. Although he records the tiniest of details, he rarely understands their importance.

CONTRIBUTION

R. Austin Freeman is perhaps most significant as one of the inventors of the inverted detective story, in which the reader observes the crime being committed from the criminal's point of view and then shifts to that of the detective to watch the investigation and solution of the puzzle. These stories depend on the reader's interest in the process of detection, rather than on the desire to know "who done it."

Freeman's most important character, Dr. John Evelyn Thorndyke, was the first true scientific investigator, a realistic, utterly believable character whose solutions relied more on esoteric knowledge and laboratory analysis than on intuition, psychology, or physical force. As opposed to those who study people, Thorndyke is interested only in things. Though all necessary clues are laid out before the reader, it would be a rare reader, indeed, who was sufficiently versed in Egyptology, chemistry, anatomy, or archaeology to make sense of all the evidence.

The Thorndyke stories, intended in part to educate the reader about criminology, are nevertheless filled with believable and attractive characters, love interests, interesting settings, and vivid descriptions of London fogs, dense woods, and seafaring vessels.

BIOGRAPHY

Richard Austin Freeman was born on April 11, 1862, in his parents' home in the West End of London. The son of a tailor, Freeman declined to follow his father's trade, and at the age of eighteen he became a medical student at Middlesex Hospital. In 1887, he qualified as a physician and surgeon. Earlier that same year, he had married Annie Elizabeth Edwards, and on completion of his studies he entered the Colonial Service, becoming assistant colonial surgeon at Accra on the Gold Coast. During his fourth year in Africa, he developed a case of blackwater fever and was sent home as an invalid. Freeman's adventures in Africa are recorded in his first published book, Travels and Life in Ashanti and Jaman (1898).

Little is known of the next ten years of Freeman's life. After a long period of convalescence, he eventually gave up medicine and turned to literature for his livelihood. Freeman's first works of fiction, two series of Romney Pringle adventures, were published in Cassell's Magazine in 1902-1903 under the pseudonym Clifford Ashdown and were written in collaboration with John James Pitcairn. In his later life, Freeman denied knowledge of these stories, and the name of his collaborator was unknown until after Freeman's death.

Freeman published his first Thorndyke novel, The Red Thumb Mark, in 1907. It was scarcely noticed, but the first series of Thorndyke short stories in Pearson's Magazine in 1908 was an immediate success. Most of these stories were published as John Thorndyke's Cases in 1909.

By then, Freeman was in his late forties. He continued his writing, producing a total of twenty-nine Thorndyke volumes, and maintained his love of natural history and his curiosity about matters scientific for the remainder of his life. He maintained a home laboratory, where he conducted all the analyses used in his books. He suspended work for a short time in his seventies, when England declared war, but soon resumed writing in an air-raid shelter in his garden. Stricken with Parkinson's disease, Freeman died on September 28, 1943.

ANALYSIS

In his 1941 essay "The Art of the Detective Story," R. Austin Freeman describes the beginning of what would become his greatest contribution to mystery and detective fiction—the inverted tale:

Illustration from the 1902 edition of The Adventures of Romney Pringle, which R. Austin Freeman published under the pen name Clifford Ashdown.

Some years ago I devised, as an experiment, an inverted detective story in two parts. The first part was a minute and detailed description of a crime, setting forth the antecedents, motives, and all attendant circumstances. The reader had seen the crime committed, knew all about the criminal, and was in possession of all the facts. It would have seemed that there was nothing left to tell. But I calculated that the reader would be so occupied with the crime that he would overlook the evidence. And so it turned out. The second part, which described the investigation of the crime, had to most readers the effect of new matter. All the facts were known; but their evidential quality had not been recognized.

Thus it turned out in "The Case of Oscar Brodski," which became the first in a long series of inverted tales told by Freeman and others.

"THE CASE OF OSCAR BRODSKI"

Brodski's story is typical of the genre: In the first part of the story, "The Mechanism of Crime," the reader is introduced to Silas Hickler—a cheerful and gentle burglar, not too greedy, taking no extreme risks, modest in dress and manner. One evening, a man he recognizes as Oscar Brodski the diamond merchant stops at Hickler's house to ask directions. After a long internal debate, the usually cautious Hickler kills Brodski and steals the diamonds he is carrying. As best he can, the killer makes the death appear accidental by leaving the corpse on some nearby railroad tracks with its neck over the near rail, the man's broken spectacles and all the bits of broken glass scattered about, and the man's umbrella and bag lying close at hand.

It is not until Hickler has returned to his house, disposed of the murder weapon, and almost left for the train station again that he sees Brodski's hat lying on a chair where the dead man left it. Quickly, he hacks it to pieces and burns the remains and then hurries to the station, where he finds a large crowd of people talking about the tragedy of a man hit by a train. Among the crowd is a doctor, who agrees to help look into things. The first part of the story ends with Silas Hickler looking at the doctor: "Thinking with deep discomfort of Brodski's hat, he hoped that he had made no other oversight."

If Freeman's theory was wrong, and his experiment had not paid off, the story would be over for the reader at this point. The killer's identity is known without a doubt, and any astute reader is sure that Hickler has made other oversights, so what else is there to learn? Luckily, Freeman was right, and watching the doctor—who turns out to be John Thorndyke—determine and prove the identity of the murderer is every bit as interesting as it would be if the killer's identity was not already known to the reader.

Much of the success of this inverted story is the result of the skills of its author. As the second part of the story, "The Mechanism of Detection," unfolds, bits of dialogue that Hickler overheard in the station are repeated, this time told by one of the speakers, and immediately the reader sees the possibilities inherent in going over the same ground from a different perspective.

Then another kind of fun begins: What did Hickler (and the reader) miss the first time through? In this case, at least one of the clues—the hat not quite fully destroyed—is expected, even by an unexperienced reader of mysteries. Before the reader can feel too smug about being ahead of Thorndyke on this one, however, the detective, with the aid of his friend Jervis and the ever-present portable laboratory, finds clues that even the sharpest reader will have overlooked: a fiber between the victim's teeth, identified as part of a cheap rug or curtain; more carpet fibers and some biscuit crumbs on the dead man's shoes; a tiny fragment of string dropped by the killer; and bits of broken spectacle glass that suggest by their size and shape that they were not dropped or run over but stepped on. The reader has seen the victim walk on the rug and drop biscuit crumbs, has seen the killer step on the glasses and gather up the pieces, and has seen him lose the bit of string. Yet—like Thorndyke's assistant Jervis—the reader misses the significance of these until Thorndyke shows the way.

At the conclusion of the story, Thorndyke speaks to Jervis in a way that sums up one of Freeman's primary reasons for writing the stories: "I hope it has enlarged your knowledge . . . and enabled you to form one or two useful corollaries." Throughout his life, Freeman was interested in medicolegal technology, and through his stories, he entered into the technical controversies of his day. He kept a complete laboratory in his home and always conducted experiments there before allowing Thorndyke to perform them in the tales. Freeman was proud of the fact that several times he was ahead of the police in finding ways to analyze such things as dust and bloodstains and in the preservation of footprints. In fact, the Thorndyke stories were cited in British texts on medical jurisprudence. Freeman enjoyed telling a good tale, but he wanted the reader—both the casual reader and the professional investigator—to leave the story with more knowledge than before.

The Thorndyke stories are also remarkable and important because they introduce, in their main character, the first true scientific detective. Unlike Sherlock Holmes, whose intuition enables him to make astonishing guesses as to the history and character of the person responsible for a footprint, based in part on his knowledge of psychology and the social habits of people, Thorndyke relies on physical evidence alone to solve the puzzle. With his portable laboratory in the green case that never leaves his side, Thorndyke can obtain the tiniest bits of evidence (seen through his portable microscope) and conduct a sophisticated chemical analysis.

It is the breadth and depth of his esoteric knowledge that sets Thorndyke above Jervis, the police, and the reader: He knows that jute fibers indicate a yarn of inferior quality, that it takes two hands to open a Norwegian knife, what a shriveled multipolar nerve corpuscle looks like, how to read Moabite and Phoenician characters, and how a flame should look when seen backward through spectacles. All the clues are laid out in front of the reader who is with Thorndyke when he measures the distance from the window to the bed or examines the photographs of the footprints; as Jervis writes down every minute observation, the reader has it also. Every conclusion Thorndyke makes is the result of his ability to apply his knowledge to what he observes, and if the reader is not able to make use of the same observations, then perhaps something will be learned from watching Thorndyke. Freeman is very firm in his essay "The Art of the Detective Story" that a proper detective story should have no false clues, and that all of the clues necessary should be presented to the reader. The proof of the detective's solution should be the most interesting part of the story.

Unlike Holmes, Thorndyke is not a brooding eccentric, but an entirely believable, normal man. He is also extremely handsome, a quality about which Freeman felt strongly:

His distinguished appearance is not merely a concession to my personal taste but is also a protest against the monsters of ugliness whom some detective writers have evolved. These are quite opposed to natural truth. In real life a first-class man of any kind usually tends to be a good-looking man.

Although handsome, intelligent, and wealthy, Thorndyke, no longer a young man (he ages through the first several books, but stops growing older once he reaches fifty), is married only to his work. That does not mean that the Thorndyke books are devoid of the love interest that was expected by readers in the first part of the twentieth century. In many of the novels, secondary characters are hopelessly in love, and in solving the crime, Thorndyke makes it possible for them to marry. Jervis himself becomes financially secure enough to marry his intended only when he is hired as Thorndyke's assistant. The love plots themselves are charmingly told, filled with believable and sympathetic characters, but they do not interfere with the mystery at hand, and at least one critic has suggested that the love stories could be extracted from the novels, leaving satisfactory mysteries intact.

If he is sympathetic to lovers young and old, Thorndyke wastes no sympathy on another class of individual—the blackmailer. He is ruthless in tracking them down when they are the prey and on more than one occasion lets a blackmailer's killer escape. It is no crime, Thorndyke maintains, for one to kill one's blackmailer if there is no other way to escape him.

“THE MOABITE CIPHER”

Besides characterization, Freeman's great strength as a writer lies in his ability to move his characters through the streets of London and across the moors in scenes that are full of life. The opening lines of “The Moabite Cipher,” demonstrates this skill:

A large and motley crowd lined the pavements of Oxford Street as Thorndyke and I made our way leisurely eastward. Floral decorations and dropping bunting announced one of those functions inaugurated from time to time by a benevolent Government for the entertainment of fashionable loungers and the relief of distressed pickpockets. For a Russian Grand Duke, who had torn himself away, amidst valedictory explosions, from a loving if too demonstrative people, was to pass anon on his way to the Guildhall; and a British Prince, heroically indiscreet, was expected to occupy a seat in the ducal carriage.

This passage contains much that is typical of Freeman's style. Thorndyke is a precise man, accustomed to noting every detail because it might later prove significant, and this discipline of mind shows itself in the way Jervis and the other narrators tell a story. Thus, the two men are not simply strolling down a street in London, they are making their way “eastward” on “Oxford Street.” These characters move through a London that is real (as with his laboratory experiments, the reader could easily follow Thorndyke's footsteps through several of the stories), and Freeman is not sparing in his use of real streets and buildings, drawing on the local flavor of foggy streets in a London illuminated with gaslights.

The London described in the passage is gone. Similarly, Freeman's vocabulary is faintly old-fashioned. Words such as “motley,” “amidst” and “anon” sound quaint to modern readers and help take them back to the proper time and place.

Also apparent in this passage is the gentle irony of tone, demonstrated here in the idea of the government's sponsoring events “for the entertainment of fashionable loungers and the relief of distressed pickpockets.” Thorndyke himself is a rather humorless man, but he smiles rather often at the eccentricities and weaknesses of his fellow creatures.

Loungers and pickpockets are only some of the “large and motley crowd” inhabiting London—a crowd made up of colorful characters including Russian grand dukes, British princes, international jewel thieves, mysterious artists, collectors of ancient artifacts, secretive foreigners, and overdressed women who are no better than they should be. In a large crowd in a big city peopled with interesting figures, anything can happen—and in the Thorndyke stories, something interesting usually does.

Cynthia A. Bily

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

ROMNEY PRINGLE SERIES (AS ASHDOWN): The Adventures of Romney Pringle, 1902 (with John James Pitcairn); The Further Adventures of Romney Pringle, 1970 (with Pitcairn)

DR. THORNDYKE SERIES: 1907-1920 • The Red Thumb Mark, 1907; John Thorndyke's Cases, 1909 (also known as Dr. Thorndyke's Cases); The Eye of Osiris, 1911 (also known as The Vanishing Man); The Mystery of 31, New Inn, 1912; The Singing Bone, 1912; A Silent Witness, 1914; The Great Portrait Mystery, 1918

1921-1930 • Helen Vardon's Confession, 1922; Dr. Thorndyke's Case Book, 1923 (also known as The Blue Scarab); The Cat's Eye, 1923; The Mystery of Angelina Frood, 1924; The Puzzle Lock, 1925; The Shadow of the Wolf, 1925; The D'Arblay Mystery, 1926; A Certain Dr. Thorndyke, 1927; The Magic Casket, 1927; As a Thief in the Night, 1928; Dr. Thorndyke Investigates, 1930; Mr. Pottermack's Oversight, 1930

1931-1942 • Pontifex, Son and Thorndyke, 1931; When Rogues Fall Out, 1932 (also known as Dr. Thorndyke's Discovery); Dr. Thorndyke Intervenes, 1933; For the Defence: Dr. Thorndyke, 1934; The Penrose Mystery, 1936; Felo De Se?, 1937 (also known as Death at the Inn); The Stoneware Monkey, 1938; Mr. Polton Explains, 1940; Dr. Thorndyke's Crime File, 1941; The Jacob Street Mystery, 1942 (also known as The Unconscious Witness)

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Uttermost Farthing: A Savant's Vendetta, 1914 (also known as A Savant's Vendetta); The Exploits of Danby Croker: Being Extracts from a Somewhat Disreputable Autobiography, 1916; The Great Platinum Robbery, 1933

OTHER SHORT FICTION: From a Surgeon's Diary, 1975 (as Ashdown; with John James Pitcairn); The Queen's Treasure, 1975 (as Ashdown; with Pitcairn); The Dr. Thorndyke Omnibus: Thirty-eight of His Criminal Investigations, 1993; The Uncollected Mysteries of R. Austin Freeman, 1998 (Tony Medaver and Douglas G. Greene, editors); Freeman's Selected Short Stories, 2000

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: The Golden Pool: A Story of a Forgotten Mine, 1905; The Unwilling Adventurer, 1913; The Surprising Adventures of Mr. Shuttlebury Cobb, 1927; Flighty Phyllis, 1928

NONFICTION: Travels and Life in Ashanti and Jaman, 1898; Social Decay and Regeneration, 1921

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Chapman, David Ian. R. Austin Freeman: A Bibliography. Shelburne, Ont.: Battered Silicon Dispatch Box, 2000. Useful bibliography of the author's works.

Donaldson, Norman. Donaldson on Freeman: Being the Introductions and Afterwords from the R. Austin Freeman Omnibus Volumes. Shelburne, Ont.: Battered Silicon Dispatch Box, 2000. Collects together Donaldson's commentaries on Freeman's novels, revealing the trajectory of the author's evolution, as well as the importance of his fiction.

_____. In Search of Dr. Thorndyke: The Story of R. Austin Freeman's Great Scientific Investigator and His Creator. Rev. ed. Shelburne, Ont.: Battered Silicon Dispatch Box, 1998. Study of Freeman's most famous character and his inspirations in the author's life and experiences.

_____. "R. Austin Freeman: The Invention of Inversion." In The Mystery Writer's Art, edited by Francis M. Nevins, Jr. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1970. Focuses on Freeman's device of showing the murderer's activities before introducing the detective.

Galloway, Patricia. "Yngve's Depth Hypothesis and the Structure of Narrative: The Example of Detective Fiction." In The Analysis of Meaning: Informatics 5, edited by Maxine MacCafferty and Kathleen Gray. London: Aslib, 1979. Looks at Freeman's works as a case study to understand the particular structure of narrative deployed by detective fiction.

Kestner, Joseph A. The Edwardian Detective, 1901-1915. Brookfield, Vt.: Ashgate, 2000. A tightly focused study of the British detective genre.

Mayo, Oliver. R. Austin Freeman: The Anthropologist at Large. Hawthorndene, S.Aust.: Investigator Press, 1980. Study of Freeman's use of anthropology in his works. Bibliographic references and index.

ALAN FURST

Born: New York, New York; February 20, 1941

Types of plot: Espionage; historical

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Jean Casson, 1996-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

JEAN CASSON is the only protagonist to appear more than once in Furst's World War II-era spy novels. He is a French film producer who initially epitomizes the pleasure-seeking abandon of interwar Paris but gradually becomes drawn into wartime intrigue and into committing himself to political action and a moral position. In The World at Night (1996), Casson is infatuated with the actress Citrine and is torn between this passion and his growing desire to help France resist the Nazis. In Red Gold (1999), Casson, a new recruit to the world of espionage, is chosen by the Resistance as a key contact person because many of his friends from his cinema days had become activists and fighters.

CONTRIBUTION

Although he did not attain large-scale success until he was fifty, Alan Furst became the most successful new writer of espionage fiction in the 1990's, a success that continued on a larger scale in the twenty-first century. Furst pioneered the genre of the atmospheric thriller, as important for its evocation of times and places gone by as for the excitement of its plot. His novels are steeped in the ambience of Europe before and during World War II. Furst writes historical fiction that happens to contain spying as much as he composes spy novels with a historical setting. Though Furst lived for many years in Paris and that city tends to be a motif in his fiction, he also sets much of his action in Eastern European countries less familiar to the readers of this genre.

Furst often features protagonists who are communists or working for the communists. His preoccupation with communism and his Eastern European settings can be seen as a product of the aftermath of the collapse of the Soviet bloc in 1989-1991; he is exploring this period from the perspective of the 1990's and after, now that it is no longer possible to see a powerful Soviet Union as a permanent outcome of World War II. Nonetheless, Furst's communists are three-dimensional characters, not cardboard ideologues, who fall in love, feel pain, and register the full range of psychological reactions. A master of historical detail, Furst also allows his characters to hold complex and deeply felt beliefs, which he may not necessarily share, but which reflect a particular time and place. In this way, Furst's novels attain a sense of the past that contributes to the atmosphere of his mysteries.

BIOGRAPHY

Alan Furst was born to Jewish American parents on the Upper West Side in New York City in 1941. He received a bachelor of arts degree in English from Oberlin College in Ohio in 1962 and a master of arts degree in English from Pennsylvania State University in 1967. Later, he took courses at the School for General Studies at Columbia University in New York, where he encountered the prominent anthropologist Margaret Mead, for whom he later briefly worked as an assistant. He worked as a freelance writer for magazines before moving to France in 1969 as a result of receiving a Fulbright Award to teach abroad. Once in France, he contributed a regular column to the International Herald Tribune. Later he moved back to the United States to work for the Arts Commission in Seattle, but he made frequent visits to Paris and soaked in the atmosphere of the city that was to become a cynosure for his major fiction.

While in France, Furst began to publish fiction. Although Your Day in the Barrel (1976) had the thriller-genre elements so central to Furst's later fiction, it was basically a comic mystery about a drug dealer named Roger Levin. The book was influenced by the exuberant, countercultural style of Tom Robbins, who provided a blurb on the novel's back cover. The book received appreciation only in Seattle, where Furst was then working. The Paris Drop (1980) and The Carib- bean Account (1981) are suspense novels that concern drug dealing, although their plots are more conventional and their appeal more mass-market. Shadow Trade (1983) was Furst's initial foray into the genre of espionage, although unlike his later books, it had a more or less contemporary setting.

In the mid-1980's, Furst visited Eastern Europe while researching an article he had been commissioned to write for Esquire Magazine. Night Soldiers (1988) was inspired by this trip and marked the beginning of Furst's historical espionage novels. Night Soldiers and Dark Star (1991) were long and possessed considerable meditative passages. It was only with The Polish Officer (1995) that Furst fully mastered a stripped-down technique and an ability to convey historical information without disrupting the excitement of a suspenseful plot. This book was followed by The World at Night and Red Gold, Furst's only books sharing a protagonist, the French film producer Jean Casson. Furst was not tempted by the stability and marketing potential of a Jean Casson series, however, turning to stand-alone protagonists for his next three books. Kingdom of Shadows (2001) and The Foreign Correspondent (2006) concern Eastern European émigrés in prewar Paris and Rome, respectively, while Dark Voyage (2004) focused on a Dutch captain aboard a seemingly neutral freighter.

Though Furst lived in Paris at the beginning of his work on the historical espionage books, by the mid-1990's he had moved to Sag Harbor, New York, on the east end of Long Island. By 2002, he had become a prominent figure in the literary world, as evidenced by a major profile in The New York Times as well as by his writing the copy for an advertisement for Absolut vodka. Furst's two novels Dark Voyage and The Foreign Correspondent were given the space and depth of treatment in newspaper review sections usually reserved for major works of mainstream fiction and marked Furst's development from cult writer beloved by aficionados to a figure with an increasing popular readership.

ANALYSIS

Alan Furst's appeal has a good deal to do with his choice of setting. Though many spy novels have been written about World War II, most emphasized action, military intelligence, or the technical and scientific details of weaponry. Furst's focus on psychology, atmosphere, and political relations between and within nation-states provides pleasures that are as intellectual as visceral.

Although inspired by Eric Ambler's spy novels of the 1930's and Graham Greene's "entertainments" focusing on Cold War machinations, Furst is writing from the viewpoint of a later time period and evokes rather than shares in the passionate left-wing political allegiance of the two British novelists. Another British novelist of the Greene-Ambler generation, Anthony Powell, exerted a profound influence on Furst's fiction. Powell's sense of social history, interest in ordinary life during wartime, and ability to entwine discursive background with quick, terse dialogue are features emulated by Furst's mature work. Interestingly, however, despite his admiration for these British writers and a general Britishness of tone noted by many reviewers in Furst's work, Britain seldom, if ever, appears as a setting in his fiction.

The first two historical espionage books written by Furst, Night Soldiers and Dark Star, show the author immersing himself in the background of his books while also trying to communicate a compelling story. These novels serve as groundwork for their more seamless and faster-paced successors, starting with The Polish Officer. By Dark Voyage, Furst's denouement involving a final chase through the Baltic Sea is as exciting as any action-thriller.

For most writers, historical information and description are background. For Furst, they are content, a substantial part of what the reader expects. He conducts massive research, from securing names and dates relevant to the settings of his stories to determining what cigars the characters would have smoked, what restaurants they might have eaten in, and what popular songs they might have heard.

Furst's protagonists are always male and are almost always single. As with the traditional espionage or hard-boiled detective novel protagonists, they are loyal ultimately only to themselves, although they may be enveloped in a network of business and ideological associations. Furst's protagonists differ, however, from those in the hard-boiled or traditional spy novel in that they are consciously intellectual and often cultured and have a keen sense of style. His protagonists are often active in the arts either as practitioners, like Jean Casson, or as aficionados like Jean Szara, the protagonist of Dark Star, whose name alludes to the Romanian Dadaist writer Tristan Tzara. Even Eric DeHaan, the Dutch sea captain who is the protagonist of Dark Voyage, is somebody who reads and reflects beyond his immediate circumstances. Furst's protagonists are more detached and disaffiliated at the start of the novel than at the end. Often, they find themselves engaged in a moral or ideological sense during the course of the novel, whether because of a romantic attachment, an acquired sense of mission, or a dormant sense of morality that is awakened by the dire, life-or-death circumstances into which they have been thrust. Because Furst's characters wake up to their existential situation rather than espousing a predetermined attitude, the novels often chronicle the philosophical growth of their protagonists.

Furst tells his stories almost exclusively from the point of view of his heroes; readers learn about the characters' world as they do, and readers feel themselves to be in the characters' shoes as they struggle to thread their way through a murky and perilous reality. Furst's protagonists often try to address their isolation through relationships with women; Furst does not write love scenes as smoothly as he writes passages of pursuit and flight, but the sexual element is a crucial one in his work. Though some of these relationships succeed better than others, these love stories provide a counterpoint to the pervasive presence of war and politics, but they also demonstrate that the World War II era was one in which the private could not remain untouched by the political.

Furst's heroes tend to be middle-aged, middle-class, reserved, and unsuccessful in love but sympathetic to and intrigued by women; they are intellectual though not literary, and while slow to commit themselves, Furst's heroes eventually come to care deeply about the activity of espionage, partially out of moral considerations but also out of love of the game. Though Furst's heroes encounter many perils, they always emerge alive at the end; however, Jean Casson aside, his protagonists are not repeated from book to book. The protagonist's survival is not to ensure the next adventure but instead is an affirmation of personal integrity in a world that often seems ready to dismiss it. Furst may seem to emphasize political events and circumstances, but his novels forcefully convey the importance of unprepossessing people who are able to rise to the occasion at a time of crisis.

RED GOLD

The title of Red Gold refers to the funding of the communist resistance in Nazi-occupied France during World War II, the sources of which Germany is determined to find. Jean Casson, an apolitical man and former filmmaker, returns to France to pursue a woman with whom he is infatuated. Casson is recruited into the Resistance by a police officer who realizes that because Casson has a network of contacts in the film industry, he has unwittingly met a lot of communists. Casson's assignment to foil German attempts to ferret out the "red gold" allows Furst to demonstrate the way in which prewar glamour can be transmuted into grim wartime determination. Red Gold is Furst's only novel set fully in France, a setting his readers know better than the Eastern European countries he often explores. Furst's ability to evoke an original sense of atmosphere is all the more remarkable.

DARK STAR

In Dark Star, Jean Szara is a journalist for the Soviet newspaper Pravda who, despite his communist conviction, is not an ideologue. Therefore, it marks a change for him when he is asked by the NKVD, the Soviet spy agency, to monitor activity in Paris. Szara finds himself torn between what are, in his mind, competing goods: the communist ideological struggle and his growing awareness of his own Jewishness, which leads him to try to save the Jews of Europe from Nazism even though that is not within the mandate given him by his Soviet superiors. This novel, covering a wider span of time (1937-1940) than most of Furst's subsequent works, sets the tone for them by charting the growth of the protagonist's awareness of himself and his world.

THE POLISH OFFICER

Poland was quickly conquered in 1939 by the armed might of Germany and the perfidy of the Soviet Union, but the Polish resistance, forced abroad, is just beginning the fight in The Polish Officer. Captain Alexander de Milja, who makes maps for a living, experiences the map of Europe in a visceral way to help underwrite the Polish resistance in exile as he tries to smuggle the Polish gold reserves out of the country via the one open border with Romania. This novel gives a good overview of the Eastern Front of the early years of World War II and shows de Milja as both an ardent patriot and a vulnerable human being subject to stress and temptation.

DARK VOYAGE

Dark Voyage explores diplomatic ambiguities of World War II, especially the importance of governments in exile and the potential of the few neutral countries, like Spain, to become sites of espionage and skullduggery. Dutch captain Eric DeHaan disguises his ship, the MV Noordendaam, as a Spanish freighter while plotting to aid the resistance to the Nazis who have occupied his country. Following an exciting itinerary that takes him and his ship from Tunisia in the Mediterranean to Estonia in the Baltic, DeHaan shows how paradoxically easy it is for a political mission, when disguised as an economic enterprise, to escape notice even in a world at war. Dark Voyage is arguably Furst's most gripping and most thoughtful work.

Margaret Boe Birns

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

JEAN CASSON SERIES: The World at Night, 1996; Red Gold, 1999

NONSERIES NOVELS: Your Day in the Barrel, 1976; The Paris Drop, 1980; The Caribbean Account, 1981; Shadow Trade, 1983; Night Soldiers, 1988; Dark Star, 1991; The Polish Officer, 1995; Kingdom of Shadows, 2001; Blood of Victory, 2002; Dark Voyage, 2004; The Foreign Correspondent, 2006

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NONFICTION: One Smart Cookie: How a Housewife's Chocolate Chip Recipe Turned into a Multi- million-Dollar Business, The Story of Mrs. Field's Cookies, 1987

EDITED TEXT: The Book of Spies: An Anthology of Literary Espionage, 2003

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Anderson, Patrick. The Triumph of the Thriller: How Cops, Crooks, and Cannibals Captured Popular Fiction. New York: Random House, 2007. Section on Furst praises his spy fiction, calling it compelling, and describes several novels, including Kingdom of Shadows.

Dunn, Adam. "Publishers Weekly Talks with Alan Furst." Publishers Weekly 249, no. 26 (July, 2002): 52. This revealing interview explores Furst's research methods, reading habits, and the marketing of his work.

Foreman, Jonathan. "Furst Among Equals." Review of Dark Voyage, by Alan Furst. Weekly Standard 10, no. 9 (November, 2004): 37-38. This review of Dark Voyage foregrounds the qualities that have made Furst's historical spy novels appealing to so many.

Gross, Ken. "Paris Noir." The New York Times Magazine: Sophisticated Traveler, June 4, 2006, 148-152. An examination of the fictional Paris created by Furst; important for the appreciation of Furst's techniques of establishing background and setting.

Schrag, Peter. "Graham Greene, Roll Over." The Nation, October 12, 2002, 31-34. This omnibus review of Furst's spy novels discusses the traits they share and analyzes their effect on the reader.

Taylor, Charles. "A Stylish Contradiction: Furst's Romantic Realism." The New York Observer, June 7, 2006, 20. This overview article valuably links the popularity of Furst's work to political concerns of the 1990's and the early twenty-first century, particularly the continuing debate over the significance of World War II.

JACQUES FUTRELLE

Born: Pike County, Georgia; April 9, 1875

Died: On the Titanic; April 15, 1912

Type of plot: Master sleuth

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Professor S. F. X. Van Dusen, 1905-1909

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

PROFESSOR VAN DUSEN, otherwise known as the THINKING MACHINE, is a Sherlock Holmesian investigator who charges no fee for his services. His full title, Augustus S. F. X. Van Dusen, Ph.D., LL.D., F.R.S., M.D. (and other unnamed honors), is indicative of his professorial background, his elitism, his scientific methodology, and his worship of logic. He is unmarried and relies on a reporter named Hutchinson Hatch to do his detailed research. Van Dusen delights in solving baffling cases and is fond of proving that “nothing is impossible” and “two plus two always equals four.”

CONTRIBUTION

Jacques Futrelle wrote seven novels and some fifty short stories. Clearly indebted to Edgar Allan Poe’s Monsieur Dupin and Arthur Conan Doyle’s Sherlock Holmes, Futrelle’s Professor Van Dusen nevertheless has his own distinctive features. Futrelle deliberately exaggerates the reasoning powers of his hero, for example, to promote an ambiguous result: One is never sure if the Thinking Machine incarnates an idol of the master sleuth or if the ultimate end is to ridicule over-indulgent logic. His language is at times clever, at times full of typical detective jargon, at times teeming with subtle humor. Other than Van Dusen, Futrelle’s characters are normal, ordinary people, but his solutions to criminal puzzles are always unique and often border on the bizarre. His inventiveness has attracted critical praise. Writing at a time when it was fashionable to emphasize quick action, incidents, and criminal situations, Futrelle preferred to carve out stories of ideas and analysis. He helped reverse the trend toward violence and raised the level of detective fiction by portraying intellectual, rather than physical, combat.

Aside from his eccentric detective and the clever solutions, Futrelle is cited for his variety of locked-room mysteries, which he developed to perfection, and a subtle satiric voice not always recognized. He extended the realm of Dupin and Holmes, but he sacrificed character to focus on illustrations of the power of logic. Some may argue that his range is limited, and it is true that his novels have lost some appeal over the years. Still, Futrelle’s early death ended what many saw as a developing genius.

BIOGRAPHY

Jacques Heath Futrelle was born to Wiley H. H. Futrelle and Linnie Bevill Futrelle of French Huguenot descent on April 9, 1875, in Pike County, Georgia. Recorded information about his early life is scant. Evidently he read widely in Poe, Doyle, and François-Eugène Vidocq and developed a love of logical detail. It is also clear that he had a considerable depth of knowledge in the sciences and criminology. He first worked for a newspaper in Richmond, Virginia, at the age of fifteen and briefly served as a theatrical manager while there (1902-1904). Later he moved to Boston to join the editorial staff of the Boston American newspaper (1904-1906). He married L. May Peel, also a writer, on July 17, 1895.

Futrelle gained prominence when the Boston American serialized his famous short story “The Problem of Cell Thirteen” from October 30 to November 5, 1905. The story was used to encourage readers to write in and suggest possible solutions, with prize money of one hundred dollars for the best possible answer. Most of the Thinking Machine stories appeared in this newspaper, but some, no one knows how many, are presumably lost among stacks of old papers tied in huge bundles at warehouses.

Futrelle began to attract attention as a freelance writer and published his first novel in 1906. Although he wrote both Westerns and detective stories successfully, by the time of his death he had become known internationally as a writer of light, lush romances and so-called Edwardian novels. Since that time, however, his popularity as a writer of romantic fiction has waned. The Diamond Master, published in 1909, is generally considered his best novel, but the weight of criticism lies heavily in favor of his short stories.

For the remainder of his life he resided in Scituate, Massachusetts, until his heroic death April 15, 1912, aboard the Titanic, which was returning from England. Seven of his stories went down with him in the Atlantic Ocean. Always a gentleman and a devoted husband, Futrelle put his wife aboard a lifeboat as the Titanic was sinking but refused to take his place on the boat until others were taken care of first. Such courtesy cost him his life.

ANALYSIS

Of the seven novels and four short-story collections of Jacques Futrelle, two of the novels and almost all the short stories feature Professor Augustus S. F. X. Van Dusen. Futrelle's first two works are among his best known: "The Problem of Cell Thirteen" and the novel The Chase of the Golden Plate (1906). Because the novel was written before the short story (despite their publication dates), the question of exactly what year the now-famous professor was introduced becomes problematic. Professor Van Dusen is a fifty-year-old, yellow-haired, five-foot, two-inch, 107-pound, slit-eyed "son of the son of the son of an eminent German scientist"; he is "the logical production of a house that had borne a distinguished name in the sciences for generations." Just recently he has held the chair of philosophy in a great university, and he has spent thirty-five years "devoted to logic, study, analysis of cause and effect, mental, material, and psychological." He is fond of repeating the phrases "two plus two equals four," "nothing is impossible," and "simple logic can reveal anything," and he boasts that one astute in logic can receive only one day of training in chess and beat the chess masters at their own game "by the force of inevitable logic." With the professor, Futrelle gave new meaning to Richard Lovelace's famous words: "Stone walls do not a prison make, nor iron bars a cage." Lovelace meant that the mind can leave the body behind in its flight. Futrelle's depiction of Van Dusen, however, suggests that the body can follow the mind in its flight.

The critic Howard Haycraft wisely warns all detective writers to "avoid the Locked Room puzzle; only a genius can invest it with novelty or interest today." Part of the reason for Haycraft's warning stems from the works of Futrelle, about half of which deal in some manner with a locked-room, -building, or -passage situation (a prison cell, two separate locked rooms in a hotel, a boarded-up antique house being renovated, a room in a boat at sea, a dentist's office, a strip of highway walled on both sides, an impregnable science lab, even the impossible escape of a fourteen-month-old baby from a house isolated in the snow). Most of the stories employ strange but logical means of escape (for example, an orangutan swings the baby through the trees, and two motorcycles with detachable seats and steering are made to look like the car that vanishes into the strip of highway). In the case of "The Problem of Cell Thirteen," the escape of Van Dusen from a maximum security prison with nothing but polished shoes, tooth powder, and twenty-five dollars was a sensational locked-room puzzle no reader of the Boston American solved. Such near-impossible escapes earned for Van Dusen the title the Thinking Machine and earned for Futrelle the title Master of the Locked Room, for few have set up the "closure" mystery any better.

"THE PROBLEM OF CELL THIRTEEN"

"The Problem of Cell Thirteen" (published in The Thinking Machine, 1907) sets the tone and the parameters for the rest of the Van Dusen series. Almost all the stories refer to Van Dusen as the Thinking Machine, almost all employ newspaper reporter Hutchinson Hatch as his sidekick, and most use Detective Mallory of the Supreme Police Intelligence of the Metropolitan District as the inferior but pleasant rival of Van Dusen.

THE CHASE OF THE GOLDEN PLATE

The structural pattern most of Futrelle's short stories were to follow is first seen in his novel The Chase of the Golden Plate. That Professor Van Dusen is not mentioned until the last third of the novel does not mean that he plays a secondary role, or that he was added to the story as an afterthought, as some critics have suggested. Typically, the Futrelle mystery story falls into three sections, as in this novel. In the first section the mystery is presented to the reader, either as told to Van Dusen or through third-person narration. In the second section, Hutchinson Hatch usually appears to check out specific details, accumulate physical evidence, or, in some cases, dramatize to Van Dusen how baffling the situation is at that point of his investigation. Finally, in the third section, the Thinking Machine focuses his brain cells on the problem and in most cases solves the riddle without so much as leaving his armchair, all the while pointing out that the case was logically quite simple. The three steps used as a controlling device (matching the three parts of this novel), with Van Dusen brought in late in the third part, is a technique used throughout Futrelle's career.

Even though Futrelle left no body of critical material that outlines his fictional theory, or any commentary on the writing of other detective fiction that might be used as a gauge, one can surmise from his work a distinct approach involving four prominent elements: insistence on the superiority of logic to any insoluble features, a corresponding deemphasis of violence and incident, realism of detail, and subtle humor. "Two plus two equals four, not some time but all the time," Van Dusen argues in story after story. Here is a man whose supreme logic permits him in a story entitled "The Perfect Alibi" to solve the only murder case in which a criminal made absolutely no mistakes.

Why was Futrelle bent on creating plausible stories with insoluble problems, puzzles, locked rooms, and surprise conclusions—all of which required a special knowledge or insight rare among humans? Part of the answer lies in Futrelle's insistence on the imagination as an ingredient of supreme intellect. Indeed, the Thinking Machine relies as much on intuition and creativity as he does on deduction. In one story ("The Scarlet Thread"), Van Dusen insists that imagination is 50 percent of logic. In another story ("Kidnapped Baby Blake, Millionaire") he delivers a stern lecture on how the "imagination is the backbone of the scientific mind" and declares that "this imagination—really logic—leads to amazing possibilities." In his first novel, The Chase of the Golden Plate, Van Dusen reveals the solution with this advice: "All things must be imagined before they can be achieved; therefore imagination is one of the most vital parts of the scientific brains." Clearly, this is not too far removed from Poe's ratiocination, in which the detective has the imaginative capability of emptying himself and replacing his being with the criminal mind.

A second reason for Futrelle's fascination with insoluble problems is his belief in the power of sheer force of will to overcome adversity. "Nothing is impossible," he repeats in virtually every story, usually as a heated reminder to Hatch. Like Poe's Ligeia, one can conquer anything, even death, by bringing to bear the power of the will over matter. Futrelle has embraced the philosophical position inherited from the Enlightenment that every problem is soluble if one persists and applies intense concentration. He uses his hero well to instill a faith in human logic to overcome all adversity. "The mind is master of all things," says Van Dusen.

REASON AND CRIME SOLVING

At a time when most of his colleagues were concerned with gruesome crimes and sensational murders, Futrelle was more concerned with the application of reason to any given phenomena, especially the apparently incongruent. The heart of Futrelle, like that of Doyle and Poe, lies in the ingenuity with which problems are concocted and then solved, rather than with elaborate chases, murder, or violent acts. Benedict Freedman has calculated that murder cases feature in 42.1 percent of Futrelle's stories compared with 60 percent of Poe's stories, and even in those stories in which murder is the crime, Futrelle's fascination is with the mental solution rather than the deed. This deemphasis of violence raises the level of analysis and intrigue of the usual police/detective story to new intellectual heights. What Futrelle gives the reader, then, is mental tension rather than physical action, and the focus of his stories is the ingenuity of Van Dusen in solving the unsolvable. Further, the systematic dependency on reason does not, as some surmise, amount to a game of matching wits with Professor Van Dusen. Futrelle, instead, seems to want to stretch the minds of his readers so that they can inculcate new dimensions to their thinking. Futrelle's plots demand close observation, dialectical reasoning, synthesis, objective detachment, rigor in logic, and purity of concentration—all of which Futrelle advocates as modes of problem solving and avenues to acute awareness.

Although Van Dusen has a laboratory in his home, he seldom uses it. He simply breaks the problem down into components, applies rigorous logic, and arrives at a solution by deduction. With the possible exception of Sherlock Holmes, he is the most intellectual of detectives.

It must be admitted that Futrelle has written some uneven works. His mystery novels—for example, Elusive Isabel (1909) and Blind Man's Buff (1914)—pale by comparison to his detective stories. It may well be that Futrelle, like Poe, could not sustain the dramatic tension in his longer works. He seems unable to construct the gradual, careful plots so necessary for mystery novels. It is also true that the later stories leaned more toward exotic events and sentimentality. Perhaps the early publication of his short stories in the newspapers required him to take a more disciplined approach. These serialized stories demanded an economy of style coupled with a certain intrigue, and the hypothetical problems posed in them proved so popular that he found it easy to repeat the pattern.

Futrelle is justly praised for his realistic detail. Although not a superb molder of character, he is a master at achieving accuracy of minute clues in a maze of hidden facts and obscurities. The clever manner in which Van Dusen uses drain pipes, rats, socks, shoe polish, linens, and human psychology to escape in "The Problem of Cell Thirteen" accounts for that story being one of the most anthologized of all detective stories.

HUMOR AND SATIRE

In all of his work Futrelle displays a subtle sense of humor. Only the shrewd Baltimore Sun critic H. L. Mencken seems to have fully grasped the fact that the satiric elements in Futrelle's style may well have indicated the direction his writing was headed before his death. If Mencken is correct in claiming that Futrelle's "true field was humor" and that "he had in him the making of a first rate satirist, a species of scrivener very rare among us," then why is it that so few recognize the talent? The answer can only be that Futrelle's tongue-in-cheek humor is too subtle for most readers.

The difficulty is in knowing if the apparent satire is intended as a deliberate spoof on the detective-fiction genre or simply pure entertainment. For example, it is obvious enough that Van Dusen's size-eight hat emphasizes the housing for his oversized brain and that it is wittingly contrasted with Detective Mallory's small, size-six hat. When, however, in a moment of competition, the "Supreme Intellect" glares at "the Thinking Machine," how does one read those labels? Also, how does one interpret Professor Van Dusen's definition of "light reading" as a craving for "page after page of encyclopedic discussion on 'ologies' and 'isms' with lots of figures in 'em"? Even the professor's title—with its ridiculous laundry list of academic degrees—is charged with satire. When in one story ("The Lost Radium") a midget escapes from prison three times the first day by simply wriggling between the bars, one knows Futrelle has a sense of humor. Yet are such strokes intended to parody other detective stories? Is Futrelle laughing up his sleeve at any serious consideration of a supreme intellect or a thinking machine? It seems that the ambiguity in his humor is simply one more way Futrelle teaches reader alertness. There is logic in the humorous, and, conversely, there is frivolity in the serious, warns Futrelle.

In some ways Futrelle looks back to his literary predecessors Poe and Doyle, but he also anticipates the later developments in detective fiction. His unique approach, coupled with his creation of Van Dusen, makes Futrelle one of the best detective-fiction writers in American literature.

Ernest Pinson

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

PROFESSOR S. F. X. VAN DUSEN SERIES: The Chase of the Golden Plate, 1906; The Thinking Machine, 1907 (also known as The Problem of Cell 13); The Thinking Machine on the Case, 1908 (also known as The Professor on the Case); Best Thinking Machine Detective Stories, 1973; Great Cases of the Thinking Machine, 1976

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Simple Case of Susan, 1908 (expanded as Lieutenant What's-His-Name by May Futrelle, 1915); Elusive Isabel, 1909 (also known as The Lady in the Case); The Diamond Master, 1909; The High Hand, 1911 (also known as The Master Hand); My Lady's Garter, 1912; Blind Man's Buff, 1914

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Benvenuti, Stefano, and Gianni Rizzoni. The Whodunit: An Informal History of Detective Fiction. Translated by Anthony Eyre. New York: Macmillan, 1979. Brief but valuable discussion of Futrelle.
- Bleiler, E. F., ed. Introduction to The Best Thinking Machine Detective Stories, by Jacques Futrelle. New York: Dover, 1973. Provides a detailed discussion of Futrelle's work.
- _____. Introduction to Great Cases of the Thinking Machine, by Jacques Futrelle. New York: Dover, 1976. Provides a history and criticism of Futrelle's work.
- Ellison, Harlan. Introduction to The Thinking Machine: The Enigmatic Problems of Prof. Augustus S. F. X. Van Dusen, Ph.D., LL.D., F.R.S., M.D., M.D.S. New York: Modern Library, 2003. Characteristically provocative commentary on Futrelle's work by the famous science-fiction author and pundit.
- Haycraft, Howard. Murder for Pleasure: The Life and Times of the Detective Story. 1941. Rev. ed. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1984. Brief but valuable discussion of Futrelle.
- Pederson, Jay P., ed. St. James Guide to Crime and Mystery Writers. 4th ed. Detroit: St. James Press, 1996. Chronicles the development of the crime and mystery genre, placing Futrelle as one of its instigators. Dictionary of terms and bibliography.
- Roth, Marty. Foul and Fair Play: Reading Genre in Classic Detective Fiction. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1995. A poststructural analysis of the conventions of mystery and detective fiction. Examines 138 short stories and works from the 1840's to the 1960's. Helps place Futrelle within the context of the genre.

G

ÉMILE GABORIAU

Born: Saujon, France; November 9, 1832

Died: Paris, France; September 28, 1873

Types of plot: Amateur sleuth; police procedural; thriller

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Monsieur Lecoq, 1865-1869

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

MONSIEUR LECOQ is a detective of the French Sûreté, who in the course of the series progresses from recent recruit to senior police official. His powers of logical reasoning (of which he is inordinately proud) are undeniable, but he is not infallible, and he often has to be rescued from despair when things do not go well.

PÈRE "TIRAUCLAIR" TABARET is a retired pawnbroker and an avid reader of police memoirs who enjoys using his talents to solve crime and who helps and counsels Lecoq. His role in the stories diminishes as Lecoq's increases.

CONTRIBUTION

Some writers claim that Émile Gaboriau was the author of the first detective novel. That is too simple, but he was certainly a pioneer in four respects. First, his novels fuse the short, tightly constructed, intellectually satisfying account of a mystery and its solution, practiced by Edgar Allan Poe, and the long, episodic, and sensational stories enjoyed by the French newspaper-reading public of the 1860's. Second, Gaboriau was the first to introduce convincing false trails for the reader (and the police) to follow, and he provided ingenious variations of this device in later novels. Third, and perhaps most important, Gaboriau rehabilitated the official detective in fiction: Lecoq differs from his predecessors in being neither an incompetent against whose efforts those of a gifted amateur are contrasted nor a sinister agent of a repressive regime. Finally, Gaboriau gives authentic insights into judicial interrogations, police procedures, and scientific methods leading to the detection of crime. Despite the sensational episodes, gruesome scenes, and accounts of deductive reasoning and police activities, his novels reveal contemporary social conditions and attitudes and bear comparison with the work of the acknowledged masters of the realist and naturalist novels of the day.

BIOGRAPHY

Émile Gaboriau's grandfathers were lawyers, and his father was a district superintendent of the property registry who repeatedly moved with his family around the southern and central provinces of France in the largely unfulfilled hope of advancement. The young Gaboriau was not a gifted pupil at school, but he was a voracious reader. He briefly became a lawyer's clerk but always wanted to practice journalism and literature; after a short interlude in the cavalry, he was bought out and went to Paris. There, moving from address to address, he eked out a miserable existence by engaging in journalism of many kinds for numerous periodicals, writing poetry, and collaborating in theatrical ventures. Gradually, his circumstances improved, and he became a respected social and political commentator.

Gaboriau began also to write serialized stories to the popular taste, in many of which he made use of his own experiences and which eventually included detective stories. Lecoq first appeared in print in a moribund journal in 1865, but his adventures were soon transferred to much more successful journals, and the invention of this character made Gaboriau famous. Unfortunately, he had been plagued by illness since the 1860's and his new affluence was but little compensation, save that he was able to abandon much of his purely journalistic work and concentrate on literature.

In 1870, Gaboriau was mobilized to fight in the Franco-Prussian War, and his letters and journal give a vivid account of the despair of a patriotic Frenchman, the incompetence of his superiors, and the misery of Paris during the siege that followed. Between 1861 and 1873, he published a score of works, including detective fiction, sensational historical novels, and collections of anecdotes. In 1873, ailing and exhausted, he married Amélie Rogelet, his nurse and intimate companion for more than a decade, and died two months later. After his death, his publisher issued in book form a number of other works that in his lifetime had appeared only as serials.

ANALYSIS

Émile Gaboriau's first seven novels were romans-feuilletons (newspaper serials), and in the accepted manner of such stories, they overflowed with surprises, reversals of fortune, recognitions, and threatened and actual violence. Each episode ended on a note of suspense, to ensure that the public would purchase the next issue, and the more horrific the violence, the more virginal the victim or intended victim, the better the public liked them. In L'Affaire Lerouge (1863, serial; 1866, book; The Widow Lerouge, 1873), Gaboriau introduced a detective theme, and four more stories featuring Lecoq appeared subsequently.

Some people do not recognize these works as detective fiction, regarding them as long-winded social and family histories in the grand manner of the nineteenth century novel. Gaboriau readily interpolates lengthy flashbacks, and the reader may complain that the sensational dominates at the expense of the relevant—and, moreover, that the author reveals information that he has concealed from his detective. Nevertheless, however tedious these episodes may be, however tenuous the link may seem to the reader interested only in the detective element, they do help to create and are integrated within the genealogical or social edifice that forms the background to Gaboriau's story—the background, moreover, in which a murder is committed, often to avoid some sort of scandal.

The crucial point is that Gaboriau's detective novels are structured around a crime and its detection. This marks another important difference between these works and other romans-feuilletons; whereas the latter sought to focus attention on the crime itself, with much gruesome and suspenseful buildup and as many horrific details as possible, Gaboriau concentrates on the process of detection after the crime has been committed.

THE WIDOW LEROUGE

In The Widow Lerouge, the main detective is Père Tabaret. Tabaret keeps his hobby a secret, fearing the disapproval of friends and neighbors; to explain his irregular hours, he allows them to believe that he indulges in various social vices. It is an interesting and significant comment on the stigma attached to police work that this "moral" activity should be concealed by something that even then would have been seen as immoral. Lecoq, a junior police officer, merely advises the examining magistrate, Daburon, to engage Tabaret to solve the murder of Madame Lerouge. Tabaret finds many clues missed by Lecoq's incompetent superior Gévrol, and his investigation occupies the major part of the novel. A complication is provided by Daburon's former romantic attachment to the mistress of the principal suspect, Commarin: Tabaret, initially convinced of Commarin's guilt, eventually realizes that another man is guilty, and despite Daburon's reluctance to acknowledge this, he finally proves his case.

THE EMERGENCE OF LECOQ

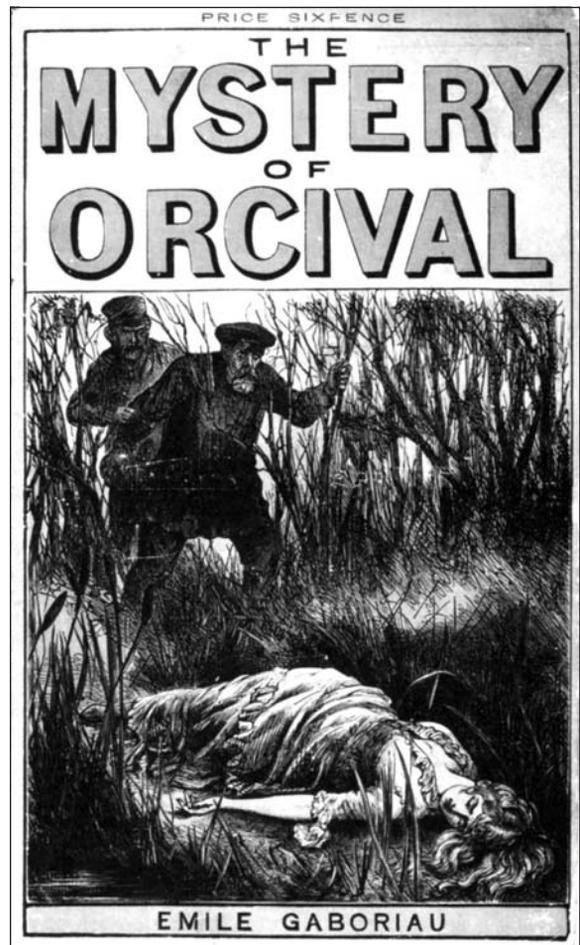

Yet it is Lecoq who emerges from the series as the dominant character, for Tabaret's role diminishes in the later works, and Gévrol disintegrates into a caricature of pompous and obstructive officialdom, a man whose stupidity is contrasted with Lecoq's genius. In an age when the police were often regarded (in literature as in life) as agents of repression, Gaboriau's decision to use an official detective as his hero was both bold and original. Hesitant at first (Tabaret is an amateur), Gaboriau finally brought Lecoq into prominence. In his determination to make him efficient and sympathetic, he gave him both human and superhuman qualities. Apart from his mastery of disguise (an ability he uses in his investigations and as a defense against criminals who have sworn to kill him), he is adept at following a trail (young Gaboriau was an avid reader of James Fenimore Cooper), is an expert cryptographer, speaks fluent English, and has courage and intelligence. His mastery of logical deduction sometimes recalls Edgar Allan Poe's C. Auguste Dupin, but apart from the obvious difference that Dupin was an amateur and Lecoq is a professional, the former was an armchair detective whereas Gaboriau's hero is a practical police officer. Thus, Lecoq not only solves the mystery but also pursues the criminal. To his courage and intelligence, Lecoq adds the basic skills of scientific detection. He takes plaster casts of footprints, he uses photographic enlargements of material evidence and shows photographs of suspects to witnesses, and he calls for and uses the results of autopsies. There is evidence that Gaboriau read widely in works on forensic medicine, jurisprudence, and ballistics to authenticate his writing, and his detectives are experts in the characteristics of firearms and the effects of certain poisons. Less properly, perhaps, Lecoq always carries lock-picking tools and is a capable forger. Gaboriau also gives fascinating accounts of investigative procedures, of interrogations of suspects, and of cunning police devices (such as releasing a minor criminal in the hope that his indiscretions will unmask an accomplice or using various ruses to cause a suspect or a hostile witness to lower his guard).

At his most spectacular, Lecoq prefigures Sherlock Holmes in his love of surprising his companions by producing descriptions of suspects from what appears to be little or no evidence at all. In The Widow Lerouge, it is Tabaret who deduces that the criminal was a young man who entered Madame Lerouge's house before half past nine, that he was not expected by the victim (who nevertheless admitted him), and that he was of just above average height and well dressed, wearing a top hat, carrying an umbrella, and smoking a cigar in a holder. It is Lecoq himself, however, in Monsieur Lecoq (1869; English translation, 1879), who inspects the snow-covered wilderness around an inn in which three men have died and declares that two women have run across it, followed by a tall, middle-aged man, wearing a cloth cap and a light-brown overcoat—for good measure, Lecoq adds that he is probably married—who has later conversed with them. In both cases, the clues that support these deductions are carefully explained. In Le Crime d'Orcival (1867; The Mystery of Orcival, 1871), in some ways a distant foreshadowing of Ellery Queen's The Chinese Orange Mystery (1934), Lecoq realizes that the criminal has deliberately falsified the clues and that he must therefore believe the opposite of what his observations appear to suggest.

Nevertheless, Lecoq has human traits. He is arrogant and has a sense of the dramatic. As a young man, dismissed by his employer for planning imaginary crimes, he joined the police force as the only possible alternative to a career as a master criminal. (In The Widow Lerouge, Gaboriau stated that Lecoq was a former criminal. This would not have surprised the French reading public, but he clearly regretted this lapse and went to some lengths to correct it in later books.) He is easily downhearted. His feat of deduction outside the inn comes only after he has given up hope and is goaded by an ignorant companion. He is also fallible. He thoughtlessly leaves the scene of the crime unguarded, and in his absence the evidence is disturbed. Disguised as an Englishman, he forgets his assumed foreign accent in a moment of excitement and thus betrays himself. Later, having caused a suspect to be released, he trails him across Paris to a very grand house but fails to deduce that the suspect is the nobleman who owns the house.

In this last instance, one sees not only Lecoq's fallibility but also Gaboriau's attempt to solve an abiding problem of the early detective novel. In short, a detective story requires the construction of a puzzle and the exposition of its solution, and it is thus a form of intellectual game engaging the powers of reason of both writer and reader. A novel, on the other hand, engages the reader's emotions, and the process of characterization is paramount. Conscious of the disruptive effect of the interpolations that had slowed down the narrative of The Widow Lerouge, Gaboriau had been trying to overcome the problem ever since. The Mystery of Orcival, a shorter work, has shorter interpolations, which deflect the reader only briefly from the detective theme, and Lecoq's investigations seem to continue through and beyond them. This apparent solution was illusory, however, and the overriding impression of Gaboriau's next novel, Le Dossier no. 113 (1867; File No. 113, 1875), throughout which Lecoq (by now a senior police officer) is disguised so that not even the reader knows his identity, is one of tediousness and irrelevance—despite exciting episodes and the not-inconsiderable achievement of laying a false trail that points persuasively to the cashier Bertomy instead of the real criminal. (Equally convincing false trails had pointed to Commarin in The Widow Lerouge and to Guespin in The Mystery of Orcival.) The next novel, Les Esclaves de Paris (1868; The Slaves of Paris, 1879), is an involved tale of blackmail, and Lecoq intervenes only late in the narrative to unravel the complicated situation.

MONSIEUR LECOQ

The trailing of the suspect across Paris to the nobleman's house forms an important episode of Monsieur Lecoq, the last of the series to appear. In some respects, this novel shows Gaboriau at his best, though he has been criticized for reintroducing Lecoq as a junior police officer. It is worth glancing at the chronology of its composition: Gaboriau began it in 1864—that is, before The Widow Lerouge—but did not complete it until 1868. As a narrative, read not as the last but as the first of the series, it dovetails with the histories of the various reappearing characters; as a structure, it reveals the hand of a more mature craftsman of detective fiction than the author of the other Lecoq novels.

It is cast in two volumes. The first is a detailed account of Lecoq's inquiry into the crime—but, as has been noted, does not reach a satisfactory conclusion. The human background is contained in a second volume, the action of which begins fifty years earlier: An epilogue narrates the conclusion of Lecoq's investigation. In terms of the detective element, readers might complain of having to wade through an irrelevant second volume before Lecoq, reassured at the end of the first by Tabaret (who provides significant information about certain characters), confirms what he was unable to believe and solves the mystery. Because the second volume is also an engaging if somewhat breathlessly narrated sociohistorical document, the reader's interest is properly engaged on this alternate level.

The detective part of the novel is tightly constructed, and the characters are carefully drawn, from the old woman who keeps the inn to the incompetent and treacherous Gévrol. Lecoq's role is central, and Gaboriau makes frequent but brief authorial comments on his thoughts and actions, in a manner that readers of Georges Simenon will find familiar. Lecoq's powers of deduction are impressive, even when his conclusions are slightly inaccurate (for example, he inverts the social status of the women who fled from the inn). The strange behavior of the first examining magistrate, Escorval, provides a mystery in itself, as do the achievements of the ubiquitous accomplice who forestalls Lecoq's every move; the personality of the suspect, Mai, pervades the first volume, especially during his long and gripping interview, full of the cut and thrust of debate, with a second examining magistrate, Segmuller. Tabaret appears briefly, explains errors Lecoq has made, and provides information he perhaps should have known. There are powerful, gruesome scenes, such as the description of the morgue, but these are always coldly realistic.

Gaboriau's style is at its most typical in Monsieur Lecoq. His sentences are short and punchy, and they often form paragraphs in themselves, similar to the style of reporting in certain newspapers. Gaboriau often uses exclamatory phrases, a characteristic that becomes intrusively repetitive in the later novels. The vocabulary is full of imagery, some conventional and some refreshingly original, and he habitually employs colloquial language in the narrative where more formality might be expected.

The freshness of Gaboriau's approach lies in the fact that although Lecoq observes, tests, and deduces like Poe's Dupin, he does so on a grander stage and at greater length. There are inconsistencies—characters possessing information they cannot have acquired, discrepancies in age and appearance—but the initially confusing chronology of Lecoq is explicable, and other faults are trivial and perhaps forgivable in a writer who wrote at such a furious rate. Gaboriau established the basic formula, and English writers such as Wilkie Collins and Arthur Conan Doyle developed it.

OTHER WORKS

Gaboriau went as far as he could with Lecoq. His two remaining detective novels—one of which barely qualifies for the description—introduce other detectives. La Corde au cou (1871; Within an Inch of His Life, 1873), featuring Inspector Goudar, is an adventurous romp, but the short novel entitled Le Petit Vieux des Batignolles (1876; The Little Old Man of Batignolles, 1880), in spite of narrative inconsistencies, is full of exciting twists and turns. The murderer, assuming the cleverness of the police in interpreting clues, falsifies them to incriminate someone else. In the event, Inspector Méchiné and his colleague, ignorant of a crucial fact, arrest the right man for the wrong reasons. The popularity of Lecoq himself was maintained by a rather sensational novel entitled La Vieillesse de Monsieur Lecoq (1878; The Old Age of Monsieur Lecoq, 1880), which some readers consider part of the canon, although it was actually written by Gaboriau's disciple, Fortuné du Boisgobey.

William S. Brooks

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

MONSIEUR LECOQ SERIES: L'Affaire Lerouge, 1863 (serial), 1866 (book; The Widow Lerouge, 1873); Le Crime d'Orcival, 1867 (The Mystery of Orcival, 1871); Le Dossier no. 113, 1867 (File No. 113, 1875); Les Esclaves de Paris, 1868 (The Slaves of Paris, 1879); Monsieur Lecoq, 1869 (English translation, 1879)

NONSERIES NOVELS: La Corde au cou, 1871 (Within an Inch of His Life, 1873; also as In Peril of His Life and In Deadly Peril); Le Petit Vieux des Batignolles, 1876 (The Little Old Man of Batignolles, 1880; also known as A Thousand Francs Reward and A Beautiful Scourge)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Les Cotillons célèbres, 1860; Les Comédiennes adorées, 1861; Les Gens de bureau, 1862 (The Men of the Bureau, 1880); Les Mariages d'aventure, 1862 (Marriage at a Venture, 1879); La Vie infernale, 1870 (The Count's Secret, 1881); La Clique dorée, 1871 (The Clique of Gold, 1874); La Dégringolade, 1872 (The Downward Path, 1880); L'Argent des autres, 1874 (Other People's Money, 1874); La Capitaine Coutanceau, 1875 (Captain Coutanceau, 1880); Les Amours d'empoisonneuse, 1881 (The Marquise de Brinvilliers, 1886); Written in Cipher, 1894

SHORT FICTION: Ruses d'amour, 1862

PLAYS: L'Honneur du nom, pr. 1869 (with others); L'Affaire Lerouge, pr. 1872 (with Hippolyte Hostein; adaptation of Gaboriau's novel)

NONFICTION: L'Ancien Figaro: Études satiriques, 1861; Le Treizième Hussards, 1861 (The Thirteenth Hussars, 1880)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bell, A. Craig. "The Rise and Fall of the Detective Novel." Contemporary Review 272 (April, 1998): 196-200. Traces the development of the detective genre, giving brief mention to Gaboriau.
- Bonriot, Roger. Émile Gaboriau: Ou, La Naissance du roman policier. Paris: J. Vrin, 1985. A meticulous critical biography in French.
- Murch, A. E. The Development of the Detective Novel. 1958. Reprint. New York: Philosophical Library, 1968. Gaboriau's importance as the father of the detective novel is discussed; considers Gaboriau's police-officer hero as well as his plot structure and themes.

Panek, LeRoy Lad. An Introduction to the Detective Story. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1987. This history of the detective story and how it developed contains a chapter on Gaboriau.

Roth, Marty. Foul and Fair Play: Reading Genre in Classic Detective Fiction. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1995. A poststructural analysis of the conventions of mystery and detective fiction. Examines 138 short stories and works from the 1840's to the 1960's. Helps place Gaboriau within the context of the genre.

Sayers, Dorothy L. Les Origines du Roman Policier: A Wartime Wireless Talk to the French. Translated by Suzanne Bray. Hurstpierpoint, West Sussex, England: Dorothy L. Sayers Society, 2003. Address to the French by the famous English mystery author, discussing the history of French detective fiction and its relation to the English version of the genre. Provides perspective for understanding Gaboriau.

Scaggs, John. Crime Fiction. New York: Routledge, 2005. Contains discussion of Gaboriau's novels.

Symons, Julian. Bloody Murder: From the Detective Story to the Crime Novel—A History. 3d ed. New York: Mysterious Press, 1993. Provides a lucid presentation of Gaboriau's many contributions to the genre and of his influence on future practitioners.

LUIZ ALFREDO GARCIA-ROZA

Born: Rio de Janeiro, Brazil; January, 1936

Types of plot: Hard-boiled; psychological; police procedural

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Inspector Espinosa, 1996-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

INSPECTOR ESPINOSA is a middle-aged police investigator from the Peixoto District Precinct, in the Copacabana neighborhood of Rio de Janeiro. Espinosa is divorced and has a son that he has not seen in years, who lives in Washington, D.C. Espinosa lives alone in a small apartment near his work and maintains an ever-growing library of used books, which he respects more than he does most of his fellow police officers. He considers himself to be one of the few honest detectives in a job where most have been co-opted by a system of payoffs. He accomplishes most of his crime solving outside the official judicial system. Espinosa lives a simple life, with only two passions: Italian food and good-looking women.

IRENE (her last name is never given), the one consistent woman in Inspector Espinosa's life, lives in São Paulo but travels to Rio de Janeiro on business. Espinosa often wonders about Irene's private life and speculates that she may have other lovers. Nonetheless, both he and Irene maintain separate lives, and neither wishes to marry. The relationship is one of mutual respect and admiration, rather than control.

WELBER is a young police officer who is the only person in the Peixoto District Precinct that his chief, Inspector Espinosa, trusts implicitly. Welber is logical, dedicated, intelligent, and honest. He is chosen when Espinosa needs somebody outside the judicial system to work with him in the streets of Copacabana and Rio de Janeiro. Welber lives a simple life in a neighborhood far from Copacabana and suffers a long daily commute to work. He repeatedly confirms his integrity, to the point of getting shot while protecting Espinosa.

CONTRIBUTION

Luiz Alfredo Garcia-Roza began his writing career by publishing academic works while he was a professor of psychology at Brazil's Federal University of Rio de Janeiro. His experience as a scientist and psychiatrist is reflected in his mystery series centered on Inspector Espinosa, who investigates crime in the Copacabana section of Rio de Janeiro. In these novels, crimes are not always solved, but Garcia-Roza thoroughly examines the inspector's thoughts as he contemplates the psychological and philosophical issues that produce these often brutal crimes.

Through Espinosa's thoughts, Garcia-Roza comments on the modern Brazilian mind, with special emphasis on the psychological and legal interactions between the multiple levels of society to be found in Copacabana and Rio de Janeiro. Espinosa's calm, frank, and astute assessment of the reasons for the existence of corruption in the megalopolis where he lives provides a nonbiased explanation of the reality of the lives of those who are typically not mentioned in the daily news: the homeless children living on the streets of Rio, police who place their own welfare above that of their fellow citizens, and strong and independent women who function within a male culture.

BIOGRAPHY

Luiz Alfredo Garcia-Roza was born in the Copacabana neighborhood of Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, in January, 1936. He grew up at a time when Copacabana had no tall buildings and was mostly single houses. He witnessed his neighborhood make the immense change from a small, beachside community to a skyscraper-filled, world-famous resort, and he later made it the setting for his mystery novels. As the city changed around him, Garcia-Roza developed from a young and relatively innocent youth into a sophisticated scientist, Freudian psychoanalyst, and professor.

Garcia-Roza dedicated himself to the academic life at Brazil's Federal University of Rio de Janeiro. He spent thirty-five years teaching philosophy and psychology, directing the preparation of undergraduate and postgraduate theses, and overseeing the postgraduate program of psychoanalytical theory. During his tenure there, Garcia-Roza wrote numerous nonfictional works that dealt primarily with psychological behaviorism. These works expand on Freudian theories of unconsciousness, interpretation of dreams, and metapsychology (the underlying causes of noncognizant behavior). Later, this profound knowledge of human behavior would be evident in the philosophical and analytical musings of Inspector Espinosa, Garcia-Roza's main character in his mystery novels.

Although Garcia-Roza maintained a busy academic schedule, he still found time to read mystery novels. Among the works he read were those of his favorite authors, Raymond Chandler, Dashiell Hammett, and Arthur Conan Doyle, who would later influence his own mystery fiction. The specific style of writing Garcia-Roza employs in the Inspector Espinosa series is unique, but the author does credit the great masters of mystery with providing examples of literary excellence that inspired him to develop his own distinctive works.

Garcia-Roza's first mystery novel, O silêncio da chuva (The Silence of the Rain, 2002), was published in 1997. It became an immediate best seller in Brazil. The work received the Nestlé Prize for Literature in 1997 (one of the highest literary awards available in Latin America) and the Jabuti Award for Latin American Literature. Shortly afterward, Garcia-Roza decided to leave his distinguished position at his university and to embrace mystery-fiction writing as his full-time career. The Espinosa series has been translated into English, Spanish, French, Greek, and other languages.

ANALYSIS

Luiz Alfredo Garcia-Roza started the Inspector Espinosa series in 1997 with The Silence of the Rain. Inspector Espinosa lives a very Brazilian life in Copacabana. He knows his neighborhood well, and the streets, parks, beaches, and the characters he encounters in the novels are all based on well-known Carioca (Rio de Janeiro resident) lifestyles. Espinosa lives a solitary life among the crowds of tourists, business professionals, entrepreneurs, the homeless, and the criminals of Copacabana. The inspector goes about his life unnoticed by his neighbors. He lives in an honest manner, and to do so, he maintains a certain physical and psychological distance between himself and his community.

This individuality extends to his interactions with fellow law enforcement officials in his police district, the Peixoto District. He is one of only two police officers in the series who are portrayed as honest and above coercion from those who would co-opt them. Garcia-Roza chose the name Espinosa because it was the name of a philosopher. This name was meant to project the image of a police officer who would ponder the evidence and situation rather than the stereotypical Latin crime investigator who would often rigidly stick to his first impressions of a crime in order to solve the case quickly (and often profit from this artificial resolution).

Throughout the series, Garcia-Roza presents the tropical climate and beach environment as an exotic backdrop for the fast-paced progression of life and crime in Rio de Janeiro. The heat of summer (in December), the winds that bring tropical rainstorms, and proximity to ocean beaches with their cooling breezes dictate where many of the clandestine meetings, stake-outs, and other events included in the crime-solving process take place. Like most residents of Copacabana, Inspector Espinosa lives in an apartment. Much of his life involves his experiences with the surrounding neighborhood. In Espinosa, Garcia-Roza creates a fallible man, one who can and does make mistakes as he develops a case. He is a simple but not simplistic man who calmly accepts his life as a divorced man. His home is a place of frozen dinners, oddly stacked literary works (one of his passions is used books), and a telephone answering machine. This "electronic secretary" is central to all of Garcia-Roza's mystery novels. Much of the action that takes place in the novels begins or ends with a message on the answering machine. The machine is so important in the works that it can be thought of as a crucial character.

Garcia-Roza presents the reader with strong female characters. They run the gamut from wealthy widows to artists to prostitutes. What they all have in common is their intelligence and strength in demanding circumstances. Inspector Espinosa reduces the personal distance he keeps from others only to indulge in one of his few social pleasures: having women in his life. Numerous women, both suspects and friends, appear during Espinosa's investigations. Most, such as Alba Antunes in The Silence of the Rain, appear in only one novel. However, Irene has an ongoing amorous but nonexclusive relationship with Espinosa throughout the series.

Garcia-Roza provides Espinosa with one honest and trustworthy partner in the police unit, a Sherlock Holmes-like officer known simply as Welber. However, fellow police officers are often as corrupt as the criminal suspects. For this reason, and to avoid losing testimony from honest witnesses who would feel pressured to exaggerate their testimonies if they were to speak inside the district precinct, Espinosa often meets with witnesses in plazas, in parks, or on beaches. The witnesses are often told not to speak to other police, as this could corrupt the investigation. Garcia-Roza presents a strong criticism of the justice system as it operates in Rio de Janeiro. Interestingly, Espinosa is presented not as cynical but rather as pragmatic in the manner that he carries out investigations, given the realities of his position in the department.

Because of Garcia-Roza's background in psychology, it is not surprising that some of the novels deal with madness versus sanity in society. Just as Espinosa lives in a borderland between law and lawlessness, some of Garcia-Roza's characters occupy a space between insanity and normality. Readers often find themselves wondering if a suspect is conscious of his or her behavior. At times it becomes unclear as to who is the victim and who is the perpetrator, and who is the psychiatrist and who is the patient. By the time readers conclude the novels, it becomes apparent that the lines that separate good from evil, police from criminals, and sanity from madness have become blurred in the skewed realities of Copacabana.

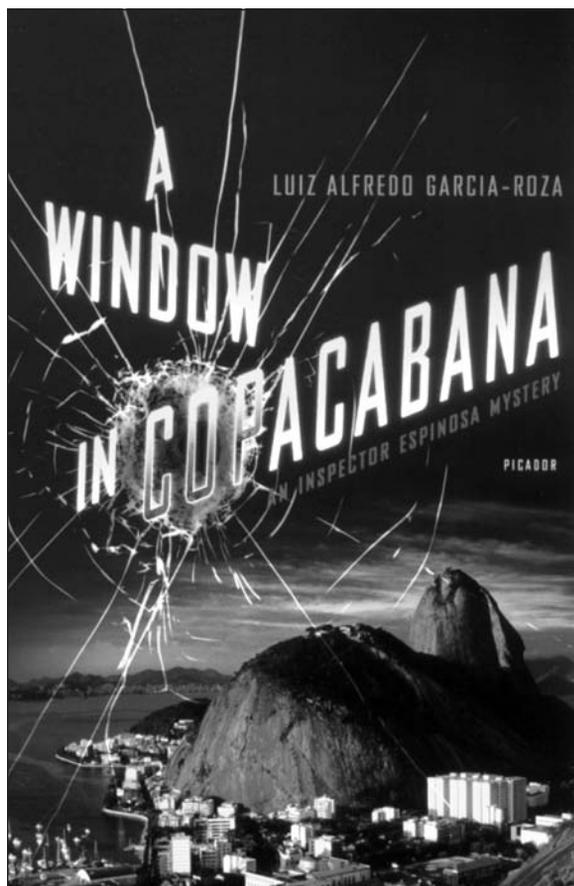

THE SILENCE OF THE RAIN

In The Silence of the Rain, when Ricardo Carvalho is found shot within his own automobile, a series of false assumptions leads Inspector Espinosa to repeatedly reevaluate the motives that he logically assumes have driven the suspects in the death. The reader is witness to more than the inspector is, but the evolving plot soon exposes how easily one can be led to psychological assumptions, especially when the reader is used to a North American system of judicial values.

In an example of a reversal of roles, a technique that Garcia-Roza employs in several of his novels, the distinction between murder and suicide, the blackmailer and the one being blackmailed, the police officer and the criminal, and the victim and the perpetrator become muddled. The author presents a straightforward tale of intrigue without using confusing flashbacks or false leads. Instead, a seemingly unconnected series of events and violent actions are logically and seamlessly interwoven during the last short chapters of the novel.

The women in this mystery novel are all quite independent, and all become suspects. In one form or another, Inspector Espinosa is attracted to all of them. Bia, Ricardo Carvalho's middle-aged but still attractive widow, will not allow herself to be intimidated by pushy police officers. Alba Antunes, a fitness instructor, starts an affair with Espinosa but does not wish any long-term commitment. Rose, Ricardo Carvalho's secretary, outsmarts all of the antagonists who try to use her for financial gain. The final episode of the novel involves a woman who uses love to literally murder the person who was there to take her life.

A WINDOW IN COPACABANA

In Uma janela em Copacabana (2001; A Window in Copacabana, 2005), three police officers from the Peixoto precinct where Inspector Espinosa works are shot at point-blank range. The murders are obviously linked, but Espinosa has a problem. He suspects that the murders are linked in some manner to other police officers. Therefore, he has to choose only a few officers, led by his trusted colleague Welber, to investigate without revealing any results or suspicions to other police. In an example of the duality of life and psychology that Garcia-Roza often presents, all the murdered police officers have secret double lives: two addresses and two women. The investigation leads to evidence of widespread corruption within the police department.

The mistresses of the murdered police start to show up dead. The investigation finds collusion between organized crime and several police officers, but this actually starts to hinder the process of finding those responsible for the murders. Espinosa is correct that the perpetrators are within close proximity to him, but his mistaken psychological profile of the guilty allows the real culprit to manipulate the situation from the start.

Irene, Espinosa's girlfriend, is present in this work and functions as a sort of cross-examiner in that she allows the inspector to bounce ideas off of her. As usual, Garcia-Roza presents a world that is filled with female protagonists who all seem to be attractive to Espinosa. The author's brilliant manner of portraying the inspector as attempting to save the last mistress from the mob's assassins leaves the reader unprepared for what at first glance seems to be one last twist in the plot, but actually reveals the Achilles' heel of Espinosa's gender follies.

PURSUIT

In O perseguido (2003; Pursuit, 2006), Dr. Nesse, a psychiatrist in Copacabana, discovers that one of his daughters has disappeared with one of his patients. Inspector Espinosa is called in to find the daughter, but she returns on her own after admitting having had an affair with the patient. Months later, Espinosa is called again, this time by the doctor, who is being accused of harassing and intimidating a patient who was under his care in a psychiatric hospital, to the point of causing his death. This Garcia-Roza work blurs the line between victim and perpetrator and between sanity and insanity.

Inspector Espinosa attempts to interpret the supposed murder of a man who cannot be proved to have existed. His witnesses at first are reluctant to reveal information and later are found murdered. The reader is left to try to ascertain just who is psychotic, the doctor, his family, or the missing “victim.” This is an offbeat critique of the psychiatric institutions and experts in Rio de Janeiro. Those who are presumed to be abnormal are found to be sane and also dead, while those who treat them are actually spiraling into paranoia.

Paul Siegrist

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

INSPECTOR ESPINOSA SERIES: O silêncio da chuva, 1997 (The Silence of the Rain, 2002); Achados

e perdidos, 1998 (December Heat, 2003); Vento sudoeste, 1999 (Southwesterly Wind, 2004); Uma janela em Copacabana, 2001 (A Window in Copacabana, 2005); O perseguido, 2003 (Pursuit, 2006); Berenice Procura, 2005; Espinosa sem saída, 2006

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NONFICTION: Psicologia estrutural, 1972; Freud e o inconsciente, 1984; Acaso e repetição em psicanálise, 1986; O mal radical em Freud, 1990; Palavra e verdade na filosofia antiga e na, 1990; Introdução à metapsicologia freudiana, 1991-1995 (3 volumes.)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Craig-Odders, Renee W., ed. Hispanic and Luso-Brazilian Detective Fiction. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2006. Collection of essays on multiple authors of detective works with astute observations on the sociopolitical environments in which the works are located. Especially useful for feminist observations. Index.

Garcia-Roza, Luis Alfredo. Luiz Alfredo Garcia-Roza. <http://www.garcia-roza.com/index.htm>. A useful source for general information on Garcia-Roza and on Copacabana and Rio de Janeiro (location of the mystery works).

Hooper, Brad. Review of A Window in Copacabana by Luiz Alfredo Garcia-Roza. Booklist 101, no. 5 (November 1, 2004): 468. A favorable review of the work in the Espinosa series that mentions the author's use of Rio de Janeiro as a setting.

Simpson, Amelia S. Detective Fiction from Latin America. London: Fairleigh Dickinson University Press, 1990. This work is a general explanation of the Latin American mystery novel from a historical and geopolitical viewpoint. The Brazilian mystery novel is examined as being unique unto itself. Important Latin American mystery authors' works are also briefly covered. Photographs and index.

ERLE STANLEY GARDNER

Born: Malden, Massachusetts; July 17, 1889

Died: Temecula, California; March 11, 1970

Also wrote as Kyle Corning; A. A. Fair; Charles M. Green; Grant Holiday; Carleton Kendrake; Charles J. Kenny; Robert Parr; Dane Rigley; Arthur Mann Sellers; Charles M. Stanton; Les Tillray

Types of plot: Master sleuth; private investigator; hard-boiled; courtroom drama

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Perry Mason, 1933-1973

Doug Selby, D.A., 1937-1949

Bertha Cool and Donald Lam, 1939-1970

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

PERRY MASON is a brilliant criminal lawyer who makes a specialty of defending accused murderers who seem to have all the evidence stacked against them but whom he frees and absolves by finding the real murderer, to the frequent astonishment of Lieutenant Tragg.

LIEUTENANT ARTHUR TRAGG is the tough police officer who arrests Mason's clients.

HAMILTON BURGER is the district attorney who opposes Mason in the courtroom and is the target of his legal arrows.

DELLA STREET is Mason's attractive and resourceful secretary who often becomes involved in Mason's cases by offering ideas and helping the defendants.

PAUL DRAKE is the owner of a detective agency that roots out information for the lawyer.

DOUG SELBY is the district attorney in a desert town in Southern California, where he brings criminals to justice.

A. B. CARR is the slick defense attorney who often crosses swords with Selby.

SHERIFF REX BRANDON does Selby's legwork and helps him figure out his cases.

SYLVIA MANNING, a reporter for the town paper, provides publicity when it is needed and also does investigative work.

BERTHA COOL, an overweight middle-aged detective, is fond of such expressions as "Fry me for an oyster!"

DONALD LAM, a slightly built, disbarred attorney, teams up with Cool and often supplies the solution to their cases and expert legal advice for the lawyers of their clients.

CONTRIBUTION

According to the 1988 edition of the Guinness Book of World Records, as of January 1, 1986, Erle Stanley Gardner's books had sold more than 319 million copies in thirty-seven languages. This sales total makes Gardner one of the most popular fiction writers of all time. The sheer number of volumes he produced is overwhelming; 141 of his books were in print at the time of his death, including 80 in his most popular series, the Perry Mason books (another 5 were published later), 46 mystery novels of other kinds, and 15 non-fictional volumes. This list is supplemented by hundreds of short stories and magazine articles. (His complete bibliography fills thirty quarto-sized pages, each of which contains three columns of small print.) Although Gardner constructed his mystery stories according to formulas, the success of which he proved over more than a decade of pulp magazine apprenticeship, they were never stereotyped or hackneyed because Gardner's sense of integrity did not allow him to repeat situations. His dedication to pleasing his audience, coupled with his extraordinarily fertile imagination, led him to turn out first-rate mystery novels at the rate of at least three a year for thirty years. Many of his books were made into films, radio plays, comic strips, and television shows, crowned by the top-rated television series Perry Mason, which ran for nine years (1957-1966) with Raymond Burr as the lawyer-detective and which was filmed with Gardner's assistance and supervision. Gardner's volume of output and reader popularity, along with the approval of both critics and peers, have ensured his prominent position in the annals of mystery and detective fiction.

BIOGRAPHY

Erle Stanley Gardner was born to Grace Adelma Gardner and Charles Walter Gardner in Malden, Massachusetts, in 1889. The elder Gardner was an engineer who traveled wherever his work demanded, and he moved his family to the West Coast, first to Oregon when Erle was ten, and then to Oroville, California, in 1902. The young Gardner loved California, and though in adulthood he traveled extensively, he always made California his home base and that of his fictional characters.

Gardner displayed the independence, diligence, and imagination that were later to mark his career as a writer by becoming a lawyer at the age of twenty-one, not by attending law school but by reading and assisting an attorney and then passing the bar exam. He set up practice in Oxnard, Ventura County, northwest of Los Angeles, where he quickly gained a reputation as a shrewd and resourceful attorney who helped many clients out of seemingly impossible situations.

An outdoorsman (hunter, fisher, and archer), Gardner tried a number of other business ventures before turning to writing at the age of thirty-four, selling his first story to a pulp magazine in 1923. He was not a natural writer, but he learned quickly by studying successful writers and the comments of his editors. During the 1920's and 1930's, he turned out an enormous number of stories for the pulps and created a large array of characters before introducing his most successful character, lawyer-detective Perry Mason, and selling his first novel based on Mason in 1933, by which time he was working so rapidly (turning out a ten-thousand-word novelette every three days) that he had progressed past the typewriter to the dictating machine (he also employed a staff of secretaries, to whom he dictated as they worked in shifts). By 1938, his base was a ranch at Temecula, near Riverside, California; he had several other hideaways and often took what he called his "fiction factory" (himself, dictating machines, and secretarial staff) on the road to remote places in a caravan of trailers. A favorite retreat was Baja California, about which he wrote several travel books and to which his characters often scurry when in trouble.

After World War II, Gardner's fame slowed his output somewhat as his celebrity caused him to become involved in other causes, chief among them the Court of Last Resort (first associated with Argosy magazine, to which Gardner was a frequent contributor, and later a part of the American Polygraph Association), an organization that he formed with others to improve the quality of American justice, and the Perry Mason television show.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Erle Stanley Gardner posing next to a stack of his own published books in 1950.

Gardner married Natalie Talbert in 1912, and they had a daughter, Natalie Grace Gardner, in 1913. The Gardners separated in 1935, although they remained friends and never divorced. Gardner supported his wife until her death in 1968. That same year, Gardner married one of his longtime secretaries, Agnes Jean Bethell, who is considered the real-life model for Perry Mason's Della Street. In 1962, he received the Mystery Writers of America's Grand Master Award. Gardner died of cancer at his ranch in 1970.

ANALYSIS

A typical Erle Stanley Gardner story features interesting and engaging characters, fast action that is moved along primarily by dialogue, and a plot with more twists and turns than a bowl of Chinese noodles. Readers are given just enough information to keep them from being totally lost, and somewhere in the welter of material are placed a few details that, properly interpreted, will clear up the mystery and tie up all the loose ends.

Gardner did not come by this pattern or his writing skills by nature, but only after ten years of study and work at his craft. At first he thought that the way to make characters interesting was to make them bizarre, and his early pulp fiction introduces such unusual characters as Señor Lobo, a romantic revolutionist; Ed Jenkins, the phantom crook; El Paisano, a character who could see in the dark; Black Barr, a Western gun-fighter; and Speed Dash, a human-fly detective who could climb up the side of buildings to avoid locked doors. Gardner also created the more conventional detective figures Sidney Giff, Sam Moraine, Terry Clane, Sheriff Bill Eldon, and Gramps Wiggins, about each of whom he was to write complete novels later.

LESTER LEITH

Lester Leith is a character from this period who was one of Gardner's favorites and whose stories reveal typically Gardnerian twists. Leith is a detective who specializes in solving baffling cases of theft (particularly of jewels) merely by reading newspaper accounts of the crimes. Leith steals the missing property from the criminals, sells it, and donates the money he gets to charity, keeping a percentage as a commission that he uses to maintain himself in his luxurious lifestyle (which even includes employing a valet). The fact that the police are never able to pin any crimes on Leith himself is the more remarkable because his valet, Scuttle, is actually a police undercover agent planted in Leith's home specifically to catch the detective in shady dealings. In the series devoted to this character, Gardner puts an extra spin on the pulp-fiction device of the crime-fighter with a secret identity. Usually, the character with a secret identity must remain outside the law because he has special powers that would create problems if he were revealed (for example, Superman) or must use special extralegal methods (the Green Hornet). In the Lester Leith series, Scuttle, the valet with the secret identity, is a crime-fighter who remains inside the legal system to catch a detective who is so clever that he stays outside the law. A further irony is that Leith, who has amazing intellectual ability, never figures out that he has a spy operating in his own household, a feature that amuses the thoughtful reader.

PERRY MASON

As Gardner's career progressed, he abandoned such colorful characters for the more ordinary and believable characters who people his three main series, beginning with Perry Mason, the lawyer who gets defendants out of situations in which they appear headed for the electric chair. With Perry Mason, Gardner returned to the legal ground that he knew best, sometimes using techniques that he had worked out in his own legal practice. For example, the Chinese merchants in Oxnard ran a lottery; Gardner, learning that the law was after them, had them change places with one another for a day while the police were buying lottery tickets from them. When the ticket purchasers tried to identify the sellers in court, Gardner showed that all the defendants had been misidentified and that the purchasers were naming the sellers by identifying them with the store at which the ticket was purchased rather than by identifying the actual person. The cases were thrown out, making Gardner a hero in the Chinese community; Gardner reciprocated by frequently using Chinese characters and Chinatown locations in his stories. The device of confusing identification by having a witness deal with a person who looked like or was dressed similarly to a defendant was a dodge that Perry Mason used again and again. Gardner was careful to keep Mason's activities scrupulously legal, and he often used real court decisions as a basis for his mystery plots. In the first Bertha Cool-Donald Lam novel, The Bigger They Come (1939), Lam gets off the hook on a murder charge through a loophole in an extradition law. Although Mason gives some questionable legal advice early in his career, he becomes more circumspect as the series progresses, and in such later entries in the series as The Case of the Beautiful Beggar (1965), Mason reminds his client and the police of the changes in notification of rights for victims established in the Miranda case.

The fast pace of the Mason stories was ensured by dividing the detective activities between two characters. Paul Drake and his skilled team of operatives do the investigative work and find whatever information or evidence the lawyer needs, leaving Mason free to do the deductive work of solving the crime. Relegating the investigative work to a reported rather than dramatized element of the action also helps to cover up improbabilities; Drake's men are almost always able to find whatever Mason needs and rarely lose anyone they are following. Gardner was fascinated with this aspect of detective work, and many Mason stories are filled with minutiae on the technique of shadowing a person, particularly someone who knows that he or she is being followed. The fast action also helped Gardner's characters to gloss over whatever improbabilities existed in the stories.

BEWARE THE CURVES

In Beware the Curves (1956), Donald Lam knows that his client did not commit a murder and knows as well who actually committed the crime, but he lacks proof. He supplies his client's lawyer with the evidence needed to have the client convicted on the lesser charge of manslaughter and then points out that the statute of limitations on manslaughter is three years; because the crime was committed more than three years ago, the client is freed. Any competent district attorney would have thought of all this before the trial started, but Gardner's writing is so vivid that the reader is swept into the action and does not think of this point until later, if at all.

As if to be fair to the other side of the justice system, Gardner created the character of Doug Selby, a district attorney who approaches the detection of criminals from the prosecutorial side. Because the publishing market was being flooded with Erle Stanley Gardner's volumes, Gardner's entry in the hard-boiled detective field, the Bertha Cool-Donald Lam series, was written and submitted under the pseudonym A. A. Fair, a ruse that fooled no one, because, even though the stories are racier than the Mason series, with Donald Lam often pursued by beautiful women, the novels usually end in a courtroom, with the author's legal expertise and bias clearly apparent.

THE CASE OF THE VELVET CLAWS

Gardner's clever use of details and penchant for plot turns are evident in the first Mason book, The Case of the Velvet Claws (1933), in which Mason uncovers evidence that seems certain to send his rather unpleasant client, who has earned the enmity of Della Street, to the electric chair. Mason finds the real murderer because he notices a puddle of water around an umbrella stand, placing one of the suspects at the murder site at a time earlier than when he had claimed to be there; thus, he catches the real murderer and reminds both Della Street and the reader that justice is for everyone, not only for likable people.

Besides the sheer entertainment and enjoyment he gives his readers, this emphasis on true justice may be Gardner's most lasting contribution to the mystery field. By making Mason, Selby, and the others not only crusaders but also fair and legally scrupulous investigators, he informs his readers of the requirements of justice and thereby of their obligations as citizens also to be fair and to judge others according to facts, rules, and logic rather than emotion and prejudice.

James Baird

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

PERRY MASON SERIES: 1933-1940 • The Case of the Velvet Claws, 1933; The Case of the Sulky Girl, 1933; The Case of the Lucky Legs, 1934; The Case of the Howling Dog, 1934; The Case of the Curious Bride, 1934; The Case of the Counterfeit Eye, 1935; The Case of the Caretaker's Cat, 1935; The Case of the Sleepwalker's Niece, 1936; The Case of the Stuttering Bishop, 1936; The Case of the Dangerous Dowager, 1937; The Case of the Lame Canary, 1937; The Case of the Substitute Face, 1938; The Case of the Shoplifter's Shoe, 1938; The Case of the Perjured Parrot, 1939; The Case of the Rolling Bones, 1939;

The Case of the Baited Hook, 1940; The Case of the Silent Partner, 1940

1941-1950 • The Case of the Haunted Husband, 1941; The Case of the Empty Tin, 1941; The Case of the Drowning Duck, 1942; The Case of the Careless Kitten, 1942; The Case of the Buried Clock, 1943; The Case of the Drowsy Mosquito, 1943; The Case of the Crooked Candle, 1944; The Case of the Black-Eyed Blonde, 1944; The Case of the Golddigger's Purse, 1945; The Case of the Half-Wakened Wife, 1945; The Case of the Borrowed Brunette, 1946; The Case of the Fan Dancer's Horse, 1947; The Case of the Lazy Lover, 1947; The Case of the Lonely Heiress, 1948; The Case of the Vagabond Virgin, 1948; The Case of the Dubious Bridegroom, 1949; The Case of the Cautious Coquette, 1949; The Case of the Negligent Nymph, 1950; The Case of the One-Eyed Witness, 1950

1951-1960 • The Case of the Fiery Fingers, 1951; The Case of the Angry Mourner, 1951; The Case of the Moth-Eaten Mink, 1952; The Case of the Grinning Gorilla, 1952; The Case of the Hesitant Hostess, 1953; The Case of the Green-Eyed Sister, 1953; The Case of the Fugitive Nurse, 1954; The Case of the Runaway Corpse, 1954; The Case of the Restless Redhead, 1954; The Case of the Glamorous Ghost, 1955; The Case of the Sun Bather's Diary, 1955; The Case of the Nervous Accomplice, 1955; The Case of the Terrified Typist, 1956; The Case of the Demure Defendant, 1956; The Case of the Gilded Lily, 1956; The Case of the Lucky Loser, 1957; The Case of the Screaming Woman, 1957; The Case of the Daring Decoy, 1957; The Case of the Long-Legged Models, 1958; The Case of the Foot-Loose Doll, 1958; The Case of the Calendar Girl, 1958; The Case of the Deadly Toy, 1959; The Case of the Mythical Monkeys, 1959; The Case of the Singing Skirt, 1959; The Case of the Waylaid Wolf, 1960; The Case of the Duplicate Daughter, 1960; The Case of the Shapely Shadow, 1960

1961-1973 • The Case of the Spurious Spinster, 1961; The Case of the Bigamous Spouse, 1961; The Case of the Reluctant Model, 1962; The Case of the Blonde Bonanza, 1962; The Case of the Ice-Cold Hands, 1962; The Case of the Mischievous Doll, 1963; The Case of the Stepdaughter's Secret, 1963;

The Case of the Amorous Aunt, 1963; The Case of the Daring Divorcée, 1964; The Case of the Phantom Fortune, 1964; The Case of the Horrified Heirs, 1964; The Case of the Troubled Trustee, 1965; The Case of the Beautiful Beggar, 1965; The Case of the Worried Waitress, 1966; The Case of the Queenly Contestant, 1967; The Case of the Careless Cupid, 1968; The Case of the Fabulous Fake, 1969; The Case of the Crimson Kiss, 1971; The Case of the Crying Swallow, 1971; The Case of the Fenced-In Woman, 1972; The Case of the Irate Witness, 1972; The Case of the Postponed Murder, 1973

DOUG SELBY SERIES: The D.A. Calls It Murder, 1937; The D.A. Holds a Candle, 1938; The D.A. Draws a Circle, 1939; The D.A. Goes to Trial, 1940; The D.A. Cooks a Goose, 1942; The D.A. Calls a Turn, 1944; The D.A. Breaks a Seal, 1946; The D.A. Takes a Chance, 1948; The D.A. Breaks an Egg, 1949

BERTHA COOL AND DONALD LAM SERIES (AS FAIR): The Bigger They Come, 1939 (also known as Lam to the Slaughter); Gold Comes in Bricks, 1940; Turn on the Heat, 1940; Spill the Jackpot!, 1941; Double or Quits, 1941; Bats Fly at Dusk, 1942; Owls Don't Blink, 1942; Cats Prowl at Night, 1943; Give 'Em the Ax, 1944 (also known as An Axe to Grind); Crows Can't Count, 1946; Fools Die on Friday, 1947; Bedrooms Have Windows, 1949; Top of the Heap, 1952; Some Women Won't Wait, 1953; Beware the Curves, 1956; Some Slips Don't Show, 1957; You Can Die Laughing, 1957; The Count of Nine, 1958; Pass the Gravy, 1959; Kept Women Can't Quit, 1960; Bachelors Get Lonely, 1961; Shills Can't Cash Chips, 1961 (also known as Stop at the Red Light); Try Anything Once, 1962; Fish or Cut Bait, 1963; Up for Grabs, 1964; Cut Thin to Win, 1965; Widows Wear Weeds, 1966; Traps Need Fresh Bait, 1967; All Grass Isn't Green, 1970

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Clew of the Forgotten Murder, 1935 (also known as The Clue of the Forgotten Murder); This Is Murder, 1935; Murder up My Sleeve, 1937; The Case of the Turning Tide, 1941; The Case of the Smoking Chimney, 1943; The Case of the Backward Mule, 1946; Two Clues: The Clue of the Runaway Blonde and The Clue of the Hungry Horse, 1947; The Case of the Musical Cow, 1950

OTHER SHORT FICTION: Over the Hump, 1945; The Case of the Murderer's Bride, and Other Stories, 1969; The Amazing Adventures of Lester Leith, 1981

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

SHORT FICTION: The Human Zero, 1981; Whispering Sands: Stories of Gold Fever and the Western Desert, 1981; Pay Dirt, and Other Whispering Sands Stories, 1983

NONFICTION: The Land of Shorter Shadows, 1948; The Court of Last Resort, 1952; Neighborhood Frontiers, 1954; The Case of the Boy Who Wrote "The Case of the Missing Clue" with Perry Mason, 1959; Hunting the Desert Whale, 1960; Hovering over Baja, 1961; The Hidden Heart of Baja, 1962; The Desert Is Yours, 1963; The World of Water: Exploring the Sacramento Delta, 1964; Hunting Lost Mines by Helicopter, 1965; Gypsy Days on the Delta, 1967; Off the Beaten Track in Baja, 1967; Mexico's Magic Square, 1968; Drifting down the Delta, 1969; Cops on Campus and Crime in the Streets, 1970; Host with the Big Hat, 1970

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bounds, J. Dennis. Perry Mason: The Authorship and Reproduction of a Popular Hero. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996. Examines the fictional Perry Mason as a "cultural product"; also discusses Gardner.

Fugate, Francis L., and Roberta B. Fugate. Secrets of the World's Best-Selling Writer: The Story-Telling Techniques of Erle Stanley Gardner. New York: William Morrow, 1980. Focuses on Gardner's technique in his mystery and detective fiction.

Haining, Peter. The Classic Era of American Pulp Magazines. Chicago: Chicago Review Press, 2000. Discusses Gardner's pulp work, shedding light on the relationship between the Perry Mason stories and their pulp-fiction forebears. Index.

Hughes, Dorothy B. Erle Stanley Gardner: The Case of the Real Perry Mason. New York: William Morrow, 1978. A comprehensive biography of Gardner.

Leitch, Thomas. Perry Mason. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 2005. Study of the enduring popularity of the Perry Mason character and what it reveals about American culture. In addition to this broader cultural analysis, the book includes a detailed account of the creation of the character and the nuts and bolts of his portrayal on television.

McWhirter, Darien A. The Legal One Hundred: A Ranking of the Individuals Who Have Most Influenced the Law. Secaucus, N.J.: Carol, 1998. Gardner is ranked ninety-ninth in this list of the one hundred people who have had the greatest effects on the evolution of the modern legal system.

Penzler, Otto. The Private Lives of Private Eyes, Spies, Crimefighters, and Other Good Guys. New York: Grosset & Dunlap, 1977. Studies detectives in the mass media. Includes bibliographies, filmographies, and index.

Senate, Richard L. Erle Stanley Gardner's Ventura: The Birthplace of Perry Mason. Ventura, Calif.: Charon Press, 1996. Study of the formative role of this little-known community outside Los Angeles in the life of Gardner in general and in the creation of Perry Mason in particular.

Van Dover, J. Kenneth. Murder in the Millions: Erle Stanley Gardner, Mickey Spillane, and Ian Fleming. New York: Frederick Ungar, 1984. Examines the work of three highly popular writers for the stereotypes they employed. Suggests the moral, political, and social implications of their genres.

JOHN GARDNER

Born: Seaton Delaval, Northumberland, England;
November 20, 1926

Died: Basingstoke, England; August 3, 2007

Also wrote as Edmund McCoy

Types of plot: Comedy caper; espionage; master sleuth; police procedural

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Boysie Oakes, 1964-1975
Derek Torry, 1969-1974
Professor Moriarty, 1974-1975
Herbie Kruger, 1979-1995
James Bond, 1981-1996
Sergeant Suzie Mountford, 2002-2005

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

BOYSIE OAKES, a parody of Ian Fleming's James Bond, is a lazy and lecherous espionage agent who hires others to do his killing for him. He is inept, forgetful, and afraid of airplanes.

DEREK TORRY, a Scotland Yard inspector of Italian descent, takes crime personally and reacts angrily to criminals. He suffers from religious crises of conscience. His conservative Roman Catholic beliefs often inhibit his efforts at romance and make him self-doubtful.

PROFESSOR MORIARTY, created by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, is a leading antagonist of Sherlock Holmes who has the personality of an English university teacher. His efforts to bring all major European crime under control rarely result in confrontation with Holmes.

HERBIE KRUGER, a German-born British intelligence agent, considers himself a failure. He is devoted to Gustav Mahler's music and, like many Gardner characters, is thoroughly neurotic.

JAMES BOND, the famous Agent 007 created by Ian Fleming, has been revived by Gardner. The new Bond differs from the original in being interested in conservation. He is also more sophisticated and faces villains who are often not mere stock figures of evil.

SUZIE MOUNTFORD is a female detective who operates during World War II and has to fight her way through male chauvinism in the police force as well as to sort out the mysteries of the working class.

CONTRIBUTION

John Gardner specialized in taking over characters created by other writers. By presenting characters such as James Bond and Dr. Moriarty in his own way, Gardner added an extra dimension to his novels: The original characters remain in the reader's mind, available for comparison with Gardner's versions. Gardner also pioneered the practice of including comic elements in the standard mystery, effectively creating a new genre. His work shows great attention to historical detail and more than a touch of the occult. Gardner's professionalism and ability to imitate other writers' styles helped him, particularly in his James Bond novels. However, his own stylistic sense was better than that of Ian Fleming, so his stories read somewhat differently. Nevertheless, he retained Fleming's readers and handed the series over to other writers after illness forced him to abandon it. His books have been translated into more than fourteen languages.

BIOGRAPHY

John Edmund Gardner (not to be confused with literary scholar John Champlin Gardner, Jr., 1933-1982) was born on November 20, 1926, in Seaton Delaval, Northumberland, England. He developed an interest in writing very early and at the age of nine told his father he wanted to be a writer. His progress toward that goal, however, was hardly direct. After wartime service in Britain's Royal Navy in the latter part of World War II and as a commando with the marines in 1946, he graduated from St. John's College, Cambridge University, in 1950. He decided to follow his father into the Anglican priesthood and was ordained in 1953. Meanwhile, in 1952, he married Margaret Mercer, with whom he had two children. Gardner developed doubts about whether he had followed the right calling and eventually left the priesthood in 1958. He then worked as a theater critic and art editor for a Stratford-on-Avon newspaper for six years.

John Gardner. (©1984 Richard Newton)

Gardner came to realize that he wanted to write books of his own rather than to remain a critic. After writing a nonfictional work discussing his alcoholism, he became a mystery novelist. He won popularity immediately with his Boysie Oakes series, but his career did not really blossom until 1981, when he was selected to continue the James Bond series, more than fourteen years after Ian Fleming died. At first, he contracted to write three books to bring Bond into the late twentieth century. However, his contract was repeatedly renewed because of the success of his books. He himself said that Bond was too much of a fantasy character for his liking, but his professionalism carried him through sixteen Bond novels, some of which were novelizations of screenplays.

While writing the Bond novels, Gardner moved to the United States and then to Ireland. However, the onset of cancer in 1995 and the death of his wife in 1997 brought him back to Great Britain. After major surgery, he survived the cancer, and after a gap of some five years, resumed writing. He began a completely new series, set during World War II, with Suzie Mountford, a female police sergeant, as the series lead. He imagined her as a middle-class woman thrown into a world of crime and men by the demands of the war. The first novel of the series, Bottled Spider, was published in 2002. He continued to work hard until 2006, when a serious stroke stopped him from writing once again. He died on August 3, 2007, in Basingstoke, England.

ANALYSIS

Although adept at creating original characters, John Gardner devoted much of his career to mysteries that developed the characters of other detective writers. Ian Fleming's James Bond ranks foremost among those that Gardner used for his own purposes. Bond plays the principal role in two of Gardner's series, the first using the name Boysie Oakes and the second explicitly continuing the original Bond novels. Another character Gardner adopted is Dr. Moriarty, the greatest antagonist of Sherlock Holmes. Not all Gardner's work, however, was variations on themes by other writers. He also wrote a number of espionage novels—one trilogy in particular earned wide recognition because of its detailed picture of life in England during World War II.

Ian Fleming's James Bond novels appealed to audiences in the 1950's in part because of their ruthless but suave and sophisticated hero. Although Fleming took Bond very seriously, certain elements of his stories readily lent themselves to parody. Gardner made apt use of these elements in his Boysie Oakes series, beginning with The Liquidator (1964).

THE BOYSIE OAKES SERIES

In his first Boysie Oakes novel, Gardner paints an easily recognizable character. Oakes, also known as "L," works as a professional killer for the Department of Special Security. Unlike most members of his profession, he fears violence and hires others to do his killing for him. As if this were not enough, Oakes also cannot stand flying. In the Oakes series, which eventually numbered eight novels, the plot usually matches the principal character in absurdity. In Understrike (1965), Oakes—nervous, inept, and forgetful as always—goes on a mission to observe the test of a Russian submarine. The Russians quickly catch on and send a duplicate of Oakes, an agent of their own, to substitute for the real Oakes. As usual, Gardner's hero somehow muddles through.

Many of the Oakes novels illustrate a feature that appears often in Gardner's work. He depicts sexual scenes very graphically. In the Oakes novels, this subject becomes an occasion for humor: Oakes overcomes his habitual indolence for extended exercises in lechery, often with Miss Chicory Triplethrust.

A COMPLETE STATE OF DEATH

Readers who viewed Gardner as a skilled parodist and comic mystery writer soon learned that his talents extended far beyond this rather minor genre. In A Complete State of Death (1969), he introduced Inspector Derek Torry of Scotland Yard. Unlike Oakes, Torry is a very serious character. To him, crime stands as a personal enemy, and he is consumed by his hatred of it. Interrogations often end with Torry losing his temper and slugging his suspects. He does this not because he is cruel but because he becomes too involved. Torry, a conservative Roman Catholic, also finds himself troubled by religious doubts. Some people see in Torry a reflection of Gardner himself. Gardner, however, denied that Torry mirrored his own problems and viewed with hostility attempts to read his novels as autobiography.

Although Gardner intended A Complete State of Death and his other Torry novel, The Corner Men (1974), as comments on criminal violence and its malevolent effects, the author found his taste for the bizarrely humorous difficult to abandon. In the former novel, for example, the plot centers on a school for aspiring criminals run by a character whose manner resembles that of an English university teacher. The aristocratic head of the school is, for all of his apparent good breeding, an agent of the Crime Syndicate who operates with ruthless efficiency.

THE RETURN OF MORIARTY

Gardner soon returned to novels featuring another writer's character. In The Return of Moriarty (1974), Gardner began a popular series that features the main antagonist of Sherlock Holmes. According to Gardner's series, Moriarty, like Holmes, survived their famous showdown at Reichenbach Falls in Switzerland. Moriarty, portrayed as a professor, has returned to London in an effort to control all crime in Europe.

Although the Moriarty novels do not boast the fine character portrayal of the Torry stories, they make evident another key feature of Gardner's work: Gardner took great pains to depict accurately the background for his stories. He showed in his Moriarty series an impressive knowledge of Victorian England. He neglected almost nothing in his efforts toward realism: He knew Victorian criminal slang, for example, and informed the reader what diners in restaurants of the time were likely to order for dinner.

THE WEREWOLF TRACE

With The Werewolf Trace (1977), yet another one of Gardner's interests came into full view. He had a detailed knowledge of World War II, dating back to his own service in the Royal Navy. The horrors of Nazism and the fears that Adolf Hitler aroused among the British people form the backdrop to this novel.

Its characteristically unusual plot concerns a nine-year-old boy who may be a survivor of the last hours of the Third Reich. If so, it is likely that the boy is being groomed for the role of Werewolf, the British code name for the future leader of any attempt to revive the Nazi empire. Although from this description one might suspect that a farce is in the offing, Gardner in fact intended his novel to make serious points. These concern the bad effects of technology, the evils that result from unmanageable obsessions, and the need for privacy. The Werewolf Trace also illustrates Gardner's interest in the occult. The house in which the alleged future Führer lives has been visited by ghosts that have arisen from a mysterious killing of another little boy.

THE KRUGER TRILOGY

Gardner's occultism was not something that he placed in his stories to satisfy a whim. On the contrary, he artfully blended elements of the occult into his works to add to the feeling of mysterious terror. This use of the occult is a principal feature of The Nostradamus Traitor (1979), the first volume of a trilogy whose main character is a German-born British intelligence officer named Herbie Kruger.

Here the occult lies at the center of the novel. As the title suggests, the prophecies of Nostradamus, a sixteenth century French astrologer, serve as the book's leitmotif. They enabled Gardner to tie together events in Great Britain and France in 1940/1941 with later developments in London in the 1970's. Although the connection between Nostradamus and the first Allied agent to penetrate German-occupied France might seem tenuous, in Gardner's skilled hands astrology evoked the eeriness of the Third Reich, through the interest of Hitler and Nazi propagandist Joseph Goebbels in that subject.

Herbie Kruger, the agent featured in The Nostradamus Traitor, was one of Gardner's favorite characters. Gardner carefully depicted his personality in The Garden of Weapons (1980), the second volume of the Kruger trilogy. Kruger is highly nervous, sexually impotent, and in his own eyes a failure. He comes out of his gloom only when listening to the music of his favorite composer, Gustav Mahler. In this novel, the plot, while skillfully woven, takes second billing to the depiction of Kruger. The story is about an espionage network set up in East Berlin that may have been infiltrated by a double agent. In the novel, Kruger recalls his troubled past as a child living in wartime Berlin.

The first two volumes of the trilogy, along with the final volume, The Quiet Dogs (1982), illustrate an aspect of Gardner's work that became increasingly prominent. He offered a detailed picture of the way an espionage agency works. The interplay between the "masters," the leaders of the intelligence agencies who manipulate men like chess pieces, and the agents, who carry out orders without knowing their real purposes, fascinated Gardner. One of his later novels, The Secret Generations (1985), made the mechanics of espionage its chief theme. This work traces a British and an American family, both of which have long-standing connections with the intelligence services of their country, through three generations of involvement in spying.

LICENSE RENEWED

Gardner did not become a real star among mystery writers until License Renewed (1981). He had been selected by Gildrose Publications, which held the copyright to the James Bond novels, to continue Ian Fleming's immensely popular series, and this was his first Bond novel. Gardner's novels in the Bond series won for him a wide audience and celebrity status. His

James Bond differs from Fleming's: Even though he was hired to continue the series, he produced no slavish imitation of the original 007. The new Bond is conscious of Earth's limited resources and carefully avoids using too much gasoline. Also, although Gardner was not writing a parody of Bond, a few Boiesie Oakes details appear from time to time. In License Renewed, a thirty-foot-long python removes the shoes of its victims before eating them, and the story's villains plan to seize an American defense command station by using ice cream to flood the soldiers guarding it.

Many critics did not like the new Bond; although Gardner had generally received good reviews from critics during his career, the Bond novels were an exception. Most of Gardner's critics contended that he had failed to capture the spirit of the true Bond. They found his style too arch and sophisticated, unsuited to the simplicity of Ian Fleming's original. When Gardner attempted to imitate Fleming's style, to some reviewers the result was awkward prose.

This criticism is somewhat surprising. Although Gardner had not concentrated on his style before the Bond series, it had almost always been considered accomplished and engaging. He had shown remarkable skill in the evocation of historical events, and his plotting was highly intricate. If, in the light of his previous success, the criticism of the Bond series surprised Gardner, it is unlikely that it disturbed him very much. Some critics did like the Bond books, and numerous readers did also. Without a doubt, the Bond series brought Gardner much commercial success.

TROUBLED MIDNIGHT

Troubled Midnight (2005), the fourth novel of the Suzie Mountford series, is set, as are all the books in the series, in wartime Great Britain. Shortly before Christmas, 1943, two badly battered bodies are found in a quiet town in southern England. Suzie is assigned the case under Detective Chief Superintendent Tommy Livermore, who is her secret lover. They are joined by an operative from Intelligence, because one of the victims has details of the forthcoming Normandy landings. Gardner thus combines police work with the kind of undercover plot with which he is most at home.

Bill Delaney

Updated by David Barratt

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

BOYSIE OAKES SERIES: The Liquidator, 1964; Understrike, 1965; Amber Nine, 1966; Madrigal, 1967; Founder Member, 1969; Traitor's Exit, 1970; Air Apparent, 1970 (also known as The Airline Pirates); A Killer for a Song, 1975

INSPECTOR DEREK TORRY SERIES: A Complete State of Death, 1969 (also known as The Stone Killer); The Corner Men, 1974

PROFESSOR MORIARTY SERIES: The Return of Moriarty, 1974 (also known as Moriarty); The Revenge of Moriarty, 1975

HERBIE KRUGER SERIES: The Nostradamus Traitor, 1979; The Garden of Weapons, 1980; The Quiet Dogs, 1982; The Maestro, 1993; Confessor, 1995

JAMES BOND SERIES: License Renewed, 1981; For Special Services, 1982; Icebreaker, 1983; Role of Honor, 1984; Nobody Lives Forever, 1986; No Deals, 1987; Scorpius, 1988; Win, Lose, or Die, 1989; Licence to Kill, 1989 (based on screenplay); Brokenclaw, 1990; The Man from Barbarossa, 1991; Death Is Forever, 1992; Never Send Flowers, 1993; Seafire, 1994; Goldeneye, 1995 (based on screenplay); Cold Fall, 1996

SERGEANT SUZIE MOUNTFORD SERIES: Bottled Spider, 2002; The Streets of Town, 2003; Angels Dining at the Ritz, 2004; Troubled Midnight, 2005

GENERATIONS TRILOGY: The Secret Generations, 1985; The Secret Houses, 1987; The Secret Families, 1989

NONSERIES NOVELS: To Run a Little Faster, 1976; The Werewolf Trace, 1977; The Dancing Dodo, 1978; The Last Trump, 1980 (also known as Golgotha); Flamingo, 1983; Blood of the Fathers, 1992 (as McCoy; also known as Unknown Fears)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: The Censor, 1970; Every Night's a Bullfight, 1971 (also known as Every Night's a Festival and The Director); Day of Absolution, 2000

SHORT FICTION: Hideway, 1968; The Assassination File, 1974

NONFICTION: Spin the Bottle: The Autobiography of an Alcoholic, 1963

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Broyard, Anatole. "James Bond Revised." Review of Icebreaker, by John Gardner. New York Times, April 9, 1983, p. 1.17. Negative review of Gardner's continuation of the Bond series. Finds Gardner's prose awkward when compared with Fleming's smooth style.

Bryant, Bobby. "James Bond 00-50: After Half a Century, Novels Are at a Crossroads." Times Union, September 14, 2003, p. J4. This discussion of the James Bond novels after Ian Fleming's death notes that the series was continued first by Kingsley Amis, then Gardner, and finally Raymond Benson (1997-2002). Gardner states that he feels the series should no longer be continued.

Hitz, Frederick P. The Great Game: The Myth and Reality of Espionage. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004. This work contrasts fictional espionage with that in the real world. Although it does not discuss Gardner's work, it does discuss some of Fleming's and sheds light on Gardner's Bond novels.

Melton, Emily. Review of Bottled Spider, by John Gardner. Booklist 99, no. 2 (September 15, 2002): 209. Reviewer finds the first book in the Suzie Mountford series, which is about a serial killer, to be suspenseful and well paced and to provide a good sense of London in World War II.

Wright, David. Review of Troubled Midnight, by John Gardner. Booklist 102, no. 12 (February 15, 2006): 50. Review of the fourth entry in the Suzie Mountford series about the murders of an air-force colonel and his lover finds the work filled with period details. Compares the work to that of Helen MacInnes.

ANDREW GARVE

Paul Winterton

Born: Leicester, England; February 12, 1908

Died: Surrey, England; January 8, 2001

Also wrote as Roger Bax; Paul Somers; Paul Winterton

Types of plot: Amateur sleuth; inverted; espionage; psychological; thriller

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Inspector James, 1948-1951

Hugh Curtis, 1958-1961

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

HUGH CURTIS, a young journalist, is the protagonist in several lighthearted novels under the Paul Somers pseudonym. In competition with a more experienced female reporter on a rival newspaper, he is engaged in some detective work, but his adventures are more noteworthy for their thrills and suspense than for the process of amassing and making deductions from clues.

CONTRIBUTION

In a long career, Andrew Garve produced more than forty books of mystery, detection, thrills, and romance. Difficult to categorize under one heading, he was known not only for his productivity but also for the variety of his themes and settings and his ingenious plots. It has been suggested that he never wrote the same book twice, and although he repeated some of his characters, he never developed the series pattern carried out by many of his fellow writers in this genre. Each of his stories appears to have developed naturally out of its context and the personalities of its characters.

Although Garve uses police characters involved in classic tales of detection, more frequently his hero is a dedicated amateur. The reader identifies with these likable protagonists, sharing in their initial bafflement and participating in their solution of the mystery. A number of Garve's novels were adapted for radio or television, both in the United States and Great Britain, and two were the basis for popular films. Garve died in January, 2001, in Surrey, England.

BIOGRAPHY

Andrew Garve was born Paul Winterton in Leicester, England, on February 12, 1908. His father was a journalist and, for a time, a member of Parliament. Winterton was educated in a number of schools, including Purley County School in Surrey, before going to the London School of Economics. In 1928, he received a bachelor of science degree in political science and economics; soon after, he joined the staff of The Economist. After several years, he moved to the News Chronicle, a London daily. For thirteen years he served as reporter, editorial writer, and foreign correspondent, spending the years 1942-1945 in Moscow.

Winterton had first visited Russia following his graduation, spending the winter of 1928-1929 there. He recounted this experience in his first book, A Student in Russia (1931). Later, having been an eyewitness on the Soviet front during World War II, he wrote Report on Russia (1945) and Inquest on an Ally (1948), the latter a discussion of Soviet foreign policy. His book Mending Minds: The Truth About Our Mental Hospitals (1938) dealt with mental hospitals in England.

In 1938, Winterton wrote his first mystery story, Death Beneath Jerusalem, under the pseudonym Roger Bax. Well received, it launched his career as a writer of crime and mystery fiction. He found a ready public for his efforts in this field, and after the late 1940's he wrote only fiction. He first used the pseudonym Andrew Garve, under which most of his novels have been published, in 1950.

ANALYSIS

The distinguishing mark of Andrew Garve's fiction is its variety. Some of his novels are tales of high adventure with no crime and no real detection. Some are inverted mysteries, told in the first person by a narrator who turns out to be the criminal. Many involve police officers, but not all of these are police procedurals strictly speaking. While many of Garve's novels are not classic mysteries, he proved himself quite adept at the genre. Frame-Up (1964), for example, which concerns an artist's murder and the work of the police in unraveling the crime, is a pure representative of the classic detective story, and has been praised by a number of critics as a flawless specimen of the grand old form. Most of his novels, however, include elements of several plot types, woven together in masterful fashion. With the exception of the short-lived Inspector James and Hugh Curtis series, each of his books stands alone, and even in the three Curtis books there is little carryover beyond the identity of the protagonist.

The settings of Garve's novels are quite as varied as his forms, ranging from London and provincial England to Russia, the Scilly Isles, Africa, Australia, France, the Baltic Sea, the West Indies, Palestine, and the Gulf of Finland. Some of these areas are well known to him through his travels, while in other cases he has relied at least in part on research. Whatever their source, his descriptions are always persuasive and evocative.

In addition to descriptions of exotic locales, Garve's novels often feature informative disquisitions on nautical lore, mountaineering, archaeology, finance, and other favorite topics. Garve is particularly fond of and knowledgeable about the sea, and many of his books reflect that lifelong attachment. In The Sea Monks (1963), vicious young thugs invade a lighthouse and are pitted against its keepers while a hurricane rages outside. A Hero for Leanda (1959) affords greater opportunity for the author to display his knowledge of sailing, with the introduction of a central character who wins his lady by virtue of his navigational expertise. Inland rivers and canals in England also provide settings for Garve novels. The Narrow Search (1957) is the story of a father who kidnaps his daughter from his estranged wife and the new man she has found. The couple's search through the waterways for the missing child is compellingly told, with the drama of the narrative complemented by the unusual setting.

THE RIDDLE OF SAMSON

Despite the variety of his settings and types of plot, Garve's fiction is strongly formulaic. His novel The Riddle of Samson (1954) provides an excellent introduction to his work; it is typical not only of Garve's novels but also of the mystery and detective genre as a whole in its reliance on prefabricated materials.

Like many mystery novels, The Riddle of Samson offers readers a literary allusion in its title. Samson is one of the Scilly Isles, where the story is set; the "riddle" is the mystery to be solved in the course of the novel. Yet the title also alludes to the biblical Samson, who posed the Philistines a riddle so difficult that they could solve it only by coercing his new bride to pry the answer from him. In one sense, the allusion is pointless—as it turns out, there is no connection between the biblical story and the plot of the novel—but it nevertheless serves a function: The mystery novel is a kind of game, and part of the game is the contriving of allusive titles. The reader is immediately on familiar ground.

With his opening sentence Garve sets the tone of his tale: "The day I crossed to Scilly the islanders had just learned that for the first time in their history they were going to have to pay income tax." This is a textbook example of an effective narrative hook: The action is under way, the setting is established, and the reader's curiosity is aroused. The lightly humorous tone suggests that, while the narrative that follows may include crime and violent death, the overall mood of the book will not be somber.

By the second paragraph of the novel, Garve's first-person narrator has acquired an easy familiarity with the reader: "In case you don't know the Isles of Scilly—the 'Fortunate Isles,' as the guidebooks like to call them—they're a cluster of five inhabited islands . . ." What follows is virtually a guidebook summary—location, population, climate, principal products—supplemented a few pages later by a map. Not every reader finds such mini-lectures to his taste, but Garve is only one of many mystery writers who lightly flavor their books with information about all manner of things.

More such information is dispensed as the character of the narrator and protagonist is sketched. He is John Lavery, a twenty-nine-year-old bachelor and university lecturer with a passionate interest in archaeology. As the story begins, he is coming to the Scillies on vacation to do some digging on Samson; a friend is scheduled to join him. While working on Samson he becomes acquainted with a beautiful young woman, Olivia Kendrick, whom he had noticed earlier in the company of her husband, Ronnie, an obnoxious, alcoholic journalist some years older than she. Missing the boat back to the main island, Olivia spends a (chaste) night with John in his tent on Samson. Learning of this, the jealous Ronnie later confronts Olivia and John near a cliff's edge. In a drunken rage, Ronnie strikes John, then staggers and falls to the waves and rocks below—apparently to his death, though his body cannot be found.

The question of what happened to Ronnie is the central "riddle" of Samson, though a secondary mystery is introduced later in the narrative. The police inspector who comes to the island speculates that John and Olivia conspired in the murder of Ronnie. John's friend George, when he arrives, makes a forceful case that Olivia and Ronnie were in league in a scheme to collect on a large insurance policy that he had recently taken out. John must free himself from suspicion; at the same time, he recognizes that he is in love with Olivia and must struggle against George's damning hypothesis.

As noted above, it is characteristic of Garve to combine in one novel elements of several genres or subgenres. The Riddle of Samson features some amateur detection of the classic variety—particularly in John and George's attempt to reconstruct the "crime" through pure ratiocination. The novel also makes substantial use of the conventions of romantic fiction of a type usually associated with female writers: John's immediate attraction to Olivia, his struggle against accepting what seems to be her guilt, their temporary estrangement and ultimate reconciliation—all this is straight from the paperback romance, with the usual gender roles reversed. In addition, The Riddle of Samson, like many of Garve's books, includes an exciting action sequence—this one set in an underwater cave. Such passages show Garve at his most convincing; they have a plausibility that the bits of detection and romance clearly lack.

Garve himself, no doubt, would be quick to acknowledge that much in The Riddle of Samson is implausible if judged by the canons of realism, yet he might add that such criteria are irrelevant to a work that promises no more—and no less—than a deft recycling of familiar conventions.

Anne R. Vizzier

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

INSPECTOR JAMES SERIES (AS BAX): Blueprint for Murder, 1948 (also known as The Trouble with Murder); A Grave Case of Murder, 1951

HUGH CURTIS SERIES (AS SOMERS): Beginner's Luck, 1958; Operation Piracy, 1958; The Shivering Mountain, 1959

NONSERIES NOVELS: 1938-1950 • Death Beneath Jerusalem, 1938 (as Bax); Red Escapade, 1940 (as Bax); Disposing of Henry, 1946 (as Bax); Came the Dawn, 1949 (as Bax; also known as Two If by Sea); No Mask for Murder, 1950 (also known as Fontego's Folly); No Tears for Hilda, 1950

1951-1960 • A Press of Suspects, 1951 (also known as By-Line for Murder); Murder in Moscow, 1951 (also known as Murder Through the Looking Glass); A Hole in the Ground, 1952; Death and the Sky Above, 1953; The Cuckoo Line Affair, 1953; The Riddle of Samson, 1954; The End of the Track, 1956; The Megstone Plot, 1956; The Narrow Search, 1957; The Galloway Case, 1958; A Hero for Leanda, 1959; The Far Sands, 1960; The Golden Deed, 1960

1961-1970 • The Broken Jigsaw, 1961 (as Somers); The House of Soldiers, 1961; Prisoner's Friend, 1962; The Sea Monks, 1963; Frame-Up, 1964; The Ashes of Loda, 1965; Murderer's Fen, 1966 (also known as Hide and Go Seek); A Very Quiet Place, 1967; The Long Short Cut, 1968; Boomerang, 1969; The Ascent of D-13, 1969

1971-1978 • The Late Bill Smith, 1971; The Case of Robert Quarry, 1972; The File on Lester, 1974 (also known as The Lester Affair); Home to Roost, 1976; Counterstroke, 1978

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NONFICTION (AS WINTERTON): A Student in Russia, 1931; Russia—with Open Eyes, 1937; Mending Minds: The Truth About Our Mental Hospitals, 1938; Eye-Witness on the Soviet War-Front, 1943; Report on Russia, 1945; Inquest on an Ally, 1948

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Adrian, Jack. "Obituary: Andrew Garve." The Independent, March 8, 2001, p. 6. Obituary of Garve notes his several pseudonyms and his leftist leanings. Describes his works as suspenseful and diverse in plot and locale.
- Barzun, Jacques, and Wendell Hertig Taylor. "Preface to No Tears for Hilda." In A Book of Prefaces to Fifty Classics of Crime Fiction, 1900-1950. New York: Garland, 1976. Preface by two preeminent scholars of mystery and detective fiction, arguing for the novel's place in the annals of the genre.
- Becker, Mary Helen. "Andrew Garve." In Twentieth-Century Crime and Mystery Writers, edited by John M. Reilly. 2d ed. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1985. Compares Garve to other practitioners of the mystery genre and discusses their unique contributions.

- Horsley, Lee. Twentieth-Century Crime Fiction. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005. Very useful overview of the history and parameters of the crime-fiction genre; helps place Garve's work within that genre.
- Steinbrunner, Chris, and Otto Penzler, eds. Encyclopedia of Mystery and Detection. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1976. Garve's entry in this dictionary of mystery fiction, plays, and cinema includes details of both his literary works and their adaptations to other media.

JONATHAN GASHJohn Grant

Born: Bolton, Lancastershire, England; September 30, 1933

Also wrote as Graham Gaunt; John Grant; Jonathan Grant

Type of plot: Amateur sleuth

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Lovejoy, 1977-

Dr. Clare Burtonall, 1997-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

LOVEJOY (his full name is never given) is an antiques dealer in East Anglia who divides his time unequally between his love for antiques of all description and his love of women. Lovejoy has an unerring ability to recognize genuine antiques; nevertheless, he is usually broke. His charm lies in his fund of knowledge about the artifacts of history, his blithe amorality in matters of antiques dealing and romance, and his quick wit.

DR. CLARE BURTONALL is the investigator in a darker, more hard-boiled series that deals with medical themes and urban settings. She is a physician who joins forces with her lover, the head of an escort agency, to investigate crime.

CONTRIBUTION

Jonathan Gash's popularity as a writer of detective fiction rests primarily with the series of novels featuring the antiques dealer Lovejoy. Plots for the Lovejoy novels usually center on deception, fakery, theft, and murder in the antiques trade, but the particular appeal of the series lies in the charm of their narrator, Lovejoy, and his mine of information about antiques from every period and country. Moreover, he is always willing to interrupt the thread of his narrative to offer a brief lecture on antique dueling pistols or Elizabethan flea-and-louse boxes or how to recognize a genuine antique chair owned by the poet William Wordsworth. He is also informative about creating antique forgeries, probably because he has created so many of them himself. Lovejoy delivers all this information with an appealing combination of technical terminology and dealers' slang.

Lovejoy's attitude toward the wheeling and dealing of the antiques world is cheerfully amoral, as is his attitude toward the numerous women who find their way to his bed in the course of the series. Flippant, cynical, cowardly, defensive, and always in need of money, Lovejoy, the complete antihero, is willing to do almost anything to possess a valuable antique provided it sets off the bell in his midsection that is triggered by finding a genuine article. Nevertheless, he is possessed of a fondness for birds and children. The popularity of his novels led to the creation of a British television series during the 1980's and early 1990's, but television tamed the Lovejoy character and diluted his gamey vigor.

BIOGRAPHY

Jonathan Gash was born John Grant in Bolton, Lancastershire, England, on September 30, 1933. His parents were both mill workers. In 1955, he married Pamela Richard, a nurse. He was educated at the University of London, where he received two bachelor's degrees in 1958 and went on to the Royal College of Surgeons and Physicians. He was licensed as a physician, became a member of the International College of Surgeons, and did further specialized study in pathology and tropical medicine. As a medical student, Gash supported himself by working in several of London's antiques markets, where he learned a great deal about antiques, including how to tell the forgeries from the genuine articles—the knowledge that became the core of the Lovejoy mysteries. Meanwhile, Gash's medical career flourished; he practiced medicine and pathology in London from 1958 to 1962 and clinical pathology in Germany from 1962 to 1965. After three years in the British army's medical corps, he moved to Hong Kong, where he headed the clinical pathology department at Queen Mary Hospital and taught on the medical faculty for the University of Hong Kong. He came to love the city and schooled himself in Chinese language and art—interests that crop up periodically in his detective fiction (each of the Lovejoy novels is dedicated to a Chinese god or ancient such as the god Wei Tuo, who protects “books against fire, pillaging, decay, and dishonest borrowers” according to Gash's dedication in The Judas Pair, 1977).

Gash began writing the Lovejoy novels as a way of finding some relief from his medical career, writing by hand on a commuter train as he traveled to and from work. His first Lovejoy novel, The Judas Pair, won the John Creasey Award for a first crime novel from the Crime Writers' Association. By the late 1980's, the series was so popular that the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) offered him a contract to allow the network to use the Lovejoy novels as the basis for a television series. Busy with the demands of medicine, Gash signed the contract but later found himself unhappy with the television transformation of Lovejoy from the impoverished and amoral antiques dealer and womanizer into a much more respectable character. Nevertheless, the series, which starred Ian McShane, was very popular and ran more than eighty episodes, first on BBC and later in the United States on the Arts and Entertainment (A&E) television network.

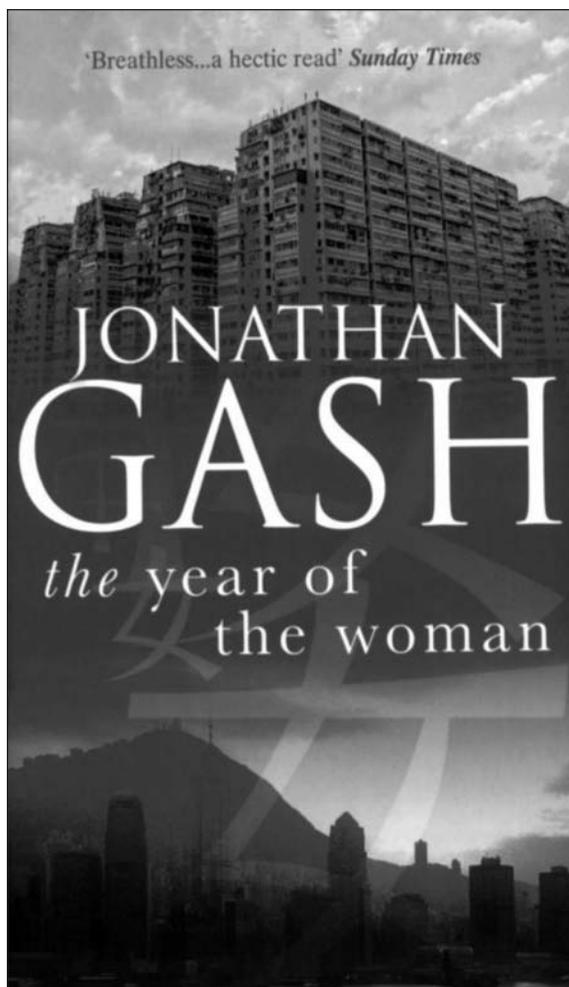

In addition to his mystery fiction, Gash has written other works. He wrote a trilogy of novels—The Shores of Sealandings (1991), Storms at Sealandings (1992), and Mehala, Lady of Sealandings (1993)—under the name Jonathan Grant. The Year of the Woman (2004) is set in Hong Kong just before the return of the Crown Colony to the People's Republic of China. In it, Gash indulges his love for the city and his passion for Chinese culture by using dialogues between the central character, a homeless squatter, and the ghost of her great-great-grandmother (she admits that she does not know exactly how many “greats” ago the ghost woman lived), who drills the woman on traditional Chinese beliefs and customs. Gash's fascination with language is also shown by his essay “The Trouble with Dialect,” which was published in the Journal of the Lancashire Dialect Society in September of 1989.

After his retirement from medicine, Gash introduced the Clare Burtonall series, which allows him to consider medical issues in his fiction. Gash lives with his wife in Colchester, Essex. He has negotiated with a British network for a new Lovejoy series, one in which he would have more control over the way Lovejoy is portrayed in order to capture the qualities—both positive and negative—with which he invested his most notable character.

ANALYSIS

Although plot may be a primary concern in most detective fiction, it is probably not the main appeal of Jonathan Gash's Lovejoy novels. Like other mystery writers, Gash introduces crimes, usually crimes involving the theft or forgery of valuable antiques. Those crimes then lead to one or more murders, and the murders are then solved by Lovejoy, often more by chance than by actual detective work on his part. Reviewers have often noted that Gash's plots are sometimes convoluted and even outlandish and that his solutions are less than believable. However, readers of the series are fans of the character of Lovejoy, a rogue hero given to lying, theft, forgery, and an insatiable fondness for any available women (married or not) with whom he can, in his words, "make smiles." This antihero is always out of money and in debt, lives in squalor (often without electricity when he has been too broke to pay the light bill), and dislikes the countryside. He drives a ridiculously ancient and unreliable car (like his Austin Ruby) when he has any car at all and abandons his lovers whenever he must choose between romance and an antique. Lovejoy has a satiric eye for society's shortcomings (but a complete blindness to his own faults).

With all his failings, however, Lovejoy has several very appealing qualities. One is his inerrant ability to recognize a true antique: That ability, which makes him a "divvie," sets off a chime in his midsection whenever he is near a true example of a Chippendale chair or a piece of genuine jade or a miner's brooch or any one of the myriad other items an antiques dealer might want to own. Beyond that, Lovejoy is vastly knowledgeable about antiques and history, and he never minds interrupting his narrative to offer the reader some amusing information about dealers' pricing codes or the ratio of fakes to genuine antiques (5:1 in East Anglia, he says) or the history of the art of enameling. Lovejoy's information extends to the criminal world as well, and he is equally informative about how to insert a lead cylinder into a chair leg to give it weight that would suggest that it is made of rare woods or how long the smell of linseed oil will linger and give away the true age of a forged painting. The key to Lovejoy's likability is his genuine love for the beautiful things that human beings can create. That is why he prefers towns to the countryside and why he has a deep respect for even the smallest artifacts of the past (and a contempt for the mass-produced plastics of today). It is the cause of his satiric wit, which targets the social pretensions of some of his clients. Something of that same love informs his passion for women; all of them, he says, have some element of beauty in them, even Chemise, the ugly girlfriend of his old friend Tryer who runs a mobile sex museum. Lovejoy also likes babies and faithfully feeds the birds around his cottage. If Lovejoy is violent, he is also very funny.

Lovejoy's contradictory qualities are the cement of each of the novels in the series, but Gash also offers his readers a smorgasbord of other characters, such as Tinker Dill, Lovejoy's scout who finds antiques for him. Perpetually unwashed and ragged, motivated only by his desire for a pound or two to spend on beer, Dill makes Lovejoy look almost respectable. Other notable characters appear in the ranks of antiques dealers, including the gay couple Cyril and Keyveen ("our town's most flamboyant flamers"), the former dressed like a cross between a drum major and a Hussar; and Three-Wheel Archie, who deals in engines and watches and rides a tricycle. Typical of Lovejoy is that he is generally accepting of others' foibles as long as they do not damage the antiques.

THE JUDAS PAIR

Gash's first Lovejoy novel, The Judas Pair, begins when Lovejoy's lovemaking is interrupted by a phone call from Tinker Dill. Responding to his premonition that some lucrative deal is in the offing, Lovejoy pushes his current girlfriend, Shiela, into the bathroom (in later novels he is a bit more gentle with women) and listens to Tinker's story about a buyer for some flintlock dueling pistols. When Lovejoy releases Shiela from the bath, he is puzzled at her anger at being thrown over for a buyer: "Women can be very insensitive to the real problems of existence," he says. The customer wants Lovejoy to find a special pair of pistols, the thirteenth pair that may (or may not) have been made by the famous eighteenth century pistol maker Durs Egg. Lovejoy tells the reader about this after several pages of amusing background on the history of such weapons, but from there on, he is focused on his search, during which Shiela is murdered. As he continues to search for the pistols as well as to find a way to avenge Shiela's death, Lovejoy is nearly a victim himself, caught in his own burning cottage. However, at the end he solves the several crimes his search has uncovered and both finds the pistols and manages to steal them for himself.

THE GRAIL TREE

The Grail Tree (1979), the third Lovejoy mystery, begins with Lovejoy's noting that "Antiques, women and survival are my only interests. It sounds simple, but you just try putting them in the right order." Like The Judas Pair, it opens with Lovejoy's lovemaking, this time, in a tent at a village fair, being interrupted by Tinker Dill who thinks he has found an antique sword.

Following the trail of the sword leads Lovejoy to the Reverend Henry Swan, who believes he has the Holy Grail in his possession. Though Lovejoy has his doubts, he likes the old man, and when Henry is murdered, Lovejoy is once again thrust into the investigation, this time with an assistant in training. As in the first novel, he works by happenstance and intuition and at the end is caught in serious violence from which he manages to escape as he begins an affair with his assistant, who has phoned her mother to reassure her with a lie about going to the Channel Isles. Lovejoy summarizes: "You can't beat a woman for trickery. I don't think they'll ever learn to be honest and fair-minded, like me."

Lovejoy's best investigations take place in his own East Anglia and London, the sources of his lively slang and powerful sense of place. When he ventures to the United States, some of his vigor seems to evaporate, but at home where he can mock the airs of would-be aristocrats and the errors of know-nothing dealers (and buyers) his divvie's bell seems to chime out of his own heart—his passion for passion, whether it creates love affairs or art.

Ann D. Garbett

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

LOVEJOY SERIES: The Judas Pair, 1977; Gold from Gemini, 1978 (also known as Gold by Gemini, 1978); The Grail Tree, 1979; Spend Game, 1980; The Vatican Rip, 1981; Firefly Gadroon, 1982; The Sleepers of Erin, 1983; The Gondola Scam, 1984; Pearlhanger, 1985; The Tartan Ringers, 1986 (also known as The Tartan Sell, 1986); Moonspender, 1986; Jade Woman, 1989; The Very Last Gambado, 1989; The Great California Game, 1991; The Lies of Fair Ladies, 1992; Paid and Loving Eyes, 1993; The Sin Within Her Smile, 1993; The Grace in Older Women, 1995; The Possessions of a Lady, 1996; The Rich and Profane, 1998; A Rag, a Bone, and a Hank of Hair, 1999; Every Last Cent, 2001; Ten Word Game, 2003

DR. CLARE BURTONALL SERIES: Different Women Dancing, 1997; Prey Dancing, 1998; Die Dancing, 2000; Bone Dancing, 2002

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Year of the Woman, 2004

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: The Incomer, 1981 (as Gaunt); The Shores at Sealandings, 1991 (as Jonathan Grant); Storms at Sealandings, 1992 (as Jonathan Grant); Mehala, Lady of Sealandings, 1992 (as Jonathan Grant)

PLAY: Terminus, 1978 (as John Grant)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Fletcher, Connie. Review of Ten Word Game, by Jonathan Gash. Booklist 100, no. 8 (December 15, 2003): 729. A brief review of the novel, stressing the nonformulaic plot and the engaging character of Lovejoy.

Herbert, Rosemary. The Fatal Art of Entertainment: Interviews with Mystery Writers. New York: G. K. Hall, 1994. Gash talks about the limitations of the crime novel and why he decided to write other types of fiction as well.

_____, ed. The Oxford Companion to Crime and Mystery Writing. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999. A useful reference for all detective fiction, but with particularly helpful entries on the arts and antiques milieu, conventions of the genre, and British regionalism.

Hubin, Allen J. "Patterns in Mystery Fiction: The Durabable Series Character." In The Mystery Story, edited by John Ball. Del Mar, Calif.: Publisher's, 1976. A useful general discussion of publishers' requirements for series fiction. Includes a lengthy table of works categorized by character, type, country, and author.

Oleksin, Susan. A Reader's Guide to the Classic British Mystery. Boston: G. K. Hall, 1988. Offers brief plot synopses of some of Gash's earlier novels. Also includes maps and references to other writers with arts/antiques interests.

Ott, Bill. Review of A Rag, A Bone, and a Hank of Hair, by Jonathan Gash. Booklist 96, no. 12 (February 15, 2000): 1088. This brief review discusses the novel's plot and Lovejoy's personality, emphasizing how both mirror the pattern of the series.

Winks, Robin W., ed. Detective Fiction: A Collection of Critical Essays. Englewood Cliffs, N.J.: Prentice-Hall, 1980. Part of the Twentieth-Century Views series, this collection includes some classic discussions of the genre, including examinations of theme and formulas. See especially W. H. Auden's "The Guilty Vicarage," Edmund Wilson's "Who Cares Who Killed Roger Ackroyd?" and John Cawelti's "The Study of Literary Formulas."

WILLIAM CAMPBELL GAULT

Born: Milwaukee, Wisconsin; March 9, 1910

Died: Place unknown; December 27, 1995

Also wrote as Will Duke; Dial Forest; Roney Scott

Type of plot: Private investigator

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Joe Puma, 1953-2003

Brock "the Rock" Callahan, 1955-1992

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

JOE PUMA is a private investigator based in Beverly Hills. He is a tough, hot-tempered Italian and a ladies' man who enjoys playing the field. He has a passionate hatred of criminals but an equally passionate respect for professional honesty and integrity.

BROCK "THE ROCK" CALLAHAN is a private investigator and a former guard for the Los Angeles Rams. He is touchy about his sports past and can be brutish when his reputation as an honest and competent investigator is questioned. Underneath the hulking exterior is a sensitive and compassionate man.

CONTRIBUTION

William Campbell Gault was one of the few writers of detective fiction able to take various motifs from the different pulp magazine genres—sports, mystery, science fiction—and blend them into a distinctive style of his own. Gault's fiction deals with themes of racial, ethnic, and social equality. His most successful fictional character, Brock "the Rock" Callahan, maintains a gruff, no-nonsense demeanor while championing the defenseless.

Gault's style is tough and fast-paced, true to its pulp-magazine genesis, yet he manages to evoke compassion for and understanding of all his characters. Through former football star Callahan, Gault elaborates on the sports credo of fair play, showing how it can be applied to the urban world of manipulators and murderers.

BIOGRAPHY

William Campbell Gault was born on March 9, 1910, in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, the second of three children of John Gault and Ella Hovde Gault. His father was a law school graduate but never practiced law, preferring to dabble in real estate. His mother sold cookware door-to-door and, with the family's savings, later purchased and managed the Blatz Hotel in Milwaukee.

Gault grew up in the Milwaukee suburb of Wauwatosa, where he played some football in high school but reserved most of his enthusiasm for English studies. When he was eighteen, he was married to Julie Barry, and they later had a son, William Barry. In 1929, Gault briefly attended the University of Wisconsin in Madison. During the Depression, he worked as a sole cutter in a shoe factory before comanaging the Blatz Hotel with his mother.

Gault wrote short stories on the side and in 1936 won a fifty-dollar first prize in a short-story contest sponsored by the Milwaukee Journal and the McClure Syndicate. By 1939, he was supporting himself almost entirely from his writing. Eventually, he was divorced from his wife; he maintained custody of his son. In 1942, he married Virginia Kaprelian. The following year, he joined the army; he was assigned to the 166th Infantry and throughout most of his duty was stationed in Hawaii. After his discharge in 1945, Gault toured the West Coast and became enamored of Southern California. Having resumed his writing career, he moved his family (which now included a daughter, Shelly) to Pacific Palisades, a Los Angeles suburb, in 1949.

As the popularity of the pulp magazines declined in the late 1940's and early 1950's, Gault was forced to supplement his income by working for Douglas Aircraft in Long Beach and then later for the post office in Pacific Palisades. However, he continued to write: In a span of eighteen months, he wrote three novels, all published in 1952; Thunder Road, Don't Cry for Me, and The Bloody Bokhara. Don't Cry for Me won the Edgar Allan Poe Award of that year. Following the success of his first three books, Gault was once again able to write full time.

On the advice of fellow mystery writers Ross Macdonald and Michael Collins, both residents of Santa Barbara, Gault and his family moved to Santa Barbara in 1958. Gault continued to write mystery and juvenile sports novels; in the early 1980's, he served as president of the Private Eye Writers of America and was given that organization's Lifetime Achievement Award in 1984. He received a Shamus Award in 1983 for The CANA Diversion (1980). He was given a Lifetime Achievement Award from the Bouchercon World Mystery Convention in 1991. Gault died in 1995, at the age of eighty-five, after completing a final short story. "An Ordinary Man" was published in New Mystery Magazine, a publication he helped found in 1990.

ANALYSIS

During the sixteen years in which William Campbell Gault produced more than three hundred short stories for the pulps, he developed a distinctive voice. Gault took to heart the advice of William Saroyan: "If you can't write well, write fast." Over a period of time, Gault learned to do both. At first, he wrote mainly for the sports pulps. To keep the stories coming and the plots fresh and varied, Gault ventured into other genres—mystery and science fiction—and then began combining genres. Later, he began to address themes of personal concern to him, particularly issues of ethnic and racial prejudice. One of Gault's first recurring characters, for example, was Sandy McKane, a private detective of Hawaiian descent. Other stories dealt with juvenile delinquency, with young, streetwise protagonists with questionable morals who in the end redeem themselves.

As Gault gained confidence as a novelist, he decided to create a series character who would be a vehicle for these concerns. Brock “the Rock” Callahan emerged as one of the most distinctive and fully realized characters in detective fiction. He is a character with a strong moral code, one forged out of his well-documented past. He was born in Southern California and reared in Long Beach; his police officer father was killed by a hoodlum when Callahan was a boy. Callahan attended Stanford University on a football scholarship and was graduated near the top of his class. After college, he joined the army and was involved with the Office of Strategic Services for three years. Subsequently, he signed with the Los Angeles Rams and played guard for nearly a decade, earning awards and accolades for his outstanding achievements. When he retired from football, he chose to open a detective agency in Beverly Hills, believing that his reputation as a star athlete would attract clients and win him friends on the police force.

Callahan is very much aware of the question of his credibility, his ability to perform adequately as a private detective with no real formal investigative training:

Well, what had I brought to this trade? Three years in the O.S.S. and my memories of a cop father. Along with a nodding acquaintanceship with maybe fifty lads in the [Los Angeles Police] Department. That didn't make me any Philip Marlowe.

Work alone wouldn't do it, nor determination; I was a fraud in my chosen profession. So many are, but that didn't make me any more admirable.

What keeps Callahan dedicated to his new profession is his past. He grew up fatherless because of a hoodlum killer. He knows at first hand how crime can devastate the lives of the innocent. He also knows, through years of playing professional football, the importance of being treated equally and fairly, of being judged by one's actions and performance and not by one's social or ethnic background. Callahan feels compelled to apply the sports credo of fair play to his new profession. He wants to protect the lambs from the lions, to make sure that the innocents have a chance to survive despite the manipulators and murderers who pervert society's rules to their own advantage.

Callahan carries the aura of the sports world wherever he goes. It defines him more than any other characteristic. He is linked to his sports past and is proud of it, although he never indulges in sentimental memories. The sports references are used to clarify a point or give a fuller dimension to a character or a situation. Many of Callahan's clients are sports heroes, former teammates, or friends of sports figures, yet rarely is the sport itself used as the central focus of the story, and macho posturing is avoided. Callahan is well aware of the reputation most sports figures have of being brainless hulks. It is almost an obsession with him to shatter the stereotype of the stupid jock; this concern fuels his desire to establish a reputation as a competent and intelligent detective.

Gault, through Callahan, challenges stereotypes, prejudices, and hastily formed judgments. Callahan has a gruff, aggressive manner that usually antagonizes the person he is confronting, whether it be an officer, a client, or a criminal. The tension created through these abrasive confrontations leads to deeper character revelations. Few of Gault's characters can be pigeonholed as true villains—even murderers are often portrayed with some sympathy.

Gault's characters tend to tangle first and to display mutual affection and admiration later. This pattern holds in Callahan's dealings with the police. It is used even more effectively in his relationship with Jan Bonnet. They meet in the first book of the series and immediately develop a prickly fondness for each other. Jan is a strong, independent businesswoman, hardly a lamb in need of protection. She owns and operates her own interior decorating business with a wealthy Beverly Hills clientele. Callahan, smitten by her intelligence, beauty, and no-nonsense approach to life, proposes marriage on several occasions. Jan refuses, however, spouting her disapproval of his profession and his lack of financial sense. She is infuriated by the fact that he is willing from time to time to take on a case free of charge.

DEAD HERO

Although Gault attempts to present Callahan and Jan as equals, a double standard exists: Callahan becomes sexually involved with various women throughout the series, yet it is implied that Jan remains faithful to him. This double standard is vividly illustrated in Dead Hero (1963). Having learned of a friend's wife's infidelity, Callahan expresses outrage to Jan, who replies, "Men—you smug monsters. If a man is unfaithful, he's just a red-blooded live wire to the boys. But if a woman is, she's a tramp. To hell with men and their idiotic world." Callahan explains, "Men and women are different. . . . I mean a man is—emotionally constituted so adultery has less meaning for him; it doesn't degrade him as much as it can a woman."

Yet despite this deeply ingrained attitude, Callahan is open-minded enough to realize that his former teammate is too intolerant of the wife's adulterous behavior. "You know you're in love," Callahan reminds him. "You can't make a career out of being an outraged husband. . . . And remember you're a father as well as a husband. And before you were married you were an All-American blonde-chaser."

As a private detective, Callahan must examine an issue from every angle to get at the truth and solve the mystery. In so doing, Callahan, along with the reader, becomes more tolerant toward behavior that at first seemed repugnant and characters who at first seemed despicable. Callahan's nickname, the Rock, is used ironically. He is tough when he must be, but he is also one of the most tolerant and compassionate of all fictional private detectives.

COUNTY KILL

One of the best books of the series, one that expertly interweaves all Gault's favorite themes, is County Kill (1962). It begins with Callahan's accepting as a client a child, a twelve-year-old runaway who seeks help in finding his father, Skip Lund. Callahan finds Lund, who in turn hires the detective to investigate the murder of one of his business partners. Later, Callahan discovers Lund's business: drug smuggling. The drug dealers, however, prove to be the most noble characters of the story. They are smuggling heroin and distributing it to local addicts at low cost to keep the addicts from committing crimes to support their habit, to help rehabilitate them, and to prevent organized crime from infiltrating the area. Most of the addicts are poor Hispanics.

The strongest character in the book is Juanita Rico, the proprietress of a bar in the poor district of San Valdesto; she is the brains behind the drug operation.

Skip Lund, a man of humble beginnings who has married into a rich family, risks destroying his marriage to help oppressed members of his community. Callahan mixes and sympathizes with both rich and poor: He wants Lund to reunite with his wife so that their son will have a proper upbringing, but he also feels for Juanita Rico and her cause. Eventually, the murders are shown to have nothing to do with drug dealing or social inequality; they are motivated by matrimonial jealousy and infidelity.

THE CALLAHAN SERIES RESUMES

After the publication of Dead Hero in 1963; Gault stopped writing detective stories for seventeen years; in 1980, he resumed the Callahan series. In these later novels, Callahan and Jan are married, his financial problems having been solved by means of an inheritance. They both are retired and have moved to San Valdesto; after a taste of retirement, however, both become bored and resume their careers.

Because he is wealthy, Callahan can now afford to investigate cases without charging any fee and without bringing down Jan's wrath. Private investigation has become for him a hobby instead of a profession, and, as one critic put it, he has become "a relentlessly nice man." Even so, the writing remains tight and the stories well plotted, with compelling themes and well-realized characterizations.

THE CANA DIVERSION

In the first novel of the resumed series, The CANA Diversion, Callahan investigates the disappearance of a former Beverly Hills detective, Joe Puma, a character who had already appeared in his own long-established series. Puma is a tougher, more volatile character than Callahan, more rootless and less predictable. Like Callahan, he hates injustice. He is quick with the sarcastic remark but also quick to apologize. Puma claims to have only two weaknesses: women and food. Essentially, he is Callahan's spiritual twin. Both come off as tough and sarcastic to police, clients, and hoods, but later, as their professionalism and honesty become apparent, they earn admiration from all. In 2003, many of the older Joe Puma stories were collected in The Marksman, and Other Stories.

There is at times a poetic quality about Gault's writing. It springs from his quick pacing, his ability to mix the essential qualities of a good detective story—tension, toughness, a bleary-eyed view of society, and a logically constructed murder plot—with a dignity that is genuine and heartfelt. It is a unique style—poetic pulp—and it makes Gault's contribution to the detective genre an important one.

James Kline

Updated by Janet Alice Long

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

JOE PUMA SERIES: Shakedown, 1953 (as Scott); End of a Call Girl, 1958 (also known as Don't Call Tonight); Night Lady, 1958; Sweet Wild Wench, 1959; The Sweet Blond Trap, 1959; The Wayward Widow, 1959; Million Dollar Tramp, 1960; The Hundred-Dollar Girl, 1961; Marksman, and Other Stories, 2003

BROCK CALLAHAN SERIES: Ring Around Rosa, 1955 (also known as Murder in the Raw); Day of the Ram, 1956; The Convertible Hearse, 1957; Come Die with Me, 1959; Vein of Violence, 1961; County Kill, 1962; Dead Hero, 1963; The CANA Diversion, 1980; The Bad Samaritan, 1982; Death in Donegal Bay, 1984; The Dead Seed, 1985; The Chicano War, 1986; Cat and Mouse, 1988; Dead Pigeon, 1992

NONSERIES NOVELS: Don't Cry for Me, 1952; The Bloody Bokhara, 1952 (also known as The Bloodstained Bokhara); Blood on the Boards, 1953; The Canvas Coffin, 1953; Run, Killer, Run, 1954; Fair Prey, 1956; Square in the Middle, 1956; Death Out of Focus, 1959; Man Alone, 1994

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: 1952-1960 • Thunder Road, 1952; Mr. Fullback, 1953; Gallant Colt, 1954; Mr. Quarterback, 1955; Speedway Challenge, 1955; Bruce Benedict, Halfback, 1957; Dim Thunder, 1958; Rough Road to Glory, 1958; Drag Strip, 1959
1961-1970 • Dirt Track Summer, 1961; Through the Line, 1961; Road-Race Rookie, 1962; Two-Wheeled Thunder, 1962; Little Big Foot, 1963; Wheels of Fortune: Four Racing Stories, 1963; The Checkered Flag, 1964; The Karters, 1965; The Long Green, 1965; Sunday's Dust, 1966; Backfield Challenge, 1967; The Lonely Mound, 1967; The Oval Playground, 1968; Stubborn Sam, 1969; Quarterback Gamble, 1970

1971-1980 • The Last Lap, 1972; Trouble at Second, 1973; Gasoline Cowboy, 1974; Wild Willie, Wide Receiver, 1974; The Big Stick, 1975; Underground Skipper, 1975; Showboat in the Backcourt, 1976; Cut-Rate Quarterback, 1977; Thin Ice, 1978; Sunday Cycles, 1979; Super Bowl Bound, 1980

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Baker, Robert A., and Michael T. Nietzfel. "The Rock-Like Knight: Brock Callahan." In Private Eyes: One Hundred and One Knights—A Survey of American Detective Fiction, 1922-1984. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1985. Critical essay focusing on Gault's best-known detective.

Landrum, Larry. American Mystery and Detective Novels. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood, 1999. An important resource for understanding the development of the genre in the United States. Mentions of Gault are brief but instructive.

Locke, John, ed. Pulp Fictioneers. Silver Spring, Md.: Adventure House, 2004. A fascinating compilation of firsthand accounts of working and writing for the pulp-fiction industry in its heyday. Provides background for understanding Gault.

Steinbrunner, Chris, and Otto Penzler, eds. Encyclopedia of Mystery and Detection. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1976. Given the period of Gault's greatest productivity as a writer, this old but reliable resource is still one of the best places to go for contextualizing his work.

ELIZABETH GEORGE

Susan Elizabeth George

Born: Warren, Ohio; February 26, 1949

Types of plot: Police procedural; psychological

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Sir Thomas Lynley, Earl Asherton, 1988-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

THOMAS LYNLEY, EARL ASHERTON, an inspector at New Scotland Yard, is a tall, blond, strikingly handsome detective. A distinguished graduate of elite schools, he was born into the aristocracy, is privately wealthy and heir to a large estate in Cornwall, but he is totally committed to his work. Like many other detective heroes of fiction, Lynley is a loner and has long been guilt ridden about events that occurred in his personal life.

BARBARA HAVERS, a detective sergeant at Scotland Yard, is skilled and dedicated, but her prickly personality and independent nature prevent her from getting along with her superior officers. In the first book of the series, Havers becomes Lynley's assistant, providing endless contrasts to him in background, appearance, temperament, and class. Uncomfortably conscious of her grammar-school education and working-class accent, she is argumentative and prone to disregard orders. She is defiantly unattractive and often unkempt, making little effort to disguise her slovenly lifestyle. She keeps private her problems at home with her sick parents.

SIMON ALLCOURT ST. JAMES left Scotland Yard to become the most sought after independent forensic scientist in Britain. A friend of Lynley's since childhood, he remains his close confidant and ally. Brilliant, modest, and extremely self-controlled, he is unwilling to blame Lynley for an early automobile accident that left him disabled. St. James, along with his wife, Deborah, are the central investigating figures in A Place of Hiding (2003).

DEBORAH COTTER is the daughter of St. James's butler, who serves as personal caretaker, all-around assistant, and friend. Because of her father's position, Deborah grew up in St. James's home and became an exceptional photographer, often participating in his and Lynley's cases. Although a decade younger than St. James, she has always loved him. However, believing her feelings for St. James were not reciprocated, she became Thomas Lynley's lover before her declaration of love for his friend. Deborah and St. James marry in the first book in the series, but she is Lynley's betrothed in the later novel, A Suitable Vengeance (1991).

LADY HELEN CLYDE was briefly the fiancé of St. James and now works as his forensic assistant. A very self-reliant woman, Helen is the most humorous, adventurous, and daring of the four friends; she has been involved with many men, but she and Lynley marry when they discover their friendship is actually mutual love. She is pregnant with their first child, a son, when tragedy brings an end to the Lynley's marriage.

CONTRIBUTION

Elizabeth George became a major player in the crime writer's world with her first published novel, A Great Deliverance (1988). The book, nominated for the Edgar prize, won Agatha and Anthony awards and Le Grande Prix de Littérature Policière. Although not the first American crime writer to set her novels in the British Isles, George is the only one who so thoroughly captured the details of English life and culture that many British readers of the early novels believed her to be one of them. Knowledge of her nationality came about through interviews and an increasing number of reviews once George's books became best sellers.

In 1988 George began producing novels at the rate of one per year, honing her skills and evolving as a psychological writer. The development of major and minor characters and the changes in their lives as the series progressed have so touched readers that they have expressed strong, even angry opinions about the writer's treatment of these characters, particularly after the publication of With No One as Witness (2005).

Elizabeth George. (© Figge Photography)

The subplots in George's novels usually do not exist simply as red herrings. Ultimately, they emerge as significant connections to the main plot, revealing aspects of characters' past and present. Her subplots explore the English class system and the racial issues and problems that bubble beneath the surface of daily life in Britain.

According to literary critics, some of whom describe George as "doyenne" and "master," she not only carries the torch of earlier great female writers, such as Dorothy L. Sayers and P. D. James, but also has advanced the mystery genre to encompass the realities of modern existence.

BIOGRAPHY

Elizabeth George was born Susan Elizabeth George in Warren, Ohio, and grew up in the San Francisco Bay area. Later, she lived in Orange County in Southern California. While a college student, she met and married Ira Toibin in 1971. Divorced after twenty-four years, she later married Tom McCabe, a retired firefighter. After tiring of the increasing population density in California, they built a home on Whidbey Island, Washington. George has no children.

In preparation for each book, George spends a considerable amount of time in England. She prides herself on getting details right, yet points out that it is not possible to avoid some mistakes. Even though the writing of each novel generally takes about ten months, she estimates that from conception to publication generally takes about two and one half years.

As with most writers, George loved reading from a very early age, although she was not drawn to mysteries until she discovered English mystery novels. Her parents' enjoyment of literature led her to begin writing short stories at the age of seven. Impressed by her daughter's dedication, George's mother gave her a 1930's typewriter. While in high school, George first attempted writing a novel.

All of George's education took place in California, from St. Joseph's Grammar School in Silicon Valley to her first college years at Foothill Community College, followed by graduation from the University of California, Riverside. At the University of California, Berkeley, she took courses to add to her professional credentials, continuing with more classes at California State University, Fullerton, where she earned a degree in counseling/psychology, studies that would later serve her well in her novels. Needing further credentials to teach secondary school, George did more work at the University of California, Riverside. Among her many awards is an honorary degree from California State University, Fullerton.

George taught briefly at Mater Dei High School in Santa Ana, California, but her liberal views and activism in union affairs led to her firing. Portraits in her home of leftist activist César Chávez and Mexican artist Frida Kahlo show a side of George that might surprise readers of her early fiction, with its upper-class British characters. Her later novels, however, sympathetically depict a bitter underclass of the poor and mixed-race inhabitants of Britain.

Although the California courts ordered the Mater Dei school to rehire George and others who had been let go, George was already teaching English at El Toro High, where she remained for thirteen years until A Great Deliverance was published. For a time after George left high school teaching, she taught creative writing in several colleges in the United States, Canada, Scotland, and England.

George once said to a reviewer that writing gives her creative balance. To another, she confided that writing keeps her from feeling depressed. Her pleasure in writing, along with her joy in teaching, has led to her sharing her knowledge about the craft of writing with many others.

ANALYSIS

Elizabeth George's novels are clearly descendants of Golden Age and postwar mystery novels, just as these classic mysteries are evolved from those written by nineteenth century Romantic novelists. However, her novels are distinctly different from the classic mysteries. One example of how George's novels differ is in the nature of the crimes in all of her mysteries. They are violent and shocking, with solutions equally horrifying, yet unforced and logical.

George's Sir Thomas Lynley series has details that remind readers of its forebears in the realm of English mysteries. George likes to make literary allusions, sometimes general, as with her mention of Charles Dickens in a number of her mysteries, but sometimes specific. Early in A Great Deliverance, the first work in the series, Lynley hears church bells like those in Dorothy L. Sayers's The Nine Tailors (1934). George, an admirer of Sayers's work, created Sir Thomas Lynley, Earl Asherton, a figure with a background that is similar to that of Lord Peter Wimsey, Sayers's aristocratic detective hero. In many ways Lynley could have been a character from the Golden Age of British mystery fiction. Both Lynley and Wimsey are members of the upper class and have graduated from Eton and Oxford, where they earned first-class honors. Each has great wealth and worldly experience and has had multiple affairs with women. Each has a memorable mother and a brother who is a possible candidate for a crime. However, Lynley differs from Wimsey, who begins the series as somewhat of a clown, in having an introverted personality and a quick temper. Three-quarters of a century after the much loved and ever popular Golden Age of mystery writing, the detective novel has undergone many other changes. Whereas the cheery Wimsey is an amateur detective, Lynley is a professional with all the rules and regulations that go with his work, and his psyche from the onset is that of a darkly unhappy man with personal demons.

George, like all superior novelists, with each novel improves her writing. She strengthens the maturing protagonists, shaping them into believable human beings and making their dialogue less trivial as their daily lives become more realistic. Her readers have appreciated the changes, becoming further engrossed in the events that affect the characters.

A GREAT DELIVERANCE

Elizabeth George's first novel, A Great Deliverance, is an impressive prize winner. The novel opens in London, but the scene soon shifts to the exquisite but desolate Yorkshire countryside, where Roberta Tey, a young farm woman, has confessed to the beheading of her father. Because of the lack of significant evidence, Roberta's confused mental state and incarceration in an asylum, and the refusal of her friends and neighbors to accept the possibility of her guilt, a difficult and complex investigation ensues. As Lynley and Havers search for the truth, many long-hidden secrets of the quiet, bucolic community are revealed. The final pages establish a pattern in George's novel: They seldom end happily.

In 2001 the Public Broadcasting Service (PBS) broadcast a British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) film version of A Great Deliverance in the United States.

WELL-SCHOOLED IN MURDER

The third Lynley mystery, Well-Schooled in Murder (1990), was also made into a film by the BBC and shown in the United States on PBS. The film has many disturbing details, but the book is even grimmer. Here, as in her introductory novel, George tears aside the curtain that hides aberrant behavior, violence, and sexual cruelty. Once more, the setting is an isolated community, but in this instance it is a private school for upper-class boys, along with a few token scholarship students. Although lip service is paid to the training and discipline of the students, breaking of the rules is common. Some faculty members have secrets that they are concerned will come to light, so bullies take advantage of their weakness and gain control over other students. The administrators do not want to know about drugs, beatings, or sexual intimidation because their priority is maintaining endowments and enrollment. Lynley becomes involved through a friend's request when one of the scholarship boys goes missing. Betrayal, murders, and suicide follow.

A SUITABLE VENGEANCE

George's fourth mystery, A Suitable Vengeance, provides a valuable backdrop for a number of the Lynley stories. The novel reveals the history of the major protagonist, Detective Inspector Lynley, his alienation from his mother and younger brother, and his reluctance to visit the family estate in Cornwall, his birthplace. Although the introductory segments of the story are set in London, the crucial part of the novel takes place in Cornwall. George describes in full detail the magnificent Jacobean house, the outbuildings, dairy farms, agricultural areas, church, and stables that make up the grounds of the Asherton holdings, alongside the Atlantic ocean. Flying his own plane, Lynley brings his party of guests to his ancestral home for a celebration of his engagement to Deborah Cotter. The engagement is broken off as events unfold. Inasmuch as the first novel described Deborah's wedding to St. James, it is clear that George's concern is greater expansion of her characters' lives rather than creating a linear, chronological tale.

WITH NO ONE AS WITNESS

Written fourteen years after A Suitable Vengeance, With No One as Witness provides a pivotal change of direction in George's work. George turns her attention, in this and the novel that follows, to people and places in London that resemble the nineteenth century world of Dickens. Problem boys, some who have been in prison, mostly poor and uneducated, are required to attend a school ironically called Colossus. Many of the faculty have questionable credentials and little interest in the boys. The school is located not far from a ragtag, covered flea market frequented by characters who could have come from the unsettling paintings of fifteenth and sixteenth century Dutch painter Hieronymus Bosch. Both the school and the market as well as the shabby nearby neighborhoods are venues for thieves, pedophiles, pimps, and murderers. A serial killer of young boys, an ambitious police supervisor, and an amoral reporter bring Lynley and Havers into an investigation that leads to unforeseen tragedy.

WHAT CAME BEFORE HE SHOT HER

What Came Before He Shot Her (2006) does not feature the investigative work of Lynley, although Havers appears briefly near the end of the book. This work is inextricably linked to With No One as a Witness because of the crime that occurred; yet, it can hardly be deemed a mystery. The reader knows what the end will be, and that knowledge makes the tragedy more grievous.

Most of the individuals in the story are of mixed race, poor, and generally uneducated. Many are children of immigrants, the colonial inheritors of Britain's empire, unwanted citizens. The story is set in a section of London so different from the familiar areas of George's fiction that it seems a totally unknown world. Many of the inhabitants living in the slums of North Kensington have never been to the areas of London familiar to much of the civilized world.

Drugs are sold and distributed by gangs and crime lords who control the streets. Rape is common. An ineffective and corrupt police force metes out its own form of justice, in a pitiless and crushing system. In the miasma of failure and doom that encloses the plot, the reader fears there is no hope for the three children who are central to the story. They are abandoned by their feckless grandmother on the doorstep of her daughter, their well-intentioned aunt. However, neither she nor a few kind members of the community can save the children from a fate that has been determined by earlier events.

As if in a Greek tragedy, the final segment of the novel is a recapitulation and enlargement of scenes from the previous novel: Deborah St. James and Helen Lynley arrive at the Lynley home after a shopping trip in preparation for the birth of the Lynley baby. There a fatal shooting occurs, and the preordained calamity plays out.

Helen S. Garson

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

SIR THOMAS LYNLEY, EARL ASHERTON SERIES:
A Great Deliverance, 1988; Payment in Blood, 1989; Well-Schooled in Murder, 1990; A Suitable Vengeance,

1991; For the Sake of Elena, 1992; Missing Joseph, 1993; Playing for the Ashes, 1995; In the Presence of the Enemy, 1996; In Pursuit of the Proper Sinner, 1999; A Traitor to Memory, 2001; With No One as Witness, 2005; What Came Before He Shot Her, 2006

NONSERIES NOVELS: Deception on His Mind, 1997; A Place of Hiding, 2003

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

SHORT FICTION: The Evidence Exposed, 1999; I, Richard, 2002

NONFICTION: Write Away: One Novelist's Approach to Fiction and the Writing Life, 2004

EDITED TEXTS: Crime from the Mind of a Woman, 2002; A Moment on the Edge: One Hundred Years of Crime Stories by Women, 2004

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Brown, Jeremy K. "George, Elizabeth." Current Biography 61, no. 3 (March, 2000): 59-64. A biography of George that looks at her development as a person and a writer.

Burns, Landon C. "Elizabeth George." In Great Women of Mystery: Classic to Contemporary, edited by Kathleen Gregory Klein. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994. An essay about George six years into her novelistic career. An introductory essay by the editor speaks of the characteristics of George's predecessors.

De Witt, Philip Elmer. Review of What Came Before

He Shot Her, by Elizabeth George. Time, October 23, 2006, 88. Reviewer of the book finds it an impressive change, brilliant and refreshing.

Dubose, Martha Hailey, with Margaret Caldwell Thomas. Women of Mystery: The Lives and Works of Notable Women Crime Novelists. New York: St. Martin's Minotaur, 2000. Contains a brief entry on George that describes her works.

George, Elizabeth. Elizabeth George. <http://www.elizabethgeorgeonline.com>. The author's Web site provides a short biography of the author, plus information on her novels and upcoming events.

_____. "Plot Twist Murder on Author's Fans." Interview by Ben Fox. Palm Beach Post, April 11, 2005, Style section, p. 3. Lengthy interview with the novelist discussing her beginnings and recent reactions of readers to With No One As Witness.

_____. Write Away: One Novelist's Approach to Fiction and the Writing Life. New York: Harper-Collins, 2004. George discusses her approach to writing fiction, which includes disciplining herself to sit and write.

Klein, Kathleen Gregory, ed. Great Women Mystery Writers: Classic to Contemporary. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994. Contains an essay discussing the life and works of George.

Lindsay, Elizabeth Blakesley, ed. Great Women Mystery Writers. 2d ed. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2007. Contains an essay on George and her writing.

TESS GERRITSEN

Born: San Diego, California; June 12, 1953

Also wrote as Terry Gerritsen

Types of plot: Police procedural; thriller

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Jane Rizzoli and Maura Isles, 2001-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

DETECTIVE JANE RIZZOLI makes her first appearance in The Surgeon (2001). Assertive and even pugnacious, the thirty-three-year-old Rizzoli, who transferred to the Homicide Division some six months earlier from Vice and Narcotics, is beginning to make her mark as a persistent investigator. She has a fierce appearance, with brown hair and an unflinchingly direct gaze.

DR. MAURA ISLES, a new medical examiner recently arrived in Boston from California, appears in the second Rizzoli book. At first mutually wary, Rizzoli and Isles find themselves working closely together to solve a baffling sequence of apparently related murders. The subsequent novels in the series feature both women and trace the evolution of their teamwork from mutual respect toward true friendship as each woman learns more about the other's life and background.

CONTRIBUTION

Trained as a physician, Tess Gerritsen began writing fiction while on maternity leave from her medical practice. Her first novels, published in the 1980's, were suspense romances, most of them bearing the Harlequin imprint. More than a decade later, a chance conversation with a police officer about organ transplants and Russian mobsters led to the creation of Harvest (1996), first in a line of nonseries medical thrillers that readers and reviewers compared favorably to the work of writers such as Robin Cook, Michael Crichton, and Michael Palmer. Tess Gerritsen's fifth medical thriller, The Surgeon, was the first to feature Detective Jane Rizzoli, who, in The Apprentice (2002), would be joined by medical examiner Dr. Maura Isles, along with a cast of continuing secondary characters including Rizzoli's parents and brothers. As the Rizzoli and Isles series grew and developed, Gerritsen arguably broke new ground in crossover fiction, successfully blending the police procedural and the medical thriller, with trace elements of the romance novels with which her career began. Gravity (1999), the last of the nonseries medical thrillers, approaches science fiction, although Gerritsen was quick to remind readers that it was firmly based on solid science. Throughout the Rizzoli and Isles series, it is Jane Rizzoli who tends to dominate the action, separating Isles from such fictional medical examiners as Patricia Cornwell's Kay Scarpetta or Kathy Reichs's Temperance Brennan.

BIOGRAPHY

The writer and physician Tess Gerritsen was born Tess Tom on June 12, 1953, to Ernest Tom, a second-generation Chinese American restaurateur in San Diego, California, and his China-born wife, Ruby Tom. A 1975 graduate of Stanford University, where she majored in anthropology, Tess Tom attended medical school at the University of California Medical Center in San Francisco. She married fellow physician Jacob Gerritsen, a native of Hawaii, in 1977, and received her medical degree in 1979. Interested in writing since childhood but encouraged by her parents to choose a more lucrative profession, Tess Gerritsen began writing romantic suspense novels while on maternity leave from the practice of internal medicine in Hawaii.

Tess Gerritsen. (© Sigrid Estrada)

In 1990, the Gerritsens and their two young sons moved to the American mainland, eventually settling in Camden, Maine, where Jacob established a private medical practice while Tess, basically retired from medicine, pursued her career as a writer, also enjoying such hobbies as gardening and the Celtic fiddle. By 2003, Jacob Gerritsen had retired from active practice, enjoying his own hobby of sailing while serving as president of the Maine Medical Association. Tess Gerritsen, meanwhile, had teamed up with Michael Palmer to offer annual workshops for would-be novelists in the medical profession. In 2006, Gerritsen won the Nero Wolfe Award for Vanish (2005), which was also nominated for an Edgar Award.

ANALYSIS

By 1996, Tess Gerritsen had joined fellow physician-writers Robin Cook and Michael Palmer in the emerging field of the medical thriller, mining recent developments in medical and technological research in search of frightening possibilities for fictional development. The unprecedented success of Harvest created a ready audience for the three novels to follow, also featuring strong female physicians as principal characters. Like Cook's Coma (1977), Harvest deals with a black market in human organs; in Harvest, however, the mobsters are Russian and one of the American conspirators is quite literally in bed with the increasingly inquisitive young doctor who nearly loses her own life at the hands of her supposed lover, with her liver to be transplanted, as soon as she uncovers the conspiracy. Like Cook, Gerritsen seeks out and exploits the most frightening possibilities, from bioterrorism and mad cow disease to teen violence sparked by a meningitis epidemic.

With The Surgeon, at first glance merely the fifth of her medical thrillers, Gerritsen moved to merge medical thriller with police procedural as her focus shifted from prions and microbes to psychopaths and serial murderers. At first, the central character appears to be Dr. Catherine Cordell, a surgeon who has recently moved to Boston from Georgia in the aftermath of a brutal attempt on her life during which she shot and killed her assailant. As the novel begins, Dr. Cordell is less than pleased to be confronted by homicide detectives Thomas Moore and Jane Rizzoli, who are pursuing possible connections between a current spate of rape-murders in the Boston area and the attack in Georgia more than two years earlier. After all, she reasons, the man is dead and she can prove as much.

Rizzoli, however, proves to have the tenacity of a bulldog as she pursues leads that point to a copycat or perhaps a disciple of the dead killer.

Cordell falls slowly and cautiously in love with Detective Moore, whom she will eventually marry. Gerritsen, meanwhile, was laying the groundwork for a new fictional universe centered in Boston and featuring the mercurial Jane Rizzoli: "She wore grim dark suits that did not flatter her petite frame, and her hair was a careless mop of black curls. She was who she was, and either you accepted it or you could just go to hell." Gerritsen's subsequent novels would follow Rizzoli through a series of adventures and interactions with a variety of continuing characters. In The Apprentice, Dr. Ashford Tierney, the aging medical examiner featured in The Surgeon, has retired after choosing his own successor, a rather mysterious still-young woman by the name of Maura Isles. Within a year after assuming the position, Dr. Isles has become known to law enforcement and the press as the Queen of the Dead, owing not only to her line of work but also to her pale skin, black hair and dress, red lipstick, and calm demeanor. All that is known of her background at that point is that Tierney hired her away from a faculty position at Gerritsen's own alma mater, the University of California's San Francisco campus.

The Apprentice also marks the first appearance of Special Agent Gabriel Dean, Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), who arouses Rizzoli's ire by invading her turf with an investigation in progress, claiming intersection with a case of his own. Another recurring character making a debut is Dr. Joyce O'Donnell, a forensic neuropsychiatrist who has grown rich and perhaps infamous as an expert witness for the defense of serial killers. Indeed, it is O'Donnell's bizarre fascination with her subjects that causes Rizzoli and Dean to start working as a team, instead of acting as adversaries.

As the Rizzoli and Isles series progresses and develops, readers learn that Isles has left not only her job but also her marriage to Victor Banks, a physician practicing with a worldwide charity known as One Earth. A strong mutual attraction reaching its peak at the end of The Apprentice leaves Rizzoli bearing FBI agent Dean's child, with a proposal and marriage to follow. O' Donnell, meanwhile, will pursue her morbid fascination with serial killers until she herself is murdered, and Isles, still recovering from a brief reunion with Victor Banks, will find herself strongly, and repeatedly, attracted to a Roman Catholic priest named Daniel Brophy. Throughout the series, the lives and careers of Rizzoli and Isles continue to overlap and interact, providing two distinct viewpoints for Gerritsen's third-person narrative.

In several of the novels, Gerritsen inserts sections of first-person narrative, often in italics and most often to convey the inner musings of a perpetrator. Chilling in effect, such passages approach the inverted mystery model but are offset by the balanced narrative of the two female protagonists. In Body Double (2004), Isles, who knows only that she was adopted, finds herself examining the body of the twin from whom she was separated at birth, beginning an investigation that leads both Isles and Rizzoli down a twisted path of depravity, with their nemesis O'Donnell savoring each new discovery. Thereafter, Isles will have to live with the knowledge that she was born to the near-incestuous union of two murderers who happened to be first cousins. In The Mephisto Club (2006), Gerritsen carries the notion of the "bad seed" even further, tracing its origins back at least as far as the apocryphal Book of Enoch and its description of the Nephilim, "fallen angels who mated with human women." On balance, The Sinner (2003) and Vanish (2005) are the weakest of the Rizzoli and Isles novels: Overplotted to the point of implausibility, they serve mainly to help author and reader alike in "connecting the dots" that link both women's lives.

THE APPRENTICE

In The Apprentice, with Warren Hoyt, the serial killer known as the Surgeon, safely behind bars, Jane Rizzoli and her fellow detectives find themselves tracking an apparent copycat. Unlike Hoyt, however, who murdered women alone at home, the new perpetrator appears to target couples, binding the husbands and forcing them to watch the torture of their wives before killing the men. The wives have all vanished, leaving the husband's corpse as evidence that crimes have been committed. After consultation with forensic psychologist Lawrence Zucker, the police conclude that Hoyt, although imprisoned, must somehow be involved. Rizzoli, still damaged emotionally and physically from her close brush with death at Hoyt's hands, refuses to let go of the case, even when encouraged to do so by her fellow detectives and by Gabriel Dean, an FBI agent with an agenda of his own that he is not about to reveal. Working closely with Isles, recently arrived to replace Dr. Tierney as medical examiner, Rizzoli delves deeper into the realm of psychopathology as, midway through the crime spree, Hoyt manages a brazen escape from prison by faking a ruptured appendix, leaving three medical personnel and a prison guard dead in his wake.

Hoyt, meanwhile, has kept up a correspondence with forensic neuropsychiatrist Joyce O'Donnell, who coaxes him into revealing his innermost musings and secrets. Unlike Rizzoli, Dean is well acquainted with O'Donnell, having witnessed her expert testimony several times from the other side of a courtroom. With Hoyt on the loose and apparently teamed up with his apprentice, Dean sets up a meeting in Washington, D.C., between Rizzoli and Dean's own apparent mentor and fellow former marine, Senator Conway. The federal agenda, it seems, stems from a suspicion that the second killer, nicknamed the Dominator, is a deep-cover rogue agent, perhaps military special forces, who honed his murderous skills during the conflict in Kosovo, where Dean first encountered samples of his handiwork. Before leaving Washington, Rizzoli spends the night with Gabriel Dean; on her return to Boston, she is met by a limousine that turns out to be the trap that Hoyt and his accomplice have set for all of his victims. Bound and gagged and stuffed into the trunk of the limo, Rizzoli has just enough time to snag her bonds on a protruding screw, free herself, and retrieve her gun from her overnight bag.

When the driver opens the trunk, Rizzoli blows his head away and then fires on Hoyt, who has come down the driveway to help his disciple. It is clear to both that her first shot, to his spinal cord, will leave him paralyzed for life, and after a brief hesitation, she decides not to finish him off. He remains, however, able to talk if not to walk, and to conduct interviews with his new friend, Dr. O'Donnell.

BODY DOUBLE

In Body Double, after returning from a conference in Paris, medical examiner Maura Isles is surprised to find her home surrounded by police—who are in turn surprised, believing that they have seen a ghost. Inside a car parked nearby lies the body of a woman who, in time, will turn out to be Isles's twin, from whom she was separated soon after birth. In Body Double, Gerritsen moves beyond serial killers to explore the nature of evil as Isles proceeds to search for her origins. The dead woman, it seems, had recently been on the run from her former employer and lover Dr. Charles Cassell, a rich and powerful pharmaceutical executive with high control needs. It is Jane Rizzoli, by this time extremely pregnant, who puts Isles in touch with Rick Ballard, a detective from the suburb of Newton who had been helping the woman evade her stalker. Like Isles, the woman now known as Anna Leoni had been a scientist, a microbiologist with Castle Pharmaceuticals.

As Rizzoli investigates Cassell, Isles heads for Maine, where Leoni had fled, not only to escape Cassell but also to search for clues as to her own origins. Joined by Ballard, who is still seeking the cause of Leoni's death, Isles finds herself helping local police identify skeletal remains found in the area. Approaching the truth from opposite directions, Rizzoli and Isles gradually uncover a criminal conspiracy stretching back decades, involving the abduction and murder of pregnant women, followed by the sale of their newborns to couples willing to pay exorbitant prices. The apparent mastermind, Amalthea Lank, now serving a life sentence for double homicide, turns out to be the birth mother of both Isles and Leoni, who may well have been the first babies sold. Lank is also a patient of O'Donnell, whom Isles is about to meet for the first time, against the advice of Rizzoli. O'Donnell alerts Isles to the possibility of an accomplice, presumably a man. "Insanity doesn't interest me. Evil does," says O'Donnell. Soon Isles must face the fact that she is descended from monsters, and that Lank's accomplices were first her father, now dead, and then her brother.

Leoni's murder, meanwhile, has nothing to do with her family and everything to do with Rick Ballard, who admits to having fallen in love with Leoni and now appears to be falling in love with her twin sister. The killer turns out to be Ballard's estranged wife, herself a police officer, "I killed you once," she tells Isles, after killing Rick Ballard. "Now I have to do it all over again." Before Carmen Ballard can squeeze off another shot, she is brought down by Rizzoli, who has followed her own leads to trace the killer's identity. It appears that Leoni, having pursued her own research with Ballard's help, had come to meet her sister, Isles.

THE MEPHISTO CLUB

The concept of human beasts and monsters, brought to the surface in Body Double, is further explored in The Mephisto Club, in which Gerritsen displays a continued interest and expertise in anthropology, her undergraduate academic major. At issue is the question of evil, as expressed across cultures by myth, legend, and religious practice. The Mephisto Club draws in part on the apocryphal Book of Enoch, an ancient text that describes creatures variously known as Nephilim, watchers or giants, hybrid monsters fathered by fallen angels with human mothers. At the center of the mystery is Montague Saul, a long-dead anthropologist whose surviving family members, if they can be found, may well hold the key to a grisly series of ritual murders that have drawn the attention of Jane Rizzoli, Maura Isles, and, perhaps inevitably, Joyce O'Donnell. It is through O'Donnell that Rizzoli and Isles learn of a clandestine society known as the Mephisto Club, which Rizzoli and Isles suspect of practicing witchcraft. Its founder and leader is Anthony Sansone, a history professor retired from Harvard and possessed of enormous wealth. He explains to a skeptical Isles that he is descended from Monsignore Antonino Sansone, a monstrous sixteenth century Italian priest, and a noblewoman whom the priest had tortured and executed as a heretic after delivering the baby that he himself had fathered. That child, known as Vittorio, was the patriarch of the current Sansone line, who have adopted as their motto "Deliver us from evil." As for the Mephisto Club, Rizzoli and Isles cannot decide whether they are on the side of the devil or that of the angels. Then the club members start falling victim to a killer who leaves cabalistic clues and inscriptions at the crime scenes, along with evidence of mutilation or dismemberment. O'Donnell is among the first of the new victims, and the identification of a severed hand not far from Norwich in central New York sends Rizzoli and Isles westward in search of further evidence tying their first victim to her killer. By then, the two women are barely speaking, Rizzoli having correctly guessed that Isles has slept with Father Daniel Brophy. Rizzoli has recently learned of her own parents' impending divorce after nearly forty years of marriage: Her father is having an affair, and her mother has begun flirting with Vince Korsak, a recently retired detective whom Rizzoli has never really liked. By now, however, Rizzoli is happily married to Gabriel Dean and the mother of Regina, who seems to have inherited her mother's feisty temperament.

Arriving in upstate New York, Rizzoli and Isles find themselves dealing with another sort of inheritance: Some twelve years earlier, three members of the Saul family died within weeks of each other and two others disappeared, never to be seen again. The Sauls' daughter Lily and her cousin Dominic, Montague's son, were both adolescents at the time. Were one or both guilty of a crime in the supposed accidents and suicide twelve years before? Lily Saul, believing that she murdered Dominic after proving that he murdered her parents and brother, has kept a low profile ever since the deaths but has lately come to suspect that Dominic has come back to life and has been stalking her with murder and revenge in mind. Two of the murdered women, one in Boston and one in New York, were Lily's childhood friends. Anthony Sansone, meanwhile, manages to locate Lily in Italy, thanks to his contacts in Interpol. Back in Boston, Lily denies any knowledge of what became of her cousin; under Rizzoli's withering gaze, she eventually confesses to his murder, sending Rizzoli back to New York with Lily in tow, in search of the submerged car containing Dominic's body. The car, belonging to Lily's mother, is exactly where Lily remembered sinking it, but there is no body. Somehow, Dominic escaped and is now seeking his revenge. A final confrontation in the mountains of New Hampshire brings Lily, Rizzoli, Isles, and survivors of the Mephisto Club face to face with Dominic and his mother, who initiated him into the ancient rituals and later infiltrated the Mephisto Club under an assumed name. As in The Apprentice and Body Double, Rizzoli brings the action to a swift, if melodramatic, conclusion with one lucky bullet.

David B. Parsell

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

JANE RIZZOLI AND MAURA ISLES SERIES: The Surgeon, 2001; The Apprentice, 2002; The Sinner, 2003; Body Double, 2004; Vanish, 2005; The Mephisto Club, 2006; The Bone Garden, 2007

NONSERIES NOVELS: Adventure's Mistress, 1985; Love's Masquerade, 1986; Call After Midnight, 1987; Never Say Die, 1990; Under the Knife, 1990; Whistle Blower, 1992; Three Complete Novels: "Presumed Guilty," "Whistleblower," "Never Say Die," 1992; Presumed Guilty, 1993; Peggy Sue Got Murdered, 1994; In Their Footsteps, 1994; Thief of Hearts, 1995; Keeper of the Bride, 1996; Harvest, 1996; Life Support, 1997; Bloodstream, 1998; Gravity, 1999; Perfect Timing, 2001

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Heatware, 1998 (with Barbara Delinsky and Linda Lael Miller); Impulse: Three Complete Novels, 1999 (with Delinsky and Linda Howard); Something to Hide, 1999 (with Lynn Erickson); Take Five, Volume Four, 2001 (with Mary Lynn Baxter and Annette Broadrick); Unveiled, 2002 (with Stella Cameron and Amanda Stevens); Family Passions, 2002 (with Delinsky and Jayne Ann Krentz); Double Impact, 2003 (with Debra Webb)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Anderson, Patrick. The Triumph of the Thriller: How Cops, Crooks, and Cannibals Captured Popular Fiction. New York: Random House, 2007. An examination of the category of thriller, which helps the reader place Gerritsen with some of her contemporaries.

Desner, Lisa M. The Female Investigator in Literature, Film, and Popular Culture. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2007. Discusses female protagonists in modern detective fiction and films. Provides a sense of how Gerritsen's Rizzoli and Isles fit into the larger picture.

Gerritsen, Tess. "PW Talks with Tess Gerritsen." Interview by Steve Anable. Publishers Weekly 253, no. 31 (August 7, 2006): 28. Short interview with Gerritsen delves into her beliefs about the nature of evil.

_____. Tess Gerritsen: Official Site of the New York Times Bestselling Author. <http://www.tessGerritsen.com>. Official Web site contains many useful features, including reviews, reminiscences and reflections on writing; includes author's own blog, begun in 2005.

Mehegan, David. "Death Becomes Her: Author's Grisly Novels Thrill Women." Boston Globe, September 2, 2006, p. E1. Profile of Gerritsen describes the blood and gore in her novels, which feature female protagonists and are enjoyed by female readers. The author describes her motivations for writing.

WALTER B. GIBSON

Born: Germantown, Pennsylvania; September 12, 1897

Died: Kingston, New York; December 6, 1985

Also wrote as Andy Adams; Ishi Black; Harry Blackstone; Douglas Brown; C. B. Crowe; Wilber Gaston; Walter Brown Gibson; Maxwell Grant; Harry Herschfield; Maborushi Kineji; Rufus Perry; Howard Thurston

Type of plot: Master sleuth

PRINCIPAL SERIES

The Shadow, 1931-1963

Norgil, 1937-1940

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

THE SHADOW is a mysterious figure in black, a master of illusion, whose keen mind is able to fathom the most deeply hidden secrets. A law unto himself, he heads an organization dedicated to fighting crime. His real identity is Kent Allard, flier-adventurer, but he most often appears as socialite Lamont Cranston.

NORGIL, whose real name is Loring, is a professional stage magician with a penchant for solving mysteries. Borrowing the public persona of the great figures of prestidigitation of the day, he uses his knowledge of their trade—misdirection and illusion—to find answers to problems he encounters during his performances.

CONTRIBUTION

Walter B. Gibson brought to the mystery novel a consistent sense of illusion. Misdirection is combined in a spiritual and symbolic way as well as in specific terms. Nothing is what it appears to be on the surface, and anyone can be revealed at the end as the guilty party. The greatest mystery of all, however, concerns the identity and origins of the detective himself. The mysterious cloaked avenger known as the Shadow has a dispassionate approach to crime fighting, which to him is much like an intellectual puzzle or a game of chess. Gibson works toward achieving an effect as he manipulates his audience. Each novel in the series is not merely another unit in a saga, interchangeable with its mates, but part of an evolving account of the career of the hero. The Shadow has become a symbol of what "mystery" itself should be and of that part of the story that is most fascinating because it is never solved. Even the revelations in the story "The Shadow Unmasks" did not spoil the ending.

BIOGRAPHY

Walter Brown Gibson was born on September 12, 1897, in Germantown, Pennsylvania, the son of Alfred Cornelius Gibson and May Whidden Gibson. His father was a manufacturer of gas fixtures. The name Maxwell Grant, under which Gibson created the Shadow writings, was derived from the names of two magic dealers whom he knew. Attracted to magic from childhood, Gibson published stories and puzzles at an early age. Former President William Howard Taft praised a story for which Gibson won a literary prize, predicting that he would have a long literary career.

On being graduated from Colgate University in 1920, Gibson went to work for a Philadelphia newspaper. As a reporter, he learned to write quickly and succinctly. At the Philadelphia Evening Ledger, he created the first of many features for their syndicate, "After Dinner Tricks." Collaborating with noted stage magicians, Gibson produced books under their names, linking his name with those of Harry Houdini, Howard Thurston, and Harry Blackstone. His journalism and editorial experience (for Macfadden magazines) attracted publishers Street and Smith, who needed someone to write a new magazine, The Shadow, which they were planning. Eventually, Gibson would supply twenty-four novelettes each year.

Between 1931 and 1949, Gibson wrote 283 novelettes about the Shadow, one series about magician-detective Norgil, scripts for Super-Magician Comics and Shadow Comics, and several standard magic texts. After six years, a substitute writer was hired to supply additional Shadow material, but Gibson was the major contributor. When the magazine ceased publication, Gibson continued his career with articles for the true-crime magazines, a series of self-help books, new magic books, revisions of some of his earlier titles, comic books and newspaper strips, juvenile titles, and two novels about magician-detectives. On August 27, 1949, he married Pearl Litzka Raymond. Not the first marriage for either of them, it proved a lasting and significant collaboration. A professional magician, Litzka Gibson brought a stability and support to the somewhat nomadic life of her new husband. The majority of his books were published after their marriage. In his later years, Gibson lectured on magic and the Shadow, accepted two awards from the Academy of Magical Arts, and kept in contact with friends around the country. He died on December 6, 1985, in Kingston, New York.

ANALYSIS

Although Walter B. Gibson's the Shadow is a very unusual character, he is not a creature invented out of thin air and smoke but a combination of existing traditions within the mystery genre. The exotic atmosphere of Sax Rohmer, the avenging band of men created by Edgar Wallace, the gangsters from the early Black Mask school, newspaper headlines, and the hero with multiple identities (Fantomas, Frank L. Packard's Jimmie Dale, Johnston McCulley's Zorro) were all available for Gibson to draw on, even subconsciously. He once referred to the Shadow as a "benevolent Dracula." It was the idea of a shadowy avenger that was given substance by this consummate storyteller.

The Shadow series is not so much a series of unrelated mysteries with a recurring detective as it is a sequence of stories, none of which can stand completely alone without drawing the reader to its fellows, each of which contributes to an evolving story. The subject of that story is the detective, about whom there is as much mystery as can be unraveled in the plot. If the average detective story can be criticized for not having

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Walter B. Gibson's Shadow was the hero of not only a series of novels but also a long-running radio series and his own pulp magazine. (Courtesy, Condé Nast) a solution as imaginative and spellbinding as the mystery itself, then the Shadow series avoids much of that criticism. It has been said of Charles Dickens's The Mystery of Edwin Drood (1870) that it is the "perfect" detective story, for, having been left unfinished, it presents no solution to spoil the mystery for the reader. With each novel in the Shadow series, the reader learns more about the mysterious avenger but not everything. New facets of the Shadow's personality are discovered without exhausting the possibilities for discovering more the next time. Even in the famous pulp magazine novelette "The Shadow Unmasks," where much is revealed, not all the questions are answered: The Shadow remains largely masked.

Despite his use of force and action, symbolized by his two .45 automatics, and his reputation as the first bringer of death in the pulp detective magazines, the Shadow is as analytical as any detective of the Golden Age, studying clues and weighing evidence before naming the guilty party. He is a law unto himself, sentencing as well as accusing, a characteristic he shares with Jimmie Dale and Wallace's Just Men; some may question his need for agents in his war on crime. In reality, the Shadow cannot be everywhere, although that is the illusion he wishes to create. Through his agents, Harry Vincent, Rutledge Mann, Burbank, Hawkeye, Moe Shrevnitz, Myra Reldon, Margo Lane, and others, he can appear to be omnipresent. They serve not only as his eyes and ears but also as "proxy-heroes" (Gibson's phrase), to whom the events of the plot happen, thus allowing the Shadow to remain offstage and even more mysterious.

What gives the stories their unique style and flavor is the continued use of motifs and references that have their basis in the lore of the stage magician. Most successful writers of detective novels tend to fill their works with information about fields that they find fascinating but seldom has there been a series that paid such loving attention to the skill of the illusionist. The Shadow possesses a bag of tricks to rival that of the Wizard of Oz. His escapes rival those of Houdini, he is a master of the trick powders that explode at the fingertips, and he can appear or vanish in smoke and flame.

The Shadow assumes several identities that allow him to mix with suspects, different classes in society, and the police. His most ubiquitous identity is that of a wealthy globe-trotter named Lamont Cranston. (Gibson chose the name with care to suggest someone with society connections and named him for the financier Thomas Lamont and a Scottish theater owner, Baillie Cranston.) There is indeed a real Lamont Cranston, however, whose identity the Shadow merely assumes when appropriate. In "The Shadow Unmasks," the master of darkness is revealed to have a basic identity of his own beneath the assumed one of Cranston. This basic identity is a famous explorer and aviator named Kent Allard. In each instance, the other identity is someone the public recognizes so well that it is not identified with the persona of the Shadow.

The proxy-hero is not always someone close to the Shadow. Sometimes he (or she) is the unwilling victim of the criminal's schemes (like Paul Brent in "The Golden Master" or Marjorie Cragg in "Shiwan Khan Returns") with whom the reader is asked to identify. Gibson's plots resemble those found in classic Golden Age detective novels, with liberal additions of action and adventure. At their base is a solid mystery that is introduced in the first chapter: Who is the mysterious figure threatening the life of the heroine? What has happened to the famous jewels? Who is killing the wealthy businessmen in town? Why can the hero not remember what happened to him last week? The mystery is fairly clued and the solution fairly revealed. Often the villain and his gang are professional criminals, with the master villain equal in ability to the master of darkness.

Gibson uses all the skill of the professional illusionist to keep the reader wondering about the identity of the villain and his motive. Some of the mystification involves the Shadow's ability to blend into the shadows in his black cloak and slouch hat, seeming to be invisible. In other versions of the Shadow stories (radio or comic books), that is accomplished through hypnosis alone. In Gibson's stories, it is accomplished by the black art illusion that takes advantage of the fact that a dark object cannot be seen against a black background. The Shadow's true identity is known to no one in the series, not even his agents. The police suspect him of being a criminal at best or a myth at worst until Inspector Cardona comes to realize that there really is a mysterious avenger known as the Shadow. It takes much longer for Commissioner Weston to come to that conclusion.

The stories are set all over the globe but primarily in New York City and the New Jersey countryside. A downtown club, the Cobalt Club, serves as a place where Lamont Cranston can hold conversations with the police commissioner, while a waterfront bar known as the Black Ship is the appropriate meeting place for gangland citizens. A few settings made familiar to the reader assist in keeping the stories credible by providing solid points of reference. Gibson explained his theories for detective fiction in several interviews toward the end of his life, but his earliest declaration in print was in an article in Writer's Digest in 1941. The Shadow, he explained, was in the crime-fighting game for his own amusement and thus the reader's entertainment. He enjoyed solving the problems of other characters and sorting out the major mystery that involved the main, or proxy, hero.

THE LIVING SHADOW

All the mystery-story elements peculiar to the Shadow series did not, however, arrive fully grown to Gibson at once. More than any other detective series, the Shadow stories evolved into their familiar pattern. Much of that pattern can be seen developing in the first three novelettes of the series, The Living Shadow (1931), The Eyes of the Shadow (1931), and The Shadow Laughs! (1931). The first is the story of Harry Vincent as he undertakes his first assignment for the Shadow. Until he met the Shadow, who saved him from a suicide attempt, his life seemed to have no purpose. Harry's story is that of all the Shadow's agents: They owe everything to the Shadow and never forget it. What will the Shadow do with an agent's life? The answer is that he will improve it, risk it, or perhaps lose it. In exchange for restoring Harry Vincent to life, the Shadow demands absolute obedience.

Harry does not solve the mystery of the Shadow, but he does succeed in discovering who killed Gregory Laidlow. There is a second plot concerning stolen jewels and criminal doings in Chinatown, a favorite setting in the series. Alternating between plots, both major and secondary, was a Gibson trademark.

THE EYES OF THE SHADOW AND THE SHADOW LAUGHS!

Not until the second novelette, The Eyes of the Shadow, does the reader meet Lamont Cranston and suspect that he and the Shadow share identities. When both are wounded, Cranston takes to his bed and the Shadow disappears, leaving the field to his agents. Having established Cranston as the Shadow's alter ego, Gibson pulled quite a different rabbit from his hat in the third novelette, The Shadow Laughs! Claude Fellows, one of the Shadow's own agents, thinks he has discovered that his master and Cranston are one and the same. He then has a conversation with Cranston in which the traveler claims to have been out of the country at the time of the events of The Eyes of the Shadow. Fellows's confusion is nothing compared with that of Cranston himself when he discovers his identical twin facing him. The reader learns that the Shadow is a distinct entity with an identity that remains unrevealed. Gibson was able to retain the essential secret of his mystery man for six years until revealing it in "The Shadow Unmasks." Wisely, he kept some of his cards up his sleeve, for the events in that story do not explain all the secrets.

NORGIL SERIES

In the late 1930's, Gibson wrote twenty-three short stories about his magician-detective, Norgil. Where the Shadow was a blending of mystery with magical additives, the Norgil stories place the emphasis on the magician's profession. Intended by their author to reflect the public lives of many of the great magicians of the golden age of magic, the episodes in Norgil's career take him into a position of solving "impossible crimes." Suave and mustached, Norgil is neither as flamboyantly exotic as the Shadow nor as fully developed as a character. The individual stories are like the events pictured on a circus poster, each designed to draw the crowd into the tent. Not as well known as the Shadow stories, the Norgil series is the unfinished sonata in Gibson's repertoire. Norgil emulates most of the great magicians of the golden age but was not allowed time to complete the cycle. (He never takes his show overseas like Houdini or Raymond.) The reader learns that Loring (Norgil's real last name) is an anagram for Norgil, but in an unwritten twenty-fourth story, readers were to have been told that his full name was W. Bates Loring, which is an anagram for Walter B. Gibson. The author was a puzzlemaker to the end.

Gibson created a series of mystery novels that epitomized the very meaning of mystery and a character, the Shadow, who is better remembered than any of the individual adventures in which he appeared. The Shadow shares a rung on the ladder of popular culture with figures such as Tarzan and Sherlock Holmes.

J. Randolph Cox

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

THE SHADOW SERIES (AS GRANT): 1931-1933 • The Living Shadow, 1931; The Eyes of the Shadow, 1931; The Shadow Laughs!, 1931; The Red Menace, 1931; Gangdom's Doom, 1931; The Death Tower, 1932; The Silent Seven, 1932; The Black Master, 1932; Mobsmen on the Spot, 1932; Hands in the Dark, 1932; Double Z, 1932; The Crime Cult, 1932; The Blackmail Ring, 1932; Hidden Death, 1932; Green Eyes, 1932; The Ghost Makers, 1932; The Five Chameleons, 1932; Dead Men Live, 1932; The Romanoff Jewels, 1932; Kings of Crime, 1933; Shadowed Millions, 1933; The Creeping Death, 1933; The Shadow's Shadow, 1933; Six Men of Evil, 1933; Fingers of Death, 1933; Murder Trail, 1933; The Silent Death, 1933; The Shadow's Justice, 1933; The Golden Grotto, 1933; The Death Giver, 1933; The Red Blot, 1933; The Ghost of the Manor, 1933; The Living Joss, 1933; The Silver Scourge, 1933; The Black Hush, 1933; The Isle of Doubt, 1933; The Grove of Doom, 1933; Master of Death, 1933; Road of Crime, 1933; The Death Triangle, 1933; The Killer, 1933; Mox, 1933; The Crime Clinic, 1933; Treasures of Death, 1933

1934-1935 • The Embassy Murders, 1934; The Wealth Seeker, 1934; The Black Falcon, 1934; Gray Fist, 1934; The Circle of Death, 1934; The Green Box, 1934; The Cobra, 1934; Crime Circus, 1934; Tower of Death, 1934; Death Clew, 1934; The Key, 1934; The Crime Crypt, 1934; Charg, Monster, 1934; Chain of Death, 1934; The Crime Master, 1934; Gypsy Vengeance, 1934; Spoils of the Shadow, 1934; The Garau-can Swindle, 1934; Murder Marsh, 1934; The Death Sleep, 1934; The Chinese Disks, 1934; Doom on the Hill, 1934; The Unseen Killer, 1934; Cyro, 1934; The

Four Signets, 1935; The Blue Sphinx, 1935; The Plot Master, 1935; The Dark Death, 1935; Crooks Go Straight, 1935; Bells of Doom, 1935; Lingo, 1935; The Triple Trail, 1935; The Golden Quest, 1935; The Third Skull, 1935; Murder Every Hour, 1935; The Condor, 1935; The Fate Joss, 1935; Atoms of Death, 1935; The Man from Scotland Yard, 1935; The Creeper, 1935; The Mardi Gras Mystery, 1935; The London Crimes, 1935; The Ribbon Clues, 1935; The House That Vanished, 1935; The Chinese Tapestry, 1935; The Python, 1935; Zemba, 1935; The Case of Congressman Coyd, 1935

1936-1937 • The Ghost Murders, 1936; Castle of Doom, 1936; Death Rides the Skyway, 1936; The North Woods Mystery, 1936; The Voodoo Master, 1936; The Third Shadow, 1936; The Salamanders, 1936; The Man from Shanghai, 1936; The Gray Ghost, 1936; The City of Doom, 1936; The Crime Oracle, 1936; Murder Town, 1936; The Yellow Door, 1936; The Broken Napoleons, 1936; The Sledge Hammer Crimes, 1936; Terror Island, 1936; The Golden Masks, 1936; Jimbaro Death, 1936; City of Crime, 1936; Death by Proxy, 1936; The Strange Disappearance of Joe Cardona, 1936; The Seven Drops of Blood, 1936; Intimidation, Inc., 1936; Vengeance Is Mine, 1937; Loot of Death, 1937; Quetzal, 1937; Death Token, 1937; Murder House, 1937; Washington Crime, 1937; The Masked Headsman, 1937; Treasure Trail, 1937; Brothers of Doom, 1937; The Shadow's Rival, 1937; Crime, Insured, 1937; House of Silence, 1937; The Shadow Unmasks, 1937; The Yellow Band, 1937; Buried Evidence, 1937; The Radium Murders, 1937; The Keeper's Gold, 1937; Death Turrets, 1937; Teeth of the Dragon, 1937; The Sealed Box, 1937; Racket Town, 1937

1938-1939 • The Crystal Buddha, 1938; Hills of Death, 1938; The Murder Master, 1938; The Golden Pagoda, 1938; Face of Doom, 1938; Serpents of Siva, 1938; Cards of Death, 1938; The Hand, 1938; Voodoo Trail, 1938; The Racket's King, 1938; Murder for Sale, 1938; Death Jewels, 1938; The Green Hoods, 1938; Crime over Boston, 1938; The Dead Who Lived, 1938; Vanished Treasure, 1938; The Voice, 1938; Chicago Crime, 1938; Shadow over Alcatraz, 1938; Silver Skull, 1939; Crime Rides the Sea, 1939; Realm of Doom, 1939; The Lone Tiger, 1939; The Vin-

indicator, 1939; Death Ship, 1939; Battle of Greed, 1939; The Three Brothers, 1939; Smugglers of Death, 1939; City of Shadows, 1939; Death from Nowhere, 1939; Isle of Gold, 1939; Wizard of Crime, 1939; The Crime Ray, 1939; The Golden Master, 1939; Castle of Crime, 1939; The Masked Lady, 1939; Ships of Doom, 1939; City of Ghosts, 1939; Shiwan Kahn Returns, 1939; House of Shadows, 1939

1940-1941 • Death Premium, 1940; The Hooded Circle, 1940; The Getaway Ring, 1940; Voice of Death, 1940; The Invincible Shiwan Khan, 1940; The Veiled Prophet, 1940; The Spy Ring, 1940; Death in the Stars, 1940; Masters of Death, 1940; The Scent of Death, 1940; "Q", 1940; Gems of Doom, 1940; Crime at Seven Oaks, 1940; The Fifth Face, 1940; Crime Country, 1940; The Wasp, 1940; Crime over Miami, 1940; Xitli, God of Fire, 1940; The Shadow, the Hawk, and the Skull, 1940; The Shadow and the Voice of Murder, 1940; Forgotten Gold, 1941; The Wasp Returns, 1941; The Chinese Primrose, 1941; Mansion of Crime, 1941; The Time Master, 1941; The House on the Ledge, 1941; The League of Death, 1941; Crime Under Cover, 1941; The Thunder King, 1941; The Star of Delhi, 1941; The Blur, 1941; The Shadow Meets the Mask, 1941; The Devil-Master, 1941; Garden of Death, 1941; Dictator of Crime, 1941; The Blackmail King, 1941; Temple of Crime, 1941; Murder Mansion, 1941; Crime's Stronghold, 1941

1942-1943 • Alibi Trail, 1942; The Book of Death, 1942; Death Diamonds, 1942; Vengeance Bay, 1942; Formula for Crime, 1942; Room of Doom, 1942; The Jade Dragon, 1942; The Northdale Mystery, 1942; Twins of Crime, 1942; The Devil's Feud, 1942; Five Ivory Boxes, 1942; Death About Town, 1942; Legacy of Death, 1942; Judge Lawless, 1942; The Vampire Murders, 1942; Clue for Clue, 1942; Trail of Vengeance, 1942; The Murdering Ghost, 1942; The Hydra, 1942; The Money Master, 1942; The Shadow Annual, 1942; The Museum Murders, 1943; Death's Masquerade, 1943; The Devil Monsters, 1943; Wizard of Crime, 1943; The Black Dragon, 1943; The Robot Master, 1943; Murder Lake, 1943; Messenger of Death, 1943; House of Ghosts, 1943; King of the Black Market, 1943; The Muggers, 1943; Murder by Moonlight, 1943; The Shadow Annual, 1943

1944-1945 • The Crystal Skull, 1944; Syndicate of Death, 1944; The Toll of Death, 1944; Crime Caravan, 1944; The Freak Show Murders, 1944; Voodoo Death, 1944; Town of Hate, 1944; Death in the Crystal, 1944; The Chest of Chu-Chan, 1944; Fountain of Death, 1944; No Time for Murder, 1944; Guardians of Death, 1945; Marry Mrs. MacBeth, 1945; Five Keys to Crime, 1945; Death Has Gray Eyes, 1945; Tear-drops of Buddha, 1945; Three Stamps of Death, 1945; The Mask of Mephisto, 1945; Murder by Magic, 1945; The Taiwan Joss, 1945; A Quarter of Eight, 1945; The White Skulls, 1945; The Stars Promise Death, 1945

1946-1949 • The Banshee Murders, 1946; Crime Out of Mind, 1946; The Mother Goose Murders, 1946; Crime over Casco, 1946; The Curse of Thoth, 1946; Malmordo, 1946; The Shadow Annual, 1947; Jade Dragon, 1949; Dead Man's Chest, 1949; The Magical's Mystery, 1949; The Black Circle, 1949; The Whispering Eyes, 1949

1963-1979 • Return of the Shadow, 1963; The Weird Adventures of the Shadow, 1966; The Shadow Scrapbook, 1979

NORGIL SERIES: Norgil the Magician, 1977; Norgil: More Tales of Prestidigitaction, 1979

NONSERIES NOVELS: A Blonde for Murder, 1948; Looks That Kill, 1948; Rod Serling's "The Twilight Zone," 1963 (adapted by Gibson); The Twilight Zone Revisited, 1964 (adapted by Gibson); Attic Revivals Presents Walter Gibson's Magicians, 1982

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: The Sin of Harold Diddlebock, 1947 (as Hershfield); Anne Bonny, Pirate Queen: The True Saga of a Fabulous Female Buccaneer, 1962 (as Brown)

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: Brazilian Gold Mine Mystery, 1960 (as Adams); Mystery of the Mexican Treasure, 1961 (as Adams); Mystery of the Ambush in India, 1962 (as Adams); Egyptian Scarab Mystery, 1963 (as Adams); The Brass Idol Mystery, 1964 (ghostwritten for Helen Wells); Monsters: Three Famous Spine-Tingling Tales, 1965 (as Walter Brown Gibson); Mystery of the Alpine Pass, 1965 (as Adams); The Man from U.N.C.L.E.: The Coin of El Diablo Affair, 1965 (as Walter Brown Gibson)

NONFICTION: 1921-1930 • After Dinner Tricks, 1921; Practical Card Tricks, 1921; 200 Tricks You Can Do, 1926; Money Magic, 1926; Popular Card Tricks, 1926; Twenty New Practical Card Tricks, 1926; 200 More Tricks You Can Do, 1927; Book of Magic, 1927; First Principles of Astrology, 1927 (as Gaston); Houdini's Book of Magic and Party Pastimes, 1927 (as Walter Brown Gibson with Henry Houdini); The Book of Secrets, Miracles Ancient and Modern, with Added Chapters on Easy Magic You Can Do, 1927; The Bunco Book, 1927; The Magic Square: Tells Your Past—Present—Future, 1927; The Science of Numerology: What Numbers Mean to You, 1927; The World's Best Book of Magic, 1927; Two Dozen Effective Practical Card Tricks, 1927; Fooling the World, 1928; Sixteen Master Card Mysteries, 1928; The Thurston Magic Lessons, 1928; Blackstone's Annual of Magic, 1929; Blackstone's Secrets of Magic, 1929; Blackstone's Tricks and Entertainments, 1929; My Life of Magic, 1929 (ghostwritten for Howard Thurston); Blackstone's Magic: A Book of Mystery, 1930; Brain Tests: Or, Your Brains, If Any, 1930; Facts About Brunettes and Blondes, 1930 (ghostwritten for Alfred F. Seward); Houdini's Escapes, 1930

1931-1940 • Blackstone's Modern Card Tricks, 1932; Houdini's Magic, 1932; Magic Made Easy: More than Two Hundred Mystifying Feats, 1932; Periodicity, the Absolute Law of the Universe, 1932 (ghostwritten for A. F. Seward); Magician's Manual, 1933; Inside the Medium's Cabinet, 1935 (ghostwritten for Joseph Dunninger); How to Make a Ghost Walk, 1936 (ghostwritten for Dunninger); The New Magician's Manual, 1936

1941-1950 • Complete Magic Show, 1941; What's on Your Mind?, 1944 (ghostwritten for Dunninger); Blackstone, World's Super Magician: Souvenir Program and Illustrated Trick Book, 1945; Secrets of Magic, 1945; Blackstone the Magic Detective Reveals Magic Tricks Everyone Can Do, 1946; The Dead Do Not Talk, 1946 (ghostwritten for Julian J. Prostauer); Blackstone's Tricks Anyone Can Do, 1948; Professional Magic for Amateurs, 1948; Magic Explained, 1949

1951-1960 • Houdini on Magic, 1953; Fun with Optical Illusions, 1956; Fun with Stunts, Tricks, and

Skits, 1956; Magic for Fun, 1956; The Book of the Presidents of the United States, 1956; The Key to Hypnotism, 1956; What's New in Magic?, 1956; How to Play Poker and Win, 1957; How to Play the Horses and Win, 1957; How to Play the Trotters and Win, 1957; How to Spot Card Sharps and Their Methods, 1957; How to Win at Pinochle and Other Games, 1957; How to Win with Racing Numerology, 1957; Secrets of My Million Dollar Memory, 1957 (ghostwritten for Theodore Nadler); Sidney H. Radner on Dice, 1957 (ghostwritten for Sidney H. Radner); How to Win at Roulette and Other Casino Games, 1958 (ghostwritten for Radner); The Key to Astronomy, 1958; The Key to Camplife, 1958; The Key to Judo and Jujitsu, 1958 (as Black); The Key to Space Travel, 1958; The Key to Yoga, 1958; The Key to Astrology, 1959; The Key to Better Bowling, 1959 (as Perry); The Key to Better Memory, 1959 (ghostwritten for Andrew Abbott); The Key to Character Reading, 1959 (ghostwritten for Abbott); The Key to Chess Simplified, 1959 (ghostwritten for Roy Masters); The Key to Knots and Splices, 1959 (ghostwritten for Walter Glass)

1961-1965 • Fell's Official Guide to Knots and How to Tie Them, 1961; Houdini's Fabulous Magic, 1961 (with Morris N. Young); Hypnotism Through the Ages, 1961; Judo: Attack and Defense, 1961; Radner on Bridge, 1961 (ghostwritten for Radner); Radner on Canasta, Including Samba, Bolivia, Calypso, and Other Games, 1961 (ghostwritten for Radner); Science and Mechanics Magic Handbook, 1962 Edition, 1961 (ghostwritten for Abbott); How to Develop an Exceptional Memory, 1962 (ghostwritten for Morris N. Young); Fell's Guide to Papercraft Tricks, Games, Puzzles, 1963; Hoyle's Simplified Guide to the Popular Card Games, 1963; Magic Made Simple, 1963 (also known as Junior Magic); Famous Lands and People Fun and Activity Book, 1964; Fifty States Fun and Activity Book, 1964; How to Win at Solitaire, 1964; Hoyle Card Games: Reference Crammer, 1964; Puzzles and Pastimes Fun and Activity Book, 1964; World Wide Fun and Activity Book, 1964; Year-Round Fun and Activity Book, 1964; How to Read Faster and Remember More, 1965 (with Morris N. Young); Psychic and Other ESP Party Games, 1965 (ghostwritten for David Hoy); Space and Science Fun and Activity Book, 1965; The Fine Art of Murder, 1965; The Fine Art of Spying, 1965

1966-1970 • How to Bet the Harness Races, 1966; The Complete Illustrated Book of the Psychic Sciences, 1966 (with Litzka R. Gibson); The Fine Art of Robbery, 1966; The Fine Art of Swindling, 1966; The Key to Solitaire, 1966 (as Douglas Brown); The Master Magicians: Their Lives and Most Famous Tricks, 1966; Secrets of Magic, Ancient and Modern, 1967 (also known as Secrets of the Great Magicians); Winning the $2 Bet, 1967; Magic with Science, 1968; The Key to Hoyle's Games, 1968 (ghostwritten for Edmond Hoyle); Dreams, 1969; Mystic and Occult Arts: A Guide to Their Use in Daily Living, 1969 (with Litzka R. Gibson); The Complete Illustrated Book of Card Magic, 1969; Family Games America Plays, 1970; Hypnotism, 1970

1971-1980 • The Magic of a Mighty Memory, 1971 (with Chesley V. Young); What Are the Odds?, 1972; The Complete Illustrated Book of Divination and Prophecy, 1973 (with Litzka R. Gibson; also known as The Encyclopedia of Prophecy); Witchcraft, 1973; Backgammon: The Way to Play and Win, 1974; Dunninger's Secrets, 1974 (ghostwritten for Dunninger); Fell's Guide to Winning Backgammon, 1974 (also known as How to Win at Backgammon); Hoyle's Modern Encyclopedia of Card Games, 1974; Pinochle Is the Name of the Game, 1974; Poker Is the Name of the Game, 1974; Mark Wilson Course in Magic, 1975 (ghostwritten for Mark Wilson); Card Magic Made Easy, 1976; Fell's Beginner's Guide to Magic, 1976; The Original Houdini Scrapbook, 1976; Walter Gibson's Encyclopedia of Magic and Conjuring, 1976; Kreskin's Mind Power Book, 1977 (ghostwritten for Kreskin); The Complete Illustrated Book of Close-Up Magic, 1980; Walter Gibson's Big Book of Magic for All Ages, 1980

EDITED TEXTS: Houdini on Magic, 1953; The Fine Art of Murder, 1965; Rogue's Gallery: A Variety of Mystery Stories, 1969; The Original Houdini Scrapbook, 1976; The Shadow Scrapbook, 1979

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Cox, J. Randolph. Man of Magic and Mystery: A Guide to the Work of Walter B. Gibson. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1988. Complete and comprehensively annotated bibliography of Gibson's writings.
- Goulart, Ron. "A.K.A. The Shadow." In Cheap Thrills: An Informal History of the Pulp Magazine. New Rochelle, N.Y.: Arlington House, 1972. Discusses the importance of the Shadow to the success and evolution of pulp fiction.
- Haining, Peter. The Classic Era of American Pulp Magazines. Chicago: Chicago Review Press, 2000. Looks at Gibson's contribution to the pulps and the relationship of pulp fiction to its more respectable literary cousins.
- Hutchison, Don. The Great Pulp Heroes. Buffalo, N.Y.: Mosaic Press, 1996. The Shadow is compared with his equally famous codenizens of the pulps, including Doc Savage, Tarzan, and Zorro.
- Montgomery, George. The Shadow Knew. Clarence Center, N.Y.: Textile Bridge Press, 1989. Short pamphlet covering the biography and career of Walter B. Gibson and discussing his influence on Jack Kerouac.
- Shimeld, Thomas J. Walter B. Gibson and the Shadow. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2003. Detailed scholarly study of the Shadow in pulps, drama, and radio. Bibliographic references and index.

ANTHONY GILBERT

Lucy Beatrice Malleon

Born: London, England; February 15, 1899

Died: London, England; December 9, 1973

Also wrote as Lucy Egerton; Sylvia Denys Hooke; J. Kilmeny Keith; Anne Meredith

Types of plot: Amateur sleuth; inverted

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Arthur Crook, 1936-1974

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

ARTHUR CROOK is Cockney in origin and a lawyer by training. Of indeterminate age, Crook remains unchanged throughout the series. He often functions as his own investigator, and his success arises from his quick wits and his encyclopedic knowledge of lower-class London. Rotund, slangy, reassuring, he arouses affection and trust in his clients.

CONTRIBUTION

In the Arthur Crook novels, Anthony Gilbert (Lucy Beatrice Malleon) develops a protagonist very different from the fashionable detective favored by her contemporaries. Tough and resourceful but lacking the elegance of Dorothy L. Sayers's or Ngaio Marsh's heroes, Crook has the earthy vitality of a Charles Dickens character, and he remains essentially himself, despite whatever complicated action swirls around him. The Crook novels move rapidly and present a vivid and recognizable picture of everyday London life. The characters, especially the minor ones, are sketched with quick, sure strokes, and they arouse the reader's sympathetic interest. Gilbert's plots are ingenious and complex; she avoids involvement with legal intricacies but presents clues fairly. Although the volume of her production makes uneven workmanship inevitable, the best of the Arthur Crook novels are entertaining, carefully crafted, and satisfying in their mixture of action and humor.

BIOGRAPHY

Anthony Gilbert was one of four pseudonyms adopted by Lucy Beatrice Malleon, born in Upper Norwood, a suburb of London, on February 15, 1899. Her father was a stockbroker, and she was educated at St. Paul's Girls' School in Hammersmith. During World War I, Malleon's father lost his position, and although her mother urged her to train as a teacher, Malleon learned typing and shorthand so that she could earn an immediate income for the family. From the age of seventeen onward, she wrote verse and short pieces for Punch and various literary weeklies. During her early years as a secretary, she began to produce novels. In 1922, after attending a performance of John Willard's theatrical hit The Cat and the Canary, she tried her hand at detective fiction but had no success until her first Anthony Gilbert book, The Tragedy at Freyne (1927), was published.

During her long career, Malleon wrote approximately seventy detective novels under the pen name of Anthony Gilbert; those books after 1936 center on the unconventional lawyer-detective Arthur Crook. In 1934, however, Malleon began, under the pseudonym Anne Meredith, a series of inverted detective stories, in which the identity of the murderer is known from the outset. In 1940, she published her only nonfictional work, an autobiography entitled Three-a-Penny, under the Meredith name. She valued her privacy and for many years successfully concealed her identity as the writer of the Gilbert novels. She continued to write radio plays for the British Broadcasting Corporation and published two nondetective books under the additional pseudonyms of Lucy Egerton and J. Kilmeny Keith.

During World War II, Malleon employed her secretarial skills in posts with the Red Cross, the Ministry of Food, and the Coal Association. She never married, and she listed her recreations as reading, theatergoing, and travel. Until the end of her life, she remained a resident of London, extending her familiarity with those small details of metropolitan life that contribute to the liveliness and immediacy of her novels. She died in London on December 9, 1973.

ANALYSIS

Lucy Beatrice Malleson began her career with a traditional novel that failed to find a publisher, and she was equally unsuccessful with her first crime novel. Assuming that publishers retained a lingering prejudice against female authors of thrillers, she submitted her next manuscript as Anthony Gilbert. This book, The Tragedy at Freyne, received enthusiastic reviews and was favorably compared to E. C. Bentley's classic novel Trent's Last Case (1913, revised 1929).

Encouraged, Gilbert rapidly produced a spate of mystery novels—ten with Scott Egerton, an ambitious young politician, as detective, and two with a French sleuth, M. Dupuy. Although clearly apprentice work, they reveal Gilbert's talent for rapid action and complex plots. It was not until the appearance of Arthur Crook in Murder by Experts (1936), however, that Gilbert achieved a popular success.

All subsequent books by Anthony Gilbert center on Arthur Crook, a raffish and bibulous Cockney solicitor who is the antithesis of aristocratic intellectuals such as Lord Peter Wimsey and Roderick Alleyn. Most of the novels concern some unworldly individual, often a young woman, who becomes trapped in a tangle of events involving serious crime, usually murder. Crook begins with the proposition "My clients are always innocent," and he sets about proving his claim by hard work, a well-honed intuition, and an airy disregard for legal protocol. Optimistic and energetic, he functions more as honorary uncle and rescuer than as counsel for the defense.

In his view of crime, Crook is largely pragmatic, and he is not given to speculation on the psychology of wrongdoers. He supports the theory of the "invisible witness," that unobserved, ordinary person who has happened to notice a vital clue. He uses this insight to trace the actual murderer, believing that an innocent victim requires not merely acquittal but complete vindication as well. Pleased to be known as "The Criminals' Hope and the Judges' Despair," he never accepts as a client anyone he knows to be guilty as charged.

Crook's methods are as practical as his philosophy. Often, he acts as his own sleuth, but on occasion he employs assistants, both amateur and professional; chiefly he depends on his subordinate, Bill Parsons, a former prisoner. His rough-and-ready methods inevitably lead his more conventional colleagues to consider him a disgrace to the profession.

Whatever his fellow lawyers may think of him, Crook shows exemplary devotion to his calling. A bachelor, he appears to have no living relatives and few interests outside his work. He does not write poetry, play cricket, or collect rare prints. His principal recreation is imbibing beer; much of his basic research involves listening and observing in some shabby London pub. His only other enthusiasm seems to be motoring; he drives a venerable but well-maintained Rolls Royce. Always dressed in a shiny brown suit of conspicuous inelegance, he addresses most women as "Sugar." His speech is a mixture of Cockney slang and odd quotations from the Bible and the works of William Shakespeare, Robert Browning, and other familiar poets.

NO DUST IN THE ATTIC

The widely reprinted No Dust in the Attic (1962) shows Gilbert at the top of her form. The heroine, Janice Grey, is appealing and resourceful. After a hasty marriage to charming Patrick Wylie, she discovers that he is a minor member of a gang of jewel thieves. In attempting to run away from him, she attracts the attention of the gang, which pursues her through several seedy London suburbs. Despite her best efforts, chance favors her adversaries, and Crook's special talents are required to save her and disprove a murder charge against her faithful suitor, Frank James, who has tried to follow her trail.

No Dust in the Attic effectively displays Gilbert's skill with minor characters. The reader meets a wide range of London types: a crusty pensioner who is nearly run down in a crosswalk; Miss Dina Plantagenet, a minor actress with expensive tastes and generous admirers; Edgar Barrett, a henpecked civil servant who finds Patrick Wylie's wallet; Mr. Proudie, the fussy and suspicious owner of an antique shop; and various denizens of disreputable London bars.

Gilbert's fast-paced and dovetailed plot structure are shown to advantage here. The analytical reader will notice that clues are fairly presented and the action is worked out according to a careful timetable. Crook's deductions, though as usual aided by luck, derive from his observation of minor detail. Although he is, somewhat atypically, cooperating with the metropolitan police in the search for Janice, he plays a lone hand in his attempts to clear her suitor, who has been accused of murdering Miss Plantagenet, the owner of the car used to abduct Janice. After his reliable intuition tells him that Frank is innocent, Crook starts digging into the background of the deceased woman to find out who inherits her automobile. By a series of logical steps, he uncovers a vital clue that reveals the identity of the mastermind behind the gang.

Although Crook is not in the tradition of detective as superhuman intellect, he is shrewd and aware of the implications of trivial events. Near the end of No Dust in the Attic, he receives a phone call from a distraught young woman who says that she is Janice Grey and that she has just escaped from her attic room. Crook immediately asks her for the number on the telephone she is using. Her reply not only leads him to the house where Janice has been imprisoned but also furnishes him with a clue about her captors:

Janice Grey couldn't have done it, she didn't know my number, and, bein' forty miles out of London, it wouldn't have been in the local directory. And if you think a girl who's trying to make her getaway is goin' to stop and dial DIR to get my number.

The style of No Dust in the Attic shows Gilbert's particular virtues to good advantage. The narrative moves along rapidly, with relatively simple language and sentence structure, but the reader is rewarded with crisp, vivid descriptions and frequent flashes of humor. Early in the book, a censorious single woman witnesses Crook's first intervention in Janice's affairs:

A lady emerged coyly from what she always referred to as the smallest room. What she saw horrified her, a creature like an ape in trousers and the reddest head she'd ever beheld, clutching a girl who didn't seem to be putting up any resistance.

In other passages, Crook is compared to "a red grizzly bear" and "an orangutan." His own conversation is full of picturesque figures of speech, as when he envisions the embarrassment of Scotland Yard over Janice's kidnapping: "Not that they ain't all colours of a mandrill's behind as it is." Gilbert's humor is sometimes sly and self-deprecating; for example, about the missing heroine, Crook reflects,

"She's like these lady writers," Crook complained. "So many monikers. Janice Grey, Jane Graham, Mrs. Patrick Wylie—and for all you and me know, she's calling herself something else by this time."

No Dust in the Attic concludes, not unexpectedly, with Crook's roundup of the criminals and a happy ending for Janice and Frank. Always the realist, Crook disclaims any idea of himself as "Justice holding the scales." Talking with Bill Parsons, he speculates on the fate of the principal villain:

You'll see, he'll have an alibi for the night Routh was killed. . . . If you can prove you weren't even there, even though you were the mind behind the machine—well, a nice crooked lawyer like Penrose could probably swing it.

In the Crook series, Gilbert created a new and immensely popular kind of detective, part music-hall Cockney and part protective father figure. She sustains the narrative with an intricate plot, a brisk, humorous style, and memorable portraits of ordinary people. Always in tune with her readers' interests, she leaves them with a sharply etched impression of that unlikely knight-errant, Arthur Crook, and a renewed faith in the triumph of a favorite British virtue, fair play.

Jeanne B. Elliott

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

SCOTT EGERTON SERIES: The Tragedy at Freyne, 1927; The Murder of Mrs. Davenport, 1928; Death at Four Corners, 1929; The Mystery of the Open Window, 1929; The Night of the Fog, 1930; The Case Against Andrew Fane, 1931; The Body on the Beam: A Detective Story, 1932; The Long Shadow, 1932; Death in Fancy Dress, 1933; The Musical Comedy Crime, 1933; An Old Lady Dies, 1934; The Man Who Was Too Clever, 1935

M. DUPUY SERIES: The Man in Button Boots, 1934; Courtier to Death, 1936 (also known as The Dover Train Mystery)

ARTHUR CROOK SERIES: 1936-1940 • Murder by

Experts, 1936; Murder Has No Tongue, 1937; The Man Who Wasn't There, 1937; Treason in My Breast, 1938; The Bell of Death, 1939; The Clock in the Hat Box, 1939; Dear Dead Woman, 1940 (also known as Death Takes a Redhead)

1941-1950 • The Vanishing Corpse, 1941 (also known as She Vanished at Dawn); The Woman in Red, 1941 (also known as The Mystery of the Woman in Red); Something Nasty in the Woodshed, 1942 (also known as Mystery in the Woodshed); The Case of the Tea-Cosy's Aunt, 1942 (also known as Death in the Blackout); The Mouse Who Wouldn't Play Ball, 1943 (also known as Thirty Days to Live); A Spy for Mr. Crook, 1944; He Came by Night, 1944 (also known as Death at the Door); The Scarlet Button, 1944 (also known as Murder Is Cheap); Don't Open the Door!, 1945 (also known as Death Lifts the Latch); The Black Stage, 1945 (also known as Murder Cheats the Bride); The Spinster's Secret, 1946 (also known as By Hook or by Crook); Death in the Wrong Room, 1947; Die in the Dark, 1947 (also known as The Missing Widow); Lift Up the Lid, 1948 (also known as The Innocent Bottle); Death Knocks Three Times, 1949; A Nice Cup of Tea, 1950 (also known as The Wrong Body); Murder Comes Home, 1950

1951-1960 • Lady-Killer, 1951; Miss Pinnegar Disappears, 1952 (also known as A Case for Mr. Crook); Footsteps Behind Me, 1953 (also known as Black Death and Dark Death); Snake in the Grass, 1954 (also known as Death Won't Wait); A Question of Murder, 1955 (also known as Is She Dead Too?); And Death Came Too, 1956; Riddle of a Lady, 1956; Give Death a Name, 1957; Death Against the Clock, 1958; Death Takes a Wife, 1959 (also known as Death Casts a Long Shadow); Third Crime Lucky, 1959 (also known as Prelude to Murder); Out for the Kill, 1960

1961-1974 • She Shall Die, 1961 (also known as After the Verdict); Uncertain Death, 1961; No Dust in the Attic, 1962; Up Goes the Donkey, 1962; Ring for a Noose, 1963; Knock, Knock, Who's There?, 1964 (also known as The Voice); The Fingerprint, 1964; Passenger to Nowhere, 1965; The Looking Glass Murder, 1966; The Visitor, 1967; Night Encounter, 1968 (also known as Murder Anonymous); Missing from Her Home, 1969; Death Wears a Mask, 1970

(also known as Mr. Crook Lifts the Mask); Tenant for the Tomb, 1971; Murder's a Waiting Game, 1972; A Nice Little Killing, 1974

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Man Who Was London, 1925 (as Keith); Portrait of a Murderer, 1933 (as Meredith); The Coward, 1934 (as Meredith); The Gambler, 1937 (as Meredith); The Showman, 1938 (as Meredith); The Stranger, 1939 (as Meredith); The Adventurer, 1940 (as Meredith)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: The Sword of Harlequin, 1927 (as Keith); Lady at Large, 1936 (as Egerton); There's Always Tomorrow, 1941 (as Meredith); The Family Man: A Victorian Novel, 1942 (as Meredith); Curtain, Mr. Greatheart, 1943 (as Meredith); The Beautiful Miss Burroughes, 1945 (as Meredith); The Rich Woman, 1947 (as Meredith); The Sisters, 1949 (as Meredith); The Draper of Edgumbe, 1950 (as Meredith; also known as The Unknown Path); A Fig for Virtue, 1951 (as Meredith); Call Back Yesterday, 1952 (as Meredith); The Innocent Bride, 1954 (as Meredith); The Day of the Miracle, 1955 (as Meredith); Impetuous Heart, 1956 (as Meredith); Christine, 1957 (as Meredith); A Man in the Family, 1959 (as Meredith); The Wise Child, 1960 (as Meredith)

PLAY: Mrs. Boot's Legacy: A Sketch for Three Female Characters, pr. 1941

RADIO PLAYS: 1940-1950 • A Cavalier in Love, 1940; Death at 6:30, 1940; The Plain Woman, 1940; Calling Mr. Brown, 1941; Footprints, 1941; He Came by Night, 1941; The Adventurer, 1941; The Bird of Passage, 1941; There's Always Tomorrow, 1941; Thirty Years Is a Long Time, 1941; A Bird in a Cage, 1942; Find the Lady, 1942; His Professional Conscience, 1942; The Home-Coming, 1944; Mystery Man of New York, 1945; Of Brides in Baths, 1945; Full Circle, 1946; Hard Luck Story, 1947; A Nice Cup of Tea, 1948; The Sympathetic Table, 1948; Profitable Death, 1950

1951-1962 • After the Verdict, 1952; Now You Can Sleep, 1952; My Guess Would Be Murder, 1954; I Love My Art with an "A," 1957; Black Death, 1960; No One Will Ever Know, 1960; And Death Came Too, 1962

NONFICTION: Three-a-Penny, 1940 (as Meredith; autobiography)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bakerman, Jane S. "Bowlers, Beer, Bravado, and Brains: Anthony Gilbert's Arthur Crook." The Mystery FANcier 2 (July, 1978): 5-13. A profile of Gilbert's most famous character, cataloging his distinctive traits and analyzing his personal style.

Moore, Lewis D. Cracking the Hard-Boiled Detective: A Critical History from the 1920's to the Present.

Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2006. Rare study that treats both the American and the British versions of the hard-boiled detective, providing useful context for the rough-edged Arthur Crook character. Bibliographic references and index.

Scaggs, John. Crime Fiction. New York: Routledge, 2005. Contains chapters on early mystery and detective fiction and the hard-boiled mode, which help put Gilbert's novels in perspective.

Wakeman, John, ed. "Anthony Gilbert." In World Authors, 1950-1970. New York: Wilson, 1975. Gilbert is profiled in this massive list of the writers of the world and their accomplishments.

MICHAEL GILBERT

Born: Billingham, Lincolnshire, England; July 17, 1912

Died: Luddesdown, Kent, England; February 8, 2006

Types of plot: Espionage; police procedural; thriller; amateur sleuth; courtroom drama

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Inspector Hazlerigg, 1947-1983

Patrick Petrella, 1959-1993

Daniel Joseph Calder and Samuel Behrens, 1967-1982

William Mercer, 1972-1997

Luke Pagan, 1995-1998

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

INSPECTOR HAZLERIGG brings to bear a Sherlock Holmes type of ratiocination to solve mysteries. Intelligent, individualistic, and tenacious, Hazlerigg weeds out the irrelevant detail so he can concentrate on key clues and personalities. He alternates between two techniques: staging a ruse (what he calls dropping a grenade) and weaving a net that allows the culprit to be firmly trapped. Hazlerigg has a red face, a heavy build, a well-worn tweed suit, and piercing eyes, the cold gray of the North Sea.

PATRICK PETRELLA, who deals with blackmail, arson, theft, and murder while rising steadily from constable to detective chief inspector with the metropolitan police, is young, industrious, ambitious, and innovative. He spent his first eight years in Spain and attended the American University of Beirut. Though of Spanish descent, he is unquestionably English, except for his occasional "demon" of a temper. He is a churchgoer, and he marries and becomes a father during the series. He eventually rises to superintendent of the East London dockyards in Roller-Coaster (1993) but retires at the end to work on his father's farm.

DANIEL JOSEPH CALDER and SAMUEL BEHRENS, coldly ruthless middle-aged counterintelligence agents who, in a number of short stories, assisted by Calder's magnificent Persian deerhound, engage in espionage, assassination, and persuasion with quiet efficiency and admirable intelligence. They work for the "E" (External) Branch of the British Joint Services Standing Intelligence Committee and do those jobs so disreputable that none of the other departments will touch them. Neighbors in Kent, they lead deceptively quiet lives, puttering about at beekeeping, hunting, and playing chess. They value decisiveness and ingenuity, characteristics they continually demonstrate themselves. Their opponents often end up with a neat hole in the head or chest.

WILLIAM MERCER, the highly individualistic and sensual inspector of The Body of a Girl (1972), is a born rebel and outsider who chose an honest living over a criminal one because of what he calls the “safety factor.” He is a stickler for procedure, requiring careful files with photographs and records of every scrap of evidence. He quits the force for a job in the Middle East but returns in several short stories.

LUKE PAGAN, whose gamekeeper father intended him to be a cleric, decides instead to enter the London Metropolitan Police at the age of eighteen. He is young and good looking, attractive to both men and women. Born in 1906 and growing to manhood during World War I, Pagan has an array of talents, including espionage skills and proficiency in several languages, particularly Russian. He rapidly rises from constable to detective to a member of the MO5 (a British Military Operations unit). When the war ends, he pursues a career in law.

CONTRIBUTION

Michael Gilbert’s career spanned more than half a century (his first book was actually written in 1930) and covered a wide range, including close to thirty novels, three or four hundred short stories (his favorite form), several stage plays, and many television and radio plays. Hence, as Gilbert himself said, it “is impossible in a brief space to make any useful summary” of his works. Gilbert was proud of treating “lightly and amusingly many subjects that would not have been touched thirty years ago.” He asked, “What is a writer to do if he is not allowed to entertain?”

Ellery Queen praised Gilbert as the “complete professional,” one who was “in complete control of his material,” whose plots originated from a compassionate knowledge of people and a “first-hand knowledge of law, war, and living, nourished by a fertile imagination that never fails him.” He called Gilbert’s writing droll, his wit dry, his characterizations credible. Anthony Boucher, critic for The New York Times, labeled Gilbert’s collection of spy stories Game Without Rules (1967) “short works of art,” in fact “the second best volume of spy short stories ever published,” outranked only by W. Somerset Maugham’s Ashenden: Or, The British Agent (1928). Others called Gilbert one of the finest of the post-World War II generation of detective writers. He had the disconcerting ability to mix the elegant and the harsh, to charm with witty exchanges, and to shock with amoral realism. He wrote about the work of divisional detectives and police foot soldiers and the potential contributions of the general public, subjects that were largely neglected by other mystery and detective authors. He captured the resilience of the young, the suspicions of the old, the humanity of police officers, and the drama of the court.

BIOGRAPHY

Michael Francis Gilbert was born in Billingham in Lincolnshire, England, the son of Bernard Samuel Gilbert and Berwyn Minna (née Cuthbert) Gilbert, both writers. He was educated at St. Peter’s School, Seaford, Sussex, and Blundell’s School. Influenced by his uncle, Sir Maurice Gwyer, lord chief justice of India, he decided on a legal career and taught at a preparatory school in Salisbury while studying law at the University of London, where he received an LL.B. with honors in 1937.

In 1939, Gilbert joined the Royal Horse Artillery. He served in North Africa and Europe (mainly Italy) from 1939 to 1945, was promoted to major, and received mentions in dispatches. Gilbert was captured in North Africa and imprisoned in Tunis and in Italy. His Death in Captivity (1952), a classic escape story involving a murder in an Italian prisoner-of-war camp, builds convincingly on these experiences, while Sky High (1955) treats a soldier’s postwar adjustment difficulties. Death Has Deep Roots (1951) and The Night of the Twelfth (1976) refer to “the hate and the fear, the hysteria and the exaggeration and the heroism” of the Occupation and to details such as “The Network of Eyes” used by the French Resistance to keep track of Gestapo officers and collaborators. The computer engineer protagonist of The Long Journey Home (1985) covers territory engraved in Gilbert’s mind from those wartime days, as he makes an arduous hike through Italy and France, pursued by mafiosi.

After the war, Gilbert worked as a solicitor (1947-1951), rising in 1952 to become a partner in the law firm of Trower, Still, and Kealing. He married Roberta Mary Marsden and had five daughters and two sons. He became a founding member of the British Crime Writers Association in 1953 and joined many other professional organizations. He was fellow mystery writer Raymond Chandler's legal adviser at one time and drew up the latter's will. In 1960, he acted as legal adviser to the government of the Middle Eastern nation of Bahrain, an experience that provided the background for The Ninety-Second Tiger (1973), an adventure/romance about a mythical Middle Eastern kingdom whose rare mineral deposits make it the center of political conflict. In 1980, Gilbert was made a commander in the Order of the British Empire.

Gilbert retired from the legal profession in 1983, after some thirty-five years of service. For his writing, he received the Swedish Grand Master Award in 1981 and the Edgar Allan Poe Grand Master Award of the Mystery Writers of America in 1987. He also won the Life Achievement Anthony Award at the 1990 Bouchercon in London and in 1994 was awarded the Crime Writers' Association's Cartier Diamond Dagger for lifetime achievement. In addition to crime novels, Gilbert wrote short stories, teleplays, dramas, and also edited a book of legal anecdotes. In 1998, he announced that Over and Out would be his final novel, although he intended to continue writing short stories. He died in Luddesdown, Kent, England, in February, 2006.

ANALYSIS

With skill, artistry, and care, Michael Gilbert wrote a wide range of works, from strict intellectual puzzles to novels of action and romance, from espionage and Geoffrey Household-type suspense to the police procedural, all set in a variety of finely delineated European and British locales. Varied, too, is his range of topics: archaeology and art (The Etruscan Net, 1969), academia in general and boarding schools in particular (The Night of the Twelfth), cricket (The Crack in the Teacup, 1966), the Church of England (Close Quarters, 1947), libraries (Sky High), and law (Smallbone Deceased, 1950, and Death Has Deep Roots). Gilbert's characters are well rounded, his authenticity of detail convincing, his sense of people and place compelling and engaging. His plots are complex but believable, substantially and plausibly developed. They involve numerous twists and turns that keep the reader guessing. In fact, Gilbert employs a chess analogy in several works to give a sense of the intricacy of the human game, from castling to checkmate, with the analogy carried out to its fullest in The Final Throw (1982), the story of a deadly game of attrition and loss in which pawns are sacrificed and last-chance risks are taken. His sometimes rapidly shifting points of view add to this intricacy.

Gilbert's works are all solid entertainment, with intricate plots, clever clues, and numerous suspects who are treated with humor, understatement, and, occasionally, a touch of the satiric. His heroes are usually rugged individualists with quick minds, sharp tongues, and resilient bodies. Many of his books build on his knowledge of the law and of the drama of the British legal system: They describe the internal workings of law firms and delineate courtroom style, legal techniques, and police, forensic, and court procedure. His protagonists, sometimes young solicitors with whom he clearly identifies, use that system to pursue justice and legal revenge.

SMALLBONE DECEASED AND DEATH HAS DEEP ROOTS

Set in a solicitor's office, where a corpse is discovered in a hermetically sealed deedbox, Smallbone Deceased allows the author to satirize gently the eccentric types associated with his own profession, while Death Has Deep Roots exploits its courtroom setting to find an alternate explanation to what seems like an open-and-shut case. One solicitor therein describes his strategy:

I happen to be old-fashioned enough to think that a woman in distress ought to be helped. Especially when she is a foreigner and about to be subjected to the savage and unpredictable caprices of the English judicial system. . . . We're going to fight a long, dirty black-guarding campaign in which we shall use every subterfuge that the law allows, and perhaps even a few that it doesn't—you can't be too particular when you're defending.

Smallbone Deceased begins with an elevated but boring, eulogistic tribute to the departed head of a law firm, punctuated by irreverent asides from his underlings, then focuses on how those assistants have the training to observe details that will later prove vital to preventing more murder. Death Has Deep Roots demonstrates how a skilled lawyer can use his knowledge of character, the few facts he has, and a team of assistants tracking down discrepancies at home and abroad to undercut the prosecution's case and at the end reveal truths that lay hidden for far too long. Flash Point (1974), in turn, demonstrates how politics affects law and justice, as the solicitor-hero seeks to reopen a case concerning a former union man now high up in government service and gets so caught up in the extremes of left and right that "justice" becomes very difficult to determine.

A Gilbert novel often depends on an amateur detective, such as Henry Bohun, a statistician, actuary, and solicitor, who is in the right place at the right time to have his imagination challenged by the puzzle of Trustee Smallbone's unexpected appearance in a deedbox. Gilbert describes him as looking "like some mechanic with a bent for self-improvement, a student of Kant and Schopenhauer, who tended his lathe by day and sharpened his wits of an evening on dead dialecticians." People trust him and open up to him, and, while he cannot do what the police do so well (take statements, photographs, and fingerprints, and the like), he can get close to those immediately involved and pick up details and relationships to which the police would have no access. In Death Has Deep Roots, there are two amateurs working for the defense, one trying to prove the accused's claims about her lover, the other investigating the mysterious wartime events in France that bind several witnesses against the accused. In The Empty House (1978), a tall, thin, neophyte insurance investigator, Peter Maniciple, becomes entangled in the machinations of British, Israeli, and Palestinian agents to control secrets unraveled by a kindly geneticist who wants only to escape them all. Liz, a bass in a village church choir, investigates arson and theft in Sky High; an art-gallery owner and an expert on Etruscan art becomes tangled in a net of tomb robbing in The Etruscan Net, while Mr. Wetherall, the headmaster of a London high school in The Night of the Twelfth, wages a one-man war on black-market crime.

Gilbert's protagonists might use old resistance networks, boarding school companions, kindly innkeepers, or even a network of citizens to help gather information, trace a car, or escape pursuit. At other times they expose the ruthlessness of the bourgeoisie: the colonel who has no qualms about arranging an "accidental" death and the museum representative who condones the illegal origins of his purchase.

LUKE PAGAN SERIES

Gilbert embarked on historical fiction with the Luke Pagan series: Ring of Terror (1995), Into Battle (1997), Over and Out, all espionage novels set during World War I. Despite his name, Pagan is a by-the-book detective, but his partner Joe Narrabone, a likeable rogue, has no compunctions about breaking the letter of the law to preserve its spirit.

These historical novels demonstrate Gilbert's interest in the evolution of espionage tactics during the course of the twentieth century. While dramatizing a search for three Russian revolutionaries who are terrorizing Edwardian London, robbing banks, burning buildings, forging documents, and manufacturing dynamite for an all-out war against the police, Gilbert documents the formation of the MO5 and the efforts that led, against Home Secretary Winston Churchill's desires, to arm the English police officers. Into Battle illustrates early attempts at code-breaking and brings Pagan into the battlefields of the Western Front. Over and Out uses a punning title to suggest the theme, in which Pagan, now a British Intelligence Corps operative, must defeat a Belgian traitor who lures demoralized British soldiers to desert and join the apparently unstoppable German army.

VIOLENCE AND ESPIONAGE

Gilbert's characters never shy away from violence. In "The Spoilers," a story of intimidation and blackmail, a young woman whose dog has been killed and mutilated turns a high-pressure steam hose on the perpetrators. In Roller-Coaster, the media gleefully pursue a racist cop who is known for harassment and assault of London's West Indians. In "Cross-Over," a dedicated young spy feels uncomfortable about making love to an enemy agent, and then, the next day, he shoots her dead to save himself and his associates. An older agent assures him, "In this job . . . there is neither right nor wrong. Only expediency." In "Trembling's Tours," a Russian agent is strangled, the cord tied so "deep into the flesh that only the ends could be seen dangling at the front like a parody of a necktie." Gilbert transmutes this image in Smallbone Deceased, where what looks at first glance "like an aerial view of the Grand Canyon," with "innumerable fissile crevices, . . . gulfs and gullies," is instead the "effect of picture-wire on the human neck. . . . Two hundred magnifications."

The bullet hole in the forehead, the stench of cyanide, the quiet drowning, the mutilated corpse—all must be taken in stride in a milieu of double agents, greed, and deception, for in Gilbert's world espionage and crime are both games "without rules." Calder and Behrens's interrogation methods result in corpses, and their retaliation for a soldier burned to death is to blow up his assassins. Gilbert has no illusions about the horrors of which people are capable in the name of an ideal, a cause, a personal longing, a twisted obsession, or a whim. As one character describes another, "He had seen more brutality, more treachery, more fanaticism, more hatred than had any of his predecessors in war or in peace."

There is always a touch of the irreverent in Gilbert. Close Quarters, a locked-room mystery set around a cathedral, takes on a church community's misdeeds and provides an entertaining and mildly satiric look at the Church of England, its canons, its deans, and its vergers. The Crack in the Teacup denigrates minor league politics and local courts, Fear to Tread (1953) takes on the British train system, and The Dust and the Heat (1967) delves into the ruthlessness of the business world. In The Body of a Girl, an honest inspector must deal with malice all around him: "bent policemen, crooked garage owners, suspicious solicitors, dirty old men, and local roundheels." Roller-Coaster, a police procedural, shows Petrella and his men risibly chafing at the boredom of the procedures, pressures, and bureaucracy of police work, longing to get out into the streets and away from the papers in the in-box on their desks.

ALLUSIONS AND IRONIES

Gilbert's stories always include interesting historical and literary allusions or quotations, with satiric or ironic subtitles from Jonathan Swift, G. K. Chesterton, William Hazlitt, and others. The protagonist in The Empty House awakens from "a land of dreams" to "ignorant armies" clashing by night "on a darkling plain," and his friend who would sail away "like Ulysses . . . bored with Ithaca" is destroyed by those battles. In The Night of the Twelfth, student rehearsals of Twelfth Night form a backdrop for the terrors of the sadistic torturing and murder of three, nearly four, young boys; the novel ends with Feste's song—as if to say that in Gilbert as well as in William Shakespeare, art makes past violence and potential horrors tolerable by showing their defeat but that reality is neither as neat nor as just as an artistic presentation.

Ironies abound: Calder shoots an attractive spy dead, and her deerhound becomes his most beloved companion; young lovers, in the throes of ecstasy, reach out and touch the cold naked foot of a ten-year-old murder victim; the most attractive woman in the story proves the most sadistic, the most warped; the key witnesses for the prosecution prove to be the real murderers; and a charming villain quotes Thucydides while chopping off a victim's fingers one by one. The stories may involve a debate (such as the one about inefficiency and freedom versus efficiency and a police state in "The Cat Cracker") or extended analogy (for example, a cricket match compared to warfare psychology or the "cracking" process of the petroleum industry likened to the "cracking" process of Nazi interrogators, both requiring just so much heat or force to achieve the effect without disintegrating the material in the process.

Gilbert's metaphorical language has won for him much praise. In Death Has Deep Roots, Sergeant Crabbe's sad realization that a competent past acquaintance is going to try to undercut the police case leads to the following comment: "He bestowed on McCann the look which a St. Bernard might have given if, after a long trek through the snow, he had found the traveler already frozen to death." Later, one Mousey Jones is described as "a small character who made a living by picking up the crumbs which lie round the wainscoting, and in the dark corners of that big living room of crime, the West End." The compulsive fascination of detection itself Gilbert sums up as "like trying to finish a crossword puzzle—in a train going headlong toward a crash."

Gilbert realistically and wittily captures the nuances of small talk, between equals and between those of different social rank, as when an older solicitor corrects a younger secretary for spelling errors:

It would appear . . . that you must imagine me to be a highly moral man. . . . But I'm afraid it won't do. . . . When I said, "This is a matter which will have to be conducted entirely by principals," I intended it to be understood that the work would be done by a partner in the firm concerned, not that it would be carried out according to ethical standards.

Gilbert also depicts the traded insults between friends of long acquaintance, the catty remarks between competing women, and the horseplay of men sharing adversity. In fact, Gilbert's sense of place derives more from a sense of personalities and their interrelations than from actual physical description, though his descriptions of English coastal towns, rugged terrain, and courtroom antics are graphic indeed. He details the inner workings and the routines of offices and institutions, providing maps and timetables, and he convincingly describes cricket matches, drinking bouts, good-natured arguments, prison camps, and boarding schools.

ART VERSUS REALITY

Gilbert is quick to call attention to the differences between what would be expected in a traditional detective story and what happens in the reality of his. The defense lawyer in Blood and Judgement (1959) argues that real-life private detectives do not have the friends, the contacts, the finances or the luck of their fictive counterparts, while the one in Death Has Deep Roots expostulates irritably:

Dammit, . . . this isn't a detective story. The murderer doesn't have to be one of the principal characters. It might have been any old enemy of Thoseby's, who happened to choose that moment to finish him off.

The solicitor-detective in The Crack in the Teacup, in dealing with a corrupt local council, comes to realize that all the good people are not necessarily on the side of what he knows is right, while the one in The Body of a Girl must consider not only the motives of the local citizens but also those of the police.

Related to Gilbert's concern with art versus reality is his focus on surface illusions and hidden truths. In The Ninety-second Tiger, what worked in the actor-hero's films proves ludicrous in the face of reality, whose Byzantine twists are always unexpected. The official report in After the Fine Weather (1963) identifies the wrong man as assassin, and the only eyewitness is in peril as she struggles to establish the truth; in turn, the kindly old sea captain in The Empty House proves to be the center of an international storm. In Death of a Favourite Girl (1980), the darling of the television screen proves a spoiled and contrary blackmailer, while the dedicated police officer who demonstrates the investigative failures of his superior proves a devious murderer. Sometimes it takes an outsider to leap the barriers of more orthodox minds and solve the puzzle that has blocked detection. A would-be burglar being held for the police helps a nightwatchman figure out a legal mystery; an actuary sees meaning in a sum that holds no meaning for others; a would-be suicide sees through a faked suicide the police have accepted as genuine. An orthodox mind-set prevents fascist guards from seeing an escape hatch. A simple turn of a kaleidoscope, a shift of the sands, or a change of perspective reveals enemy as heroic friend and trusted ally as deadly enemy. As the puzzle is solved, a shutter is lifted and reality exposed. Clearly, Gilbert's detective and espionage thrillers rise above the limits of their genre.

Gina Macdonald

Updated by Fiona Kelleghan

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

INSPECTOR HAZLERIGG SERIES: Close Quarters, 1947; They Never Looked Inside, 1948 (also known as He Didn't Mind Danger); The Doors Open, 1949; Smallbone Deceased, 1950; Death Has Deep Roots, 1951; Fear to Tread, 1953

PATRICK PETRELLA SERIES: Blood and Judgment, 1959; Petrella at Q, 1977; Young Petrella, 1988; Roller-Coaster, 1993

DANIEL JOSEPH CALDER AND SAMUEL BEHRENS SERIES: Game Without Rules, 1967; Mr. Calder and Mr. Behrens, 1982

WILLIAM MERCER SERIES: The Body of a Girl, 1972; Death of a Favourite Girl, 1980 (also known as The Killing of Katie Steelstock)

LUKE PAGAN SERIES: Ring of Terror, 1995; Into Battle, 1997; Over and Out, 1998

NONSERIES NOVELS: Death in Captivity, 1952 (also known as The Danger Within); Dr. Crippen, 1953; Sky High, 1955 (also known as The Country-House Burglar); Be Shot for Sixpence, 1956; The Claimant, 1957; After the Fine Weather, 1963; The Crack in the Teacup, 1966; The Dust and the Heat, 1967 (also known as Overdrive); The Etruscan Net, 1969 (also known as The Family Tomb); Sir Horace Rumbold, 1973; The Ninety-second Tiger, 1973; Flash Point, 1974; The Night of the Twelfth, 1976; The Law, 1977; The Empty House, 1978; The Final Throw, 1982 (also known as End-Game); The Black Seraphim, 1984; The Long Journey Home, 1985;

Trouble, 1987; Paint, Gold and Blood, 1989; The Queen Against Karl Mullen, 1991

OTHER SHORT FICTION: Stay of Execution, and Other Stories of Legal Practice, 1971; Amateur in Violence, 1973; Anything for a Quiet Life, and Other New Mystery Stories, 1990; The Man Who Hated Banks, and Other Mysteries, 1997; The Mathematics of Murder: A Fearn and Bracknell Collection, 2000; The Curious Conspiracy, and Other Crimes, 2002

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

PLAYS: A Clean Kill, pr. 1959; The Bargain, pr., pb. 1961; The Shot in Question, pr., pb. 1963; Windfall, pr., pb. 1963

RADIO PLAYS: Death in Captivity, 1952; The Man Who Could Not Sleep, 1955; Crime Report, 1956; Doctor at Law, 1956; The Waterloo Table, 1957; You Must Take Things Easy, 1958; Stay of Execution, 1965; Game Without Rules, 1968; The Last Chapter, 1970; Black Light, 1972; Flash Point, 1974; Petrella, 1976; In the Nick of Time, 1979; The Last Tenant, 1979; The Oyster Catcher, 1983

TELEPLAYS: The Crime of the Century, 1956; Wideawake, 1957; Crime Report, 1958; Fair Game, 1958; The Body of a Girl, 1958; Blackmail Is So Difficult, 1959; Dangerous Ice, 1959; A Clean Kill, 1961; Scene of the Accident, 1961; The Men from Room Thirteen, 1961; The Betrayers, 1962; Trial Run, 1963; The Blackmailing of Mr. S, 1964; The Mind of the Enemy, 1965; Misleading Cases, 1971 (with Christopher Bond); Money to Burn, 1974; Where There's a Will, 1975

NONFICTION: The Law, 1977; "Fraudsters": Six Against the Law, 1986; The Oxford Book of Legal Anecdotes, 1986 (reprinted with corrections)

EDITED TEXTS: Best Detective Stories of Cyril Hare, 1959; Crime in Good Company: Essays on Criminals and Crime-Writing, 1959; The Oxford Book of Legal Anecdotes, 1987; Prep School: An Anthology, 1991

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bargainnier, Earl F. Twelve Englishmen of Mystery. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1984. Gilbert is one of the twelve British mystery writers who form the subject of this study.

Dove, George N. The Police Procedural. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1982. Compares Gilbert's police-procedural fiction to the work of other writers in the subgenre. Bibliographic references and index.

Gilbert, Michael. Interview by Mike Stotter. Mystery Scene 53 (May-June, 1996): 30-31, 66. Brief but illuminating interview with the author.

_____. "Quantity and Quality." In Colloquium on Crime: Eleven Renowned Mystery Writers Discuss Their Work, edited by Robin W. Winks. New York: Scribner, 1986. Gilbert's take on both his own fiction and the craft of mystery fiction as such.

_____. "Quite Simply a Great Man." In Julian Symons Remembered: Tributes from Friends, collected by Jack Walsdorf and Kathleen Symons. Council Bluffs, Iowa: Yellow Barn Press, 1996. Gilbert's tribute to his fellow author is revealing of his own values and beliefs with regard to the craft of writing.

Jecks, Michael. Foreword to Crime on the Move: The Official Anthology of the Crime Writers' Association, edited by Martin Edwards. London: Do-Not, 2005. Jecks comments on Gilbert's story, "Case for Gourmets," as well as on the work of twenty-one other contributors to this anthology.

Penzler, Otto. "Patrick Petrella." In The Great Detective. Boston: Little, Brown, 1978. Argues for the place of Gilbert's creations among history's greatest fictional detectives.

Roth, Marty. Foul and Fair Play: Reading Genre in Classic Detective Fiction. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1995. A post-structural analysis of the conventions of mystery and detective fiction. Examines 138 short stories and works from the 1840's to the 1960's. Helps place Gilbert in the broader genre.

Rzepka, Charles J. Detective Fiction. Malden, Mass.: Polity, 2005. An important entry in the cultural studies of police and detective fiction, looking at the genre both as revealing of and influencing the cultures that produce it. Provides a perspective for understanding Gilbert. Bibliographic references and index.

B. M. GILL

Barbara Margaret Trimble

Born: Holyhead, North Wales, Great Britain;
February 15, 1921

Also wrote as Margaret Blake

Types of plot: Master sleuth; psychological

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Tom Maybridge, 1980-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

DETECTIVE CHIEF INSPECTOR TOM MAYBRIDGE is married to Meg, an English expert in Restoration prose. They have one grown son, whose name is not given. Maybridge is described as "a benign-looking middle-aged man, short-legged and big-paunched . . .

more impressive when seated." He wears gold-rimmed glasses and has a steady, piercing gaze that he uses to unnerve suspects during interrogation. A gentle, caring man, he appears cold and impersonal, but in reality he gets too emotionally involved in his cases and sometimes permits his feelings to cloud his judgment.

CONTRIBUTION

Two of B. M. Gill's mystery novels, Victims (1980) and Seminar for Murder (1985), are tightly written police procedurals with high puzzle value and fairly conventional "whodunit" plots. Death Drop (1979) and The Twelfth Juror (1984) are psychological portraits of victims, criminals, bereaved families, and innocent bystanders all trapped together by tragic events and emotional stresses beyond their control. The Fifth Rapunzel (1991) combines elements of both. Nursery Crimes (1986) is a sardonic analysis of a six-year-old murderess who wipes out pesky playmates and interfering adults with the cool aplomb of a baby Lizzie Borden.

Gill's greatest contribution to the mystery genre lies in her ability to button herself (and her readers) into the skins of her characters. Their deeds and psyches are not merely described but rendered as well. Gill makes her readers feel each emotion—from humor to horror—and think each thought along with the character. Gill's versatility in several genres and her emotional range are remarkable.

BIOGRAPHY

B. M. Gill was born Barbara Margaret Gill on February 15, 1921, the daughter of an Irish sea captain and his Welsh wife. Gill began writing at the age of eight, after her father encouraged the imaginative child to set down her stories about secret passages and mysterious doings. In accordance with her mixed parentage, the young Gill was educated at a convent school but attended a Presbyterian church on Sundays. This contradictory religious upbringing is reflected in Nursery Crimes, Gill's most comical, most chilling, and best-written novel.

After leaving school at the age of fifteen, Gill worked in the Trinity House Office in Holyhead, "learning about buoys, lighthouses and Elder Brethren." She worked there until her marriage at the age of twenty-one to a Mr. Trimble, whom she has not fully named or discussed in interviews. The marriage soon ended in divorce, leaving Barbara Margaret Trimble with a young son, Roger, to support. Casting about for a profession that would allow her to work at home, Gill trained as a chiropodist and set up a private practice for four years. She then retrained as a nursery school teacher and taught for fourteen years in a village school in Somerset.

While teaching, Gill began writing radio scripts and short stories for Chambers Journal and John O'London, two literary magazines. Using the pseudonym Margaret Blake, she also began writing romantic suspense novels that were serialized in Woman and Woman's Own. Encouraged by the steady sale of her writing, Gill quit her teaching job, only to discover that because of rapid inflation she could not support herself by writing alone. She therefore returned to chiropody and worked in a public health clinic for six more years before retiring.

On retirement, Gill returned to her mother's native Anglesby in Wales, resumed her maiden name, and began writing detective stories. Her first novel, Target Westminster (1977), deals with a plot to blow up the House of Parliament. Her second book, Death Drop, revolves around a grieving father's attempt to discover the truth about his son's "accidental" death at a school outing; this work was reprinted in the United States and was nominated for an Edgar Allan Poe Award. Gill's postretirement career as a mystery writer was well on its way. Her fourth book, The Twelfth Juror, won Great Britain's top crime award, the Gold Dagger, as well as a second Edgar nomination in the United States.

ANALYSIS

B. M. Gill's three novels featuring Detective Chief Inspector Tom Maybridge are Victims (published in the United States as Suspect), Seminar for Murder, and The Fifth Rapunzel. The first two are tightly written, well-paced police procedurals with a conventionally crafted whodunit denouement. The Fifth Rapunzel, the third in the series, was less well received but still fit within any description of a Maybridge novel. Gill's compassion for her characters, both innocent and guilty, and her insight into the emotional forces that drive them set her novels apart from typical police procedurals. The opening paragraph of Victims depicts the killer tenderly arranging Margaret McKendrick's corpse in a halo of dandelion leaves and admiring his victim's beauty and the glory of the clear August night. The book's closing line, "Paul accepted," depicts the victim's father as he learns to live with his bereavement and to appreciate the innocent pleasure of a golden autumnal morning. Between these two passages, between the night of the killer and the dawn of restored order, Gill takes her readers into some very dark recesses of the human mind. Some of the kindest and gentlest of the characters prove to have twisted, cruel souls; some of the most loutish and brutal ones have tender, poetic hearts; some of the most noble and worthy ones die.

Gill's technique is to move her narrative in and out of the minds and lives of the various characters. The reader develops his own sympathies and suspicions as the plot unfolds. The killer is cleverly disguised amid the other characters, and his thoughts and feelings are probed as deeply and clearly as anyone else's. The reader learns to like him and identifies with his problems, so the final revelation produces not only pleasure but also an emotional pang.

Gill's greatest skill as a writer lies in her ability to keep her own personality concealed. She unfolds the varying aspects of her characters through their own thoughts and inner soliloquies, without an intrusive author's voice describing these people and directing the reader's judgment. Nevertheless, despite the absence of overt authorial didacticism, a strong moral message about personal and civic responsibility emerges.

The character of Tom Maybridge is not employed as a mask for the author. He is merely one of several police officers conducting the investigation into the multiple murders that suddenly plague City Hospital and this nameless English town. Maybridge himself has only a surname in Victims and was probably not originally intended to be a series character. When he reappears in Seminar for Murder, however, he has acquired a first name, a scholarly wife, and a more fleshed-out personality.

SEMINAR FOR MURDER

In Seminar for Murder, Maybridge accepts an invitation to lecture to a group of eminent mystery writers at the annual Golden Guillotine awards banquet. With his wife in America lecturing on Restoration prose, Maybridge feels compelled to demonstrate his own erudition in the field of police forensics. He is able to expose the methodological errors of virtually every member of the august literary assemblage. His pleasure in his own cleverness is considerably dampened, however, when the association's president is found dead in bed, a skewer through his throat and a note taped to the headboard: Fault This Murder, Detective Chief Inspector Maybridge, If You Can.

Maybridge finds the murder hard to fault, indeed, as one suspect is found murdered and others provide unshakable alibis. He feels humiliated and also guilty, believing that his caustic demolition of the writers' plots motivated Sir Godfrey Grant's murder. Nevertheless, he struggles valiantly with the case. Despite his best efforts, his emotional involvement in the case clouds his judgment so thoroughly that he does not really solve it until several months after the official investigation has ended. Even then, it is the killer's voluntary confession that forces Maybridge to acknowledge how far off the mark he has been.

DEATH DROP

Although the Maybridge novels are entertaining and far superior to most others of their genre, they are not Gill's best efforts. Death Drop, The Twelfth Juror, and especially Nursery Crimes are rare treats for the reader. Filled with violence, passion, twisted love, and noble intentions gone awry, they haunt the mind like Freudian dream images.

Death Drop, Gill's second novel and the first to be nominated for an Edgar Award, deals with a grieving father's attempt to discover the truth about his twelve-year-old son's death during a school outing. Young David Fleming has fallen down the hold of a ship at the Maritime Museum, and the headmaster and teaching staff of exclusive Marrison Grange all sympathize with John Fleming over the tragedy of his son's accident. Their main concern is to avoid a lawsuit stemming from negligence charges.

Fleming does not believe that his son died accidentally, however, and proving the school's negligence would be balm for his own guilty conscience. Fleming's secret concern is that David may have committed suicide. Ruth Fleming, David's mother, has recently died of cancer, and the child suffered a second bereavement when his father, preoccupied with his own grief and busy with his professional travels, placed him at Marrison Grange, a typical upper-class British boys' school with all the usual hazing and casual brutality that young boys in packs can inflict on one another. Was David unhappy enough in that environment to kill himself?

Although John Fleming is the main character, he is not the ruling consciousness throughout the book.

Again, Gill permits the reader to experience the doubt, guilt, sadness, joy, hope, pain, fear, and love felt by the various characters. All minds are probed; all thoughts and emotions are shared. Brannigan, the headmaster of Marristone Grange, is torn between his basic decency and love of truth and his need to protect the school. Jenny Renshaw, the young infirmary matron, and Thirza Crayshaw, Fleming's sophisticated lawyer, try to maintain their professional objectivity while falling in love with the handsome, troubled widower. Fleming himself is torn between his desire to avenge his son's death and his reluctant pity for David's unhappy killer, whose identity becomes clear fairly early in the book. While the murderer's identity is easy to guess, his motive remains obscure until the last few chapters. When it is finally revealed, the reader feels pain and pity for the sad, lost killer, whose special good and special curse has been his thwarted capacity to love.

THE TWELFTH JUROR

The Twelfth Juror is another study in twisted love and noble intentions gone awry. Robert Quinn, a middle-aged dropout from journalism and upper-class respectability, welcomes Frances, the troubled daughter of a murder victim, into his home, which is shared by a genial crew of street singers. The girl's father, television personality Edward Carne, is on trial for the murder of his wife. When Quinn finds himself selected as the twelfth juror at Edward Carne's trial, however, he must choose between his sympathy for the pathetic young girl and his duty toward the law. He decides to remain on the jury and to win acquittal for Edward Carne, whose innocence he alternately believes in and doubts. Her father's freedom will be Quinn's gift to Frances, his way of curing her alcoholism and her troubled mind. Basking smugly in the nobility of his motives, he succumbs to hubris in believing that he is above the law and that his reasoning ability and judgment are stronger and truer than those of the other eleven jurors combined. As inexorably as fate in a Greek tragedy, Quinn's well-intentioned arrogance leads to a bloody climax in which the guilty and innocent are destroyed together. Once again, Gill has presented a psychologically complex cast of characters who are motivated by misplaced love and frustration at their inability to find a gentler outlet for their passions.

NURSERY CRIMES

Nursery Crimes, Gill's finest novel, is the lethally humorous tale of Zanny Moncrief, a cherubic six-year-old murderess who coolly and efficiently dispatches anyone who thwarts her desires. The story is set during the days of the London Blitz, and Zanny's first victim is little Willie Morton, a slum evacuee whom she drowns when he teases her and tries to appropriate her toys. Clare and Graham Moncrief, Zanny's parents, fight hard to stifle their growing certainty that their beloved child is a cold-blooded killer. Willie's older sister, Dolly, has witnessed the murder, and Zanny must buy her silence with a toy perambulator. She intends to retrieve her treasure by shoving Dolly under a passing bread truck, but the wily slum child dodges at the last moment, and Evans, the kindly bread-truck driver, swerves into a wall and dies in a spectacularly flaming wreck.

The terrified Moncriefs, still determined to protect their erring child, send her and Dolly to the shelter of a convent school, in the hope that the restricted environment will limit Zanny's scope for homicide. Several years pass, the convent's population has not been decimated, and Zanny's parents breathe easier—until the fifteen-year-old girl develops an adolescent passion for Murphy, the convent gardener, who is in love with Bridget O'Hare, a physical education teacher. Soon Bridget's battered body is discovered at the foot of a rocky ocean cliff, and Murphy is convicted of her murder. In her attempt to clear Murphy's name without implicating herself, Zanny disposes of a troublesome judge and several hapless nuns. She finally even tries to confess, but the authorities dismiss her story as the hysterical babbling of an infatuated child. Only Dolly and her parents know the truth about Zanny, and they cannot bring themselves to reveal their knowledge. Dolly's silence is motivated by a healthy desire for self-preservation; the Moncriefs' silence stems from their guilty love. Regardless of their motives, those closest to Zanny become her accomplices as the body count climbs ever higher.

Zanny is no inexplicable genetic monster. She is the logical product of wartime England, in which entire neighborhoods full of people vanish in a single moment of the Blitz. Graham Moncrief, Zanny's father, is a bomber pilot who makes German neighborhoods disappear in the same way. He is rewarded and called a hero for his deeds. Observing the values of the adults around her, Zanny learns to take what she wants, when she wants it, by any means available. Her first year at the convent does instill an inchoate sense of guilt and responsibility in the still-malleable child, and on the occasion of her first confession she tries to tell the priest what she has done. The kindly Father Donovan is certain that the blonde angel before him has been reading too many nasty comics; he laughs and tells her to say three Hail Marys. Analyzing the priest's reaction, the child quite logically concludes that her victims are now safe with Jesus, so murder cannot really be much of a sin at all. Thus shaped and encouraged by all the societal forces around her, Zanny is not a moral freak but a perfectly natural product of her upbringing. Gill's genius lies in making the reader accept this grotesque conclusion with an amused chuckle.

Beneath the entertainment offered by her books, however, Gill presents the reader with several disquieting themes and moral lessons. Sexuality is a potentially dangerous force and should not be ignored or unnaturally suppressed. It must be channeled into a loving, committed relationship. Compassion and love, too, can be dangerous when they are carelessly bestowed on the wrong people at the wrong time. Gill's presentation of these lessons is never didactic or obtrusive. She hides her authorial voice beneath her graceful prose and allows her characters and their deeds to speak for themselves.

Zohara Boyd

Updated by Janet Alice Long

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

TOM MAYBRIDGE SERIES: Victims, 1980 (also known as Suspect); Seminar for Murder, 1985; The Fifth Rapunzel, 1991

NONSERIES NOVELS: Target Westminster, 1977; Death Drop, 1979; The Twelfth Juror, 1984; Nursery Crimes, 1986; Dying to Meet You, 1988; Time and Time Again, 1989

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS (AS BLAKE): Stranger at the Door, 1967; Bright Sun, Dark Shadow, 1968; The Rare and the Lovely, 1969; The Elusive Exile, 1971; Courier to Danger, 1973; Flight from Fear, 1973; Apple of Discord, 1975; Walk Softly and Beware, 1977

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Callendar, Newgate. "Crime." Review of Death Drop, by B. M. Gill. The New York Times, September 28, 1980, p. A20. Reviewer praises Gill's ability to portray disturbed states of mind.
- Priestman, Martin. The Cambridge Companion to Crime Fiction. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003. An excellent general reference that offers much insight into the genre. Contains a chapter on postwar British crime fiction.
- Reynolds, Moira Davison. Women Authors of Detective Series: Twenty-one American and British Authors, 1900-2000. Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland, 2001. Contains information on female writers of detective series. While Gill is not covered, the essays provide context for her work.
- Talbert, Nancy Ellen. "B. M. Gill." In Great Women Mystery Writers, edited by Kathleen Gregory Klein. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994. This valuable source places Gill in critical context with other women writing on similar themes.
- Virginia Quarterly Review*. Review of Time and Time Again, by B. M. Gill. 66, no. 3 (Summer, 1990): S97. Review of work in which Maeve Barclay has served time for injuring a police officer during a demonstration and her alienation from her former life draws her into crime. Reviewer praises the clarity of Gill's writing.

DOROTHY GILMAN

Born: New Brunswick, New Jersey; June 25, 1923

Also wrote as Dorothy Gilman Butters

Types of plot: Amateur sleuth; comedy caper; espionage; private investigator; cozy

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Mrs. Pollifax, 1966-

Countess Karitska, 1975-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

MRS. EMILY POLLIFAX, a suburban matron—widowed, preoccupied with civic responsibility, the garden club, and environmental concerns—becomes a part-time agent and courier for the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA). She is convinced that life need not be placid and monotonous for women in their sixties who wish to follow their dreams.

CONTRIBUTION

Dorothy Gilman's novels featuring the eccentric and charming Emily Pollifax appeal widely to young and old, having developed a considerable following since their introduction in 1966. The first novel in the series, The Unexpected Mrs. Pollifax (1966), became a film starring Rosalind Russell under the title Mrs. Pollifax—Spy in 1971. A second adaptation, the Columbia Broadcasting Service television movie The Unexpected Mrs. Pollifax, was released in 1999 with Angela Lansbury cast as the aging sleuth.

Gilman has earned wide acclaim for the quality of her storytelling. Blending humor and intrigue, her works are rooted in the Cold War era and explore topics such as international espionage, life in iron-curtain countries, the emerging nations of the Third World, terrorism, political assassination, aid to endangered dissidents, and the role of double agents.

Despite their subject matter, Gilman's novels are not violent. Reviewers have commented on their wholesome and upbeat entertainment value. Evil is defeated. Good and Mrs. Pollifax prevail over very real danger. The direct quality of the prose makes the characters and the plots plausible. Mrs. Pollifax knows that dedicated and determined individuals can make a difference and that the discovery of one's true self produces deep reservoirs of endurance and courage to meet the most unexpected challenges.

A prolific writer of fiction for young and adult readers, Gilman has contributed to numerous publications, including On Creative Writing (1964). Her short fiction has appeared in such magazines as Redbook, Ladies' Home Journal, Cosmopolitan and Writer. Gilman received the Catholic Book Award for A Nun in the Closet (1975).

BIOGRAPHY

Dorothy Gilman was born in New Brunswick, New Jersey, June 25, 1923. The daughter of a clergyman, she was reared in a parsonage. Early in her life, she felt a need to express herself in writing, creating a six-page magazine that she circulated among parishioners. Educated as an artist at the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, Gilman was awarded the William Emlen Cresson European Scholarship in 1944. During that period, however, she audited writing classes at the University of Pennsylvania whenever time permitted, and her love of writing was nurtured.

In 1944 Gilman married Edgar A. Butters, Jr., and became the mother of two sons. During the twenty-odd years of her marriage, she taught as an instructor in drawing at the Samuel Fleischer Art Memorial for a period but enjoyed her greatest success as a writer of juvenile fiction that examined a wide array of subjects. In 1965 she was divorced, and the next year she began writing novels for an adult audience. When her younger son left for college, she purchased an old house and acreage in Nova Scotia and embarked on a new kind of life, pursuing her own serenity and self-knowledge. Rewarding and refreshing, this experience became the subject of an autobiography in 1978. She has continued writing her Pollifax series and a newer series featuring the character Countess Karitska first introduced in The Clairvoyant Countess (1975).

ANALYSIS

Humor is a vital component of Dorothy Gilman's mystery fiction as well as her young-adult writing. For Gilman, humor is "a distortion or exaggeration of reality . . . that appeals to the sense of the ludicrous or the absurd." She admits that there are some things that cannot be treated humorously, that simply are not amusing. Gilman uses humor to avoid violence. Sometimes described as too gentle for the genre, her novels never contain clinical, detailed descriptions of murder, though some violent episodes do occur. In essence, Gilman finds humor an "escape from pain, a stepping back from the event to observe it and defend the self by turning the pain into something else." Despite its limitations, and the necessity of abandoning some efforts, Gilman's final advice is that "if one has an eye for the absurd, one should put that talent to work."

Gilman uses her considerable sense of humor to good effect in A Nun in the Closet, a novel noted as much for its humor as its plot. She places two cloistered nuns in the middle of a tangle of likable leftover people from the 1960's: members of the Mafia, a crooked sheriff, migrant workers, and a mysterious stranger found wounded in the bedroom closet of a deteriorating estate. Add a guru, drugs, and thousands of dollars in a suitcase, and one has all of the ingredients for a puzzle that Sister John, another of Gilman's strong, resourceful women, must resolve. The potential for humor in having two nuns leave a cloister after twenty years to enter a world they never knew, coping with experiences and language entirely alien to them, is limitless.

Gilman's sense of humor is obvious in her writing, and it is a part of her work that she has discussed in a brief article entitled "Humor in the Mystery Novel," published in The Writer in 1978. She states that writing humor is neither easy nor natural. Because she believes that novels are "constructed," the use of humor complicates the construction process. "Humor is 95 percent craft, and at least 50 percent of that is timing," Gilman says. It is an undertaking that is, at best, "laborious." Because humor cannot carry a novel without a story line that sustains it, the author may virtually write the story twice. Gilman is aware of the differences in quality of humor; it may be subtle or broad, whimsical or black, satirical or witty. Her favorite devices are contrast, incongruity, distortion, or exaggeration, as when an elderly widow prevents a political assassination or nuns confront hired killers in the act of murder.

In all her work Gilman's style is simple, direct, and often dramatic, perhaps a result of her long apprenticeship in children's literature. The key to teaching children is often the use of clear, simple, and dramatic statement. Her books may be read quickly because her sentences follow one another in compact paragraphs that are built one on another.

Gilman began to develop her characters when she was very young, although she describes herself as lacking in insight and experience to bring them to completion. In a brief piece entitled "A Particular Bent," Gilman revealed that she had conceived the pattern for Mrs. Pollifax at the age of eighteen, when she created a character she called Miss Crispin. Miss Crispin, in turn, had grown from her experience as a child with the interesting and elderly women she had known in her father's church. She described them as "dowager types, feminists, matriarchs, soft little busybodies, and a few who were gently mad." Many of them were eccentric and "strikingly uninhibited and liberated for their time." They were, as Gilman says, her "babysitters," who brought her "little treasures" and who bought her magazine and told her stories. Gilman's characters spring from her own experience, informed and completed by long practice at the exacting craft of writing.

THE TIGHTROPE WALKER

One of Gilman's strengths is the tightly constructed plot, nowhere more satisfactorily achieved than in The Tightrope Walker (1979). In this book a young woman, Amelia Jones, who has experienced emotional problems and is searching for interior peace and self-knowledge, finds a clue to a possible murder that may have happened years earlier. In the best tradition of the amateur sleuth, Amelia unravels the tragedy step-by-step. At the end, the reader has no nagging questions or unanswered frustrations but a lucid account of the murder, the participants, and the motive. A final desperate effort of the murderer to silence Amelia makes for a thrilling conclusion in which all the loose ends are nicely tied. Not only has the heroine solved the case, she has solved many of her own doubts and difficulties and found love as well.

A NEW KIND OF COUNTRY

In her autobiography A New Kind of Country (1978), Gilman shares with her readers her personal odyssey for self-knowledge and her discovery of another kind of life. Leaving behind her old life and habitat, she shook off all the nonessentials. On the stark but beautiful coastline of Nova Scotia, a landscape of lighthouses, sand, seaweed, and weathered cottages, she went through a period of self-testing as well as self-discovery. In searching out her neighbors—lobster fishermen and townspeople—she yielded years of seeking privacy to a new sense of community and belonging.

Despite the hard work of growing or gathering food, the simplicity of long walks along the beach and time apart from former distractions heightened an awareness of and sensitivity to the treasures of nature in Gilman. There was time for introspection and for reading, for contemplation of philosophy and new points of view. The book, simply written, is revealing of the author and her interests. It is also extremely useful for an overview of the author's work as many of her interests are reflected in her fiction.

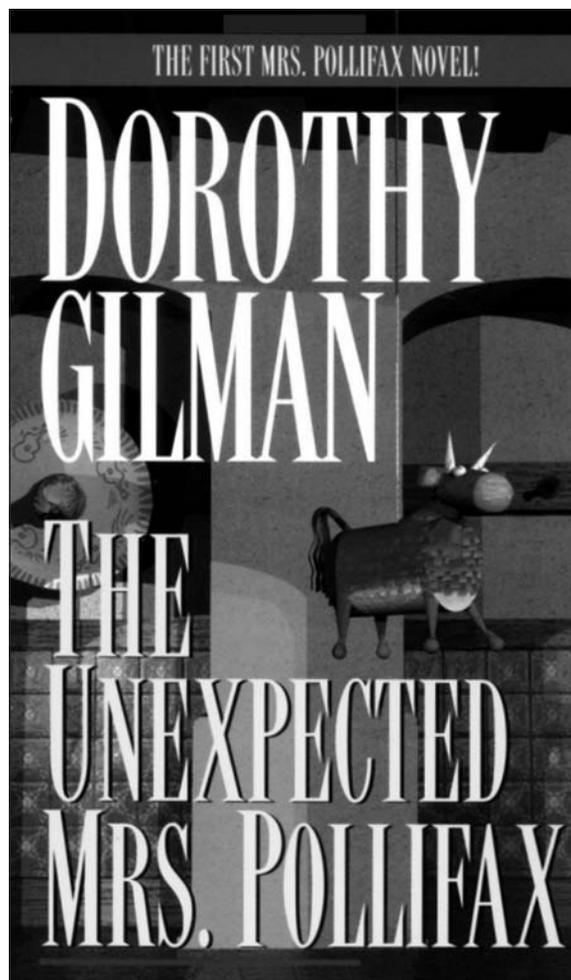

THE UNEXPECTED MRS. POLLIFAX

Gilman had already achieved success as an author of twelve books of juvenile literature when she produced her first volume of espionage mystery for adults. The Unexpected Mrs. Pollifax introduced Gilman's best-known heroine and established Mrs. Pollifax's career as a part-time agent for the CIA. Mrs. Pollifax is a very strong woman and very much her own person. Possessed of charm, a splendid sense of humor, sympathy for the human condition, and an ability to rise to unforeseen challenges, she is an entertaining character.

Mrs. Pollifax has had a full life. Now widowed, she has a grown son and daughter who live far away, and although good relations evidently exist, her children no longer need her vigilant attention. Her life could be pleasant and tranquil with her flowers, friends, and good works, but that is not enough. Because as a girl she had longed to be a spy, she offered her services to the CIA, which accepted her reluctantly but continues to give her assignments as a result of her impressive successes. Although Mrs. Pollifax's activities cause her superiors some concern—she manages always to become involved in circumstances and with people beyond the scope of her specific objectives—her accomplishments are always remarkable.

White-haired, a grandmother, yet indefatigable, Mrs. Pollifax seems an unlikely figure to serve as a special agent. It is a tribute to the author that her role is made convincing. Her improbability becomes an asset to the organization she serves. No one is less likely to arouse suspicion than this amiable woman whose life is devoted to her clubs and to environmental concerns. Even her penchant for large hats of ornate design contributes to Mrs. Pollifax's success. On one courier mission, ten documents are hidden in such a hat and handily smuggled into a totalitarian country.

It seems inevitable that Mrs. Pollifax should be compared to Agatha Christie's Miss Jane Marple. Although both are older women whose lives and experience give scope to their analytical powers, they are quite different. Miss Marple rarely leaves her quiet village except for brief holidays. Mrs. Pollifax may be kidnapped in Mexico and land in an Albanian prison. She may find herself in a convalescent hospital in Switzerland, on safari in Africa, or on the Silk Road in China. Mrs. Pollifax is involved in official espionage activity, while Miss Marple is an amateur sleuth. Mrs. Pollifax is more active physically than Jane Marple. After her Albanian adventure, she studies the martial arts and earns a Brown Belt in karate.

MRS. POLLIFAX UNVEILED

In Mrs. Pollifax Unveiled (2000), the fourteenth installment of the adventures of Gilman's grandmotherly super spy, Mrs. Pollifax forsakes her garden club to recover Amanda Pym, a young American who foiled an airline hijacking and subsequently disappeared in Damascus, Syria.

Posing as the young woman's aunt, Mrs. Pollifax and her sometime colleague Farrell join forces to uncover Amanda's whereabouts, following the thinnest of clues and evading cohorts of unknown enemies along the way. When Farrell is captured and tortured, Mrs. Pollifax must carry on alone until she enlists the help of an American archeologist who proves to be unexpectedly resourceful.

The unlikeliest of field generals, Mrs. Pollifax manages her assets masterfully to extract Amanda from the sniper-training compound where she is being held. Getting the young woman, and herself, safely out of the desert, however, proves much more challenging. Gilman adds considerable depth to the mystery by including meticulous details about local Arab culture, political analysis, and even Babylonian verse.

KALEIDOSCOPE

In Kaleidoscope (2002), Gilman returns to her intrepid and mystically minded heroine Countess Karitska, who was first introduced in the 1975 novel The Clairvoyant Countess. The divinator-turned-detective overcame hostility and skepticism to become a valued consultant to her friend Detective Lieutenant Pruden in the earlier novel through her skill at psychometry—acquiring knowledge of a person simply by touching an object connected to that person.

Kaleidoscope finds the countess once again teamed up with Trafton police detective Pruden and at the center of numerous mysteries to be solved. The numerous characters that fall under the countess's magical touch include the ruthless murderer of a young violinist, a Maine-based madman with apocalyptic ambitions, a young deaf girl wrongly accused, a socialite struggling against chronic apathy, and a timid young artist in search of confidence.

For Gilman, art follows life. Unattractive human traits of cruelty, greed, jealousy, and violence may exist in the world as in literature, but in her suspense stories they are balanced by humor, skill, self-mastery, tolerance, and decency.

Anne R. Vizzier

Updated by Philip Bader

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

MRS. POLLIFAX SERIES: The Unexpected Mrs. Pollifax, 1966 (also known as Mrs. Pollifax, Spy); The Amazing Mrs. Pollifax, 1970; The Elusive Mrs. Pollifax, 1971; A Palm for Mrs. Pollifax, 1973; Mrs. Pollifax on Safari, 1977; Mrs. Pollifax on the China Station, 1983; Mrs. Pollifax and the Hong Kong Buddha, 1985; Mrs. Pollifax and the Golden Triangle, 1987; Mrs. Pollifax and the Whirling Dervish, 1990; Mrs. Pollifax and the Second Thief, 1993; Mrs. Pollifax Pursued, 1995; Mrs. Pollifax and the Lion Killer, 1996; Mrs. Pollifax, Innocent Tourist, 1997; Mrs. Pollifax Unveiled, 2000

COUNTESS KARITSKA SERIES: The Clairvoyant Countess, 1975; Kaleidoscope, 2002

NONSERIES NOVELS: Uncertain Voyage, 1967; A Nun in the Closet, 1975; The Tightrope Walker, 1979

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Incident at Badamya, 1989; Caravan, 1992; Thale's Folly, 1999

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE (AS BUTTERS): Enchanted Caravan, 1949; Carnival Gypsy, 1950; Ragamuffin Alley, 1951; The Calico Year, 1953; Four-Party Line, 1954; Papa Dolphin's Table, 1955; Girl in Buckskin, 1956; Heartbreak Street, 1958; Witch's

Silver, 1959; Masquerade, 1961; Ten Leagues to Boston Town, 1962; The Bells of Freedom, 1963

NONFICTION: A New Kind of Country, 1978

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cargill, Ann Sanders. "Dorothy Gilman." In Great Women Mystery Writers: Classic to Modern, edited by Kathleen Gregory Klein. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994. Contains a study of Gilman's life and writing. This work contains many similar authors and a list of Internet resources for mystery and crime-fiction enthusiasts.

Cava, Frances A. Sleuths in Skirts: A Bibliography and Analysis of Serialized Female Sleuths. Oxford: Routledge, 2002. Briefly discusses Gilman's work in the context of the changing roles of female detectives through the last century and in relation to the works of similar authors.

Giffone, Tony. "Disoriented in the Orient: The Representation of the Chinese in Two Contemporary Mystery Novels." In Cultural Power/Cultural Lit- eracy, edited by Bonnie Braendin. Tallahassee: Florida State University Press, 1991. A cultural study of ethnic depictions of Chinese in Gilman's Mrs. Pollifax on the China Station and Ruth Rendell's A Speaker of Mandarin (1983).

Gilman, Dorothy. Interview. The Writer 91 (July, 1978): 13-15. Gilman is interviewed about her life and work, with an emphasis on the success of her Mrs. Pollifax series.

_____. A New Kind of Country. Garden City, N.Y.: Doubleday, 1978. Gilman's autobiography looks at her life from a new perspective, after moving to a small house in a lobstering village. Provides insights into her writing.

Herbert, Rosemary, ed. The Oxford Companion to Crime and Mystery Writing. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999. Encyclopedia-style reference work on detective fiction includes several references to Gilman in relevant entries. Bibliographic references and index.

WILLIAM GODWIN

Born: Wisbech, Isle of Ely, Cambridgeshire, England; March 3, 1756

Died: London, England; April 7, 1836

Also wrote as Edward Baldwin

Types of plot: Inverted; psychological

CONTRIBUTION

Whereas the modern detective novel is based mainly on nineteenth century views of realism and individualist psychology, William Godwin's masterpiece and only work of detective fiction, Things as They Are: Or, The Adventures of Caleb Williams (1794; best known as Caleb Williams), looks back to eighteenth century forms of literature where problems of communication and of class structure are major themes. Mystery and detection per se are always secondary in Godwin's work to subjects such as the inequities of the English legal system, the relation between guilt and innocence, and the links between power and knowledge in the personal, legal, and political spheres.

Caleb Williams had a profound and direct political impact, and it continues to hold its place as one of the finest English novels. It provoked a storm of reaction when published and exerted a profound influence on the mystery writing of nineteenth century authors such as Edward Bulwer-Lytton, Charles Dickens, and Edgar Allan Poe. It has been translated into French, German, Russian, and Polish.

BIOGRAPHY

William Godwin was born to a Dissenting minister, the seventh of thirteen children. He was reared according to strict Calvinist principles. Physically disadvantaged and intellectually precocious, Godwin began the first of four trial ministries on graduation from London's famous Hoxton Academy. The sermons and personality of the aloof and cerebral Godwin invariably disaffected the small rural congregations to which he was assigned.

William Godwin. (National Portrait Gallery)

Furthermore, beginning around 1780, Godwin's faith in God was eroded by his reading of French philosophers such as Voltaire. Moving to London, Godwin soon involved himself both with the Whig Party and with the radicals. He breakfasted with the noted feminist Mary Wollstonecraft and with Thomas Paine, reading the latter's The Rights of Man (1791-1792) in manuscript. Paine, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, and the events of the French Revolution all contributed to the thoughts expounded in Godwin's most famous theoretical work, An Enquiry Concerning Political Justice and Its Influence on General Virtue and Happiness (1793), a book that made its author the best-known radical political philosopher of his day. Godwin's most famous novel, Caleb Williams, was undertaken as a case study of the principles outlined in this theoretical work. A friend of Godwin, imprisoned in Newgate for sedition in an example of the kind of injustice Godwin was protesting, read the novel in one night. Godwin had the courage to defend his other radical friends with the pamphlet best known as Cursory Strictures (1794) when they came under the charge of high treason for their support of political reform. One of the pieces of evidence used against them was that they had read An Enquiry Concerning Political Justice and Its Influence on General Virtue and Happiness without expressing condemnation. The radicals were acquitted.

Godwin married Mary Wollstonecraft, who was already three months pregnant, in 1797. She died of septicemia shortly after childbirth. Godwin paid tribute to his brilliant and unconventional wife in Memoirs of Mary Wollstonecraft (1798). Their daughter, Mary, who caused Godwin much anguish when she eloped with his most fervent and most poetically talented admirer, Percy Bysshe Shelley, was later to follow in her father's footsteps; among other works, she wrote the celebrated gothic novel Frankenstein (1818).

Since the early 1780's, Godwin had made a precarious living as a professional writer. His plays were either rejected or damned on production. Other than Caleb Williams and St. Leon: A Tale of the Sixteenth Century (1799), his novels were not read with eagerness. More successful were his works of biography (Life of Geoffrey Chaucer, the Early English Poet, 1803) and of history (History of the Commonwealth of England, 1824-1828). His main means of support was a publishing venture in children's literature, called The Juvenile Library, which he had begun with his second wife, Mary Jane Clairmont. This venture was never fully solvent, and the next two decades saw Godwin hounded by creditors until he declared bankruptcy in 1825.

Godwin was acquainted with all the great English Romantics, and he got along with some of them. He always despised Shelley—whose money he repeatedly used to stave off his creditors—for taking his daughter from him. In all, Godwin found only trouble and failure in his later years, until the English government gave its most famous critic a position as yeoman usher of the exchequer. In his last years, Godwin was an avuncular presence, more fond of playing whist than of talking politics. He died of a fever on April 7, 1836.

ANALYSIS

Radical philosopher William Godwin wrote Caleb Williams to embody the principles described in his most well-known work, An Enquiry Concerning Political Justice and Its Influence on General Virtue and Happiness. Therefore, the work was not designed to display feats of detection but rather examine ideas such as guilt, innocence, and justice.

CALEB WILLIAMS

Like a blast of cold wind, the first words of Godwin's masterpiece Caleb Williams tear away the empty sentimentalism and inflated rhetoric that had clothed later eighteenth century English fiction. Caleb Williams curses the results of his being framed for a theft by his master, Falkland:

My life has for several years been a theatre of calamity. I have been a mark for the vigilance of tyranny, and I could not escape. My fairest prospects have been blasted. My enemy has shown himself inaccessible to intreaties and untired in persecution. My fame, as well as my happiness, has become his victim.

The gripping rhythm of the opening sentences is indicative of the novel's magnetic power, which still attracts and holds readers across the gulfs of culture and history. This passage begins the novel's intense focus on the mind of its protagonist and narrator. (Godwin had begun the novel in the third person, but realized that only a first-person account would do.) The passage also highlights the novel's existentialist theme: Calamity has forced Caleb to realize how ultimately alone he really is, how impervious others can be to his plight, and how impossible it is to express truth or guilt.

The brisk style of these sentences is soon superseded by others, however, as Godwin shifts from one genre to another—prompting one critic to entitle his study of the novel “A Question of Genres.” At times Caleb, in telling his story, assumes the role of preacher against injustice (here Godwin is aided by his own background in the ministry). At times Caleb gives objective descriptions of prisons and criminals, in a re-portorial style reminiscent of The Newgate Calendar (1773). The first book of the novel, however, is characterized mostly by the balanced periods and brisk irony of the sentimental novel.

Thus the country gentleman Ferdinando Falkland, who secretly murders a rival squire who had humiliated him, is first described in the language of Samuel Richardson's Sir Charles Grandison (1753-1754) as a paragon of honor, wisdom, and virtue. He is also, like Henry Mackenzie's The Man of Feeling (1771), acutely sensitive and benevolent. (A later Godwin novel, Fleetwood—published in 1805—was subtitled The New Man of Feeling.) Falkland's sentimentalism, however, while at first elevating him, turns to madness as he is led to hate his victim, Tyrrel, by brooding over Tyrrel's part in the death of his innocent ward Emily. This part of the plot is modeled after Richardson's Clarissa (1747-1748). Falkland is finally provoked to secret murder after receiving a beating in public from Tyrrel. Suspected of the murder, Falkland acquits himself through eloquence and reference to his previously unblemished reputation.

Godwin's unique contribution, which has led to Caleb Williams being called—incorrectly—the first psychological novel, opens as Caleb, a poor boy whom Mr. Falkland has taken on as a secretary, begins to suspect his master of Tyrrel's murder and to search for proof of it. It is clear that Caleb's motivations in this search go far beyond idle curiosity. As the following passage indicates, Caleb is stimulated in his investigations not by a disinterested desire for justice, but by a peculiar attraction to Falkland and a Faustian love of knowledge as power:

“This is the murderer! . . . It is out! It is discovered! Guilty on my soul!” While I thus proceeded with hasty steps along the most secret paths of the garden, and from time to time gave vent to the tumult of my thoughts in involuntary exclamations, I felt as if my animal system had undergone a total revolution. My blood boiled within me. I was conscious to a kind of rapture for which I could not account. I was solemn, yet full of rapid emotion, burning with indignation and energy. In the very tempest and hurricane of the passions, I seemed to enjoy the most soul-ravishing calm. I cannot better express the then state of my mind, than by saying, I was never so perfectly alive as at that moment.

Falkland is portrayed as a maniac ravaged by the twin emotions of remorse and pride; one can see from this passage that the justice-seeker Caleb is no less unbalanced than the murderer Falkland.

Falkland finally confesses to the youth, cautioning him that he can only remain alive by never leaving his sphere of influence. The rest of the novel is devoted to a depiction of the strange law of gravity that never allows Caleb to escape Falkland's orbit, yet that also allows him close enough to be destroyed.

When Caleb first attempts to leave, Falkland has him imprisoned on a trumped-up charge of theft. After Caleb is condemned, Godwin has his hero describe the horrors of prison in a documentary style—complete with footnotes—derived from The Newgate Calendar and other examples of criminal biography. These passages are documentations of Godwin's claim, made in An Enquiry Concerning Political Justice and Its Influence on General Virtue and Happiness, that punishment by the state was unnecessary, counterproductive, and usually unjust. The genre of criminal biography continues to dominate as Caleb escapes from prison and is housed by a gang of thieves, before he leaves them to assume a series of disguises as beggar, Irishman, Jew, and cripple.

In these descriptions, however, the novel's existential theme reemerges. Caleb's own personality has been crushed into oblivion by the might of his persecutor; all the figures he impersonates are marginal, despised by society. There are continual twists and turns as Caleb is rejected, abused, and pursued by the authorities and by Falkland's agent, Gines, to the point where several times he contemplates suicide—as one presumes that Falkland has also done. It is Caleb's double battle, with Falkland and with the nothingness to which Falkland would reduce him, which makes the novel so compelling, even horrifying, and which more than compensates for its generic and stylistic instabilities.

The astonishing depth of psychology in Caleb Williams is nowhere better demonstrated than in the series of reversals in the relationship between Falkland and Williams. Each is in turn accuser and accused, master and slave, hunter and hunted, aggressor and victim, police officer and criminal. These stunning reversals occur so swiftly and are expressed with such vigor that they impart to the reader an almost physical shock. The reversals constitute a questioning of the possibility of distinguishing between innocence and guilt.

Thus it is fitting that at the end of the novel, when Caleb finally brings Falkland to trial, the latter "rose from his seat supported by the attendants, and—to my infinite astonishment—threw himself into my arms!" Falkland's innocent guilt touches Caleb's guilty innocence in a final embrace. The contagion of murder passes from one to the other; Falkland dies three days after confessing his crime, and Caleb is left to meditate that "I have been his murderer."

The remarkable relationship between Caleb and Falkland has been subjected to at least three allegorical readings: the political, the psychoanalytic, and the religious. In the opinion of P. N. Furbank, the novel is a "highly dramatized symbolical picture of Godwin himself in the act of writing Political Justice." According to this reading, Godwin believes that he (Caleb Williams) has accused the ancien régime (Falkland) unfairly and with excessive violence and that his rhetoric could end up causing more terror and murder than the established political system has caused. The year 1794 was the time of the Reign of Terror in France under Robespierre, who, like Godwin, ardently admired Rousseau; the year before, Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette had gone to the guillotine. These murders caused many English supporters of the French Revolution to doubt the justice of their cause. Indeed, Caleb Williams is Godwin's farewell to radical writing. His next novel, St. Leon, is told from the point of view not of a working-class person such as Caleb, but of an aristocrat who, like Falkland, commits errors as a result of his absorption with questions of honor and glory.

The interpretation of Caleb's intense curiosity as a neurosis draws on Sigmund Freud's analysis of the Oedipus complex and of the love-hate relationships within families to explain the simultaneous love and mutual persecution between the protagonists. According to some, Caleb's opening of Falkland's trunk—whose contents remain a mystery—means coming into contact with his own unconscious, an event that naturally shatters his peace forever.

The religious reading of Caleb Williams draws on the Calvinist conception of God to explain Falkland's simultaneous benevolence and terrorism. Caleb's curiosity and his contending with the divine realm are sinful and doomed to failure. This reading is justified by Falkland's own comparison of himself with God, by Godwin's Calvinist background, and by his mentioning religious tracts about murder and about religious persecution as sources for the novel. According to Godwin, in John Reynolds's God's Revenge Against Murder and Adultery (1621-1635, revised 1770), "the beam of the eye of Omniscience was represented as perpetually pursuing the guilty, and laying open his most hidden retreats to the light of day." Godwin's remark is interesting for several reasons. It is surprising that the atheist Godwin would consciously choose the relationship between human beings and God as a basis for that between Caleb and Falkland. Also, because Falkland rather than Caleb is represented as omniscient and all-powerful in the novel, the remark suggests that Caleb is the guilty party or, because no character in the novel completely escapes condemnation, the remark at least suggests that he is a guilty party.

The religious motif, however, contradicts Godwin's stated purpose (in a preface withdrawn from the first edition) of presenting through the fiction of Caleb Williams "a general review of the modes of domestic and unrecorded despotism, by which man becomes the destroyer of man." The reader's inability to make a clear moral distinction between Caleb and Falkland counteracts the political message of the novel, which was uppermost in Godwin's conscious mind. Nevertheless, the pictures of prison life, of the robber's trade, and of the social inequality that allows Falkland to make his servant his legal victim, were not lost on eighteenth century English readers.

Another theme common to Caleb Williams and to the genre of detective and mystery fiction is the question of knowledge and legal proof. Its many juridical scenes confront two disparate forms of proof, one rational and the other emotional. Caleb is wrongly condemned by circumstantial and palpable proof, by inductive reasoning. Similarly, disguise and its detection proceed on the basis of the senses. On the other hand, Falkland acquits himself of his murder charge through an eloquence that strikes the hearts rather than the minds of the jurors. Oddly, the climactic scene shows Caleb, who has not the slightest shred of evidence against Falkland, using rhetoric in a similar fashion, not to prove, but to move. (Indeed, Godwin realized this and ended the original manuscript with Falkland's acquittal and Caleb's imprisonment for malicious prosecution.) Caleb Williams would seem to be situated at a crisis point in legal epistemology, between a traditional belief in words, birth, and reputation and a newer methodology of empirical evidence. That Caleb opts for the former and thereby imitates his persecutor Falkland shows once again the interchangeability of the two.

Many of the themes of criminality and mystery that Godwin exploited in Caleb Williams are repeated in his later, rather pedestrian efforts. Like Caleb Williams, the title figure of St. Leon is falsely accused of a crime, the murder of an old man. The aristocrat Alton of Cloudsley (1830) bears a certain resemblance to Falkland. Although good at heart, he perpetrates the crime of kidnaping his brother's heir, so that he may inherit his title. Both Alton and St. Leon share Falkland's inordinate passion for reputation and esteem. The title figure of Deloraine (1833) kills his wife's former husband by mistake. Deloraine, like Caleb, flees and uses disguise in order to avoid justice. The reappearance of these themes, dispersed over various works, reminds the reader of their psychological importance for Godwin. Their concentration into the three hundred pages of Caleb Williams allowed it to become one of the most important, controversial, and influential of English crime novels.

Thomas Beebee

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVEL: Things as They Are: Or, The Adventures of Caleb Williams, 1794 (also known as The Adventures of Caleb Williams: Or, Things as They Are; best known as Caleb Williams)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: St. Leon: A Tale of the Sixteenth Century, 1799; Fleetwood: Or, The New Man of Feeling, 1805; Mandeville, 1817; Cloudesley, 1830; Deloraine, 1833

NONFICTION: An Enquiry Concerning Political Justice and Its Influence on General Virtue and Happiness, 1793; Cursory Strictures on the Charge Delivered by Lord Chief Justice Eyre to the Grand Jury, October 2, 1794, 1794 (best known as Cursory Strictures); Life of Geoffrey Chaucer, the Early English Poet, 1803; Of Population, 1820; History of the Commonwealth of England, 1824-1828 (4 volumes); Political and Philosophical Writings of William Godwin, 1993 (7 volumes)

EDITED TEXT: Memoirs of Mary Wollstonecraft, 1798

MISCELLANEOUS: Collected Novels and Memoirs of William Godwin, 1992 (8 volumes; Mark Philip, editor)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Clemit, Pamela, ed. Godwin. Vol. 1 in Lives of the Great Romantics III: Godwin, Wollstonecraft, and Mary Shelley by Their Contemporaries, edited by John Mullen. Brookfield, Vt.: Pickering & Chatto, 1999. Compendium of critical responses to and personal narratives about William Godwin, written by those who knew him and those who moved in his literary and cultural circles.

Daffron, Eric. "Magnetical Sympathy: Strategies of Power and Resistance in Godwin's Caleb Williams." Criticism 37 (Spring, 1995). A study of Godwin's novel.

Graham, Kenneth W. William Godwin Reviewed: A Reception History, 1783-1834. New York: AMS Press, 2001. A study of the critical reception of Godwin's novels in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. Bibliographic references and index.

Grossman, Jonathan H. "Caleb Williams and the Novel's Forensic Form." In The Art of Alibi: English Law Courts and the Novel. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2002. Study of Godwin's novel explaining its relationship to English forensics and the rules of evidence. Part of an argument that the discourses developed in the courts shaped the form of the British novel.

Pollin, Burton R. Education and Enlightenment in the Works of William Godwin. New York: Las Americas, 1962. A thorough bibliography of Godwin's works is included in this study of Godwin's representation of education.

St. Clair, William. The Godwins and the Shelleys. New York: Norton, 1989. Details the familial relationships among the Godwins and Shelleys, while providing biographies of each family member.

JOE GORES

Born: Rochester, Minnesota; December 25, 1931

Types of plot: Hard-boiled; private investigator; amateur sleuth

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Dan Kearney & Associates (DKA) file, 1972-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

DAN KEARNEY heads his own investigative agency, Daniel Kearney & Associates (DKA), in San Francisco. A gruff, no-nonsense, middle-aged married man with a chiseled jaw and bent nose, Kearney seldom shows his emotions at work, the result of a quarter-century of experience in repossession and collection work. He is capable of assuming subtle gradations of character—from tough to tender—as necessary to fit particular cases. Surreptitiously called the Great White Father by his associates, Kearney usually directs other operatives from the office and has dozens of valuable contacts throughout the city. Now and then he works in the field when his special talents in legal matters, leadership, or dissembling are required.

PATRICK MICHAEL “O. B.” O’BANNON is a freckled, red-haired, middle-aged man. He is also a dedicated imbiber, a condition that is sometimes problematic in his work. He set up DKA with Kearney in the 1960’s after both men had gained considerable experience in their profession. A slight, flush-faced, married man, O’Bannon is the agency’s best field agent, thanks to his innate ability to charm his way into a target’s confidence.

GISELE MARC is a smart and ambitious young woman whose emotions show on her face. She began as a secretary at the agency and worked her way up to office manager. She is responsible for assigning and coordinating various cases with the appropriate operatives. A sometime field agent as well, Marc is a tall, striking, blue-eyed single blond built like a fashion model.

BART HESLIP is an African American agency operative in his late twenties. A former world champion caliber middleweight boxer with broad shoulders on a sturdy, 158-pound frame, Heslip exudes quiet menace and easily slips into street jargon when prowling among less savory denizens of the city on tail jobs, infiltrations, and stakeouts. Heslip has a steady girlfriend, Corinne Jones, who hates the effect that the agency business has on her man.

LARRY BALLARD is young, idealistic, athletic, and good-looking in a rugged, masculine way. He was recruited to work at DKA by Heslip, his best friend. He pursues agency work with the innocence of a puppy and the tenacity of a bulldog as he—sometimes painfully—learns the tricks and techniques necessary to achieve his assignments. Ballard has an eye for the ladies but seems attracted more to physical attributes than compatibility, a defect in judgment that often costs him. He lives alone and makes terrific coffee.

CONTRIBUTION

Like fellow mystery writer and hard-boiled pioneer Dashiell Hammett, Joe Gores is one of a handful of authors who has actually worked as a private investigator. He worked for a dozen years during the 1950’s and 1960’s in San Francisco—the same city where Hammett worked—at agencies specializing in skip tracing, repossessions, and embezzlement and insurance investigations. Gores immensely enjoyed detective work and from the beginning kept extensive case notes that he has mined for material ever since. His initial Dan Kearney & Associates (DKA) file short story, “The Mayfield Case,” appeared in Ellery Queen’s Mystery Magazine in 1967.

Gores’s work has received critical acclaim from his first novel, A Time of Predators (1969), which won an Edgar Award. He also received Edgar Awards for best short story for “Goodbye, Pops” and for best episode in a television series for “No Immunity for Murder.” Two other novels, Come Morning (1986) and Thirty-two Cadillacs (1992), were also nominated for Edgar Awards, and Gores has received the Japanese Maltese Falcon Award. However, he has experienced considerably more commercial success from script writing than from novel writing. Gores has served as secretary, vice president, president, and on the board of directors of the Mystery Writers of America.

The first DKA file novel, Dead Skip, was published in 1972. Expanding on the format of Hammett’s Continental Op stories, Gores follows the activities of many DKA detectives individually and collectively as they pursue subjects and the solutions to questions such as What really happened? Who did it? What punishment fits the crime? Gores’s nonseries novels likewise often revolve around similar investigative techniques as employed by goal-oriented amateurs and professionals seeking answers to specific questions.

BIOGRAPHY

Joseph Nicholas “Joe” Gores was born on December 25, 1931, in Rochester, Minnesota, the son of accountant Joseph Mattias Gores and Mildred Dorothy Duncanson Gores. Raised Catholic, Gores entered Notre Dame University intending to become a cartoonist. Caught up more with storytelling than art, he began writing short stories, collecting hundreds of rejection slips before he made a sale.

On graduation in 1953, Gores worked his way west, holding a variety of part-time jobs along the way: truck driver, construction worker, logger, carnival worker, and assistant motel manager. Arriving in California, he worked as an instructor at a gymnasium in Palo Alto before landing a job that would influence the rest of his career: He became a private investigator at L. A. Walker & Company in San Francisco. He worked at the agency from 1955 to 1957 and took graduate-level classes. He also sold the first of many short stories, "Chain Gang," to Manhunt magazine in 1957. After a stint in the U. S. Army (1958-1959)—served at the Pentagon, writing biographies of American generals—Gores returned to L. A. Walker & Company before moving to a similar job with David Kikkert & Associates. He worked at that agency from 1959 to 1962, meanwhile earning a master's degree from Stanford University (1961). From 1963 to 1964, Gores taught at a boys' secondary school in Kenya, then returned to San Francisco and Kikkert (1965-1967). In 1968, by which time he had published more than twenty short stories, Gores became manager and auctioneer at San Francisco's Automobile Auction Company, where he remained until 1976, after which he turned full-time to writing. In 1976, he married Dori Jane Corfitzen, who bore the couple's two children, Timothy and Gillian.

Gores's first novel, A Time of Predators, appeared in 1969. The story of Curt Halstead, a Stanford sociology professor and former military commando who seeks revenge against a gang of thugs that raped his wife, the novel won the Edgar Award for best first novel. That same year, Gores's "Goodbye, Pops" won a second Edgar for best short story.

In 1972, Gores introduced the series for which he is best known—DKA file—with the publication of Dead Skip, which concerns the activities of a group of investigators, skip-tracers, and auto repo men who work for Dan Kearney & Associates. In addition to his regular complement of short stories, Gores produced a nonfictional work (Marine Salvage, 1971), another DKA novel (Final Notice, 1973), a short-story collection (Honolulu, Port of Call: A Selection of South Sea Tales, 1974), and two nonseries novels (Interface, 1974; Hammett, 1975) before being invited to write for television. He wrote the episode "No Immunity for Murder" (1975) for Kojak (1973-1978), which won for Gores his third Edgar Award.

Gores concentrated on lucrative television writing for the next fifteen years, contributing dozens of scripts to such mystery-action series as Magnum, P.I. (1980-1988), Mike Hammer (1984-1987), Remington

Steele (1982-1987), T. J. Hooker (1982-1986), and Columbo (1968-2003). He also wrote screenplays, often adapting his own work. His 1975 novel Hammett, about real-life author Dashiell Hammett's fictional involvement in a mystery, became a film in 1982.

In the late 1980's, Gores returned to novel writing. He resurrected the DKA file series after a long hiatus with a new entry, Thirty-two Cadillacs. Gores released another collection of short stories (Mostly Murder, 1992) and began writing more DKA file and nonseries novels.

ANALYSIS

Joe Gores learned and refined his craft through the publication of dozens of crime-centered short stories over the course of a decade. These were written while he worked for private detective agencies and while he pursued a master's degree (1954-1961), first in creative writing and later in English literature, at Stanford University. His detective work enhanced his persistence and gave him a wealth of plot material based on close contact with a wide range of people during investigations. His education—though the university discouraged commercial work and disparaged genre writing by refusing Gores's proposed thesis exploring the works of Hammett, Raymond Chandler, and Ross Macdonald—provided the means to turn Gores's craft to art.

Gores was writing short stories when Simon & Schuster invited him to submit a novel. The award-winning result, A Time of Predators, lifted him to a new plateau of creativity and recognition, realized particularly in his DKA file novels, which are widely regarded as superior private eye procedurals.

An invitation to write for television not only gave Gores new insights into visual storytelling but also rewarded him financially better than novel writing alone could. The monies generated by his screenplays gave Gores the security and the leisure to carefully hone his later novels, both nonseries and DKA entries, into true gems of the genre.

The main difference between Gores's nonseries and series novels is the focus. The nonseries novels typically concern stories told from the perspective of characters outside or on the fringes of the law: a drug-dealing (Interface) or retired (Hammett) private eye with a personal agenda, a shattered loner (A Time of Predators and Dead Man, 1993) seeking vengeance, or hunter and hunted (Wolf Time, 1989, and Glass Tiger, 2006) who circle each other in a battle of wits. The series novels present the point of view of upholders of the law, who must sometimes resort to bad deeds to achieve justice. Suspense and pursuit, deceit and betrayal are themes common to both. Stories are told crisply and economically and enhanced with apt similes to fix images and motifs in the reader's mind.

Despite Gores's abilities to convincingly spin a variety of crime-flavored tales, it is probable that he will always be most strongly identified with the DKA file novels. In each new entry to the series, plots are more complex, characters are more fully rounded, relationships are more finely drawn, and the reading experience is ultimately more satisfying.

The DKA novels illustrate particular Gores fortes: his intimate knowledge of San Francisco and environs, his keen eye in observing human behavior, his ear for realistic dialogue, and his sense of absurd humor—especially from Thirty-two Cadillacs onward—which helps lighten the otherwise bleak and violent world in which his protagonists operate. Unlike many authors of private investigator novels, Gores details with authority the everyday frustrations of the job—paperwork, dead-end leads, burnout, and legal maneuvering—that plague detectives as they move through the broad spectrum of society.

DEAD SKIP

The first DKA file novel, Dead Skip, is a classic in the private investigator procedural genre. Operative Bart Heslip lies in a coma after an early morning attack, and the rest of the detectives, led by Larry Ballard, must examine Heslip's current caseload to determine the cause of the crime and the culprit behind it. A straightforward race against the clock—in seventy-two hours, the facts of the case will be turned over to the authorities if a solution is not found—but with many detours to ratchet up the tension, Dead Skip includes an homage to Parker, the hard-boiled professional criminal character created by mystery writer Donald Westlake, writing as Richard Stark.

COME MORNING

Gores's terse suspense thriller Come Morning, his first novel after a long sojourn as a scriptwriter in Hollywood, concerns Runyon, who has spent eight years in San Quentin for the theft of two million dollars worth of diamonds that were never recovered and are, in fact, unrecoverable. Runyon's plans to go straight are disrupted by a succession of individuals, including a dogged insurance investigator; Runyon's former partners, who want their share of the loot; a beautiful would-be writer; and a mysterious stranger who picks off contenders for the jewels one by one in a fast-paced tale involving Gores's familiar themes of betrayal and murder.

CASES

Cases (1999) is a fictionalized account of Gores's 1950's post-college journey across the United States and his subsequent employment with a San Francisco private investigative agency. In the book, the agency is run by shady Edward "Drinker" Cope. Through his alter ego, Pierce "Dunc" Duncan, Gores relives and embellishes experiences encountered while hitchhiking, carousing, and working at a succession of odd jobs. As Dunc wends through Georgia, across Texas, and into Nevada on his way west, he is unjustly imprisoned as a vagrant, swept up into violent bar brawls, enmeshed in a scheme involving illegal immigrants, involved in a rigged prize fight, and entangled in a weird California religious cult in a series of sometimes implausible coincidences. Part memoir, part love story, part mystery, and wholly a paean to lost innocence, Cases is a sweeping—if fragmented—novel that in passing pays tribute to various film noir traditions encompassing prison films (I Am a Fugitive from a Chain Gang, 1932), organized crime films (The Las Vegas Story, 1952), and boxing films (Body and Soul, 1947). An interesting if not entirely successful experiment in extrapolating from memory, Cases nonetheless contains the usual Gores trademarks: suspenseful situations, well-drawn characters, and occasional lyrical passages.

Jack Ewing

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

DKA FILE SERIES: Dead Skip, 1972; Final Notice, 1973; Gone, No Forwarding, 1978; Thirty-two

Cadillacs, 1992; Contract Null and Void, 1996; Cons, Scams, and Grifts, 2001

NONSERIES NOVELS: A Time of Predators, 1969; Interface, 1974; Hammett, 1975; Come Morning, 1986; Wolf Time, 1989; Dead Man, 1993; Menaced Assassin, 1994; Cases, 1999; Glass Tiger, 2006

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

SHORT FICTION: Honolulu, Port of Call: A Selection of South Sea Tales, 1974; Mostly Murder, 1992; Speak of the Devil: Fourteen Tales of Crimes and Their Punishments, 1999; Stakeout on Page Street, and Other DKA Files, 2000

TELEPLAYS: Golden Gate Memorial, 1978; High Risk, 1985 (with Brian Garfield)

NONFICTION: Marine Salvage, 1971

EDITED TEXT: Tricks and Treats, 1976 (with Bill Prozini)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Accardi, Catherine A. "The Cool Gray City." Mystery Readers Journal: San Francisco Mysteries 11, no. 2 (Summer, 1995). Accardi identifies noteworthy San Francisco mysteries, citing Gores's Thirty-two Cadillacs for its portrayal of the city in the 1990's and Hammett for his description of the city in 1928.

Garfield, Brian. "Joe Gores: A Private-Eye Novelist You Should Know." Chicago Sun-Times, March 2, 1986, p. 26. Profile of Gores on the publication of Come Morning looks at his personal history and his development as a writer.

Gores, Joe. "A Foggy Night." In Discovering the Maltese Falcon and Sam Spade, edited by Richard Layman. San Francisco: Vince Emery Productions, 2005. Reprint of an article that originally appeared in the November 4, 1975, issue of City of San Francisco Magazine. Employing the investigative techniques he used as a San Francisco detective, Gores sifts through the text of The Maltese Falcon to reveal the real-life settings of the book, including Sam Spade's apartment, the Spade & Archer office building, and other locations.

_____. "It Was a Diamond, All Right." In Lost Stories, by Dashiell Hammett, edited by Vince Emery. San Francisco: Vince Emery Productions, 2005. Gores's introduction recaps the highlights of his life, focusing on his discovery of hard-boiled crime fiction, particularly the work of Dashiell Hammett, which inspired him to follow Hammett by becoming a private investigator and later a writer. Gores makes a compelling case for Hammett's influence, not only on the hard-boiled writers who followed him but also on many mainstream writers and on films and television as well.

Kenney, Peter. "Specialists in Skip-Tracing and Re-possessions." Mystery Readers Journal 11, no. 2 (Summer, 1995). Kenney looks at private eye novels in San Francisco, including Gores's DKA files series.

McKimmey, James. "Joe Gores." Writer's Digest (August, 1988): 31-35. Brief overview of Gores's life and career that is particularly useful for Gores's pithy advice to aspiring writers—"Believe in yourself"—and for its demonstration of how he writes and edits, based on a succession of prose-tightening and tension-increasing revisions of the opening page of his novel Interface.

Scaggs, John. Crime Fiction. New York: Routledge, 2005. Contains a chapter on the hard-boiled detective novel, which sheds light on Hammett's work and provides background for Gores's writings.

Schaal, Carol. "Mystery Writer Gores Shares Life Lessons." Notre Dame Magazine (Summer, 2000). Comments from Gores regarding what he has learned in the course of living and writing.

RON GOULART

Born: Berkeley, California; January 13, 1933

Also wrote as Victor Appleton; Chad Calhoun; Susan Claudia; Franklin W. Dixon; R. T. Edwards; Laura Lee Hope; Ian R. Jamieson; Josephine Kains; Jillian Kearny; Carolyn Keene; Howard Lee; Kenneth Robeson; Zeke Masters; Frank S. Shawn; Joseph Silva; Con Steffanson

Types of plot: Private investigator; amateur sleuth; metaphysical and metafictional parody; horror; comedy caper

PRINCIPAL SERIES

John Easy, 1971-
Jack Summer, 1971-
Jake Conger, 1973-
Ben Jolson, 1973-
The Avenger, 1974-
Odd Jobs, 1975-
Terry Spring, 1978-
Groucho Marx, 1998-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

JOHN EASY, Goulart's only conventional detective character, is a Hollywood private investigator in his thirties. Tough of mind and body, he is usually involved in tracking missing women through exotic—and sometimes erotic—Southern California milieus. Easy strives to discern rationality amid the chaotic environs into which his cases take him.

JACK SUMMER, an amateur sleuth and intergalactic investigative reporter for Mudrake Magazine, is a handsome crusader in his thirties with remarkable intuition and considerable appeal for beautiful women. He solves everything from Jack the Ripper-type murders to intergalactic drug smuggling.

JAKE CONGER uses a number of “wild talents” (especially making himself invisible) to solve outrageously wacky cases for a shadowy government agency. Conger is resourceful, clever, and unbeatable.

BEN JOLSON uses his unusual ability to alter his shape to solve seemingly impossible cases of intergalactic wrongdoing for the universally famous Chameleon Corps, into which he was drafted against his will and which he serves only under duress.

THE AVENGER undertakes cases that involve vampires, demons, and other supernatural beings. The stories in which he appears are aimed primarily at a juvenile audience.

JAKE PACE and HILDY PACE, the husband and wife owners of a futuristic investigative agency known as Odd Jobs, Inc., take on cases that have baffled all other private eyes or which other private eyes refuse to take. Jake and Hildy are confronted with cases ranging from a prolific creator of monsters to a cryogenically preserved Nazi scientist to an assassination ring specializing in heads of state.

TERRY SPRING is a young, idealistic, and exceedingly nosy female television reporter/detective. She could almost be said to be a female version of the Karl Kolchek character in the old Nightstalker television series. She is particularly attracted to unusual or macabre cases.

GROUCHO MARX, the pun-prone comedian-actor, is portrayed as a private detective in league with his friend, former crime reporter Frank Denby. Together they solve crimes in the late 1930's and early 1940's, often involving Hollywood personalities.

CONTRIBUTION

In the tradition of Anthony Boucher (with whom he once studied), Alfred Bester, Mack Reynolds, and Hal Clement, the prolific Ron Goulart successfully blends—and bends—the disparate mediums of mystery and detective fiction and science fiction. He is the only writer ever to win a Mystery Writers of America Edgar Allan Poe Award for what is arguably a science-fiction novel (After Things Fell Apart, 1970). Even his “conventional” mystery and detective fiction often requires the willing suspension of disbelief necessary for the enjoyment of science fiction. His stories are notable for iconoclastic satire, wry humor, and a perceptive and sometimes compassionate insight into the human condition. Goulart—who was nominated for a Nebula Award in 1966 for his short story “Calling Dr. Clockwork”—except for perfecting the crossover story that combines elements from various traditions, has brought no major innovation to either the mystery and detective or the science-fiction field. Aficionados of both genres, however, can savor his distinctive fiction.

BIOGRAPHY

Ronald Joseph Goulart was born to Joseph Silveria Goulart and Josephine (Macri) Goulart on January 13, 1933, in Berkeley, California. He studied writing with Anthony Boucher while still in high school. Boucher had an admittedly strong influence on Goulart's career, especially in his penchant for mixing the genres of mystery and detective and science fiction.

Goulart enrolled at the University of California, Berkeley, in 1951 and received a bachelor of arts in 1955. After college, he began a career as an advertising copywriter with the San Francisco firm of Guild, Bascom, and Bonfigli, where he worked in two separate stints (1955-1957 and 1958-1960). He moved to Los Angeles in 1961 to take a consulting copywriting job with Alan Alch, Inc., where he remained through 1963. He left the advertising field in that year to pursue writing full-time. Goulart married fellow writer Fran Sheridan in 1964, and two sons, Sean and Stefan, were eventually born to them. Goulart returned to advertising copywriting briefly from 1966 to 1968 with the San Francisco firm of Hoefer, Dieterich, and Brown. In 1968 he became a full-time freelance writer, and he has created an enormous volume of work that includes original novels in a variety of genres, novelizations of films, comics, television series, short-story collections, entries in existing series under house pseudonyms, collaborative fictional efforts, and a considerable body of nonfiction.

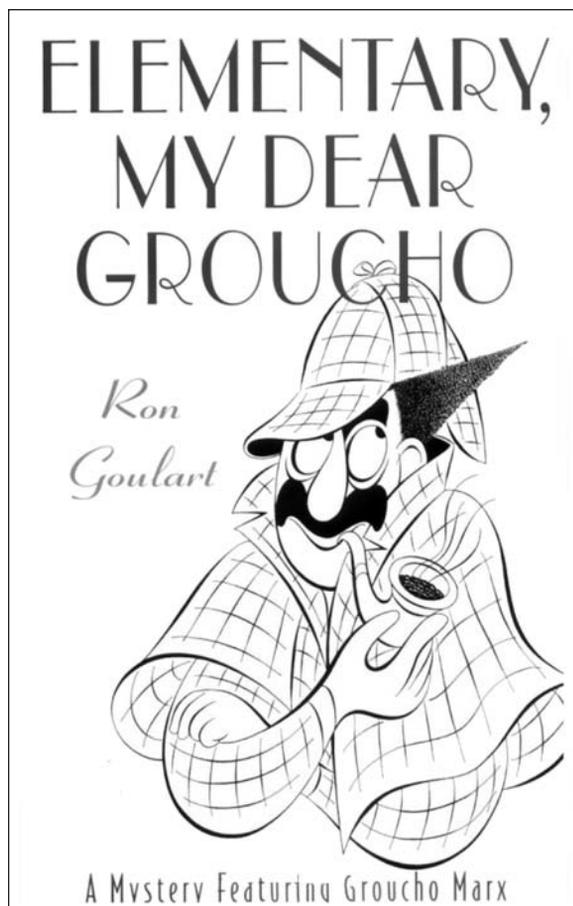

Goulart's first book-length effort was in the mystery and detective field, where he served as editor and author of an introduction to The Hardboiled Dicks: An Anthology and Study of Pulp Detective Fiction (1965). A second anthology, Line Up Tough Guys (1966) followed before the release of Goulart's first full-length fiction, The Sword Swallower (1968). A science-fiction novel that introduced a universe far from Earth, known as the Barnum System, where shape-shifters called the Chameleon Corps operate, The Sword Swallower set the standard for the mystery-science-fiction hybrid that became Goulart's hallmark in a succession of Barnum System books, including The Fire-Eater (1970), Shaggy Planet (1973), A Whiff of Madness (1975) and The Wicked Cyborg (1978). In 1970, his best-selling After Things Fell Apart won the Edgar Award and helped establish his reputation in both mystery-detective and science-fiction genres.

Since the late 1960's, Goulart has produced a veritable avalanche of written work: some two hundred books and several hundred short stories that have been frequently anthologized. Much of his work involves the author's longtime fascination for comic books—critics, in fact, note that a great deal of his fiction, though usually action-packed and entertaining, is cartoonlike, with two-dimensional characters, overblown dialogue, and wildly improbable plots. Goulart has invented his own comic heroes (the Star Hawk series, with illustrations by Gil Kane), contributed to the comic creations of others (including Challengers of the Unknown, the Hulk, Captain America, Vampirella, the Phantom, and Flash Gordon), and written extensively about comics, cartoonists, and the pulps in nonfictional works (such as The Adventurous Decade: Comic Strips in the Thirties, 1975; Ron Goulart's Great History of Comic Books, 1986; The Great Comic Book Artists, 1986, and Great American Comic Books, 2001). In 1998 Goulart launched a new humorous historical mystery series, featuring comedian-actor Groucho Marx, with the publication of Groucho Marx, Master Detective.

ANALYSIS

Ron Goulart defies categorization as a writer. His published works range from original novels and short stories to novelizations of motion picture and television scripts, from novels based on comic-strip characters to nonfictional studies of pulp magazines and cartoons, and contributions in existing series from Tom Swift to the Bobbsey Twins. Much of his best work is in the mystery and detective or science-fiction genres or, more usually, a combination of the two. His fiction is invariably satiric. The irreverent humor in his best work is worthy of Mark Twain; in his worst work, the humor is unworthy of an inept standup comedian.

The first novel in Goulart's Groucho Marx series, which has the legendary screen comedian acting as an amateur sleuth.

Goulart's characters, even main protagonists, are typically only superficially developed. All his stories unfold primarily through dialogue. He is a master at concocting startling opening sentences, which seize interest; this ability is perhaps a legacy of his career in advertising, where the emphasis is on capturing attention and drawing in the reader. The characters that cavort through his pages are outrageously bizarre parodies of familiar human types or well-known individuals. Even Goulart's "straight" mystery and detective works contain situations as fantastic as anything found in science fiction.

The fictional worlds created by Goulart are seemingly without direction or purpose. The characters in his mad universe are as unpredictable as the inmates of any insane asylum. Goulart's heroes (or antiheroes) are constantly engaged in struggles to impress some sane pattern on societies undergoing constant random metamorphoses. They usually succeed but often in ways more disturbing to the reader than the worlds they describe. Running throughout most of his stories is Goulart's sometimes cruel and always impudent humor.

Most of Goulart's straight mystery and detective fiction is set in Southern California. The area's various arcane subcultures, as seen through Goulart's eyes, bear a striking resemblance to his description of the through-the-looking-glass worlds of the Barnum System, in which many of his science-fiction stories take place. Those earthly locales are the settings for stories and characters reminiscent of fairy chess, a game in which the players make up pieces (complete with moves) as the game progresses. Such characters and situations permeate Goulart's fiction. The Southern California of John Easy could be a planet in the Barnum System. In all of his works, Goulart holds up various unpleasant aspects of society and forces his readers to scrutinize them. The world as Goulart portrays it seems to be a cosmic practical joke perpetrated accidentally on the fall-guy human race by random chance. The crime, its solution, and the characters are not paramount in Goulart's fiction. Goulart is intent on amusing readers, making them laugh (he often uses several pages to set up obscure jokes or puns), yet at the same time making them think seriously about themselves and society. His stories are not tightly plotted, nor do they contain clues for the solution of clever puzzles. The characters are virtually never developed fully enough that the reader can identify with, or even like or dislike them. This is true even of recurring characters in Goulart's several series. His best mystery and detective fiction is written on many levels and is definitely not for readers who are interested only in unraveling the solutions to puzzling crimes.

AFTER THINGS FELL APART

Nowhere is Goulart's caustic wit more pronounced than in his acclaimed After Things Fell Apart. The hero is craggily handsome Jim Haley of the Private Inquiry Office (a privately funded investigative agency with the authority of an official government bureau). Haley attempts to track down Lady Day, the leader of a mostly female organization bent on the assassination of prominent public figures in the San Francisco Enclave, one of many independent states formed after the (unexplained) collapse of the United States government at some indeterminate time in the future. As he homes in on Lady Day, Haley stoically encounters a procession of decidedly odd characters in places such as the Nixon Institute (administered by the Parker Brothers), a home for aging rock music stars; the G-Man Motel, owned and operated by former members of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, whose customers must submit to foot-printing and interrogation before being assigned a room; and a town controlled by the amateur Mafia (no Italians allowed).

A WHIFF OF MADNESS

Jim Haley's infrequently encountered fellow agent, the bald and sexually insatiable La Penna, is interchangeable with Palma, the bald and sexually insatiable photographer-sidekick of Mudrake Magazine's Jack Summer in one of Goulart's science-fiction/detective series set in the Barnum System. In A Whiff of Madness, a typical novel of the Jack Summer series, Summer and Palma are dispatched to the planet Peregrine to investigate rumors that the king of one of the planet's warring nations is responsible for the serial murders of little old ladies. After Summer's arrival on Peregrine, he frequently sees the king on television telling his subjects, "I am not a murderer." Despite the king's assurances to the contrary, Summer and Palma (with the help of some sexy ladies and assorted screwball characters) manage to show that the king turns into a royal strangler when he sniffs an addictive gas that was developed to make ordinary soldiers into ruthless killing machines.

EVEN THE BUTLER WAS POOR

A nonseries comic crime caper novel, Even the Butler Was Poor (1990) revolves around beautiful auburn-haired Helen Joanne "H. J." Mavity, a painter of romance paperback covers. After a former boyfriend who owes her five thousand dollars drops dead at her feet in a shopping mall, she enlists the aid of former husband Ben Spanner, a gifted mimic, comic, and voiceover actor on radio and television commercials (who specializes in personifying inanimate objects, such as a baby's bottom for diaper ads or an English muffin for a fish-and-chips account) in solving the meaning of the dead man's last words to her before expiring: "Ninety-nine clop clop." As usual, Goulart spends little time sketching in character details, preferring instead to plunge headlong into a wacky mystery incorporating a mutilated ventriloquist's dummy, damaging photographs, attempted blackmail, and murder—while adding a typical assortment of puns, elaborate jokes, and pokes at society's foibles.

Paul Madden

Updated by Jack Ewing

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

BARNUM SYSTEM SERIES: The Sword Swallower, 1968; The Fire-Eater, 1970; Shaggy Planet, 1973; Spacehawk, Inc., 1974; The Wicked Cyborg, 1978; Dr. Scofflaw, 1979 (bound with Isidore Haiblum's Outerworld, published as Binary Star No. 3)

FRAGMENTED AMERICA SERIES: After Things Fell Apart, 1970; Gadget Man, 1971; Hawkshaw, 1972; Crackpot, 1977; Brinkman, 1981

JOHN EASY SERIES: If Dying Was All, 1971; Too Sweet to Die, 1972; The Same Lie Twice, 1973; One Grave Too Many, 1974

JACK SUMMER (BARNUM SYSTEM) SERIES: Death Cell, 1971; Plunder, 1972; A Whiff of Madness, 1976; Galaxy Jane, 1986

BEN JOLSON (BARNUM SYSTEM) SERIES: The Tin Angel, 1973; Flux, 1974

CLEOPATRA JONES SERIES (NOVELIZATION OF SCREENPLAYS BY MAX JULIEN AND SHELDON KELLER): Cleopatra Jones, 1973; Cleopatra Jones and the Casino of Gold, 1975

THE PHANTOM SERIES (AS SHAWN, WITH LEE FALK): The Golden Circle, 1973; The Hydra Monster, 1973; The Mystery of the Sea Horse, 1973; The Veiled Lady, 1973; The Swamp Rats, 1974; The Goggle-Eyed Pirates, 1974

JAKE CONGER SERIES: A Talent for the Invisible, 1973; The Panchronicon Plot, 1977; Hello, Lemuria, 1979

THE AVENGER SERIES (AS ROBESON): The Man from Atlantis, 1974; Red Moon, 1974; The Purple Zombie, 1974; Dr. Time, 1974; The Nightwitch Devil,

1974; Black Chariots, 1974; The Cartoon Crimes, 1974; The Death Machine, 1975; The Blood Countess, 1975; The Glass Man, 1975; The Iron Skull, 1975; Demon Island, 1975

VAMPIRELLA SERIES: Bloodstalk, 1975; On Alien Wings, 1975; Deadwalk, 1976; Blood Wedding, 1976; Deathgame, 1976; Snakegod, 1976; Vampirella, 1976

TERRY SPRING SERIES (AS KAINS): The Curse of the Golden Skull, 1978; The Devil Mask Mystery, 1978; The Green Lama Mystery, 1979; The Whispering Cat Mystery, 1979; The Witch's Tower Mystery, 1979; The Laughing Dragon Mystery, 1980

ODD JOBS SERIES: Odd Jobs No. 101 and Other Future Crimes and Intrigues, 1975; Calling Dr. Patchwork, 1978; Hail Hibbler, 1980; Big Bang, 1982; Brainz, Inc., 1985

GROUCHO MARX SERIES: Groucho Marx, Master Detective, 1998; Groucho Marx, Private Eye, 1999; Elementary, My Dear Groucho, 1999; Groucho Marx and the Broadway Murders, 2001; Groucho Marx, Secret Agent, 2002; Groucho Marx, King of the Jungle, 2005

HARDY BOYS CASE FILES SERIES (AS DIXON): Disaster for Hire, 1989; The Deadliest Dare, 1989; Castle Fear, 1990

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Enormous Hourglass, 1976; Skyrocket Steele, 1980; Ghosting, 1980; Prize Meets Murder, 1984 (as Edwards, with Otto Penzler and Edward Hoch); A Graveyard of My Own, 1985; Suicide, Inc., 1985; Even the Butler Was Poor, 1990; Murder on the Aisle, 1996; Murder for Dummies: A Christmas Story, 1996; The Hidden Princess, 1982 (as Calhoun); Triple "O" Seven, 1985 (as Jamieson); Now He Thinks He's Dead, 1992

SHORT FICTION: Clockwork's Pirates and Ghost Breaker, 1971; What's Become of Screwloose? and Other Inquiries, 1971; Adam and Eve on a Raft: Mystery Stories, 2001

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

FLASH GORDON SERIES (AS STEFFANSON, WITH ALEX RAYMOND): The Space Circus, 1969 (with Alex Raymond); The Lion Men of Mongo, 1974 (with Alex Raymond); The Plague of Sound, 1974; The Time Trap of Ming XIII, 1977

KUNG FU SERIES (AS LEE, BASED ON TELEVISION SERIES): Chains, 1973; Superstition, 1973; Kung Fu, 1974

GYPSY SERIES: Quest of the Gypsy, 1976; Eye of the Vulture, 1977

LAVERNE AND SHIRLEY SERIES (AS STEFFANSON, BASED ON TELEVISION SERIES): Laverne and Shirley: Easy Money, 1976; Laverne and Shirley: Gold Rush, 1976; Laverne and Shirley: Teamwork, 1976

STAR HAWKS SERIES (ILLUSTRATED BY GIL KANE): Star Hawks, 1979; Star Hawks II, 1979; Star Hawks: Empire 99, 1980; Star Hawks: The Cyborg King, 1981

BATTLESTAR GALACTICA SERIES (WITH GLEN A. LARSON): Battlestar Galactica: Experiment in Terra, 1983; Battlestar Galactica: Greetings from Earth, 1983; Battlestar Galactica: The Long Patrol, 1984

HARRY CHALLENGE SERIES: The Prisoner of Blackwood Castle, 1984; The Curse of the Obelisk, 1987

EX-CHAMELEON SERIES: Daredevils, Ltd., 1987; Starpirate's Brain, 1987; Everybody Comes to Cosmo's, 1988

NOVELS: Wildsmith, 1972; Superstition, 1973; The Hellhound Project, 1975; The Tremendous Adventures of Bernie Wine, 1975; When the Waker Sleeps, 1975; Nemo, 1977; The Emperor of the Last Days, 1977; The Island of Dr. Moreau, 1977 (as Silva); Challengers of the Unknown, 1977; Stalker from the Stars, 1978 (as Silva, with Len Wein and Mary Wolfman, based on the Hulk comic strip); Agent of Love, 1979 (as Kearny); Cowboy Heaven, 1979; Holocaust for Hire, 1979 (as Silva, based on Captain America comic strip); Love's Claimant, 1981 (as Kearny); The Robot in the Closet, 1981; High Card, 1982 (as Masters); Upside Downside, 1982; Loaded Dice, 1982 (as Masters); Texas Two-Step, 1983 (as Masters); Cashing In, 1983 (as Masters); Hellquad, 1984; TekWar, 1989 (as Cardigan; ghostwritten for William Shatner); The Tijuana Bible, 1989; The Complete Terry and the Pirates, 1991 (with Milton Caniff and Rick Marschall)

EDITED TEXTS: The Hardboiled Dicks: An Anthology and Study of Pulp Detective Fiction, 1965; Line Up Tough Guys, 1966; The Great British Detective,

1982; The Encyclopedia of American Comics from 1897 to the Present, 1990

SHORT FICTION: Broke Down Engine and Other Troubles with Machines, 1971; The Chameleon Corps and Other Shape Changers, 1972; Nutzenbolts and More Trouble with Machines, 1975; Skyrocket Steele Conquers the Universe, and Other Media Tales, 1990

NONFICTION: The Assault on Childhood, 1969; Cheap Thrills: An Informal History of the Pulp Magazines, 1972 (also known as An Informal History of the Pulp Magazines, 1973); An American Family, 1973 (based on television documentary); The Adventurous Decade: Comic Strips in the Thirties, 1975; The Dime Detectives, 1982; Focus on Jack Cole, 1986; Ron Goulart's Great History of Comic Books, 1986; The Great Comic Book Artists, 1986; The Wisemann Originals, 1989; Over Fifty Years of American Comic Books, 1991; The Comic Book Reader's Companion: An A-to-Z Guide to Everyone's Favorite Art Form, 1993; Masked Marvels and Jungle Queens: Great Comic Book Covers of the '40s, 1993; The Funnies: One Hundred Years of American Comic Strips, 1995; Comic Book Culture: An Illustrated History, 2000; Great American Comic Books, 2001; Comic Book Encyclopedia: The Ultimate Guide to Characters, Graphic Novels, Writers, and Artists in the Comic Book Universe, 2004; Good Girl Art, 2006

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Bell, Thomas R. Review of Odd Jobs No. 101 and Other Future Crimes and Intrigues, by Ron Goulart. Library Journal 99, no. 19 (November 1, 1974): 2874. An unfavorable review of this collection of mostly detective stories set in the future or science-fiction stories written like detective stories. The reviewer found the tales “predictable, repetitive, and unredeemed by Goulart’s humor.”
- DeAndrea, William L. Encyclopedia Mysteriosa: A Comprehensive Guide to the Art of Detection in Print, Film, Radio, and Television. New York: Prentice Hall, 1994. Contains a brief entry on Ron Goulart, focusing on his work in the mystery genre, particularly Hollywood private eye John Easy.

Goulart, Ron. “Comic Book Noir.” In The Big Book of Noir, edited by Ed Gorman, Lee Server, and Martin H. Greenberg. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1998. A good sample of Goulart’s expertise in the field of comic books, wherein he demonstrates that the medium of comics, influenced by European expressionist films and by pulp magazines—and led by such creations as Superman, Batman, and the Spirit—was a standard-bearer of noir sensibilities from the late 1930’s.

Kirkus Reviews. Review of Elementary, My Dear Groucho, by Ron Goulart. 67, no. 19 (October 1, 1999): 1526-1527. An unfavorable review of this Groucho series book in which comedian Groucho Marks and his pal, former crime reporter Frank Denby, investigate a crime. Panned for the portrayal of Groucho as unconvincing and one-dimensional, for an almost nonexistent plot, and painful jokes.

Pronzini, Bill, and Marcia Muller, eds. 1001 Midnights: The Aficionado's Guide to Mystery and Detective Fiction. New York: Arbor House, 1986. Contains a Julie Smith review of Goulart’s Ghosting, a humorous murder mystery involving Barney Kains, a ghostwriter for a comic strip, “Poor Little Pearl.” Smith gives the book a positive recap, noting the information about the comics business, and recommending Goulart’s other comic crime novels, including A Graveyard of My Own, Hawkshaw, and the John Easy series, particularly One Grave Too Many.

Publishers Weekly. Review of Daredevils, Ltd., by Ron Goulart. 231, no. 20 (May 22, 1987): 70. A favorable review of Daredevils, Ltd., cited for its humor and its inventive plot featuring shape-changing spies, robots, and wisecracking appliances.

_____. Review of Groucho Marx, Private Eye, by Ron Goulart. 246, no. 9 (March 1, 1999): 63. A favorable review of this Groucho series book, in which Goulart is complimented for capturing the “voice and social conscience” of the hero, for updating an old plot—the murder of a leading plastic surgeon and drug supplier to the stars—and for including celebrity cameos and fine period details.

BRUCE GRAEMEGraham Montague Jeffries*Born: London, England; May 23, 1900Died: London, England; May 14, 1982Also wrote as Peter Bourne; David Graeme; Roderic HastingsTypes of plot: Police procedural; amateur sleuth; private investigator; invertedPRINCIPAL SERIES

Blackshirt, 1923-1940

William Stevens and Pierre Allain, 1931-1943

Monsieur Blackshirt series, 1933-1938

Theodore I. Terhune, 1941-1951

Lord Blackshirt, 1941-1943

Auguste Jantry, 1946-1952

Robert Mather, 1970-1980

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

BLACKSHIRT, a man known to his daytime acquaintances as RICHARD VERRELL, a successful mystery writer with a wry wit, at night becomes a rogue garbed in black, roaming London and stealing whatever seems most worth having.

CONTRIBUTION

Bruce Graeme created not only conventionally moral protagonists—detectives, private investigators, and high-minded amateur sleuths—but also a lovable thief who leads police on many merry chases. The criminal Blackshirt is every bit as calculating, original, and clever as Detective Sergeant Robert Mather and amateur sleuth Theodore I. Terhune, other Graeme characters. Blackshirt, though a thoroughgoing wrongdoer, excites readers' sympathy because of his good-natured mode of operation. His exploits were followed avidly for five decades by mystery lovers in Great Britain and elsewhere, as the series was continued by Graeme's son, the prolific mystery writer Roderic Jeffries, who used the pen name Roderic Graeme for his Blackshirt books.

Graeme's tales tend to have a certain air of unreality about them, with their farcical situations and bizarre characters. At times, too, his plots rely excessively on outrageous coincidence. Still, in the main, his English and Continental settings are convincingly portrayed, his characters are realistic, and his plots are plausible.

BIOGRAPHY

Bruce Graeme was born Graham Montague Jeffries in London on May 23, 1900, to parents of some means. He was schooled in private academies. When he was eighteen, Graeme saw action in World War I with the Queen's Westminster Rifles Regiment. When the war ended, his principal preoccupation became writing, and he adopted the nom de plume Bruce Graeme. In 1925, he was married to Lorna Louch, with whom he was to have a son and a daughter. (The son would follow Graeme's lead and take up writing mysteries under the pseudonym Roderic Graeme.) In the late 1920's, Graeme learned valuable lessons about crime as well as about writing when he worked as a reporter for the Middlesex County Times in Ealing, England. In 1919 and in the 1940's, he worked as a film producer.

Shortly after his marriage, Graeme published his first work, La Belle Laurine (1926). This mystery adventure was followed by more than one hundred mystery novels, a number of uncollected short stories, and several nonfictional works. Although far more appreciated in his native Great Britain than abroad, Graeme did publish a few American editions. He became a founding member of the Crime Writers' Association. He died in 1982, nine days before his eighty-second birthday.

ANALYSIS

Bruce Graeme's fertile imagination is reflected in the sheer volume of his literary output. His chief talent lay in creating tightly constructed plots with sufficient twists in them to keep readers' interest. On the whole, his methods were conservative rather than innovative, yet he succeeded in adding a personal touch to the conventions of the mystery and detective genre.

Graeme's most notable departure from the methods of the ordinary crime novel is his use of a criminal as chief protagonist in place of a heroic professional or amateur detective. Blackshirt, the central character in many of Graeme's novels, is audacious, quick-witted, humorous, tenacious, and resourceful; in short, he possesses many of the qualities usually ascribed to people on the other side of the law. No wonder that over the years the British reading public became enamored of the Blackshirt and Son of Blackshirt (or Lord Blackshirt) series. Furthermore, beginning with Monsieur Blackshirt in 1933, Graeme chronicled the adventures of a seventeenth century Blackshirt ancestor; The Vengeance of Monsieur Blackshirt (1934), The Sword of Monsieur Blackshirt (1936), and The Inn of Thirteen Swords (1938) continue the saga of this character.

Blackshirt leads a double life reminiscent of characters in British novels of the Victorian and Edwardian eras such as Robert Louis Stevenson's The Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1886) and Oscar Wilde's The Picture of Dorian Gray (1891). By day Graeme's character is Richard Verrell, the famed writer of mystery stories, and by night he is Blackshirt, the master criminal. The Blackshirt books are not the only ones in the Graeme canon to use the device of a double life. In The Undetective (1962), for example, the murderer proves to be a pleasant, methodical police detective named Edward Meredith. Despite the fact that the individual killed is a criminal, Meredith still is guilty of murder—and that secret is kept until the book's finale.

Graeme's stories are propelled by fast-paced dialogue and brisk narration. Often he achieves an almost breathless pace, demanding the reader's careful attention. Graeme's characters do not waste words: Time seems of the essence. They speak in bursts of clever dialogue and quick-witted, sometimes slangy retorts and quips. Seldom do they wax philosophical; indeed, the rapid pace of events prevents their doing so.

Graeme's ear for dialect and speech patterns is evidenced by the authenticity of his dialogue. His police detectives exchange banter in their characteristically world-weary and sarcastic manner, his gentlemen characters' speech is articulate and witty, and common folk from working-class areas chatter in colorful, ragged, animated fashion; each type of person addresses others in accordance with his origins and social background.

THE UNDETECTIVE

Graeme's outstanding characteristic as a crime novelist may well be his sense of humor and his love of the bizarre. Few of his works lack humor, and most are infused with it. Frequently his characters are plunged into highly amusing dilemmas. For example, in The Undetective, a crime-fiction writer, Iain Wallace Carter, adopts the nom de plume John Ky Lowell to write a book about what he terms an "undetective," a police detective of memorable ineptitude. The novel succeeds far beyond the writer's greatest hopes, and the London police become incensed by the fact that John Ky Lowell has made them a laughingstock. When a murder occurs in Carter's neighborhood, his brother-in-law, Police Inspector Meredith, suggests to Carter that the mysterious author of the "undetective" tale is responsible and vows that he will hunt him down. Carter is amazed to find that for the first time in his life he is a murder suspect. Moreover, he cannot afford to tell the police of his innocence because that would mean revealing his identity as the author of the notorious novel that lampooned them. Somehow, Carter manages not only to keep his identity a secret from the police—a very difficult feat—but also to solve the mystery to his own satisfaction, thus exonerating John Ky Lowell.

If Graeme has a message to convey in his fiction, it is that many criminals are normal people who, when faced by adverse circumstances or an opportunity to better themselves substantially, choose to do illegal things. The line between some of Graeme's upright citizens and his criminals is a fine one indeed. One detects in his lawbreakers admirable qualities sometimes temporarily overshadowed by evil. His sympathy toward and fascination with such characters is a rare quality in a crime-fiction writer.

THE DEVIL WAS A WOMAN

Glimmerings of a social conscience can be discerned in novels such as The Devil Was a Woman (1966), in which wretched sections of London and their sad denizens are portrayed in an often powerfully realistic way. Nevertheless, Graeme was not a social scientist or a reformer. He left those pursuits to others, concentrating instead on telling rollicking tales of adventure, intrigue, and mystery.

Graeme's ability to communicate the flavor of life in early twentieth century England springs from his capacity to capture speech patterns accurately, coupled with his skillful depiction of setting. In The Devil Was a Woman, for example, a character describes a down-at-the-heels hotel:

As I have already admitted, one does not expect Ritz accommodation for what the ill-named Gardens Hotel overcharged: it wouldn't be easy to find anywhere a more drab bedroom. The flowered wallpaper could well have been pasted on the walls sometime during the early years of King Edward VII's reign: its one chair was uncomfortable enough not to encourage guests to sit on it longer than necessary; the bed-linen had been "sides to middle'd"; the bedspread had faded to depressingly unrecognisable shades; and, worst of all, the view through the years'-grimaced lace window-curtains consisted of sooted walls, smoke-blackened chimney-pots, and basilisk-eyed windows.

Graeme's eye for revealing detail, exemplified by phrases such as "the years'-grimaced lace window-curtains," is as acute as that of novelist George Orwell. Unlike Orwell, however, Graeme does not depict slums so much to decry them—though he does do that—as to set a scene or establish a mood with them. Often, the settings of his books create mystery and intrigue by being off the beaten track, desolate, and forbidding. Graeme's slum buildings and grim, monotonous suburban row houses are appropriate to the characters who inhabit them: A dangerously askew house with sinister-appearing windows will almost always harbor dangerous or deranged characters, while tidy suburban bungalows in a middle-class area of London will house tidy, respectable, dull people. On occasion, however, Graeme will surprise his readers by upending this convention, giving murderers trappings of respectability. He captures the essence not only of London neighborhoods but also of such Continental locations as the Côte d'Azur and the Loire Valley.

Graeme occupies an important place among British—and international—crime writers. The prolific Graeme introduced to his reading public several noteworthy characters, including the memorable Blackshirt antiheroes. His fast-moving plots, his essentially humane view of characters, and his distinctive sense of humor make him a mystery writer to be remembered.

John D. Raymer

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

BLACKSHIRT SERIES: Blackshirt, 1925 (revised 1930); The Return of Blackshirt, 1927 (revised 1927); Blackshirt Again, 1929 (also known as Adventures of Blackshirt); Alias Blackshirt, 1932; Blackshirt the Audacious, 1935; Blackshirt the Adventurer, 1936; Blackshirt Takes a Hand, 1937; Blackshirt, Counter-Spy, 1938; Blackshirt Interferes, 1939; Blackshirt Strikes Back, 1940

SUPERINTENDENT WILLIAM STEVENS AND INSPECTOR PIERRE ALLAIN SERIES: A Murder of Some Importance, 1931; The Imperfect Crime, 1932; Epilogue, 1933; An International Affair, 1934; Not Proven, 1935; Satan's Mistress, 1935; Mystery on the Queen Mary, 1937; The Man from Michigan, 1938 (also known as The Mystery of the Stolen Hats); Body Unknown, 1939; Poisoned Sleep, 1939; The Corporal Died in Bed, Being the Swan-Song of Pierre Allain, 1940; Encore Allain!, 1941; News Travels by Night, 1943

MONSIEUR BLACKSHIRT SERIES (AS D. GRAEME): Monsieur Blackshirt, 1933; The Vengeance of Monsieur Blackshirt, 1934; The Sword of Monsieur Blackshirt, 1936; The Inn of Thirteen Swords, 1938

THEODORE I. TERHUNE SERIES: Seven Clues in Search of a Crime, 1941; House with Crooked Walls, 1942; A Case for Solomon, 1943; Ten Trails to Tyburn, 1944; Work for the Hangman, 1944; And a Bottle of Rum, 1949; Dead Pigs at Hungry Farm, 1951

LORD BLACKSHIRT SERIES: Son of Blackshirt, 1941; Lord Blackshirt: The Son of Blackshirt Carries On, 1942; Calling Lord Blackshirt, 1943

AUGUSTE JANTRY SERIES: A Case of Books, 1946; Cherchez la Femme, 1951; Lady in Black, 1952

DETECTIVE SERGEANT ROBERT MATHER SE-

RIES: The Quiet Ones, 1970; Two and Two Make Five, 1973; The D Notice, 1974; The Snatch, 1976; Two-Faced, 1977; Double Trouble, 1978; Invitation to Mather, 1979; Mather Again, 1979; Mather Investigates, 1980

NONSERIES NOVELS: 1926-1930 • La Belle Laurine, 1926 (revised as Laurine, 1935); The Trail of the White Knight, 1926; Hate Ship, 1928; Trouble!, 1929; The Penance of Brother Alaric, 1930; Through the Eyes of the Judge, 1930

1931-1940 • Unsolved, 1931; Gigins Court, 1932; Impeached!, 1933; Public Enemy No. 1, 1934 (also known as John Jenkin, Public Enemy); Madame Spy, 1935; Cardyce for the Defence, 1936; Disappearance of Roger Tremayne, 1937; Racing Yacht Mystery, 1938; Thirteen in a Fog, 1940

1941-1950 • When the Bells Ring, 1943 (with Anthony Armstrong); The Coming of Carew, 1945; Without Malice, 1946; Black Saga, 1947 (as Bourne; also known as Drums of Destiny); No Clues for Dexter, 1948; Flames of Empire, 1949 (as Bourne; also known as Dupe of Destiny); Tigers Have Claws, 1949

1951-1960 • Ten Thousand Shall Die, 1951 (as Bourne; also known as The Golden Road); Gateway to Fortune, 1952 (as Bourne); Mr. Whimset Buys a Gun, 1953; Suspense, 1953; The Way Out, 1954; Twilight of the Dragon, 1954 (as Bourne); So Sharp the Razor, 1955; Just an Ordinary Case, 1956; When Gods Slept, 1956 (as Bourne); The Accidental Clue, 1957; Naked Tide, 1958 (as Hastings); The Court of Love, 1958 (as Bourne); The Long Night, 1958; Boomerang, 1959; Fog for a Killer, 1960

1961-1975 • Soldiers of Fortune, 1962 (as Bourne); The Undetective, 1962; Almost Without Murder, 1963; Holiday for a Spy, 1963; The Drums Beat Red, 1963 (as D. Graeme); Black Gold, 1964 (as Bourne); Always Expect the Unexpected, 1965; The Devil Was a Woman, 1966; Fall of the Eagle, 1967 (as Bourne); Much Ado About Something, 1967; Never Mix Business with Pleasure, 1968; Some Geese Lay Golden Eggs, 1968;

Blind Date for a Private Eye, 1969; The Lady Doth Protest, 1971; Tomorrow's Yesterday, 1972; And Bay the Moon, 1975 (as Bourne)

OTHER SHORT FICTION: A Brief for O'Leary and Two Other Episodes in His Career, 1947

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: Danger in the Channel, 1973

NONFICTION: Passion, Murder, and Mystery, 1928; The Story of Buckingham Palace, 1928 (revised 1970); The Story of St. James's Palace, 1929; A Century of Buckingham Palace, 1837-1937, 1937; The Story of Windsor Castle, 1937

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Horsley, Lee. Twentieth-Century Crime Fiction. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005. This work, designed for students, looks at theoretical approaches to crime fiction and will help the reader understand Graeme's place in the genre over the years.

Hutchings, Peter J. The Criminal Spectre in Law, Literature and Aesthetics: Incriminating Subjects. New York: Routledge, 2001. A study of the representation of criminals in art, literature, and popular culture that provides perspective on Graeme's work. Bibliographic references and index.

Peach, Linden. Masquerade, Crime, and Fiction: Criminal Deceptions. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006. Extended study of the theme and portrayal of disguise and deception in mystery and detective fiction; provides perspective on Graeme's work.

Shibuk, Charles. Review of Disappearance of Roger Tremayne, by Bruce Graeme. The Mystery FANcier 1 (March, 1977): 41. Review of a Graeme book dealing with a man with amnesia that was the basis of the British film Ten Days in Paris (1939).

SUE GRAFTON

Born: Louisville, Kentucky; April 24, 1940

Types of plot: Private investigator; hard-boiled

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Kinsey Millhone, 1982-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

KINSEY MILLHONE is a private investigator and former police officer in her thirties who lives in Santa Teresa, a fictionalized version of Santa Barbara, California. Twice married and divorced, she is a self-reliant woman with no children and no pets, but she has many friends and the occasional man in her life.

HENRY PITTS is Kinsey's landlord, an attractive retired baker in his eighties who writes crossword puzzles. His numerous brothers and sisters, all in their eighties and nineties, also appear in the series.

ROSIE is a Hungarian woman in her sixties or seventies who runs a neighborhood restaurant-bar, where she serves bread made by Henry and Hungarian food. An opinionated but caring woman, she marries William, Henry's brother, in the course of the series.

CONTRIBUTION

When Sue Grafton created Kinsey Millhone, a wise-cracking, tough private investigator in 1982, she successfully recast the hard-boiled detective character type made famous by Raymond Chandler and Ross Macdonald as a woman. Kinsey's self-reliance, humor, and dedication to her job make her admirable, and her weakness for fast food, difficulty maintaining a relationship with a man, and missteps as she investigates cases make her a sympathetic and believable character. Grafton's success as a writer is due largely to the popularity of the Kinsey character, with whom women identify.

Grafton's novels have been translated into twenty-six languages, and more than ten million copies of her books are in print. Her mystery and detective fiction has earned many awards, beginning with the Mysterious Stranger Award from the Cloak and Clue Society for "A" Is for Alibi (1982). "B" Is for Burglar (1985) received Shamus and Anthony awards; "C" Is for Corpse (1986) won an Anthony; "G" Is for Gumshoe (1990) earned Shamus and Anthony awards, and "K" Is for Killer (1994) won an Anthony. Grafton received the Maltese Falcon award for "F" Is for Fugitive (1989), the American Mystery Award for "H" Is for Homicide (1991) and "A Poem That Leaves No Time," and the Ridley Award for "O" Is for Outlaw (2001). Six of her Kinsey Millhone series novels won Doubleday Mystery Guild Awards. Her short story "The Parker Shotgun" received the Macavity and Anthony awards. She has served as president of the Mystery Writers of America (1994-1995) and of the Private Eye Writers of America (1989-1990) and been a member of the Writers Guild of America, West, and the Crime Writers' Association.

BIOGRAPHY

Sue Taylor Grafton was born in Louisville, Kentucky, on April 24, 1940, to Cornelius Warren "Chip" Grafton, an attorney, and Vivian (Harnsberger) Grafton, a former high school teacher. Her father published several mystery novels, and both parents were avid readers. Although her parents were alcoholics and her family was dysfunctional, Grafton says her childhood was happy as her parents gave her a great deal of freedom and intellectual stimulation.

Grafton's first attempts at writing were poems and articles for her high school newspaper. She began to write short stories at the age of eighteen and majored in English at the University of Louisville, graduating in 1961. While still in college, Grafton married, had a daughter, and was divorced while pregnant with a son. Her first daughter was raised by her father. Grafton studied creative writing through an extension course offered by the University of California at Los Angeles, and instructor Robert Kirsh, the book editor at the Los Angeles Times, encouraged her to try her hand at writing a novel. However, Grafton did not seriously consider a career as a writer. She married again, at the age of twenty-two, to Al Schmidt, with whom she would have another daughter. She worked at various jobs in the medical field: secretary, cashier, and admissions clerk.

The stability that Grafton sought through marriage did not make her happy, however, and she kept writing. She published several short stories; then her first novel, Keziah Dane, about a woman in Appalachia, was published in 1967. Her second novel, The Lolly-Madonna War, was published in 1969, and when she sold the film rights, Grafton left for Los Angeles with her son and younger daughter. She began writing screenplays and teleplays and doing secretarial work to support herself. She became involved in a bitter custody battle with her former husband, and in her anger, she began to imagine ways to kill him, including poisoning him with oleander. Rather than acting on these thoughts, she began writing "A" Is for Alibi (1982), the first novel in the Kinsey Millhone series.

During the five years it took to write her first mystery, Grafton met Stephen F. Humphrey, whom she married in 1978. She continued to write for television series and to adapt novels written by others for television films, sometimes collaborating with her husband. However, despite winning a Christopher Award for Walking Through the Fire (1979), Grafton became dissatisfied with Hollywood and the screenwriting process, which required her to work closely with others and be a team player.

Grafton turned to mystery writing, which she could do independently and which had been her father's choice of genre. She decided to use letters of the alphabet to link her series and created the Kinsey Millhone series. Reviewers were favorably impressed with "A" Is for Alibi, which earned the Mysterious Stranger Award. Her second book, "B" Is for Burglar, published three years later, won two prestigious mystery awards. Grafton soon became a best-selling, award-winning author, producing installments in a popular series projected out to "Z" Is for Zero and possibly beyond. Grafton once half jokingly suggested that after reaching the letter Z, she could resume the series using numbers. Her sustained popularity attests to her ability to achieve her goal of keeping the series fresh by never telling the same story twice.

ANALYSIS

Sue Grafton's Kinsey Millhone, along with Sara Paretsky's V. I. Warshawski, is one of the first female private investigators created in the feminist version of the hard-boiled detective mold. These bold women are self-reliant loners who do not need to be rescued by men and do not simply stumble upon danger. They find it in the course of their work, which they diligently carry out in the pursuit of justice. Kinsey's life is frequently endangered as she discovers the identity of her killer. She is chased, beaten, and shot, but her bravery is demonstrated in the climax of the first novel of the series, "A" Is for Alibi. She hides in a trash bin as the killer approaches, and when he opens the lid with a butcher knife in his hand, she shoots him.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Sue Grafton. (AP/Wide World Photos)

The success of Grafton's series is due to her ability to create a sympathetic character in Kinsey Millhone, who is admirable for her quest for justice and order in a chaotic world and yet remains an ordinary woman, flawed and complex. Kinsey is a private investigator in Santa Teresa, a fictional version of Santa Barbara, California, which plays an important role in every book, but she travels to the Eastern Sierras in "N" Is for Noose (1998) and to Louisville, Kentucky, in "L" Is for Lawless (1995).

Kinsey, twice married and divorced with no children, is a homebody of sorts, feeling best when she is home alone in her small apartment, a converted garage owned by Henry Pitts, her octogenarian landlord, a retired baker who still likes to cook. She has a fondness for wine and high-calorie junk food, which she counters by jogging three miles on the beach every morning except Sunday (a habit Grafton shared until she started walking instead). Kinsey hates to cook and often eats at the tavern run by Rosie, a gruff Hungarian woman in her sixties or seventies, who usually dictates to Kinsey what she will eat.

As the series progresses, Grafton develops her characters, adding to both their present lives and revealing their pasts. Henry has a romance with Lila Sams in "C" Is for Corpse, and his brother William falls in love with and marries Rosie. Kinsey develops romantic relationships with Jonah Robb, a police officer whose marriage is off-again, on-again; Robert Dietz, a private eye in Carson Lake, Nevada; and handsome police officer Cheney Phillips, but none develop into a full-blown, lasting relationship. After staying in Dietz's condominium for a month in "N" Is for Noose, Kinsey says, "My general policy is to keep my distance, thus avoiding a lot of unruly emotion." Grafton gradually and sympathetically reveals the causes behind Kinsey's isolation and her inability to trust people, even her friends. After Kinsey leaves Dietz's condominium, she begins an investigation into an officer's death in Nota Lake in the Sierras. Feeling lonely in her isolated cabin, she says:

Times like this, I longed for a husband or a dog, but I never could decide which would be more trouble in the long run. At least husbands don't bark and tend to start off paper-trained.

Kinsey's sense of humor and her direct way of speaking—using slang and the occasional swear word—make this loner both more human and more endearing.

Grafton gradually reveals Kinsey's past: Her parents were killed in a car accident when she was five years old, and she was raised by her aunt Gin. The family disowned Kinsey's mother at the time of her marriage, and Grafton reveals that Kinsey has cousins in Lompoc in "J" Is for Judgment (1993). In "O" Is for Outlaw, the reader learns about Kinsey's first husband, Mickey Magruder, a police officer to whom she was married for nine months. Betrayal, isolation, and troubled family relations—particularly events in a family's history that create problems in the present—are themes that penetrate all the novels in the series.

Kinsey is thirty-two at the start of the series and ages only a few months with every book, so that most of the series takes place in the 1980's. This allows Kinsey to continue to live in a world without cell phones, computers, and Internet access, and her investigations use the telephone, face-to-face interviews, notebooks, surveillance, and index cards, which she uses to focus her thoughts. She types her reports on a manual Smith-Corona typewriter.

Grafton uses the first person for most of the series, speaking through Kinsey, although she alternates Kinsey's voice with that of a third-person narrator in "S" Is for Silence (2005). Most of the novels open with Kinsey describing how she got the case and include a self-introduction very similar to the one that opens the first book in the series: "My name is Kinsey Millhone. I'm a private investigator, licensed by the state of California. I'm thirty-two years old, twice divorced, no kids."

Grafton then moves on to the meat of Kinsey's investigation, in which Kinsey is sometimes assisted by Lieutenant Con Dolan of the Santa Teresa Police Department's Homicide Division or Lieutenant Jonah Robb, with whom she had an affair. Often, however, she works alone, partly because her job as a private investigator does not require her to follow police procedure. Kinsey is an inveterate snoop who performs a quick search of any room in which she is left alone. Although generally law-abiding, she carries a set of lock picks that she uses to break into rooms, often misrepresents herself, and in "L" Is for Lawless, she steals a maid's uniform to gain access to a hotel room. Along with the story of the investigation, Grafton usually tells a side story, either a humorous one involving Henry and his siblings or tavern-owner Rosie, or one involving a separate investigation or another character, which she sometimes uses as a red herring. However, Grafton's mysteries are enjoyable more for their characterization and dialogue rather than as puzzle mysteries to be deciphered by the reader. The killer's identity is not revealed until Kinsey confronts the suspect, and sometimes she does not know who the murderer is until that person begins to pursue her. This leads to dramatic, violent climaxes that often feature a chase and end with a definitive act such as a shooting. Sometimes the killer ultimately faces justice in a court of law, as in "Q" Is for Quarry (2002), and sometimes the killer faces a swifter form of justice, as in "O" Is for Outlaw, in which the murderer is decapitated by the edge of a bucket of a tractor driven by the brother of one of the victims. Occasionally, as in "I" Is for Innocent, the killer gets away with murder.

Almost every novel ends with an epilogue, written as if Kinsey were submitting a final report, and signed "Respectfully submitted, Kinsey Millhone." In the epilogue, Grafton explains what happens after the final climactic scene, neatly tidying up any loose ends and bringing emotional closure, as in "O" Is for Outlaw, in which Kinsey describes bidding her former husband Mickey good-bye as he died in the hospital.

"A" IS FOR ALIBI

"A" Is for Alibi, the first novel in the series, is dominated by the theme of betrayal through multiple infidelities and lies. Nikki Fife, who was convicted eight years earlier of poisoning her husband, Laurence, with oleander and has just been released from prison, comes to Kinsey to find out who really killed her husband. The police suspect Nikki of killing Libby Glass, an accountant, who also died by oleander poisoning. Suspects include Gwen, Laurence's first wife; Charlotte Mercer, a judge's wife with whom Laurence had an affair; and Libby's former boyfriend, Lyle Abernathy. Kinsey becomes romantically involved with Charlie Scorsoni, Laurence's partner, then realizes she has not ruled him out as a suspect. She solves the murders when she looks at them from a different perspective.

"M" IS FOR MALICE

In "M" Is for Malice, the past demonstrates its power to reach out and hurt people. Tasha Howard, an estate lawyer and Kinsey's cousin, asks Kinsey to find Guy Malek, one of the heirs to the fortune left by Bader Malek. Kinsey finds the former drug addict, who had been missing for eighteen years, living in poverty in a small rural town. Guy has found religion and returns to his ancestral home for what he hopes will be a happy reunion with his brothers Donovan, Bennet, and Jack. However, Guy is found murdered in his bed. The solution to the mystery centers on valuable letters that were stolen, presumably by Guy, and hidden secrets in the family.

"O" IS FOR OUTLAW

"O" Is for Outlaw is the story of multiple betrayals, first of Kinsey by her first husband, Mickey Magruder, a police officer who asks her to lie and has an affair with another woman, and then of Mickey by Kinsey, who does not trust him when he says he did not beat a man and cause his death. A storage space scavenger sells Kinsey a box of personal items that she left with her first husband, and she decides to find out what has happened to him. When Mickey is shot and close to death, Kinsey investigates and finds that Mickey had discovered links between three men in Louisville and Vietnam that may have led to his shooting and comes perilously close to being killed herself.

"S" IS FOR SILENCE

In "S" Is for Silence, Kinsey undertakes a cold case when Daisy Sullivan asks her to look into the disappearance thirty-four years earlier of her mother, Violet, then a beautiful, sexy, young woman. It had long been rumored that Violet had run off with a lover or been killed by her husband. Key to the solution of this mystery is Violet's brand-new Chevrolet Bel Air, which disappeared along with her and which Kinsey helps locate. In this novel, the theme of betrayal is joined by one of abandonment, in particular of seven-year-old Daisy by her mother. Grafton departs from her usual first-person narrative style to alternate sections told by Kinsey with a third-person narrative describing events from a long-gone Fourth of July in the small California town of Serena Station.

Rowena Wildin Dehanke

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

KINSEY MILLHONE SERIES: "A" Is for Alibi, 1982; "B" Is for Burglar, 1985; "C" Is for Corpse, 1986; "D" Is for Deadbeat, 1987; "E" Is for Evidence, 1988; "F" Is for Fugitive, 1989; "G" Is for Gumshoe, 1990; "H" Is for Homicide, 1991; "I" Is for Innocent, 1992; "J" Is for Judgment, 1993; "K" Is for Killer, 1994; "L" Is for Lawless, 1995; "M" Is for Malice, 1996; "N" Is for Noose, 1998; "O" Is for Outlaw, 1999; "P" Is for Peril, 2001; "Q" Is for Quarry, 2002; "R" Is for Ricochet, 2004; "S" Is for Silence, 2005; "T" Is for Trespass, 2007

SHORT FICTION: Kinsey and Me, 1992

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Keziah Dane, 1967; The Lolly-Madonna War, 1969

SCREENPLAY: Lolly-Madonna XXX, 1973 (with Rodney Car-Smith)

TELEPLAYS: Walking Through the Fire, 1979 (adaptation of the book by Laurel Lee); Sex and the Single Parent, 1979 (adaptation of the book by Jane Adams); Nurse, 1980 (adaptation of the book by Peggy Anderson); Mark, I Love You, 1980 (adaptation of the book by Hal Painter); Seven Brides for Seven Brothers, 1982 (with Stephen F. Humphrey); A Caribbean Mystery, 1983 (with Humphrey; adaptation of the book by Agatha Christie); A Killer in the Family, 1983 (with Humphrey and Robert Aller); Sparkling Cyanide, 1983 (with Humphrey and Robert Malcolm Young; adaptation of the book by Agatha Christie); Love on the Run, 1985 (with Humphrey); Tonight's the Night, 1987 (with Humphrey)

EDITED TEXT: Writing Mysteries: A Handbook, 1992; The Best American Mystery Stories, 1998, 1998 (with Otto Penzler)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

DuBose, Martha Hailey, with Margaret Caldwell Thomas. Women of Mystery: The Lives and Works of Notable Women Crime Novelists. New York: St. Martin's Minotaur, 2000. Contains an essay on Sue Grafton that looks at her life and how it influenced her writing. It describes the exhaustive research that Grafton puts into her work and notes her primary influences, Raymond Chandler and Ross Macdonald, and her favorite contemporary writer, Elmore Leonard.

Grafton, Sue. Sue Grafton: Author of the Kinsey Millhone Mysteries. <http://www.sueGrafton.com>. The author's official Web site contains a biography, information on the series novels, links to interviews and reviews, photographs, and copies of some of the journals Grafton keeps as she develops a book.

_____. "Sue Grafton: Death and the Maiden." Interview by Jonathan Bing. Publishers Weekly 245, no. 16 (April 20, 1998): 40-41. Grafton discusses her childhood, her motivation to write the Kinsey Millhone series, and how she came to choose the alphabetized titles.

_____, ed. Writing Mysteries: A Handbook. Cincinnati, Ohio: Writer's Digest Books, 1992. A collection of essays on how to write a mystery, from start to finish, with an introduction by Grafton that provides insights into her own writing.

Herbert, Rosemary. The Fatal Art of Entertainment: Interviews with Mystery Writers. New York: G. K. Hall, 1996. In her interview, Grafton states that what interests her is the "psychology of homicide." However, she prefers to examine the killer from the outside, rather than writing from the murderer's point of view.

Kaufman, Natalie Hevener, and Carol McGinnis Kay. "G" Is for Grafton: The World of Kinsey Millhone. Rev. ed. New York: Owl Books, 2000. This book about the character Kinsey Millhone contains chapters on her biography, her personality, her relationships, her work history, the settings in which she finds herself, and her moral code as well as chapters on Grafton's writing style and her place in the genre.

Nicholls, Jane, and Bonnie Bell. "Banishing Old Ghosts." People Weekly 44, no. 18 (October 30, 1995): 115-116. Profile of Grafton looks at her childhood in Kentucky and her relationship with her parents and her attitude toward her home state.

Waxman, Sharon. "Mystery Writer in the Mirror: 'A' Is for Alter Ego—Like Her Heroine, Sue Grafton Values Her Freedom." Washington Post, November 1, 2001, p. C01. This feature article provides an examination of Grafton's personal history and of how she came to write the Kinsey Millhone series.

CAROLINE GRAHAM

Born: Nuneaton, Warwickshire, England; July 17, 1931

Type of plot: Police procedural

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Chief Inspector Barnaby, 1987-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

CHIEF INSPECTOR BARNABY is a middle-aged, slightly obtuse detective who works on behalf of the Corston Criminal Investigation Department (CID). Occasionally short-tempered, he is described as being down to earth. A family man, he tells his wife about various crimes and the characters involved, but he often abandons dinner and leaves his daughter's performances when called to duty. Barnaby proves successful when thinking "outside the box."

SERGEANT TROY, a younger naïve detective, often believes that he has cracked the case before his boss Barnaby. He provides a contrast to Barnaby's conservatism with his speedy driving and overt displays of emotion. He often considers various aspects of interviews with witnesses or suspects unimportant and readily sighs when suspects offer more than the facts.

CONTRIBUTION

Caroline Graham began her writing career in 1971, primarily composing scripts for radio and television. Her first two novels, Fire Dance (1982) and Envy of a Stranger (1984), went virtually unnoticed, and she did not gain a measure of fame until her creation of Detective Chief Inspector Barnaby of Midsomer Worthy in The Killings at Badger's Drift (1987) on the advice of her publicist. The novels in the Barnaby series, which are about unthinkable crimes in small English villages, remind the reader of mysteries by writers such as Agatha Christie and Dorothy L. Sayers, but through Graham's inclusion of video cameras, cell phones, and computers, she brings her stories into the modern era.

Graham's novels charm the reader with layers of wit and dark humor. She fills her works with a vocabulary that reveals her botanical and theater interests and with alluring real-life characters ranging from blacksmith, to librarian, to lord of the manor. Her novels deal with village life and its inner workings, and using the picturesque village setting as a backdrop, she creates strange twists of plot that would seem to be more likely to occur in a larger city. Her characters often deceive others by having the appearance of wealth although their true financial circumstances are quite desperate. Graham takes the reader into the ugly, hidden reality of some of the villagers' lives. By highlighting the eccentricities of some of the villagers and their struggles with class, she has created an alluring setting for crimes that are shocking and ironic partly because of where they occur.

BIOGRAPHY

Caroline Graham was born in Nuneaton, Warwickshire, England, on July 17, 1931, to Horace Frederick and Edith Mary Harris. Her mother died when she was six years old. Graham attended Nuneaton High School on a scholarship. She left school at the age of fourteen to work in a mill. She worked at a succession of similar jobs until she joined the Women's Royal Naval Service. During this time she met her husband, Mike, who was in the Royal Air Force. She won a place in drama school, and she performed in local repertory theaters as she and her husband moved from base to base. They divorced after thirteen years of marriage. Graham pursued acting in London, working odd jobs between acting roles. While employed at a marriage bureau, she met the father of her son, David. As a forty-year-old single mother, she made the risky decision to become a full-time writer.

Although Graham began to write short stories, she was able to publish only journalism pieces, not fiction. She abandoned journalism when she moved to Suffolk, subsisting on government assistance for the next six years. She began writing radio dramas while taking a course on the nineteenth century novel. Doing the analysis assignments led Graham to believe that she could write. Her first couple of books were not successful, so she turned to crime fiction. Her first novel featuring Barnaby, The Killings at Badger's Drift, received a Macavity Award for the best first novel in 1989, was nominated for an Agatha Award in 1988, and was recognized by the Crime Writers' Association as one of the top hundred crime novels of all time.

Graham completed her second mystery novel, Death of a Hollow Man (1989) and returned to school, receiving a master of arts degree in theater studies in 1990. She continued to write installments in the Chief Inspector Barnaby series, which became the basis of a British television series, Midsomer Murders, that started in 1997.

ANALYSIS

Caroline Graham writes in the style of the classic English detective novel and has been compared to Agatha Christie and Colin Dexter. Her settings are typically English country manors, village churches, cozy cottages, and local theaters. However, the darkness of her murder plots, which are often shocking, keep her mysteries from being cozies. Graham deliberately contrasts the peacefulness of her settings, villages under the jurisdiction of the Corston CID, with the darkness of her plots.

Graham's series characters, Chief Inspector Barnaby and Sergeant Troy, who are introduced in The Killings at Badger's Drift, appear in all of her subsequent novels except for Murder at Madingley Grange (1990). In her Barnaby novels, she uses her knowledge of the human condition to play upon class struggles, often showing how people must sell their possessions or revert to criminal behavior to pay their debts. Her stories chronicle the human condition and how a person responds when love, money, and societal acceptance are missing. The primary characters—Barnaby, Troy, and Barnaby's family—remain constant although the victims and witnesses prove to be downright strange if not evil. The architecture of the homes and their surrounding gardens are treated with descriptions that are as thorough as her depictions of characters.

THE KILLINGS AT BADGER'S DRIFT

In The Killings at Badger's Drift, a well-liked, older never-married woman, Emily Simpson, turns up dead in her bungalow after witnessing a strange event in the woods, and a brother and sister connive their way into the lives of members of a higher class while pretending to be less than amicable with each other.

Graham creates the idyllic setting of the village of Badger's Drift for her horrific plot, which begins with the elderly Emily Simpson searching for a rare orchid in the forest. It is during this expedition that she witnesses a mortifying event, one that she feels she cannot describe to anyone. Her watchfulness, however, does not go undetected, and she is murdered. Due to her age, however, no inquest is held. Her friend Lucy Bellringer doubts the coroner's ruling of death by heart attack and visits Chief Inspector Barnaby in an effort to open an inquest. Through his investigations into the death of Simpson and then another woman in the village, Barnaby discovers that the perpetrator is also responsible for a crime committed in the past.

In The Killings at Badger's Drift, Graham focuses on setting while juxtaposing the ideal against the eccentric. Her descriptive language portrays the possible suspects with emphasis on characterization and relationship dynamics. Graham is a master at describing village life, especially class struggle. She creates a microcosm filled with eccentrics, innocents, and misleading facades.

WRITTEN IN BLOOD

In Written in Blood (1994), when the village of Midsomer Worthy's Writers' Circle decides to invite an author for a guest appearance at its next meeting, only Gerald Hadleigh objects. Gerald, who will host the meeting, has many friends and admirers in the village despite being secretive about his past. Unwilling to explain his objection to author Max Jennings's visit, Gerald goes along with the invitation in the end, but he asks fellow member Rex St. John to make sure that he is not alone with Max. Rex does not ask why and fulfills his duty until he is tricked by Jennings, who "forgets" his gloves in Gerald's house. The next day Max has left town and Gerald is found bludgeoned to death. The reactions of the members of the Writers' Circle range from gleeful to remorseful. Barnaby and Troy interview each member, who in turn, reveals his or her own troubled past.

Once again, Graham creates detailed characters whose experiences have shaped their current personalities and behaviors. She reveals the various circumstances that result from her characters' double lives and does not shy away from topics like homosexuality or drug use. What begins as a warm English cozy mystery ends with a wild twist, as Graham provides a bizarre denouement.

A PLACE OF SAFETY

In A Place of Safety (1999), set in the peaceful English village of Ferne Basset, the former vicar, Lionel Lawrence, shelters Carlotta, a young runaway. His wife, Ann, accuses Carlotta of stealing her jewelry. The two get into a fight on the village's bridge, and Carlotta falls into the water and disappears. Charlie Leathers witnesses the entire scene, so he decides to blackmail Ann. Leathers then ends up dead and his dog badly beaten. Another blackmail letter appears after Leathers's death, and Anne decides to withdraw the money. Later she decides not to pay but is robbed of the money. Barnaby looks beyond the surface drama to discover the culprits responsible for the deaths and blackmail. In doing so, he uncovers secrets and relationships suppressed by those involved.

Graham's plot in A Place of Safety is very similar to that of The Killings at Badger's Drift. She begins with a character who witnesses an event that later causes the person to be killed. In addition, the primary characters are masters of deception, appearing to be someone other than who they are. Other shared features are the class struggle, here between Ann and Carlotta, and absence of love, which creates its own separate neurosis. Despite the similarity, A Place of Safety is a much more believable tale than The Killings at Badger's Drift.

Amy J. Arnold

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

CHIEF INSPECTOR BARNABY SERIES: The Killings at Badger's Drift, 1987; Death of a Hollow Man, 1989; Death in Disguise, 1992; Written in Blood, 1994; Faithful unto Death, 1996; A Place of Safety, 1999; A Ghost in the Machine, 2004

NONSERIES NOVELS: Murder at Madingley Grange, 1990

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Fire Dance, 1982; Envy of a Stranger, 1984

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: BMX Star Rider, 1985; BMX'ers Battle It Out, 1985

NONFICTION: Camilla: The King's Mistress, 1994

RADIO PLAYS: High Spirits and Low Cunning, 1971; The Cotswold Connubials, 1973; The Sea Shell, 1976; Adonis in Dark Glasses, 1975

SCREENPLAY: The Common Lot, 1977

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Fletcher, Janet, and R. E. K. Fletcher. Review of The Killings at Badger's Drift, by Caroline Graham. Library Journal 113, no. 1 (January 1, 1988): 102. A favorable review of Graham's award-winning first work in the Barnaby series that remarks on the contrast between Barnaby and Troy and the numerous colorful eccentric characters.

Klein, Kathleen Gregory, ed. Great Women Mystery Writers: Classic to Contemporary. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994. Entry on Graham looks at her works and life.

Melton, Emily. Review of A Ghost in the Machine, by Caroline Graham. Booklist 100, no. 22 (August, 2004): 1905. Reviewer states that this Barnaby series novel is what Agatha Christie, Stephen King, and Maeve Binchy might produce if they wrote a book together. The plot involves Mallory Lawson, whose aunt dies and leave him an inheritance and a house in the village of Forbes Abbot.

Rowland, Susan. From Agatha Christie to Ruth Rendell: British Women Writers in Detective and Crime Fiction. New York: Palgrave, 2001. Although this work does not specifically deal with Graham, it describes the writers on whom her work is patterned and therefore sheds light on her works.

Stasio, Marilyn. "Crime." Review of Faithful Until Death, by Caroline Graham. The New York Times Book Review, September 13, 1998, 40. In this Barnaby series novel, Simone Hollingsworth, a newcomer to Fawcett Green, disappears. Her husband is a suspect until he also is killed. Reviewer notes the many odd-ball characters created by Graham.

WINSTON GRAHAM

Born: Victoria Park, Manchester, England; June 30, 1910

Died: Buxted, East Sussex, England; July 10, 2003

Types of plot: Psychological; thriller

CONTRIBUTION

Winston Graham is best known as the author of the Poldark saga, a series of historical novels about an eighteenth century Cornwall family. Seven of these books were dramatized for a British Broadcasting Company (BBC) series in the 1970's and were also shown in the United States on Masterpiece Theatre. In addition, from early in his career Graham wrote suspense novels, including The Little Walls, which the Crime Writers' Association of Great Britain named the best English mystery of 1955, and six others that have been made into films: Take My Life (1947), Night Without Stars (1950), Fortune Is a Woman (1953), The Sleeping Partner (1956), Marnie (1961), and The Walking Stick (1967).

Graham's thrillers usually have young women as protagonists-narrators, people whose personalities have been affected by traumatic childhood experiences or singular family relationships. Graham develops these complex central figures in depth; they are not at all the two-dimensional stereotypes that are common in suspense fiction. This thoroughness of characterization, combined with first-person narration and realistic milieus, inevitably leads the reader to empathize with the protagonists, even those who are amoral or involved in illegal activities. Graham is equally skillful at developing his plots, heightening tension through a series of quickly paced incidents that build to a suspenseful climax in which the hero or heroine's fate is on the line. Although this is formula writing, it is of the highest level, for within a standard framework Graham offers so much variety of character, plot, and setting that echoes of one book in another seem insignificant.

Marnie may be the most familiar of Graham's numerous suspense novel protagonists, primarily because of Alfred Hitchcock's film version of the 1961 novel in which she is the title character. For more than three decades, from Philip Turner in The Little Walls to David Abden in The Green Flash (1986), Graham created fully realized characters, frequently loners, whose inner turmoil not only determines their personalities and actions but also transforms and sometimes destroys the lives of others. Graham was a master storyteller, but his primary contribution to the thriller genre was a series of psychologically credible portraits of men and women whose nightmares have been shared by legions of readers on both sides of the Atlantic.

For his contributions to literature, Graham was named a fellow of the Royal Society of Literature in 1968 and was appointed to the Order of the British Empire in 1983.

BIOGRAPHY

Winston Mawdsley Graham was born in Victoria Park, Manchester, England, on June 30, 1910, to chemist Albert Henry Graham, and his wife, Anne Mawdsley Graham. Because their son frequently suffered from pneumonia and was a sickly child, the family moved to Cornwall when he was a boy. During the thirty years that he lived there, Winston learned the region's history and lore; he later used this knowledge as background for the Poldark novels that he began writing in the 1940's. When Albert Graham died in 1929, the family was left in reduced financial circumstances, but nineteen-year-old Winston was able to indulge his desire to write because his supportive mother had a small annuity and was willing to finance him while he was establishing his lifelong occupation.

Graham began his career with two rejection slips (the only ones he ever received), before placing short stories in periodicals such as Windsor magazine. By 1934 his first novel, The House with the Stained-Glass Windows, was published, and during the next decade, he turned out more than a dozen novels in a variety of genres, including thrillers, mysteries, crime novels, gothic romances, and historical novels for London publisher Ward, Lock. In the London blitz of World War II, Graham's copies of his early novels were destroyed, but the author was not particularly dismayed because, as he later admitted, the books were not especially noteworthy for the quality of the writing or for the remuneration he received for them. Over a period of sixty years, Graham would produce more than forty novels as well as a nonfictional study of the Spanish Armada, short stories, screenplays, television and radio scripts, and stage plays.

Graham's first Poldark book was Ross Poldark: A Novel of Cornwall, 1783-1787 (1945), published in the United States as The Renegade. The BBC adapted the Poldark books for two television series—the first ran in the late 1970's-early 1980's, and the second began in the early 1990's. Additionally, six Graham suspense novels were made into films, with Graham coauthoring the script for Take My Life (1947) and writing the screenplay for his award-winning Night Without Stars (1951). He also wrote the scripts for a radio play, Little Walls (1956), and a television play, Sleeping Partner (1967), both based on his novels. Graham likewise wrote Circumstantial Evidence, a stage play, in 1979 and was involved in a six-part television serialization of The Forgotten Story (1983), which received a silver medal at the New York Film Festival. His books have been translated into more than a dozen languages.

He was married to Jean Mary Williamson in 1939 (she died in 1992), and they had two children: a son, Andrew, who became a don at Oxford University, and a daughter, Anne Graham Barteau. To avoid taxes, the Grahams lived in Cap Ferrat, southern France, during the 1950's and early 1960's, but they eventually returned to their converted farmhouse in Buxted, East Sussex.

Graham was chairman of the British Society of Authors from 1967 to 1969 and was a fellow of the Royal Society of Literature. In 1983, he was awarded the Order of the British Empire. Graham's last published work was his autobiography, Memoirs of a Private Man (2003), before his death on July 10, 2003.

ANALYSIS

Winston Graham's most memorable suspense protagonists are women, particularly Marnie Elmer of Marnie, Deborah Dainton of The Walking Stick, and Norah Faulkner of Woman in the Mirror (1975), the plot of which recalls that of The Walking Stick and develops an even more highly concentrated mystery.

However, two characters are notable exceptions to the generalization: Philip Turner of The Little Walls and David Abden of The Green Flash.

THE GREEN FLASH

In The Green Flash, David Abden is an amoral loner haunted by a terrible childhood tragedy. His father, an alcoholic who fancied motor racing, died of a fall when David was eleven years old. The boy was suspected of having pushed his father during a struggle, though his mother (in love with another man) most likely had done the deed and shifted the blame to her son. At the age of twenty-four, while working for a cosmetics firm, David is attracted to an older woman, a Russian émigré who hires him to help run her perfume business, though she knows of his prison record for robbery. He eventually becomes the key person in Mme Shona's company and in her life; despite his continuing romantic involvement with her, however, he marries Erica, a wealthy fencer. Their marriage sours, however, and he kills her during a duel. In a kind of replay of his childhood crisis, David is absolved of responsibility for Erica's death. The past intrudes on his present even more when he succeeds to a Scottish baronetcy as a result of a cousin's death in a car crash and then falls in love with his cousin's widow, Alison. Lacking family pride or interest in his heritage, he turns his back on the inheritance and on Alison, returning at the end to an aging and ailing Mme Shona. The mother he never really had, she is the sole stabilizing force in his life.

Among Graham's previous thrillers, only Angell, Pearl, and Little God (1970) is longer than The Green Flash, but the earlier book is narrower in scope. The Green Flash covers many years and is a wide-ranging chronicle of an unpredictable life and a shady business world, in both of which David Abden seeks the best of everything. Its expansive plot introduces a wider range of characters and incidents than is the norm in earlier books, though the highly detailed portrait of the perfume-manufacturing industry is foreshadowed in Marnie, with its focus on a printing firm, and in The Walking Stick, with its art-auction milieu. Another distinguishing trait of The Green Flash is that though deaths and crimes occur early, the novel does not become a suspense novel until it is well under way. Further, despite the intrigues that are present throughout and the dangers that impulsive David constantly courts, The Green Flash lacks the tension that is central to so many of the earlier suspense novels. Graham may well have set out to depart from his familiar formula, not intending to produce merely another suspense story, but rather aiming to write a straight novel. Indeed, The Green Flash is as much a memorable psychological study of mature love as it is a crime novel.

THE LITTLE WALLS

Though The Little Walls is one of Graham's early thrillers, it is one of the best in the genre, mainly because of Philip Turner, the thirty-year-old narrator whose attempts to answer questions surrounding his elder brother's apparent suicide lead him on an odyssey from England to the Netherlands and then to Italy. He is motivated by his love for the sibling he considered his mentor and an unwillingness to believe that Grevil killed himself (as their father had done years earlier). A physicist turned archaeologist, Grevil had been en route to England from an expedition in Java when his body was found in an Amsterdam canal. Lacking evidence of foul play, the authorities assume suicide, particularly since a "Dear John" letter was in his jacket pocket. Philip's only leads are the woman's name on that note and the knowledge that Grevil arrived in the Netherlands with a man named Jack Buckingham, since vanished, whom he had befriended in Indonesia. The English police suggest to Philip that he seek the aid of a shady, erstwhile undercover agent whose international contacts could prove useful. In company with this man and alone, Philip confronts emotional and physical trials during his quest, which also becomes a journey of self-discovery. Eventually, he attains the answers he sought, the revelation coming in the course of a climactic confrontation with the elusive Buckingham, who admits that he abandoned Grevil to murderers. Philip's odyssey ends with his respect for Grevil reinforced, and their father's suicide is placed in the proper perspective: simply a long-ago tragedy with no bearing on the present.

MARNIE

The protagonist-narrator of Marnie is a more typical Graham protagonist: a psychologically disturbed loner of ambivalent morality. Margaret "Marnie" Elmer is twenty-three years old and has lied and robbed for years. Every few months she sheds an identity with a hot bath and a stiff drink and then departs for a new city and a different life. Two stable elements in this fragmented existence of aliases are visits to her mother in Torquay and to a horse in Cirencester, the only living things with whom she has formed lasting relationships. Marnie cannot fall in love, and sex repels her, but under duress she marries Mark Rutland, her employer. When Mark discovers that she has stolen the firm's payroll and has fled, he replaces the money, locates her, and insists on marriage, vowing not to betray her. Inevitably, Marnie's carefully obscured past returns to haunt her, and Mark increases the pressure on her to allow him to orchestrate a long-term resolution. A conflict in the family business complicates matters, however, and the novel concludes with a series of unexpected twists that place Marnie, once the quintessential loner, firmly under the control of others.

In a tale filled with irony, the most poignant example is that Marnie, who had devoted herself to hiding her personality and past from others, was doing precisely what her mother had done (without her daughter's knowledge) for years. Whereas Marnie rejected sex, however, her mother invited it, and then, in desperation, murdered an illegitimate son. Marnie's warped psyche, then, had been shaped by dimly recalled childhood experiences that she futilely attempted to change or expunge from memory. Thus she realizes that her mother (whom she had supported with her ill-gotten money) had been deceiving her for years and also had hidden the facts of her life. The ultimate irony, though, comes at the end of the novel, when the men whom she reluctantly had come to trust betray her.

Graham combines—more successfully than in any of his other suspense novels—a graphic psychological portrait with a compelling narrative in Marnie. In large measure, the tension of the unfolding plot is increased by the reader's developing empathy with the narrator. Marnie's consciousness is the distorted prism through which everything is revealed. She is a free spirit who nevertheless is trapped; a calculating victimizer who herself becomes a victim; and an attractive, personable, and intelligent woman who, sadly, is unable to enjoy continuity and security. At the conclusion, however, while being deceived into a confrontation that may be her undoing, Marnie achieves a catharsis of sorts. In one sense, she is defeated; in a more important sense, however, she succeeds in overcoming a major obstacle to leading a normal life.

THE WALKING STICK

The Walking Stick also has a pretty young woman as its protagonist-narrator, and she too is a loner, an introvert whose personality has been determined in great measure by her childhood bout with polio. A cane has become the emblem of Deborah Dainton's physical impairment, distinguishing her from everyone else and making her as fragile as the antiques about which she is an expert (she works in the porcelain department of a fashionable London auction house). When she finally is won over by the approaches of Leigh Hartly, a struggling artist, Deborah finds herself drawn into a netherworld of deceit and crime. Having fallen in love despite the defenses she had constructed around herself, she agrees to participate in a daring robbery of the auction house, playing a central insider's role at critical stages of the complex intrigue. Deluded by love, she permits herself to be used by a calculating rogue and those in whose debt he labors.

What Deborah learns after the Whittington robbery, however, is that she had been set up from the very start. The initial meeting with Leigh, the requests for dates, the developing romantic involvement—all had been part of the grand scheme for a million-dollar theft that could have succeeded only with her assistance.

The lameness that Deborah regards as distinguishing herself from others is for the most part overcome when she and Leigh are living together, for the psychological and emotional benefits of the relationship apparently improve her physical well-being. In the aftermath of the robbery and the subsequent revelation of Leigh's deceit, however, Deborah again seeks the support of her walking stick. Having experienced another way of life, without her cane, Deborah apparently cannot return to the former one. The work concludes with her plans for suicide and for betraying her accomplices to the police.

Gerald H. Strauss
Updated by Jack Ewing

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: The House with the Stained-Glass Windows, 1934; Into the Fog, 1935; The Riddle of John Rowe, 1935; Without Motive, 1936; The Dangerous Pawn, 1937; The Giant's Chair, 1938; Keys of Chance, 1939; Strangers Meeting, 1939; No Exit: An Adventure, 1940; Night Journey, 1941 (revised 1966); My Turn Next, 1942; The Merciless Ladies, 1944 (revised 1979); The Forgotten Story, 1945 (also known as The Wreck of the Gray Cat, 1958); Take My Life, 1947; Cordelia, 1949; Night Without Stars, 1950; Fortune Is a Woman, 1953; The Little Walls, 1955; The Sleeping Partner, 1956; Greek Fire, 1957; The Tumbled House, 1959; Marnie, 1961; The Grove of Eagles, 1963; After the Act, 1965; The Walking Stick, 1967; Angell, Pearl, and Little God, 1970; Woman in the Mirror, 1975; The Green Flash, 1986

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Ross Poldark: A Novel of Cornwall, 1783-1787, 1945 (also known as The Renegade: A Novel of Cornwall, 1783-1787, 1951); Demelza: A Novel of Cornwall, 1788-1790, 1946; Jeremy Poldark: A Novel of Cornwall, 1790-1791, 1950 (also known as Venture Once More: A Novel of Cornwall, 1790-1791, 1954); Warleggan: A Novel of Cornwall, 1792-1793, 1953 (also known as The Last Gamble: A Novel of Cornwall, 1792-1793, 1955); The Black Moon: A Novel of Cornwall, 1794-1795, 1973; The Four Swans: A Novel of Cornwall, 1795-1797, 1976; The Angry Tide: A Novel of Cornwall, 1798-1799, 1977; The Stranger from the Sea: A Novel of Cornwall, 1810-1811, 1981; The Miller's Dance: A Novel of Cornwall, 1812-1813, 1982; The Loving Cup: A Novel of Cornwall, 1813-1815, 1984; Cameo, 1988; The Twisted Sword: A Novel of Cornwall, 1815-1816, 1990; Stephanie, 1992; Tremor, 1995; The Ugly Sister, 1998; Bella Poldark: A Novel of Cornwall, 1818-1820, 2002

SHORT FICTION: The Japanese Girl, and Other Stories, 1971

PLAYS: Shadow Play, pr. 1978; Circumstantial Evidence, pr. 1979

RADIO PLAY: Little Walls, 1956

SCREENPLAYS: Take My Life, 1947 (with Valerie Taylor and Margaret Kennedy); Night Without Stars, 1951

TELEPLAY: Sleeping Partner, 1967

NONFICTION: The Spanish Armadas, 1972; Poldark's Cornwall, 1983; Memoirs of a Private Man, 2003

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Boucher, Anthony. "Criminals at Large." Review of Marnie, by Winston Graham. The New York Times Book Review 66 (January 8, 1961): 50. Boucher praises the complex title character, a woman who defrauds various companies through a series of false identities, and lauds the author for his "phenomenally successful use of a woman's viewpoint."

_____. "Criminals at Large." Review of Night Jour- ney, by Winston Graham. The New York Times Book Review 73 (January 28, 1968): 41. The reviewer remarks on the author's "quietly understated" efforts in effectively telling a spy story set during World War II, which is compared with Hitchcock's early films.

_____. "Criminals at Large." Review of The Walking Stick, by Winston Graham. The New York Times Book Review 72 (July 16, 1967): 10. Boucher lauds the novel as the author's best suspense novel to date, citing the well-orchestrated plot concerning the sexual awakening of a highly intelligent girl with a withered leg, resulting in a masterful blend of suspense and psychology.

DeAndrea, William L. Encyclopedia Mysteriosa: A Comprehensive Guide to the Art of Detection in Print, Film, Radio, and Television. New York: Prentice Hall, 1994. A brief entry on Graham, paying particular attention to his mystery fiction, with a list of genre titles and dates.

Publishers Weekly. Review of Stephanie, by Winston Graham. 240, no. 7 (February 15, 1993): 200. Calls the novel an "atmospheric suspense thriller" that revolves around a disabled World War II hero who refuses to believe that his twenty-one-year-old daughter has died accidentally. The plot ranges from England to India, presenting a number of interesting, complex characters and plot twists that constantly ratchet up the tension.

Publishers Weekly. Review of Tremor, by Winston Graham. 242, no. 51 (December 18, 1995): 41. A highly favorable review of Tremor, a disaster thriller that centers on a real-life incident: the 1960 destruction by earthquake of Agadir, Morocco. The reviewer notes that Graham has crafted a "compelling drama of sacrifice, loss and redemption" through his crisp dialogue and clever plotting that involve a variety of people—French prostitutes, a British writer, an American lawyer and others—who are caught up in the tragedy.

Saturday Review. Review of The Sleeping Partner, by Winston Graham. 39, no. 50 (December 15, 1956): 34. A lukewarm review of The Sleeping Partner, called "an adequate thriller"—believable, but not particularly suspenseful.

ANN GRANGERPatricia Ann Granger*Born: Portsmouth, England; July 12, 1939Also wrote as Ann HulmeTypes of plot: Amateur sleuth; cozy; police proceduralPRINCIPAL SERIESMeredith Mitchell and Alan Markby, 1991-Fran Varady, 1997-PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

MEREDITH MITCHELL is a career foreign service officer, now based in London, who sees little hope of getting another assignment abroad. Her inquisitive mind and her need for action often lead her into amateur detecting, to the despair of Chief Inspector Alan Markby, who would prefer that she leave crime and criminals to the police. Over the course of the series, she becomes closer and closer to Markby, and eventually she agrees to relinquish her independence and marry him.

CHIEF INSPECTOR ALAN MARKBY, head of the Criminal Investigation Department unit in the small Cotswolds town of Bamford at the start of the series, later is promoted to the rank of superintendent, with responsibilities for a larger area. A tall, handsome man with fair hair and blue eyes, Markby is always noticed by women, but he is interested only in Meredith Mitchell. Although he resists her involvement in his cases, he admits that her skill in eliciting information from others complements his more guarded approach, which derives both from his temperament and his public school education. He also admires her incisive mind and likes to test his theories on her. Markby has no doubt that the two of them belong together.

FRAN VARADY is a young woman who was abandoned by her mother when she was just a child and whose other relatives have died, leaving her homeless at the age of sixteen. In London, she survives by taking low-paying jobs and sleeping wherever she can. Eventually, she hopes to become an actress. Meanwhile, her unflinching compassion for the street people around her propels her into becoming an amateur sleuth.

CONTRIBUTION

Ann Granger's best-known Mitchell and Markby series derives from the traditional cozy crime novel that was made popular in the 1920's by writers such as Agatha Christie. These early cozy mysteries were set in rural England in a society made up of a few ruling families who had lived in their country houses for generations; their dutiful, subservient servants; equally dependent cottagers; and the local farmers and townspeople, who were also well aware of the need for deference to those of a higher social class. As everyone had a role to play in this society, murder was a shocking aberration, and the purpose of the novel was to put things right as speedily as possible. Readers did not expect to find acts of violence and descriptions of bloody bodies in these mysteries; it was appalling enough that a murder had been committed in what was assumed to be an ideal society. However, as this society disappeared, the genre declined in popularity.

In the 1970's, some talented writers saw how the cozy mystery could be redefined and refocused, and revived the genre. Granger's popular Meredith Mitchell and Alan Markby series is among the best of the new cozies. In this series, Granger retains the village setting and many of the character types found in the traditional cozy, but she is uncompromisingly realistic about the changes that threaten to destroy English country life. Because of both its style and its substance, the Mitchell and Markby series is highly regarded by critics. Granger's works have been translated into French, German, Swedish, and Finnish.

BIOGRAPHY

Ann Granger was born Patricia Ann Granger on July 12, 1939, in Portsmouth, England. Her father, Eugene Granger, was a Royal Navy officer; her mother, Norah Granger, was a homemaker. As a child, Granger learned to love books and reading, as her mother would read to her for hours. When she was still a teenager, an English teacher encouraged her to read literary works by writers not often encountered by young readers, such as the Russian writer Fyodor Dostoevski.

Granger completed her education at Royal Holloway College, London University, where she specialized in modern languages. From 1960 to 1961, she worked in France as an English teacher. Granger then returned to London University, and in 1962, she received her bachelor of arts degree, with honors. After graduation, she went to work in the visa sections of British consulates and embassies in Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia, and Austria. In 1966, she married John Hulme, a colleague in the foreign service, and accompanied him to Zambia and Germany. Both of their children, Timothy and Christopher, were born while the Hulmes were abroad. When the family returned to England and made their home in Bicester, Oxfordshire, Granger embarked on a new career as a writer.

Although Granger really wanted to write crime novels, she began her literary career with historical romances, publishing them as Ann Hulme. From 1981, when Summer Heiress appeared, until 1989, Mills & Boon published almost a dozen of these books, and several more were picked up by Worldwide. Granger's historical romances are now out of print. It was not until she produced her first mystery novel in 1991 that she began to achieve critical recognition, as well as the phenomenal popularity she eventually came to enjoy.

In her first crime novel, Say It with Poison (1991), Granger introduced Meredith Mitchell, who like the author is an experienced foreign service officer. Mitchell is presently based in London although she would like another posting abroad. While attending her goddaughter's wedding in the Cotswolds, she meets Chief Inspector Alan Markby. Thus begins a romance that develops throughout the series, eventually ending in marriage. However, Mitchell and Markby's romance is never allowed to overshadow the crimes they encounter. Granger keeps the focus of these novels on the village murders, which can be solved only by sleuths who have the remarkable gifts of psychological insight that Mitchell and Markby both possess, gifts that also account in large part for their continuing fascination with each other.

In 1997, Granger embarked on her Fran Varady series, set in the slums of contemporary London. Critics and readers admired the spunky heroine as well as the colorful secondary characters whom Granger brought so vividly to life. In 2006, Granger published her first historical crime novel, A Rare Interest in Corpses, which is set in Victorian London. The Companion, which appeared the following year, featured the same setting and the same sleuths. Though Granger's remarkable abilities, particularly for characterization, drew readers to these two new ventures, the ongoing Mitchell and Markby series remains the best-known and the most popular.

ANALYSIS

Unlike the cozy mysteries of the Golden Age, Ann Granger's village stories have serious themes. One of the author's preoccupations is the loss of a sense of community in rural England. She points out that the cottages where the same families had lived for generations are now occupied by strangers from the city, to whom the village is no more than a pleasant weekend retreat. The newcomers are not inquisitive; they do not scrutinize their neighbors' doings and often do not even know their names. While this way of life enhances privacy, it weakens the community, for villagers no longer feel responsible for their neighbors or for the village as a whole. As a result, criminal activity is made much easier, and as Mitchell and Markby find over and over again, solving crimes becomes much more difficult.

Granger also fears that the natural beauty of the Cotswolds, where her series is set, will soon be lost forever. She admits that with farming less and less profitable, it is difficult for long-established farm families to hold onto their land. Granger is sympathetic toward the young men and women in her novels who remain on the land, working harder and harder, while they secretly resolve to sell out and leave as soon as their parents are dead. One of the recurring characters in the series is developer Dudley Newman. With her usual honesty, Granger does not show him as a villain but instead as a pleasant person who makes no secret of the fact that his goal in life is to make money. Unfortunately, Newman values the natural setting only as a backdrop for the houses he erects and as a further inducement for city dwellers to come to what they mistakenly believe will continue to be an unspoiled paradise.

Though the Mitchell and Markby books deal with serious issues, they are enlivened by the presence of colorful characters, by references to local history and persistent rural customs, and by frequent flashes of wit and humor, especially in the exchanges between the two principal characters. It is also to Granger's credit that even in a series with more than a dozen mysteries, she has managed to keep every book unique. Even the relationship between Mitchell and Markby is constantly changing; in one book, they seem closer to commitment, while in the next, it is clear that they are still dealing with serious problems. Moreover, Granger invents a totally different structure for each novel in the series, sometimes drawing brilliantly on past history and even juxtaposing crimes that are in fact separated by years.

COLD IN THE EARTH

The third mystery in the Mitchell and Markby series, Cold in the Earth (1992), focuses squarely on the problems of the present. When Mitchell leaves her home in London for the village of Bamford, where she has agreed to house-sit for Alan Markby's sister, she expects to have a pleasant holiday in the Cotswolds, an area she has always equated with peace, quiet, and natural beauty. She could not be more mistaken. A body is found at the site of one of the new developments that are springing up all over the Cotswolds. One of the suspects in the crime is the contractor, Dudley Newman; another is Alwyn Winthrop, one of the young farmers who wants to sell out to a developer and escape from the rural life he has come to loathe. Thus Granger bases her plot on the pervasive theme of change.

In time, the corpse is identified as a French undercover narcotics agent, and it becomes even clearer that the seemingly bucolic village is not immune from urban crime. Interestingly, even though this mystery is set in the present, Mitchell finds disturbing parallels in events that transpired in Bamford long ago. Thus she emphasizes the presence of the past, which is another recurring theme in the series.

A RESTLESS EVIL

In A Restless Evil (2002), an old crime takes on new life. Twenty-two years ago, a man dubbed the "Potato Man" by the media committed a series of rapes but was never caught, and Alan Markby has continued to be troubled by his failure in this case. Now, however,

Mitchell has finally agreed to share her life with him, so the pair are too busy house hunting and planning their future together to worry about much else. When a skeleton is found in Stovey Woods, where the rapist used to take his victims, Markby is forced to revisit the past. A few days later, a seemingly blameless woman is found murdered in the village church. Mitchell and Markby cannot believe that her death is connected to the rapes, but they soon find that they are mistaken.

Although this mystery ends with the punishment of the evildoers, it also concludes with redemption. After the skeletal remains are identified, Markby has the privilege of hearing a confession and then of lifting the burden of guilt that an innocent woman has carried for years. In her story one can see why Granger is so much admired for her use of psychology. Such insights make her characters more believable and her novels more profound.

Although in her Fran Varady mysteries and her Victorian crime novels Granger also creates interesting characters, places them in convincingly realistic settings, and proceeds with complex plots that lead eventually to the restoration of order, it is her Mitchell and Markby books that are most acclaimed by critics and most admired by the reading public. Her reinterpretation of the cozy genre has played no small part in the revival of the form.

Rosemary M. Canfield Reisman

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

MITCHELL AND MARKBY SERIES: Say It with Poison, 1991; A Season for Murder, 1991; Cold in the Earth, 1992; Murder Among Us, 1992; Where Old Bones Lie, 1993; A Fine Place for Death, 1994; Flowers for His Funeral, 1994; Candle for a Corpse, 1995; A Word After Dying, 1996; A Touch of Mortality, 1996; Call the Dead Again, 1998; Beneath These Stones, 1999; Shades of Murder, 2000; A Restless Evil, 2002; That Way Murder Lies, 2004

FRAN VARADY SERIES: Asking for Trouble, 1997; Keeping Bad Company, 1997; Running Scared, 1998; Risking It All, 2001; Watching Out, 2003; Mixing with Murder, 2005; Rattling the Bones, 2007

NONSERIES NOVELS: A Rare Interest in Corpses, 2006; The Companion, 2007

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS (AS HULME): A Poor Relation, 1979; Summer Heiress, 1981; The Gamester, 1982; The Emperor's Dragoon, 1983; Daughter of Spain, 1984; A Woman of the Regiment, 1985; The Hungarian Adventures, 1985; The Garden of the Azure Dragon, 1986; The Unexpected American, 1988; The Flying Man, 1988; A Scandalous Bargain, 1988; Captain Harland's Marriage, 1989; False Fortune, 1989; Whisper in the Wind, 1989

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ashley, Mike, comp. The Mammoth Encyclopedia of Modern Crime Fiction: The Authors, Their Works, and Their Most Famous Creations. New York: Carroll & Graf, 2002. Essay on Ann Granger includes biographical information and traces the author's use of pseudonyms. Praises plotting and characterization in the Mitchell and Markby series. Notes that the Varady series, though also well written, differs markedly as to setting and social class.

Heising, Willetta L. Detecting Women: A Reader's Guide and Checklist for Mystery Series Written by Women. 3d ed. Dearborn, Mich.: Purple Moon Press, 2000. Brief entry on Granger differentiates between the author's two series and lists mysteries written through 1999. An extensive index points out numerous other references to the author and her works.

Oleksiw, Susan. "Cozy Mystery." In The Oxford Companion to Crime and Mystery Writing, edited by Rosemary Herbert, Catherine Aird, John M. Reilly, and Susan Oleksiw. New York: Oxford University Press, 1999. Defines the genre and traces its history. Oleksiw's suggestion that the form has once again become popular as a way to explore issues of community is clearly applicable to Granger's mysteries.

Publishers Weekly. Review of Shades of Murder, by Ann Granger. 248 (September 24, 2001): 72. This book exemplifies Granger's success in modernizing the traditional village mystery. Her handling of a double plot, involving two poisonings more than a century part, is superb.

Windrath, Helen, ed. They Wrote the Book: Thirteen Women Mystery Writers Tell All. Duluth, Minn.: Spinsters Ink, 2000. Essays by British and North American female mystery writers on subjects including setting, characterization, plotting, and research. One particularly illuminating essay discusses the use of women sleuths.

ANNA KATHARINE GREEN

Born: Brooklyn, New York; November 11, 1846

Died: Buffalo, New York; April 11, 1935

Types of plot: Police procedural; private investigator; historical

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Ebenezer Gryce, 1878-1917

Caleb Sweetwater, 1899-1910

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

EBENEZER GRyce, a detective working for the New York police force, is first described as middle-aged, stolid, and portly; toward the end of his career he is depicted variously as about eighty or eighty-five years old. Gryce's methods combine discerning assessment of evidence and testimony with surprise tactics used to elicit essential information from reluctant suspects. Gryce feels ill at ease in dealing with those of a higher social station, and it is awkward and painful for him to confront well-born and attractive women. He rarely, if ever, looks anyone directly in the eyes.

MR. Q (for "Query"), who typically prefers carrying a calling card with a single question mark to using his actual name, is a subordinate who is employed because of his extraordinary ability to uncover clues.

HORACE BYRD, another younger detective, is described as an attractive man with a cultivated bearing. Unlike Gryce, Byrd feels little discomfort in dealing with his social betters.

CALEB SWEETWATER assumes significant and demanding functions alongside Gryce in several novels before taking on major responsibilities in his own right. In some works he and Gryce contribute in roughly equal measure to the solution of cases where the younger man's mobility and growing expertise are complemented by his aging mentor's shrewdness. Sweetwater's projecting nose and receding chin leave an impression of outright ugliness that is offset mainly by his ready smile and his cheerful, modest demeanor. With respect to Gryce, Sweetwater never seems moved by rivalry; even in their next-to-last case together, Sweetwater is presented as one of Gryce's favorite protégés.

AMELIA BUTTERWORTH, a middle-aged single woman who is inquisitive and obstinately self-reliant, acts as an informal though rather effective adjutant for Gryce. She turns out to be particularly good at extracting clues from difficult locations; two important cases reach successful conclusions partly because of her tenacity and boldness in searching for evidence where Gryce would find it difficult to go. In spite of some occasional reservations Gryce may have about her suitability for such tasks, she probably does about as well as her male counterparts in the field of detection.

VIOLET STRANGE, who appears on her own in a collection of stories, is of a rather different stamp. Her existence is quite varied, as the demands of an active social calendar must be reconciled with the requirements of her work for a private-detective agency. She seems slight, a mere slip of a woman, whose contagious wit and sparkling eyes conceal a deep measure of self-possession and resourcefulness. While the inferences she elucidates from available evidence sometimes appear intuitive, along the way she is also shown as becoming learned in the ways of the world.

CONTRIBUTION

Although Anna Katharine Green was neither the first woman to publish crime fiction nor the first American to write a detective novel, her efforts were taken as distinctive advances in a genre that had only begun to emerge as a separate literary form. Many of the features with which mystery devotees were to become familiar were utilized in her works. With the wise and methodical detective as a pivotal figure, clues and evidence were adroitly dispersed about her narrative, and from a relatively small number of suspects, solutions that were startling and yet plausible were reached. Many of Green's novels concerned family crises, where secret marriages, scheming relatives, or missing persons added poignant notes of lurking intrigues; her works were constructed systematically, around factual questions, clearly differentiating themselves from the novels of the mid-Victorian period. Affinities with gothic fiction arose here and there, where Green suggested ghosts and strange footfalls, but these signs became explicable in all cases when crimes and other secrets were laid open. For some time early in her life, Green had written Romantic poetry, and the atmosphere and overtones associated with that genre probably impart some melodramatic qualities to her detective novels. While several influences seem to converge in her work, Green's crime fiction also promoted relatively new forms of evidence and reasoning.

Particular mention should be made of early reactions to Green's writings, which did much to preserve her reputation even after the vicissitudes of literary tastes seemed to turn against her works. After her first novel, The Leavenworth Case: A Lawyer's Story (1878), was published, under her own name, the Pennsylvania legislature debated whether its author actually could have been a woman. Later the novel was used at Yale University for the purpose of illustrating means by which circumstantial evidence could be misleading. Wilkie Collins acknowledged his admiration for the powers of imagination manifested in that work. Green's novels were steadily in demand throughout her lifetime; among the American and British statesmen who enjoyed her works were Woodrow Wilson and Stanley Baldwin. Although subsequently her renown declined as readers' preferences turned toward shorter works of a more straightforward style, specialists repeatedly have accorded Green a place of importance in the development of mystery fiction. For that matter, special honorable citations of her efforts were made by leading characters in the fiction of John Dickson Carr and Agatha Christie. Green has also received attention as a female writer whose position in the field of detective fiction indicated the paths by which the genre could be enriched.

BIOGRAPHY

A major influence on Anna Katharine Green's literary career was her home situation. Anna, who was born in Brooklyn, New York, on November 11, 1846, was the second daughter and fourth child of James Wilson Green and Catherine Ann Whitney Green, who died about three years after Anna's birth. Her father was an important attorney who practiced in New York and was involved in many criminal cases. During her early years, Anna Katharine Green learned enough about officers on the metropolitan police force to depict them as rather ordinary except for their expertise in handling investigations. There may also have been a real-life counterpart to the female detective Amelia Butterworth.

In the course of an education that was concluded with a baccalaureate degree from the Ripley Female College in Poultney, Vermont, Green became interested in Romantic poetry; indeed, at one time she had discussed such matters directly with Ralph Waldo Emerson and corresponded with him briefly. Some of her verse was published in leading journals of that day, but the tepid reception such efforts received caused her to pursue fiction. By her own account Green derived some inspiration from the police novels of Émile Gaboriau; evidently her father did not encourage her work on detective fiction, thinking it better for her to continue with her poetry. Although The Leavenworth Case was written in some secrecy, after it appeared it was widely acclaimed—and demand mounted for her subsequent detective novels. Although The Defence of the Bride, and Other Poems was published in 1882, and was followed five years later by Risifi's Daughter (pb. 1887), a drama in verse, the success of Green's mystery fiction already had set the die for the remainder of her literary work.

In 1884, Green wed Charles Rohlf, an actor seven years younger than she who later turned to the design of iron stoves and furniture. Two sons and one daughter were born to them, and in time they made their home in Buffalo, New York. Green's work is often cataloged under her married name, and royalties from her writings provided most of the household's earnings. In addition to community and educational matters, the author concerned herself with international copyright legislation, possibly as a reflection of the success of her works abroad; during her lifetime, her works were translated into French, German, Dutch, Danish, and Swedish. Apart from a visit to Europe in 1890, however, much of her life was spent in or around her home. At times she granted requests for interviews, and on occasion she also discussed in print her theories on the fascination crime stories exercised over their readers. Indeed, sometimes local newspapers recalled the stages in Green's career that had brought her to the forefront of American mystery writers. For the most part, however, she did not seek public attention. Green lived to celebrate her fiftieth wedding anniversary, and about five and one-half months later she died in Buffalo on April 11, 1935.

ANALYSIS

Most considerations of Anna Katharine Green's literary achievements begin with an exposition of the salient and noteworthy features of The Leavenworth Case; indeed, this work has much in common with Green's later efforts, though she manifested rather more versatility and ingenuity elsewhere than some commentators have allowed. In any event, her most famous novel has generally been accorded special attention for its innovative qualities. For that matter, certain devices and techniques, when they were adopted by later writers, eventually became hackneyed, whereas at the outset of her career Green's approach to crime fiction was praised by many for its freshness and originality.

THE LEAVENWORTH CASE

The opening chapters pose the problem in its most direct yet enigmatic form. When Horatio Leavenworth, a wealthy retired merchant, is found shot to death in his mansion in New York, and the fatal bullet is traced to the dead man's pistol (which was left cleaned and reloaded at its usual place in an adjoining bedroom), certain individuals readily come under suspicion. Diagrams (which the author often supplied in her novels) suggest the path that the murderer may have taken; as no signs of surprise or struggle could be inferred from the victim's posture, it is presumed throughout that the guilty party was well known to him. The work is narrated by Everett Raymond, a junior partner in a law firm. Almost from the beginning Raymond consults with Ebenezer Gryce, who has been recommended for his ability to assess the relative importance of facts and statements.

Speculation mounts about the dead man's nieces. One of them, Mary Leavenworth, refuses to answer questions about a document that had been within her reach—and then privately admits that it exists no longer. The other, Eleanore, seems implicated by the discovery of a monogrammed handkerchief with gun soot on it, and a broken key to the library also is found in her possession. The contrast between the two leading female suspects, one blonde and one dark, is developed with a certain dramatic flair as it emerges that each of them is less than forthcoming on crucial points. In keeping with the emphasis on empirical methods, new problems of proof arise at each turn of the plot. On the other hand, the narrator's subjective beliefs that character and bearing should mitigate the harsher suppositions circumstantial evidence has raised against the leading women add a further element of personal concern that seems justified by the outcome.

While the disappearance of Hannah Chester, a servant who may know more than the others about the fateful night, has some ominous overtones, other problems of motivation are considered when it becomes known that the final will of the deceased man did not favor one niece over the other so much as had been thought. The narrator is presented with evidence that Mary has been secretly married, to one Henry Clavering; fragments of an important letter, with bloodstains on them, and an inscription readily traced to her seem to cast further doubts on Mary's intentions. Trueman Harwell, an assistant the dead man had originally employed to prepare one of his books for publication, seems persuaded that Clavering was the guilty one.

Illustration from the first edition of The Leavenworth Case.

Careful research and a fair amount of footwork are required to trace the movements of leading characters; these are set down in a chronological table, and at intervals there are enumerated lists of major facts and questions outstanding.

Mr. Q, who is adept at disguises and can follow instructions from memory, scurries about to observe more closely the comings and goings at the Leavenworth mansion. When Hannah Chester is found dead with a packet of poison nearby and when a note ostensibly written by her is discovered, the mystery is thrown open once more. Yet it is resolved finally through the brooding intelligence of Mr. Gryce, who openly accuses Mary only as a stratagem to compel the original murderer to confess. Critics have objected that on one point the final reasoning seems awry. Gryce contends somewhat arbitrarily that it would be impossible for a woman to clean a pistol: Thus, from the very outset he had considered other possibilities.

OTHER GRYCE CASES

In his next case, A Strange Disappearance (1880), Gryce takes up the clues leading to a missing woman from a wealthy household of New York who has been abducted by bandits. Q, who narrates this work, at one point poses as a seedy French artist (he also climbs a tree to enter a house). The Sword of Damocles: A Story of New York Life (1881), one of the author's lengthier works, has Gryce brought in toward the end after securities have been taken from a bank vault.

HAND AND RING

The author regarded Hand and Ring (1883), one of the more popular of her early works, as her personal favorite among her novels. In that novel, Green introduced Caleb Sweetwater and Horace Byrd as two of Gryce's more prominent subordinates. The murder of a seemingly inoffensive woman in her own house and the discovery of a diamond ring that was detached from her finger lead to some odd and chilling scenes. One suspect, in despair, attempts to cut his own throat, while the initial conundrum cannot be resolved in the courtroom. It comes to light that Gryce, disguised as a humpbacked man, has gathered further evidence; eventually a secret marriage, involving one of the least likely characters, is disclosed as the basis for the crime.

Byrd makes another appearance in Seven to Twelve

(1887); he and Gryce work together in A Matter of Millions (1890), while Q is called back to aid his superior in Behind Closed Doors (1888). The limitations under which Gryce had to operate seemed to call for more active and astute participation by other detectives who were brought in to assist him. Although by the standards of his time Gryce is well versed in problems of scientific evidence—he can distinguish among grades of writing paper and the types of ash they produce when burned, and he is knowledgeable about ballistics and toxicology—he is far from all-knowing, and rarely are his cases closed without the services of his able assistants.

AMELIA BUTTERWORTH

The appearance of female detectives in Green's works helped to demonstrate the possibilities this form of characterization offered, the more so as at that time female protagonists typically were cast as victims or villains. Amelia Butterworth, from an aristocratic New England family, is on most counts a level-headed and forward sort; notwithstanding her awareness of her social position, she has few qualms about exploring old houses or peering into closets where major clues are to be found. In due course, Gryce's skepticism about her capacities as an investigator gives way to grudging respect when the inferences she draws yield essential insights. In That Affair Next Door (1897), her notions concerning what a woman of gentility would do with her hat and gloves are instrumental in solving a difficult case. Subsequently, her efforts to fathom the old family secrets of those in a mysterious neighborhood and her forthright ventures into finding clues in an old house produce information that Gryce, described as giving in to his advanced age, could scarcely have obtained himself.

Yet the old master is able to reason from the facts on hand to settle the problem of Lost Man's Lane: A Second Episode in the Life of Amelia Butterworth (1898) in a way that had not occurred to his female associate. In this work the complementary qualities of the two leading detectives seem to suggest that the author did not conceive of any particular type as unerring or indomitable. Caleb Sweetwater, who had acted in an auxiliary capacity earlier, becomes more prominent in some subsequent cases. Although he originally had been portrayed as a vaguely comic figure, increasingly his acumen and critical faculties are displayed. In Agatha Webb (1899) he outwits another lawman to arrive at the solution to a curious puzzle.

THE CIRCULAR STUDY

A well-known work from the author's later career, The Circular Study (1900), presents a baffling maze of clues and suppositions that has the added attraction of showing three major detectives at work on an unusual crime. When a reclusive inventor who lived in a remote neighborhood is found dead, the evidence seems to point nowhere in particular. There are few signs of a struggle, but an enigmatic note, clenched between the dead man's teeth, a cross that was pulled down from his wall, and the cryptic utterances of a pet English starling that enunciates the names of women who cannot be identified at the outset seem to suggest that some controversy from the past lies behind this murder. A deaf and mute butler who was on the scene and an odd array of mechanical contrivances that the dead man had installed add further touches of uncanny gloom.

Some comic moments arise when Miss Butterworth, during her own investigation, leaves traces of her presence, which Gryce briefly and mistakenly considers as further evidence. Sweetwater assists in finding those involved in a tangled family saga from years past that had led eventually to the old man's death; an illustrative floor plan and an enumerated series of open questions (which later are marked answered) allow the reader to follow this venture in collaborative deduction. In One of My Sons (1901), Sweetwater utilizes Gryce's extensive expertise—described as the result of more than sixty years of such work. Both of them take part in Initials Only (1911), where a seemingly inexplicable murder is explained as the effect of an ice pellet that had killed and then melted away. Their final joint effort is recounted in The Mystery of the Hasty Arrow (1917). In his own right Sweetwater demonstrates the extent to which he grasps the old detective's methods for handling cases; in addition to settling the troubled matter of The Woman in the Alcove (1906), he could, very much like his mentor, employ a ruse to draw the truth from an obdurate and outwardly unlikely suspect, as demonstrated in The House of the Whispering Pines (1910).

THE GOLDEN SLIPPER AND OTHER PROBLEMS FOR VIOLET STRANGE

As an operative for a detective agency, Violet Strange in some respects resembled private investigators who had begun to appear elsewhere in mystery fiction. In the stories in The Golden Slipper and Other Problems for Violet Strange (1915), her work includes recovering some missing diamonds, determining the nature of a mysterious shooting, and locating a will that a somnambulant heiress unwittingly misplaced. All the while personal concerns also make their claims on Strange, though she is able to separate social matters from the more serious demands of her employment. (Although her handling of clues is partly intuitive and does not approach the level of scientific expertise manifested by the author's first detective, curiously enough one short novel, The Doctor, His Wife, and the Clock, 1895, which affords a rare glimpse of Mr. Gryce during his early years, resurfaced with a different leading character and in a slightly reworked form in the collection of works that feature Miss Strange.) Later, Strange's romantic inclinations toward a young man of Boston and her interest in her older sister's career as an opera singer become foremost in her thoughts, and her ventures as an investigator are brought to a close.

In many of Green's novels, particularly those that did not utilize a series format, she yielded to her penchant for breathless and rather high-flown sorts of imagery and description, possibly in keeping with her early ambitions as a poet and a dramatist; such efforts produced sentimental and melodramatic overtones that awkwardly tilted any balance that might have been struck between the narrative pace of crime fiction and the more leisurely development of love interests. Even her more carefully constructed offerings were burdened with a prolix and ponderous style that blunted the effects of some otherwise finely conceived tales. Moreover, her handling of dialogue was often undistinguished, as her characters often lapsed into patterns of discourse that resembled those of her narrators.

THE FORSAKEN INN AND MARKED "PERSONAL"

On the other hand, many of Green's novels presented problems that were original and intrinsically interesting. As with her series novels, some of her other mystery works could not necessarily be solved unaided, in their entirety, by the reader. Often the trail of clues would lead to disclosures of past liaisons and intrigues that lay behind violent deeds. Indeed in The Forsaken Inn (1890), a full-fledged historical mystery dealing with events from the eighteenth century, a supposed curse is laid to rest partly through the perusal of manuscripts. Individuals with unusual scientific ideas or aptitudes appear in some works: for example, a deranged inventor who had created an odd electrodynamic machine in Marked "Personal" (1893).

THE FILIGREE BALL AND DARK HOLLOW

It would seem likely that the legal lore she learned early in life figured in some of Green's quasi-documentary narratives. The Filigree Ball, Being a Full and True Account of the Solution of the Mystery Concerning the Jeffrey-Moore Affair (1903) uses newspaper accounts the author composed to supplement more direct statements made on the part of leading characters; the discovery of a cunningly devised contrivance to strike a skull adds some macabre touches toward the end. One of the more highly rated of the author's later novels is Dark Hollow (1914), which concerns a celebrated crime and trial. The narrator of this novel gathers evidence from newspaper clippings and other materials to arrive at a new solution to a past case. Along the way, further evidence, such as a previously overlooked bit of steel in the stick the killer used, is uncovered, and some unsavory facts about a local judge are brought forth.

THE MAYOR'S WIFE AND THE STEP ON THE STAIR

Green was adept at devising puzzles where strange writings, which were sometimes disguised or found in fragments, eventually yielded crucial secrets. The Mayor's Wife (1907), which deals with a mysterious illness and a secret marriage, features some odd inscriptions that are deciphered in a way that takes the methods of Edgar Allan Poe's "The Gold Bug" (1843) one step further. In this novel, and in other works, Green, while depicting fears of ghostly spirits among the more credulous characters, also produced natural explanations for strange emanations by introducing evidence found in secret chambers or hidden passages. Details of this sort enliven The Step on the Stair (1923), Green's final fictional work, in which the origins of some curious apparitions are traced to a hiding place for vital documents in an old house.

Although in a certain sense the importance of Green's works can hardly be disregarded, her work occupies an unusual position in the mystery and detective genre. Among those familiar with early detective fiction, her novels have been recognized as innovative and significant. Yet her works have been criticized by newcomers to the genre—perhaps because of the widespread application of techniques she pioneered; for once clues, testimony, and deductive reasoning became standard features of mystery writing, her works were consigned to a lesser status. To be sure, there are many positive aspects of Green's oeuvre. It seems likely that many of her novels will continue to impress devotees of detective fiction.

J. R. Broadus

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

EBENEZER GRyce SERIES: The Leavenworth Case: A Lawyer's Story, 1878; A Strange Disappearance, 1880; The Sword of Damocles: A Story of New York Life, 1881; Hand and Ring, 1883; Behind Closed Doors, 1888; A Matter of Millions, 1890; The Doctor, His Wife, and the Clock, 1895; That Affair Next Door, 1897; Lost Man's Lane: A Second Episode in the Life of Amelia Butterworth, 1898; The Circular Study, 1900; One of My Sons, 1901; Initials Only, 1911; The Mystery of the Hasty Arrow, 1917

CALEB SWEETWATER SERIES: Agatha Webb, 1899; The Woman in the Alcove, 1906; The House of the Whispering Pines, 1910

NONSERIES NOVELS: XYZ, 1883; The Mill Mystery, 1886; Seven to Twelve, 1887; The Forsaken Inn, 1890; Cynthia Wakeham's Money, 1892; Marked "Personal," 1893; Miss Hurd: An Enigma, 1894; Doctor Izard, 1895; Three Women and a Mystery, 1902; The Filigree Ball, Being a Full and True Account of the Solution of the Mystery Concerning the Jeffrey-Moore Affair, 1903; The Amethyst Box, 1905; The Millionaire Baby, 1905; The Chief Legatee, 1906 (also known as A Woman of Mystery); The Mayor's Wife, 1907; Three Thousand Dollars, 1910; Dark Hollow, 1914; The Step on the Stair, 1923

OTHER SHORT FICTION: The Old Stone House, and Other Stories, 1891; A Difficult Problem, The Staircase at the Heart's Delight, and Other Stories, 1900; The House in the Mist, 1905; Masterpieces of Mystery, 1913 (also known as Room Number 3, and Other Detective Stories); The Golden Slipper, and Other Problems for Violet Strange, 1915; To the Minute, Scarlet and Black: Two Tales of Life's Perplexities, 1916

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

PLAY: Risifi's Daughter, pb. 1887

POETRY: The Defence of the Bride, and Other Poems, 1882

BIBLIOGRAPHY

DuBose, Martha Hailey, with Margaret Caldwell Thomas. Women of Mystery: The Lives and Works of Notable Women Crime Novelists. New York: St. Martin's Minotaur, 2000. Examines the life and work of Green, noting how the success of The Leavenworth Case launched her career. Discusses her in relation to other writers of the time.

Harkins, E. F. "Anna Katharine Green." In Famous Authors (Women). Boston: L. C. Page, 1906. Green is profiled alongside other women who wrote books that were famous at the turn of the twentieth century. Hayne, Barrie. "Anna Katharine Green." In Ten Women of Mystery, edited by Earl F. Bargainnier. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1981. Compares Green's work to that of nine of her fellow female mystery writers, including Mary Roberts Reinhart and Josephine Tey.

Huang, Jim, ed. They Died In Vain: Overlooked, Underappreciated, and Forgotten Mystery Novels. Carmel, Ind.: Crum Creek Press, 2002. Green is among the authors discussed in this book about mystery novels that never found the audience they deserved.

Maida, Patricia D. Mother of Detective Fiction: The Life and Works of Anna Katharine Green. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1989. Monograph delving into the biography and fiction of Green, written by a scholar but aimed at a popular audience. Bibliographic references and index.

Murch, A. E. "Women Writers of Detective Fiction in the Nineteenth Century." In The Development of the Detective Novel. New York: Philosophical Library, 1958. Emphasizes Green's role as both a trailblazing female author and a significant innovator of an emergent genre.

GRAHAM GREENE

Born: Berkhamsted, Hertfordshire, England; October 2, 1904

Died: Vevey, Switzerland; April 3, 1991

Types of plot: Espionage; inverted; thriller

CONTRIBUTION

Graham Greene's place in the history of crime drama is one of considerable importance, for he added to the dimensions of the genre in several ways. He was much more than a writer of thrillers. It is not simply a matter of writing other kinds of fiction; it is a matter of his being one of the greatest novelists of the twentieth century. The imposition of his formidable talent on his "entertainments" (as he chose to call them) gave to the thriller a respectability that it had not possessed before his work. Consistent with his ambition to give the action novel artistic texture was his interest in taking the obvious themes of the genre beyond patently oversimplified motivation. He used the realities of the modern political world as a basis for his plots and made the exploration of political issues an integral part of his novels. Questions of religion and ethics surface in his work as well. Indeed, Greene's sensitive interest in human conduct, particularly in people's enthusiasm for imposing pain on others even apart from motives of profit and power, affords his crime dramas a complexity that makes them difficult to classify.

Graham Greene. (© Amanda Saunders)

It must be acknowledged, too, that Greene was chiefly, if not solely, responsible for the deromanticization of the espionage novel. Grubby, cheeseparing working conditions, disillusion, loneliness, betrayals by one's own side—all these gloomy trappings of the person on the fringes of normal life, conditions that were to become common motifs in post-World War II thrillers of writers such as Len Deighton and John le Carré, were in Greene's work from the beginning. If his original intentions for his entertainments were limited, Greene nevertheless showed that the stuff of popular, sensationalistic fiction could be turned into art.

BIOGRAPHY

Graham Greene was born to a modestly distinguished family on October 2, 1904, in Berkhamsted, England. His parents were Charles Henry Greene and Marion Raymond Greene. His father was the headmaster of a good, if not prestigious, school for boys, Berkhamsted School, and Greene was educated there.

Greene had some serious emotional difficulties as a boy, caused in part by his awkward position as a student in a residential school where his father was in charge. He often experienced isolation and loneliness, feelings that would be common to protagonists of his novels. Bored by school and life, prone to depression, haunted by a sense of evil and religious insecurities, he was eventually obliged to enter psychoanalysis. This therapy was helpful to him, so that he was able to finish his education at Balliol College, Oxford University (between 1922 and 1925).

After he became engaged to a Roman Catholic, Vivien Dayrell-Browning, Greene decided to take instruction in Catholicism, in spite of his serious doubts about the existence of God. Searching for some meaning in the chaotic world of the 1920's, but wary of the mysteries of religion, he eventually converted to Roman Catholicism in 1926. He has been identified and discussed as a Roman Catholic novelist ever since, despite his protestations that he was, at best, a bad Catholic.

Greene worked first as a newspaperman in Nottingham; in 1926, he became a subeditor with The Times of London. His principal ambition, however, was to be a novelist, and he continued to work on his fiction. In 1927, he married; two children were born of that marriage. Between 1935 and 1939—years in which he steadily produced novels with limited success in the market—he served as film critic for The Spectator, establishing a reputation as one of the finest writers of cinema criticism. He became literary editor of the magazine in 1940.

During World War II, Greene served in the Foreign Office in intelligence; it was during this time that he gained the firsthand knowledge of the world of espionage that was to have a strong influence on his fiction. By the end of the war, his reputation had been established not only as a novelist but also as a versatile journalist. Several of his novels had been turned into films, and he had consolidated another line in his career: as a writer for motion pictures.

By the late 1940's, Greene was widely recognized as a major artist. He won several literary prizes for his novels, and his career was steadily productive. In the mid-1950's, he produced dramas with some success, and he occasionally revisited the stage afterward. In 1966 he was named in the New Year's Honour List in Great Britain as a Companion of Honour. In 1976 he won the Grand Master Award of the Mystery Writers of America. His work was continually popular in film adaptations, and in the 1980's he had been well served in television versions of his work.

Greene carried on a sometimes-mischievous battle with American foreign policy in his writing and in his life, and he was often an honored guest of socialist countries throughout the world. He also had a strong affection for tropical countries, which are common settings for his novels. He died in Switzerland in 1991.

ANALYSIS

It is difficult to think narrowly of Graham Greene as a writer of thrillers, for his own idea of the medium, from the beginning of his career in the early 1930's, was highly complex. Despite the commercial success and critical recognition of his works, he was often self-deprecating, particularly when he wrote or spoke of his thrillers. He claimed to have written so many of them in the early stages of his career simply to make money and to establish a reputation as a writer that would allow him eventually to leave journalism (where he had a successful career as a columnist, a screen critic, and an editor) and become a full-time writer of fiction. Nevertheless, the early thrillers manifest, if somewhat awkwardly on occasion, his wide-ranging ambition for the form, which he polished over a career spanning more than fifty years. Indeed, many of Greene's thrillers have themes and tonalities in common with his supposedly more serious novels.

A GUN FOR SALE

His early thriller A Gun for Sale: An Entertainment (1936) is seemingly a simple tale of a hired killer who is on the run after murdering an old man in a European city and returning to England to collect his payoff. He knows nothing of the victim, nor much of the man who contracted his services, but he becomes determined to find the latter when he discovers that he has been paid in counterfeit money. The police pursue him for passing the bogus currency, as he looks for his employer. Eventually he finds the boss of the operation and kills him—and is, in turn, killed by the police.

The basic plot is that simple. It is what Greene added to it that makes the difference. The murdered man turns out to have been a prominent politician with a strong reputation for social reform, and his death precipitates a crisis between two European countries that may lead to war. The man behind the assassination is an industrialist who will make a fortune out of armaments if war does occur. The fact that thousands will die is irrelevant; profit is the point of life. This modest flirting with politics and the profit motive of modern capitalist society foreshadowed a common element in Greene's work. Greene was a socialist; his sympathies were always with the common people, and his disdain for capitalism and its influence on human character was often woven into his novels. A recurring character is the manipulating boss who will kill for profit; sometimes he is a politician, and at times he is a fascist tyrant, as is the case in The Honorary Consul (1973). People in power in general—whether they simply are criminals, as in A Gun for Sale or Brighton Rock (1938), or whether they have political connections, as in The Human Factor (1978)—are likely to act viciously, even against their own, and often represent a kind of mean-spirited inhumanity that Greene despises. Greene's major characters, however tainted they may be themselves, are often in the hands of pusillanimous villains who far surpass their agents in human beastliness. Moreover, such conduct is often clearly connected with democracies badly derailed through commercial greed, when it is not connected with outright fascism in novels such as The Human Factor, Our Man in Havana: An Entertainment (1958), and The Comedians (1966).

Greene is often called a novelist of pity, and this aspect of his work is constant. In A Gun for Sale, the killer, Raven, is an unattractive runt with a harelip that he knows most people find disgusting. He is despised, and he despises, but the reader learns that his life has been a living hell. His father was executed, and while he was a child, his mother stabbed herself to death. He has no affection for anyone, and expects none for himself. Yet the novel explores the possibility of a different Raven, the one who might have been had someone taken an interest in him, and on occasion he shows capacity for more humane behavior.

BRIGHTON ROCK

This interest in the killer as a human being with a history, a psychological reason for his conduct, appears again with the character Pinkie in Brighton Rock; this time it is much richer and more complicated, and has added to it that very important theme of the Greene canon, the question of religion. Pinkie is, like Raven, a lethally dangerous man without hope for anything more than what he can lay hold of through crime. What is the nature of his relationship to God? How can God allow the squalor, the violence, the hopelessness of modern urban society, the self-interested manipulations of modern politics? If he exists at all (and that is questionable in Greene's world of meaningless animality), can he forgive humans for their terrible conduct, their cruelty to one another? The thrillers, like the novels, often embark on this melancholy investigation of not only social responsibility but also religious possibility.

THE HONORARY CONSUL

This interesting idea of the killer as a lost soul, so deeply in sin that he cannot be retrieved even by God, can take complicated turns in Greene's work. In The Honorary Consul, the lost soul is, in fact, a Roman Catholic priest, Leon Rivas, who has left the Church to lead a revolutionary group against the fascist regime in Paraguay. Legally, he is a criminal; religiously, he is in a state of sin. Much of the novel is taken up with a discussion not only of political right and wrong but also of the responsibility of God for allowing the inhumanity of fascism in supposedly enlightened late twentieth century countries such as Paraguay, where murder and torture are common tools of political power.

Such debates are often carried on by means of another character-type that recurs frequently in Greene's novels. In A Gun for Sale, Anne Crowder, a simple showgirl who gets involved by chance in Raven's attempt to elude the police, attempts to understand what makes Raven what he is. This suspension of judgment, this willingness to understand, this kindness in the face of seemingly unexplainable conduct, sees her through. It is not always to be so. Many of Greene's major characters are merely trying to get through life without emotional commitment, but their basic decency pulls them into the center of dangerous situations that they had not contemplated. Greene has admitted to a deep admiration for the work of Joseph Conrad, and his jaundiced view of the makeup of a spy or a terrorist can be traced back to Conrad's Under Western Eyes (1910) and The Secret Agent (1907). The pessimism of Greene's protagonists can be seen in Conrad's most ironically titled work, Victory (1915), in which a character who had hitherto kept to himself, as he had been advised to do by his father, befriends a woman and falls in love with her reluctantly and innocently enough, but with consequences that are disastrous for both of them. Greene's novels often center on a man such as Eduardo Plarr of The Honorary Consul, a doctor who helps the poor as best he can yet shuns personal relationships. By chance he falls in love, helps a friend, attempts to rescue an innocent political hostage, and gets killed for involving himself with other human beings.

THE HEART OF THE MATTER

In The Heart of the Matter (1948), the police officer Scobie ignores a seemingly innocent breach of wartime regulations, tries to console a young woman rescued from a torpedoed ship, and attempts to keep his neurotic wife happy though he no longer loves her—all innocent acts of pity. In combination, however, they lead to betrayal and murder—and to Scobie's suicide, despite his agony in offending God by causing his own death. Decency, pity, innocent concern for others are often likely to kill a character in Greene's inexorably, arbitrarily cruel world.

This confrontation of often-inept tenderness with a world that does not care is what has come to be suggested by "Greeneland," a word that has been coined to refer to the universe of Greene's novels. Modern thrillers are generally marked by stylistic eccentricity, and much of their readers' pleasure derives from the peculiarity of the dialogue and of the narrative. Indeed, it is almost an obligation for the writer of the thriller to fashion the story's language in a way that mirrors the moral and emotional characteristics of the protagonist. It can be as shallow as the style used by Ian Fleming or as rich and complex as those of Raymond Chandler and Dashiell Hammett.

For Greene, style may be said to go beyond any other thriller writer's ambition for it. In his work, style is clearly an aspect of meaning, and thus his writing is peculiarly muted, repressed, and consistently pessimistic in tone and image. Chocolate, for example, always seems to have connotations of death in a Greene novel, an idea that would be surprising in any other context but seems perfectly appropriate in his work. “Seedy” is the word often used to describe Greene’s world. His characters—down-at-heel, reclusive, plain, and depressed—often seem unqualified to cope with trouble, but they tend to attract it, no matter how hard they try to avoid it.

To balance the discussion, it should be said that Greene, for all of his morbidity about life in general, is often a very amusing writer. Indeed, he has written what may very well be the most comical of mock-thrillers, Our Man in Havana, in which many of the conventions of the genre are quite charmingly turned upside down.

Charles Pullen

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: 1929-1940 • The Man Within, 1929; The Name of Action, 1930; Rumour at Nightfall, 1931; Stamboul Train: An Entertainment, 1932 (also known as Orient Express: An Entertainment, 1933); It’s a Battlefield, 1934; England Made Me, 1935; A Gun for Sale: An Entertainment, 1936 (also known as This Gun for Hire: An Entertainment); Brighton Rock, 1938; The Confidential Agent, 1939; The Power and the Glory, 1940 (reissued as The Labyrinthine Ways)

1941-1960 • The Ministry of Fear: An Entertainment, 1943; The Heart of the Matter, 1948; The Third Man: An Entertainment, 1950; The Third Man and The Fallen Idol, 1950; The End of the Affair, 1951; Loser Takes All: An Entertainment, 1955; The Quiet American, 1955; Our Man in Havana: An Entertainment, 1958

1961-1988 • A Burnt-Out Case, 1961; The Comedians, 1966; The Honorary Consul, 1973; The Human Factor, 1978; Dr. Fischer of Geneva: Or, The Bomb Party, 1980; Monsignor Quixote, 1982; The Tenth Man, 1985; The Captain and the Enemy, 1988

SHORT FICTION: The Basement Room, and Other Stories, 1935; Nineteen Stories, 1947 (revised 1954 as Twenty-one Stories); A Sense of Reality, 1963; No Man’s Land, 2004

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVEL: Travels with My Aunt, 1969

SHORT FICTION: The Bear Fell Free, 1935; Twenty-four Stories, 1939 (with James Laver and Sylvia Townsend Warner); A Visit to Morin, 1959; May We Borrow Your Husband? and Other Comedies of the Sexual Life, 1967; Collected Stories, 1972; How Father Quixote Became a Monsignor, 1980

PLAYS: The Heart of the Matter, pr. 1950 (with Basil Dean; adaptation of his novel); The Living Room, pr., pb. 1953; The Potting Shed, pr., pb. 1957; The Complaisant Lover, pr., pb. 1959; Carving a Statue, pr., pb. 1964; The Return of A. J. Raffles: An Edwardian Comedy in Three Acts Based Somewhat Loosely on E. W. Hornung’s Characters in “The Amateur Cracksman,” pr., pb. 1975; For Whom the Bell Chimes, pr. 1980, pb. 1983; Yes and No, pr. 1980, pb. 1983; The Collected Plays of Graham Greene, pb. 1985

RADIO PLAY: The Great Jowett, 1939

SCREENPLAYS: Twenty-one Days, 1937; The New Britain, 1940; Brighton Rock, 1947 (adaptation of his novel; with Terence Rattigan); The Fallen Idol, 1948 (adaptation of his novel; with Lesley Storm and William Templeton); The Third Man, 1949 (adaptation of his novel; with Carol Reed); The Stranger’s Hand, 1954 (with Guy Elmes and Giorgino Bassani); Loser Takes All, 1956 (adaptation of his novel); Saint Joan, 1957 (adaptation of George Bernard Shaw’s play); Our Man in Havana, 1959 (adaptation of his novel); The Comedians, 1967 (adaptation of his novel)

TELEPLAY: Alas, Poor Maling, 1975

POETRY: Babbling April: Poems, 1925; After Two Years, 1949; For Christmas, 1950

CHILDREN’S LITERATURE: The Little Train, 1946; The Little Fire Engine, 1950 (also known as The Little Red Fire Engine, 1952); The Little Horse Bus, 1952; The Little Steam Roller: A Story of Mystery and Detection, 1953

NONFICTION: Journey Without Maps: A Travel Book, 1936; The Lawless Roads: A Mexican Journal, 1939 (reissued as Another Mexico); British Dramatists, 1942; Why Do I Write? An Exchange of Views Between Elizabeth Bowen, Graham Greene, and V. S. Pritchett, 1948; The Lost Childhood, and Other Essays, 1951; Essais Catholiques, 1953 (Marcelle Sibon, translator); In Search of a Character: Two

African Journals, 1961; The Revenge: An Autobiographical Fragment, 1963; Victorian Detective Fiction, 1966; Collected Essays, 1969; A Sort of Life, 1971; The Pleasure Dome: The Collected Film Criticism, 1935-40, of Graham Greene, 1972 (John Russell-Taylor, editor; also known as The Pleasure-Dome: Graham Greene on Film, Collected Film Criticism, 1935-1940); Lord Rochester's Monkey: Being the Life of John Wilmot, Second Earl of Rochester, 1974; Ways of Escape, 1980; J'accuse: The Dark Side of Nice, 1982; Getting to Know the General: The Story of an Involvement, 1984

EDITED TEXTS: The Old School: Essays by Divers Hands, 1934; The Best of Saki, 1950; The Spy's Bedside Book: An Anthology, 1957 (with Hugh Greene); The Bodley Head Ford Madox Ford, 1962, 1963 (4 volumes); An Impossible Woman: The Memories of Dottoressa Moor of Capri, 1975

MISCELLANEOUS: The Portable Graham Greene, 1973 (Philip Stout Ford, editor)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

De Vitis, A. A. Graham Greene. Rev. ed. Boston: Twayne, 1986. Most interesting in this volume are an overview of critical opinion about Greene, a chronology, and a chapter on the short stories. Supplemented by a thorough primary bibliography and an annotated bibliography of secondary sources.

Falk, Quentin. Travels in Greenland: The Complete Cinema of Graham Greene. 3d ed. New York: Trafalgar Square, 2000. A guide to Greene's association with film, as a screenwriter and as a reviewer, as well as the numerous adaptations of his novels to film.

Hill, William Thomas. Graham Greene's Wanderers: The Search for Dwelling—Journeying and Wandering in the Novels of Graham Greene. San Francisco: International Scholars, 1999. Examines the motif of the dwelling in Greene's fiction. Deals with the mother, the father, the nation, and the Church as the "ground" of dwelling.

Hoskins, Robert. Graham Greene: An Approach to the Novels. New York: Garland, 1999. An updated look at Greene's oeuvre. Includes bibliographical references and an index.

Malmet, Elliott. The World Remade: Graham Greene and the Art of Detection. New York: P. Lang, 1998. Focuses on Greene's genre fiction.

Sheldon, Michael. Graham Greene: The Enemy Within. New York: Random House, 1994. In this unauthorized biography, Sheldon takes a much more critical view of Greene's life, especially of his politics, than does Norman Sherry, the authorized biographer. A lively, opinionated narrative. Notes and bibliography included.

Sherry, Norman. The Life of Graham Greene. 3 vols. London: J. Cape, 1989-2004. The most comprehensive, most authoritative account of Greene's life yet published, written with complete access to his papers and the full cooperation of family, friends, and the novelist himself. Includes a generous collection of photographs, a bibliography, and an index.

West, W. J. The Quest for Graham Greene. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1998. Focuses on the more obscure aspects of Greene's life, including his adolescent nervous breakdown and his involvement with the British Secret Service.

STEPHEN GREENLEAF

Born: Washington, D.C.; July 17, 1942

Types of plot: Hard-boiled; private investigator; courtroom drama

PRINCIPAL SERIES

John Marshall Tanner, 1979-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

JOHN MARSHALL "MARSH" TANNER is a San Francisco-based private eye in his late forties. Formerly a defense attorney, Tanner was suspended because he publicly defied a corrupt judge. However, he retains his law license so that he can invoke attorney-client privilege and withhold sensitive information from the police. Although he is sometimes roughed up, Tanner is not particularly adept with his fists or with firearms. Rather, he is intelligent, perseverant, and adept at role-playing. His sympathies are always with the underdog, and he recoils from the rich, the powerful, and the self-important. He is also a depressive, an insomniac, a technophobe, and something of a loner. His private vices include scotch and sandwich cookies, and he enjoys jazz, modern art, and modern literature.

CHARLEY SLEET, a detective lieutenant in the San Francisco Police Department (SFPD), is Tanner's best friend. A large man with a tough demeanor, Sleet shares Tanner's sympathies for the underdog and regularly (though without fanfare) donates time and fortune to help the homeless, drug addicts, prostitutes, and others marginalized by society. Tanner has unofficially assisted Sleet on some police cases, and Sleet in turn makes available to Tanner confidential police information that helps investigations.

RUTHIE SPRING is a profane Texas cowgirl, former nurse, and widow of Tanner's mentor Harry Spring. After Harry's death in the initial novel of the series, Ruthie becomes a private investigator and often assists her good friend Tanner on his more logistically challenging cases.

PEGGY NETTLETON is Tanner's loyal and resourceful secretary. As the series progresses, she becomes a more prominent figure, one of Tanner's most trusted confidantes. After both mistake their trust and friendship for sexual passion, in Toll Call (1987), Peggy quits her job and moves away from the Bay Area. Thereafter she makes only one more appearance in the series, as Tanner's client in a case that takes him to Seattle.

CONTRIBUTION

The John Marshall Tanner novels by Stephen Greenleaf have been frequently recognized as extending the California hard-boiled private eye tradition established by Dashiell Hammett, Raymond Chandler, and Ross Macdonald. Initially the influence of Chandler and particularly Macdonald was unmistakable. Gradually, however, Greenleaf developed his own style, Tanner became his own man, and several of the novels succeeded in transcending genre conventions to engage important social concerns of the 1980's and 1990's.

Like Greenleaf, Tanner is a former attorney, and most of his cases involve legal as well as ethical issues. There is usually a prominent lawyer among the chief suspects in each criminal case investigated by Tanner. Greenleaf's two nonseries novels also directly involve courtroom dramas. The protagonist of The Ditto List (1985) is a male divorce lawyer who represents only women. Impact (1989) concerns a personal injury trial after an airplane crash.

Greenleaf's plots are very well crafted, often involving multiple lines of action and different time frames as they delve into the colorfully messy lives of families across generational lines. He has even experimented with alternatives to murder as the moral and emotional catalyst for his mystery plots. In Toll Call, for example, the narrative centers around sexual harassment involving Tanner's secretary; when that situation is resolved, another dealing with kidnapping takes over as the focus of Tanner's detection. As always, these crimes have their genesis in some past trauma, and as Greenleaf once told an interviewer, his principal concern is "less on who done it than on why it was done." The result is characterization in remarkable depth.

BIOGRAPHY

Stephen Howell Greenleaf was born on July 17, 1942, in Washington, D.C., the son of Robert Wendell, a lawyer and business executive, and Patricia Howell Greenleaf. Shortly thereafter the family relocated to Centerville, Iowa. Greenleaf first became interested in detective novels in the fifth grade when he was sent home from school for sneaking a Perry Mason story into class. He received his bachelor's degree in history from Carleton College in Minnesota in 1964 and his law degree from Boalt Hall of the University of California, Berkeley, in 1967. In 1967-1969 Greenleaf served in the United States Army, including a year in Vietnam. He was married to Ann Garrison, an author of children's books, on July 20, 1968. The couple has a son, Aaron Howell.

Greenleaf was admitted to the bar of California in 1968 and served as a legal aid for Multnomah County in Portland, Oregon, in 1969-1970. The following year, he was an associate attorney at Thompson & Hubbard in Monterey, California. From 1972 to 1976 he was associate attorney at Sullivan, Jones & Archer in San Francisco, specializing in securities fraud, anti-trust, and business litigation. He became dissatisfied with his career in law and cast about for a new challenge, deciding eventually, at the age of thirty-four, on writing. His years as a lawyer on the West Coast gave him a feel for the setting he would use as home base in the Tanner series.

Greenleaf moved back to Iowa toward the end of the decade and served as an adjunct professor of trial advocacy at the University of Iowa. He wrote his first Tanner novel, Grave Error (1979), while waiting to take the Iowa bar exam and was also a participant in the Iowa Writers' Workshop. Lacking the benefit of an agent or any contact in publishing, Greenleaf saw his manuscript rejected by seven publishing houses before he managed to get the novel accepted by Dial Press. Over the next two decades, thirteen more novels in the Tanner series would appear, with middling sales despite mostly good reviews. Three of the final four volumes were nominated for major awards in the mystery field. The series concluded with Ellipsis (2000), by the end of which Tanner appears about to retire from his career as detective and to begin a new life with his wife-to-be, Assistant District Attorney Jill Coppelia.

Hoping to attract a larger readership, Greenleaf moved outside the mystery genre by writing two non-series novels: The Ditto List and Impact, both of which involve courtroom dramas and were sold to Hollywood. After many years in Washington and Oregon, the Greenleafs settled in Northern California.

ANALYSIS

Stephen Greenleaf did not begin his writing career until the age of thirty-four, after two years in the military and nearly six as a practicing lawyer. Therefore he had a ready store of experience on which to draw as a writer. In particular, his career in the law and his family background—his father and both grandfathers had also been attorneys—created a strong awareness of the legal profession's demands and shortcomings as well as its strategic place in American society. In one way or another, this awareness informs every book he has written.

The title character of the Tanner series was named after John Marshall, the longest-serving chief justice in the history of the Supreme Court. Before becoming a private investigator, Tanner was a practicing attorney for some five years, until his suspension for contempt of court. He spent six months in jail rather than apologize to the corrupt judge, an experience that sensitized him to another side of the legal system and to its victims.

Greenleaf's knowledge of the law gives a particular edge to his engagement with social issues. Reviewers have often noted the remarkable acuity with which his novels have examined such themes as radical politics, the legal insanity defense, corporate chicanery, libel in works of fiction, surrogate motherhood, racism, the AIDS epidemic, repressed memories of childhood sexual abuse, police brutality and corruption, and the plight of illegal immigrant farmworkers. In Greenleaf's hands these issues invariably raise complex legal and ethical questions that are credibly made to serve as the impetus for plot developments by providing a variety of suspects, victims, alibis, hidden identities, and the rest of the apparatus needed for Tanner's investigations to progress. At the same time, by giving the issues concrete human embodiment, his novels elicit compassion and understanding in a way that mere ratiocination or polemic could not.

As is often the case with hard-boiled noir fiction, setting assumes a large importance in the Tanner novels. Most are set in San Francisco and environs, making available the full range of material and tonal assets needed in a private eye series: extremes of privilege and deprivation, racial and cultural diversity and antagonism, cunning as well as brutal criminal activity, and a general atmosphere evocative of modern alienation and angst. The proximity of the swells of Nob Hill to the hells of the Tenderloin section and of nearby exotic locales like Monterey and Berkeley are reminders that the American dream remains elusive even in a place where its rewards are gaudily on display.

Tanner narrates the novels in the first person, and his voice, though not flashy, is a clear and effective instrument for interpreting his world. Well read, conversant with jazz, modern art, and professional sports, he is observant and attentive, especially to pretension and material excess, frequently the targets of his irony, and to suffering and deprivation, which elicit his empathy.

GRAVE ERROR

Greenleaf has admitted that when he began the series he hoped to “write about the Bay Area in the way Ross Macdonald wrote about Southern California.” This is especially evident in his first novel, Grave Error, in which crimes committed in the past provide a hidden link to present crimes and the effect of earlier traumas on later generations of a dysfunctional family become the motivational key to the case. What begins as a relatively simple investigation into what is possibly blackmail becomes a tangled web of theft, racism, incest, and multiple murder—with Tanner ultimately discovering the connections between all the strands, yet withholding crucial information that would bring needless pain to a member of the primary family involved. Like Macdonald’s Lew Archer, Tanner acts in accordance with a tacit code of honor. This case offers the first of a series of tests of that code, tests that challenge the meaning of honor and compel constant redefinition, if not subversion, of the code.

In one of his many suggestive asides, Tanner notes that the private eye’s job is “short on glamour and long on moral ambiguity.” For him the ambiguity is often a product of conflict between the observer’s preferred professional stance of detachment and objectivity, and the humane desire to become involved and to help those in need. It is a conflict that Tanner never quite resolves to his satisfaction but one whose complexities make for illuminating, if sometimes troubling, insights.

FATAL OBSESSION

The fifth Tanner novel, Fatal Obsession (1983), is a departure in that it takes place not in San Francisco but in Chaldea, a small town in western Iowa, where Tanner was born and raised. There is more exposition about his early life than in any other novel in the series. Tanner, an all-state football star in high school, has three siblings, two of whom still reside in Chaldea. Their parents were killed in an auto accident when Tanner was just ten. The disposition of the family’s farmland provides the occasion for the siblings’ reunion, a situation that allows Greenleaf to explore the range of difficulties faced by small farmers.

The apparent suicide of Tanner’s nephew, a tormented Vietnam veteran, becomes the focus of Tanner’s investigation, during which he uncovers local manifestations of national problems such as the illicit drug trade, environmental plunder, investment scams, and the dissolution of the family, and becomes involved with the small town’s struggle for economic survival.

Tanner solves the puzzle of his nephew’s death only to feel disappointment in his own life, which had once seemed so full of promise. He reflects at the end:

I thought that my return to Chaldea might reveal something that would explain or even excuse some of the things I was and unfortunately was not. But it hadn’t done anything of the kind, of course. It had just reminded me that those days were worse than I remembered, not better, and that the search for excuses is endless and therefore worthless.

Like other titles in the series, including Book Case (1991), Past Tense (1997), and Strawberry Sunday (1999), Fatal Obsession is enjoyable as a novel, beyond its interest as a mystery.

BOOK CASE

In what may be Greenleaf’s finest novel, Book Case, Tanner is hired by a publisher friend to find the author of an anonymously submitted manuscript of a novel called Homage to Hammurabi. This novel appears to be a potential blockbuster, dealing with a sex scandal at an exclusive private school. The more he looks into the case, the more Tanner becomes convinced that the supposedly fictional plot is based on fact and that the scandal, involving sexual abuse of a female student by a male teacher who subsequently lost his job and was sent to prison, had actually occurred at an elite preparatory school in a posh San Francisco suburb. Tanner believes the fired teacher may be the author of the manuscript, and he uncovers evidence that the charge was fraudulent and the prison sentence therefore a cruel miscarriage of justice.

As the former teacher, recently released from prison, has become a homeless vagrant, Tanner's search for him necessarily entails a descent into the seamiest part of San Francisco, known as the Tenderloin. This search provides a sharp contrast to the scenes in the suburban enclave where the school is located. Tanner's investigation ultimately discloses fundamental connections between these seemingly opposed worlds, in both of which greed, fear, addiction, and despair drive people to criminal behavior.

The convoluted story of both Book Case and Homage to Hammurabi, as one character observes, is "straight out of Kafka—nothing is as it seems; no one is unsullied; guilt and innocence are indeterminable." Tanner responds that it sounds more like something Ross Macdonald would write.

The complex plots, witty dialogue, convincingly drawn characters, and richly textured prose style have made the Tanner series one of the most distinguished in the genre and have helped elevate its literary stature. This estimate is supported by the predominantly enthusiastic reviews Greenleaf has received from the beginning, though his modest sales may offer a clue as to why he has stated that he will add no further volumes to Tanner's saga.

Ronald G. Walker

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

JOHN MARSHALL TANNER SERIES: Grave Error, 1979; Death Bed, 1980; Child Proof, 1981; State's Evidence, 1982; Fatal Obsession, 1983; Beyond Blame, 1986; Toll Call, 1987; Book Case, 1991; Blood Type, 1992; Southern Cross, 1993; False Conception, 1994; Flesh Wounds, 1996; Past Tense, 1997; Strawberry Sunday, 1999; Ellipsis, 2000

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: The Ditto List, 1985; Impact, 1989

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bedell, Jeanne F. "Interdependent Mazes: The Detective Novels of Stephen Greenleaf." Clues: A Journal of Detection 10, no. 1 (Spring/Summer, 1989): 51-62. The only scholarly analysis of the Tanner series (through 1987's Toll Call), finding Greenleaf's early efforts derivative of Ross Macdonald but his later ones original and distinctive in voice and theme.

Greenleaf, Stephen. "Detective Novel Writing: The Hows and the Whys." The Writer 106, no. 12 (December, 1993): 11-14. The author explains his methods of writing detective novels and how Ross Macdonald's Lew Archer series influenced him.

_____. Interview by Thomas Chastain. The Armchair Detective 15, no. 4 (1982): 346-349. The earliest interview of the author, after only three of the Tanner novels had appeared. Useful information about Greenleaf's background, influences on his work, and his methods of composition.

_____. "The John Marshall Tanner Novels." Mystery Readers International 11, no. 2 (Summer, 1995): 28-29. Greenleaf discusses his John Marshall Tanner series, which at the time consisted of eleven books. He describes how he chose his setting as well as the origins of the character's name.

Lynskey, Ed. "Stephen Greenleaf: Creator of California's Next Great Private Eye." 2005. <http://www.mysteryfile.com>. An overview and summary of all fourteen Tanner novels, along with quotations from book reviews and a useful bibliography.

Murphy, Stephen M. "Stephen Greenleaf." Their Word Is Law: Bestselling Lawyer-Novelist Talk About Their Craft, edited by Stephen M. Murphy. New York: Berkeley Books, 2002. A collection of interviews. Greenleaf's interview, which took place in 1991, is an interesting mid-career look at how the author drew on his experience of the legal profession and how the series has matured over the years.

MARTHA GRIMES

Born: Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; May 2, 1931

Types of plot: Police procedural; amateur sleuth; psychological; cozy

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Richard Jury and Melrose Plant, 1981-

Emma Graham, 1996-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

DETECTIVE SUPERINTENDENT RICHARD JURY of Scotland Yard rises from chief inspector to superintendent. Urbane, handsome, compassionate, he turns women's heads but remains unattached. He is helped by Melrose Plant and Sergeant Alfred Wiggins.

MELROSE PLANT, Jury's friend and an amateur sleuth, lives in the village of Long Piddleton in Northamptonshire. Single, well-educated, and rich, by birth he is Lord Ardry, but he has given up his titles.

EMMA GRAHAM is a twelve-year-old Maryland girl, based largely on her creator's adolescent self.

CONTRIBUTION

Martha Grimes's mysteries, despite their familiar British surroundings and English eccentrics, defy the usual categorization. Her plots partake of the best of many schools—amateur sleuth, police procedural, psychological study, private investigator—without succumbing to the limitations of any given type. This rare versatility is largely the result of two strategies: the pairing of a Scotland Yard detective with an aristocratic amateur sleuth and a sustained attention to atmosphere.

The two detectives—Detective Superintendent Richard Jury and Melrose Plant—are idealizations from different worlds, a slightly oddball team containing one man from the metropolis and one from the country. Grimes's control of the atmosphere in which these two operate has the mark of an exceptional talent. Not a single detail is without design. The novel titles drawn from pub names (her trademark), the poetic imagery, the alternation of delicious humor and somber apprehensions, and the rolling montage technique—all combine to produce Grimes's uniquely wrought mysteries.

BIOGRAPHY

Martha Grimes was born in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, was reared in western Maryland, and worked and lived in Maryland; Washington, D.C.; and England. Her father died when she was a child, and her mother operated a summer resort near Deep Creek Lake, Maryland, to support the family, which included an older brother, Bill. After earning both her bachelor's and master's degrees at the University of Maryland, Grimes went on to the University of Iowa, where she studied poetry. She taught English at Montgomery College in Takoma Park, Maryland, for fourteen years and also taught a seminar on detective fiction as a visiting professor at the Johns Hopkins University. She was married briefly.

After Grimes worked for some time on her poetry, she recognized that the suspense, drama, and death in her poems were strong indicators that her real strength as a writer would be detective fiction. There were several years of rejection slips before The Man with the Load of Mischief was published in 1981.

Grimes's fascination with England began during a romance with an English writer. She began taking annual extended visits, gathering material. Although the English setting is necessary to her work, she found the perspective she gained from living in the United States to be equally important. As much as she has been compared with Agatha Christie, Grimes's composition process is quite unlike that of Christie, who plotted her stories from the end backward. Grimes's work is expressionist in more than imagery alone; she determines "whodunit" only after most of the story is written. Grimes's talent has gained recognition, although she is still underrated. Her third novel, The Anodyne Necklace, won the Nero Wolfe Award for the best mystery of 1983.

ANALYSIS

Martha Grimes, poet and English professor, was sitting in Bethesda, Maryland, poring over a book on British pub names, when she was struck with a vision of her future: writing mysteries set in and around British pubs. Loving both British mysteries and England itself, she saw the pub as the symbolic heart of British daily life and as the natural gathering place for the closed society so necessary to the classic detective story. On her frequent trips to England, she studied small villages and their pubs, absorbing the atmosphere and observing the people.

With the pubs go the eccentric characters of the English mystery tradition. At the start, Grimes had intended Melrose Plant to be the central figure in her series. Eccentric in having dispensed with his claims to nobility, he would be surrounded by other humorous characters, noteworthy for some quirk, talent, or obsession. His Aunt Agatha, for example, one of the most unswervingly obnoxious women in a mystery series, will never forgive her nephew for thwarting her pretensions to titled eminence. His butler Ruthven is as self-possessed as Jeeves and as accomplished in domestic feats as Bunter. In the village of Long Piddleton, Dick Scroggs is the inventive proprietor of the Jack and Hammer, where Marshall Trueblood, antiques dealer and flashy dresser, usually shares the drink of the day with the lovely, well-bred Vivian Rivington, or perhaps with the old char, Mrs. Withersby.

At some undetermined point, the character of Detective Superintendent Richard Jury was developed, and he was a different sort of detective from Plant. Jury became increasingly important, until each man had his own role. This development was something Grimes had to defend to her publisher, who finally agreed to the notion of a shared working relationship, a cooperative, fifty-fifty arrangement. Grimes argued that her books simply could not succeed if either man's role were diminished. When Jury is in London, another set of eccentrics comes on the scene. At Jury's flat, he is sandwiched between the headstrong Carole-Anne on the second floor and the fearful Mrs. Wassermann in the basement, both of whom long to see him married. On the job, Jury is complemented by his sidekick, the eternally sniffing Wiggins, his voluble and luxury-loving boss Racer, the winsome Fiona Clingmore, and the mischievous feline Cyril. However much Racer tries to make Jury's life miserable, it is clear that he is mere bluster. Like the milieu of the pub in Long Pidd (as Long Piddleton is known), the scene at the Yard is a comic one.

As important as the collection of engaging characters is the world created for them, and this world Grimes suggests with a wide range of British idioms, clear and concrete descriptions of interior as well as exterior settings (details of furniture, dress, dinnerware, the quality of daylight), and delicately rendered nuances of feeling in conversation. Music, too, underlines the shifting moods as the atmosphere alternates from light to dark. Yet as carefully observed and accurate as these details are, their cumulative effect is not what might be expected. The details are selected precisely for their power to convey the romantic illusion of the classic British mystery.

In 1983, Grimes wrote about the willing suspension of disbelief so enjoyed by the loyal readers of this sort of mystery. So keen was she on researching Scotland Yard that she even read several official reports of the commissioner to the queen, attempted unsuccessfully to interview former convicts, and, if one is to take her in earnest, visited the plate-glass and steel edifice on Victoria Street in the company of a man who claimed that he was being poisoned. Regardless of the absolute veracity of the account of that visit, Grimes herself was under no delusion about her purpose:

Although I wanted to know the red-tape details, I didn't want to use them. My sort of mystery is far more an exercise in deduction and an occasion to give free play to a dozen or so cranky types than it is a "true" account of how Scotland Yard operates.

The reader does not really want to know, Grimes concluded, about the level of police corruption in London or that the Yard is not really called in on complicated cases out in the provinces—"not even in the case of the Yorkshire Ripper." The reader wants the conventions that are the stuff of his dreams.

With the research accomplished, the next logical step is usually the plotting. However, Grimes typically would not know who the murderer was before Jury did. She could not outline the story in advance, she said. She did not even have a central murder in mind when she began writing. This unconscious method of composition is quite consistent with the expressionist style she chose and with her assertion that this kind of mystery was the stuff of dreams. While Grimes's conscious mind would be occupied selecting the details of atmosphere appropriate to the unthinkable deed, her unconscious would devise the motive and the means for a death—shockingly out of place, yet consistent with the mood.

Perhaps Grimes's greatest strength, given the doubling of detectives, the pairing of metropolis and village, and the two levels of story development, conscious and unconscious, is the montage effect she manipulates so dexterously. She brings her poetic talents to bear, accenting imagery, and she has a delicious sense of humor that she uses to relieve her more somber passages. This rapid alternation of mood, character, setting, and action is admirably suited to the two most important requirements of the detective plot, forward movement and diversion. Montage serves as camouflage.

THE FIVE BELLS AND BLADEBONE

The Five Bells and Bladebone (1987) is a particularly good example of this doubling, of contrasting moods, and of alternating perspectives. Its plot involves the classic problem of identity. The pub for which this book is named is located in London's East End, the Limehouse district. It is a place with a murderous reputation, which the story's opening sentences feelingly invoke:

What else could you think of but getting your throat slit?

Whitechapel, Shadwell, the Ratcliffe Highway: images of the bloody East End flashed like knives in and out of Sadie Diver's mind each time she heard the sound of footsteps behind her on the dark walk from Limehouse. She was still thinking of it as her heels clicked wetly on the fog-draped pavements of Wapping. Never caught him either, did they? So much for police.

These are the thoughts of Sadie Diver as she walks toward a life-or-death encounter on a slimy slipway along the Thames. No sooner has this abrupt and chilling immersion into suspense occurred than the scene is shifted to another character in another place: Tommy Diver, Sadie's romantic kid brother, is standing on the Thames dock downriver, anticipating a trip to see his sister the next day; then, as abruptly as before, the scene shifts to formal gardens and the perspective of a hungry white cat stalking a dark moving shadow, then licking a bloody paw.

Three dark views, three tangentially related fragments of action, make up the first chapter, lightened, in chapter 2, by yet another kaleidoscopic shift, this time to the Jack and Hammer in Long Pidd. Melrose Plant is waiting, crossword puzzle in hand, for his friend Richard Jury, who has two weeks' vacation and wants to spend it in the quiet countryside. Bedeviling Plant as he waits is Dick, the pub's proprietor, who is making improvements to the place with his hammer, and Aunt Agatha, who is limping about on a bandaged ankle and badgering her nephew about Jury's time of arrival. Plant begins entering words such as "dolt" and "nit" in his crossword as he struggles to retain his composure despite Agatha's abuse. When Vivian and Marshall arrive, things do not improve for the former earl. More four-letter words come to Melrose as he begins inventing answers to the questions shot his way. Jury's car has broken down, he tells them, writing in F-O-O-L, and he has met an old flame; they are having tea at the Woburn turnoff while the car is being fixed. Thus Grimes bedazzles her audience as she juggles time and tone, clues and characters.

Once Jury does arrive in Long Pidd, the two detectives discover the first body (Sadie Diver's is found later). Plant and Jury come upon the body of Simon Lean, the ne'er-do-well son-in-law of Lady Summerston of Watermeadows, whose body has been stuffed into a desk that had just been delivered to Marshall's shop. The teamwork begins, with Plant supplying local connections and perceptive consultation and Jury calling in London officials and conducting interviews.

Both men are romantic idealizations, each in his own way. Jury, for his part, can authorize certain police procedures, but he never seems to depend on technicians. According to Grimes, he moves too slowly, listens too patiently, is too affable to be taken as the real thing. He operates as a professional, but without the taint of hard-boiled realism. His deductions come to him, as often as not, through an imaginative synthesis. It is Plant who asks, soon after Lean's body is taken away by the police, "Was the killer trying to conceal or reveal?" The brainy Plant is, from an American point of view at any rate, the ideal aristocrat—one who has withdrawn his allegiance from the aristocracy and simply takes life as it comes in the English village. When Jury realizes that Lean's wife, Hannah, and the dead Sadie are lookalikes, he brings his deductions to Plant for closer consideration.

The question of identity on which the plot turns becomes more and more ambiguous as images of water mount. The proper names alone seem to be clues—Watermeadows, Sadie Diver, Ruby Firth (one of Simon's lady friends), Roy Marsh (Ruby's jealous companion)—but the real clues waver like lights on water or evaporate like a mirage when approached. Grimes shows that legal proofs of identity are anything but certain. It is possible, as Jury says, to take someone's identity away from him, to wipe out a life. In the end, the reader wonders if one can ever know who anyone else really is.

THE LAMORNA WINK

The Lamorna Wink (1999) presents a departure for Grimes, granting the elegant and aristocratic Melrose Plant his first starring role in a series built primarily around Richard Jury. In this novel, with Jury away in Northern Ireland, Plant lands in the midst of a mystery while seeking solitude in Cornwall. Sleight of hand and deception color the tone of this story, and Grimes again fills her pages with exceptional characters. Plant embarks on his journey to Cornwall in high spirits, delighting in simple acts such as riding on a train. As he imagines dark mysterious pasts for his fellow passengers based on old films, the inescapable Aunt Agatha interrupts his reverie. Horrified to learn that Agatha is "coincidentally" traveling to Cornwall as well, Plant resigns himself to an altered holiday and amuses himself by ordering her a pot of poison at the Woodbine Tearoom in Bletchley village.

The order is taken by Johnny Wells, a jack-of-all-trades teenager working three jobs to pay his way through school. Johnny's fascination with magic helps fuel the undertone of trickery prevalent throughout the tale. The preternaturally mature youth quickly endears himself to Plant by offering to entertain Agatha for an afternoon. Plant wastes no time and immediately seeks out and rents a house in the village. Interest piqued by photos of the family renting the house, Plant soon learns that the family's two children died in a tragic accident four years earlier. In the midst of this serious and reflective scene, Grimes's inimitable style shines through as she deftly weaves humor into Plant's search of the house. As he turns a corner expecting to see a portrait of a young and tragic heroine wandering in the mist, he comes face to face with a painting of . . . chickens. In the village, forced to choose between cafés called the Drowned Man and the Die Is Cast (the Poor Soul café didn't even make it into the running), Plant determines that Bletchley may be the first "village noir" of England.

Johnny's aunt Chris, part owner of the tearoom, disappears without a trace one evening soon after Plant's arrival. Eager to help his new friend, Plant calls on Divisional Commander Brian Macalvie of the Devon and Cornwall constabulary, who is in the area investigating a mysterious homicide in the town of Lamorna Cove (home of the Lamorna Wink pub) a few miles away. This novel offers startling insights into Macalvie's character. Previously described as committed, driven, and extraordinarily demanding, with a cobalt gaze that "could strip you with a look," Macalvie unveils a past riddled with tragedy.

Morris Bletchley, an American millionaire who made his fortune with fast-food chicken restaurants, bought the country house of a hard-luck aristocrat and turned it into a high-class hospice, where he enjoys careening full-tilt through the hallways in a borrowed wheelchair. As the grandfather of the drowned children, Bletchley believes there is more to that accident than meets the eye. As it happens, Macalvie led the investigation of the drowning and shares Bletchley's opinion.

The story unfolds in typical Grimes style, meandering through the lives and thoughts of the characters, allowing glimpses here and there into the complexities of relationships. Her incomparable use of imagery and ability to capture a scene with a few well-chosen words remain her greatest strengths as a writer and set her apart from others in the mystery genre.

Also of note is the way in which Grimes can seamlessly change the feeling of a story from tragic to humorous. Those familiar with the series welcome the return of the Long Piddleton crowd as Vivian sets a date to marry her Venetian fiancé (again), unleashing a hilarious chain of events as her friends think of ways to stop the wedding. Jury's return in the eleventh hour allows readers to witness the engaging banter between him and Plant just before the answer is revealed, and the solution to the case exposes a dark side of the human spirit that will shock even the most jaded reader.

Grimes faced the wrath of disappointed Jury fans when she published Hotel Paradise (1996), introducing a twelve-year-old crime fighter named Emma Graham. Apart from a knack for tracking down serial killers, the heroine is a close self-portrait of the author at the same age. Despite resistance to Emma from readers, Grimes followed up her initial adventure with Cold Flat Junction (2001) and Belle Ruin (2005), which was warmly received by critics as a "tour de force cobwebby mystery." Alarming readers further, Grimes arranged for the temporary "death" of Richard Jury in The Blue Last (2001), returning her to the best-seller lists after a decade. Jury himself returned two years later in The Grave Maurice (2003). Grimes continues to combine extensive research with excellent writing to produce an elegant, engaging mystery.

Rebecca R. Butler

Updated by Fiona Kelleghan,

Mickey Rubenstien, and Janet Alice Long

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

RICHARD JURY AND MELROSE PLANT SERIES:

The Man with the Load of Mischief, 1981; The Old Fox Deceiv'd, 1982; The Anodyne Necklace, 1983; The Dirty Duck, 1984; Jerusalem Inn, 1984; The Deer Leap, 1985; Help the Poor Struggler, 1985; I Am the Only Running Footman, 1986; The Five Bells and Bladebone, 1987; The Old Silent, 1988; The Old Contemptibles, 1991; The Horse You Came in On, 1993; Rainbow's End, 1995; The Case Has Altered, 1997; The Stargazey, 1998; The Lamorna Wink, 1999; The Blue Last, 2001; The Grave Maurice, 2003; The Winds of Change, 2004; The Old Wine Shades, 2006; Dust, 2007

EMMA GRAHAM SERIES: Hotel Paradise, 1996;

Cold Flat Junction, 2001; Belle Ruin, 2005

NONSERIES NOVELS: The End of the Pier, 1992;

Biting the Moon, 1999; Foul Matter, 2003

SHORT FICTION: The Train Now Departing and

When the Mousetrap Closes, 1997

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

POETRY: Send Bygraves, 1989

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Campbell, Mary. "Grimes' Dust Nothing to Sneeze At." Review of Dust, by Martha Grimes. Sunday Gazette-Mail, April 8, 2007, p. 5F. This Jury and Plant series novel looks at the murder of a wealthy heir in his thirties that involves secrets from World War II. The reviewer finds the novel entertaining.

Grimes, Martha. "Killing Time with Martha Grimes: Mystery Writer Reflects on Twenty-five Years with Jury." Interview by Oline H. Cogdill. The Ottawa

Citizen, April 9, 2006, p. C7. Grimes talks about writing a series and her series character Jury's age and lack of luck in love.

_____. Martha Grimes.com. http:// www.martha-grimes.com. The authorized Web site offers a biography, bibliography, and links to mystery sites.

Klein, Kathleen Gregory, ed. Great Women Mystery Writers: Classic to Contemporary. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994. Contains an essay describing the life and works of Grimes.

Knight, Stephen. Crime Fiction, 1800-2000: Detection, Death, Diversity. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004. Offers in-depth discussions of gender, puzzle cases, and the English influence on American writers, such as Martha Grimes, in detective fiction.

Lindsay, Elizabeth Blakesley, ed. Great Women Mystery Writers. 2d ed. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2007. Contains an essay on Grimes that examines her life and works.

Strafford, Jay. "Emma Graham, Girl Detective, Returns." Review of Belle Ruin, by Martha Grimes. Richmond Times-Dispatch, August 28, 2005, p. K3. In this Emma Graham series novel, Emma solves the mystery of the disappearance of the infant Fay Slade from a now abandoned resort hotel. Reviewer praises the believability of Grimes's characters.

JOHN GRISHAM

Born: Jonesboro, Arkansas; February 8, 1955

Type of plot: Courtroom drama

CONTRIBUTION

Although writing was not his first career, John Grisham has opened the genre of legal thriller to audiences who grew up watching Perry Mason (1957-1966) on television. He began writing his first novel, A Time to Kill (1989), while he was practicing law during the 1980's. It was this decade that filled the headlines with stories of greed and corruption in the legal profession. By writing about lawyers who were more like Harper Lee's Atticus Finch in To Kill a Mockingbird (1960), he managed to redeem the profession while offering a realistic view of the criminal world. He gained fame with his second book, The Firm (1991), about a naïve recent Harvard graduate who accepts an offer he cannot refuse from a corrupt Memphis law firm. Grisham attributes the success of his second book to an article in Writer's Digest which provided a formula for writing a suspense novel. The success of The Firm afforded Grisham the luxury of walking away from his practice to pursue writing full time.

After publishing A Time to Kill, Grisham wrote best-selling legal thrillers at the rate of one per year until 2001, when he branched into other genres and formats. A Painted House (2001) is a fictionalized autobiography, and the novel Skipping Christmas (2001) is filled with humor. Both highlight the author's skill as a master storyteller. In 2003, Grisham wrote Bleachers, a fictionalized memoir about high school football and the issues surrounding returning to one's hometown. He also has written two screenplays and the nonfictional The Innocent Man: Murder and Injustice in a Small Town (2006). Despite being considered formulaic by the critics, Grisham's novels often occupy spots on The New York Times best-seller list.

Grisham's novels are concerned with the underdog who, against all odds, takes on giant corporations, "big government," or terrorism and often wins. By including average people in his heroic plots, Grisham enables his massive readership to imagine themselves as characters in his novels. He also restores people's faith in their government by having the protagonist win despite the greatest of odds. The idea of the underdog taking on a massive corporation, the Mafia, or another antagonist of gigantic proportions is part of American culture and features in most of Grisham's works.

BIOGRAPHY

John Grisham was born in Jonesboro, Arkansas, on February 8, 1955, the son of an itinerant construction worker and a homemaker. The family moved often, finally settling in Southaven, Mississippi, when Grisham was twelve. After moving to each town, Grisham would obtain a public library card and rate the condition of the town's Little League field. He dreamed of becoming a professional baseball player, becoming so focused on athletics that he neglected his grades in English. His love of baseball would continue through college. He enrolled at Northwest Junior College in Sanitobia, Mississippi, then transferred to Delta State University in Cleveland, Mississippi, where he continued to play baseball. When he realized that he was not destined for the major leagues, he transferred to Mississippi State.

At Mississippi State, Grisham majored in accounting with the intention of becoming a tax attorney. However, after his first tax-law class at the University of Mississippi, he decided that criminal law provided more interest and drama. After graduation in 1981, he returned to Southaven, opening up his own practice and marrying Renee Jones, a childhood friend. He ran a successful practice but felt unfulfilled. A change to practicing civil law brought no more personal satisfaction. Grisham won one of the largest settlements in DeSoto County history on behalf of a child who sustained extensive burns when a water heater exploded. An idealist, he pursued a political career on the platform of education reform, winning a position in the Mississippi House of Representatives in 1983. This, too, would be short-lived, as he discovered his inability to break through the bureaucracy of the state legislature to effect educational change. He resigned in 1990.

During Grisham's tenure in the House, he had continued to practice law in Southaven. While observing a trial, Grisham listened as an adolescent girl testified against her rapist. The life-changing experience influenced him to write A Time to Kill. "I never felt such emotion in my life," he said in an interview with People magazine. He began to obsess over what would have happened if the girl's father had shot the culprit and then was put on trial. "I had to write it down," he said. This developed into the nucleus of the plot, to which he added the complexity of racial relations in the South. Grisham thought about the book for a while before actually writing it. He would rise at dawn to write an hour a day while working sixty to seventy hours a week. He did this for three years to finish the book.

John Grisham. (Courtesy, Doubleday & Co.)

Grisham's first book was rejected numerous times, then Jay Garon of New York agreed to represent him and made a deal with Wynwood Press for fifteen thousand dollars and five thousand copies. Grisham purchased a thousand copies for himself. Friends recalled how they received copies as gifts and how Grisham would sell the book at garden parties. Critics describe A Time to Kill as one of Grisham's best novels, and a first edition has reached the value of thirty-nine hundred dollars. With the success of The Firm as well as the novels that followed, interest in Grisham's first book grew, and it was reprinted.

Although Grisham does not regard himself as a bookworm, he does recall reading the works of John Steinbeck, Mark Twain, and Charles Dickens. He is now a best-selling author, and his books have been translated into thirty-one languages and have topped more than 60 million in print. Such success enabled Grisham and his wife, Renee, to found the Rebuild the Coast Fund Organization in September, 2005. The organization donated five million dollars to help the lives destroyed by Hurricane Katrina.

ANALYSIS

John Grisham manages simultaneously to glorify and vilify the legal profession; rarely does legal counsel appear as a neutral third party. Grisham says he develops plots by taking a character, then getting them involved in some situation and back out again. What he omits from this description is that often the protagonist makes a sacrifice, as in A Time to Kill, The Firm, and The Pelican Brief (1992). The difference between A Time to Kill and his second and third novels is that in the latter two novels he has created an outside force that looms in the background rather than an internal threat. Typically the heroes or heroines are ordinary people who accomplish extraordinary feats or attorneys, either fresh out of law school or practicing in some small town. In The Runaway Jury (1996), a woman is suing a tobacco company over her husband's death. In The Client (1993), an eleven-year-old boy witnesses a suicide and knows the location where a murdered United States senator is buried. The child becomes the target of the Mafia and pursued by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. Grisham has been accused of not sufficiently developing his characters and focusing more on the surprising twists in his plots. The Client features more character development and complexity within his minor characters.

Grisham takes his readers on a journey into the legal system. In a sense, he opens up another world, taking readers behind the scenes, and glamorizes the courts and the law. Unlike many fantasy or science-fiction novels, however, his mysteries have plots that theoretically could happen. Grisham knows that what he writes is not high-brow literature but rather entertainment for the masses; however, he strives to improve his writing with each new novel. "They have a certain flow and level of suspense so they can be read quickly. People get caught up in them," he told an interviewer from Christianity Today.

A TIME TO KILL

A Time to Kill, the first of Grisham's books and deemed by critics to be his best, was written over three years while Grisham served in the Mississippi House of Representatives and practiced law. Because he based it on a deeply moving personal experience, he put a great deal of effort into character development and setting description. In the novel, attorney Jake Brigand defends an African American Vietnam war veteran, Carl Lee, who killed the two white men accused of raping his ten-year-old daughter. It is a tale of ordinary people doing extraordinary things. Although sales of the novel were initially slow, it became a best seller after the publication of The Firm.

Grisham's plot is superb in that every detail in the setting and characterization has purpose. Readers experience the pain of Carl Lee, whose "baby girl" has been raped by two rednecks. Grisham creates empathy between Jake and Carl by having the attorney state that he would want to kill anyone who raped and beat his daughter. The interconnectedness of the characters coupled with Grisham's extensive knowledge of the setting makes this one of his best novels.

THE RUNAWAY JURY

In The Runaway Jury, a woman whose husband died of lung cancer as a result of smoking brings suit against Big Tobacco, which hires jury consultants to investigate potential jurors to ensure a bias in its favor. Led by Rankin Fitch, the team of consultants breaks confidentiality laws to obtain financial and medical records that help them speculate on how the jurors will vote. Critics noted the timeliness of this publication as lawsuits and legislation against tobacco companies dominated the news in the years surrounding its release.

Grisham continues the intrigue by not revealing the true identities of jurors Nicholas Easter and his girlfriend, Marlee, until late in the novel. He uses the beginning chapters of the novel to educate the reader on the procedures involved in jury selection, then returns to the underdog-versus-big-corporation plot that he favors. He uses matter-of-fact dialogue to highlight how lawyers can push the envelope in regard to jury selection in this novel, which was loosely based on real-life events.

THE BROKER

Grisham drew inspiration for The Broker (2005) from the international crime scene, particularly terrorism. In the novel, shortly after receiving a presidential pardon for treason, former Washington, D.C., lobbyist Joel Backman finds himself in Bologna, Italy, being supported by the same government that had incarcerated him. Suspecting that his new life is part of some larger Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) plan, Backman attempts to contact his family but realizes that he is under constant surveillance. The CIA director has laid a mousetrap with the former lobbyist as bait to find out who Backman's true enemies are, and a complex game of cat and mouse begins. Grisham leads readers on a tour of Bologna and provides many details of Italian culture and language but does not quicken the pace of the plot until he is about half way through the story. Therefore, some critics found the book lacking in the action, suspense, and careful plotting that marks Grisham's other works.

Amy J. Arnold

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: A Time to Kill, 1989; The Firm, 1991; The Pelican Brief, 1992; The Client, 1993; The Chamber, 1994; The Rainmaker, 1995; The Runaway Jury, 1996; The Partner, 1997; The Street Lawyer, 1998; The Testament, 1999; The Brethren, 2000; The Summons, 2002; The King of Torts, 2003; The Last Juror, 2004; The Broker, 2005; Playing for Pizza, 2007

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: A Painted House, 2001; Skippping Christmas, 2001; Bleachers, 2003

NONFICTION: The Innocent Man: Murder and Injustice in a Small Town, 2006

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Anderson, Patrick. The Triumph of the Thriller: How Cops, Crooks, and Cannibals Captured Popular Fiction. New York: Random House, 2007. Section on Grisham discusses how his novels have changed over the years. Anderson states that Grisham is the best of the mega-selling novelists in the 1990's and 2000's.

Best, Nancy, ed. Readings on John Grisham. San Diego, Calif.: Greenhaven Press, 2003. Essays cover his personal life and writing process, the genre of legal thriller, and the themes and issues in his various novels.

Grisham, John. John Grisham: The Official Site. <http://www.jgrisham.com>. The official Web site for John Grisham offers a biography, descriptions of his published works, and news about upcoming projects.

Grossman, Lev. "Grisham's New Pitch." Time, October 16, 2006, 68. Profile of Grisham on the publication of The Innocent Man that examines his writings outside legal thrillers. Discusses how he came to write the story of Ron Williamson.

Hubbard, Kim, and David Hutchings. "Tales Out of Court." People, March 16, 1992, 43-44. This profile of Grisham looks at his childhood, his southern roots, and the incident that inspired him to write his first book. He speaks of his life values and family.

Norton, Will, Jr. "Why John Grisham Teaches Sunday School." Christianity Today 38, no. 11 (October 3, 1994): 14-15. Discusses the influence of Christianity on Grisham throughout his life.

Pringle, Mary Beth. John Grisham: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1997. Contains information on Grisham's life and works, including critiques of his novels through 1996. Also provides an in-depth look at the genre of legal thrillers.

_____. Revisiting John Grisham: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2007. Contains a further biography and critiques of his novels from 1997 to 2003.

Zaleski, Jeff. "The Grisham Business." Publishers Weekly 245, no. 3 (January 19, 1998): 248-249. A profile of Grisham written after the publication of The Street Lawyer that focuses on the business generated by his novels and the motion pictures that have been made from them.

H

WILLIAM HAGGARD

Richard Henry Michael Clayton

Born: Croydon, Surrey, England; August 11, 1907

Died: Place unknown; October 27, 1993

Types of plot: Espionage; inverted

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Colonel Charles Russell, 1958-1985

Paul Martiny, 1972-1974

William Wilberforce Smith, 1982-1986

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

COLONEL CHARLES RUSSELL, a very English, elegant, and urbane military intelligence officer, is a pukka sahib who, after years of dedicated service to his country, serves as head of military security. He operates at the highest levels of political diplomacy, making carefully considered decisions in times of crisis. His decisions potentially determine the fate of nations, whose representatives, legal and otherwise, he plays off against each other. His goal is to preserve British interests through diplomacy. Russell is not always directly involved in the action, particularly in those novels set after his retirement, but his subtle mind is always at work behind the scenes.

MAJOR MORTIMER is Russell's all-around, eminently reliable associate.

PROFESSOR WASSERMAN, a brilliant, eccentric, witty, and irreverent Jewish nuclear scientist, a survivor of a Nazi concentration camp, fills in the gaps when Russell's scientific knowledge is lacking and arranges a surprising revenge on the worst of his persecutors.

MARTIN DOMINY is a cautious and competent operative whom Russell tests out as his possible replacement.

WILLIAM WILBERFORCE SMITH (to whom whole novels are later dedicated), a Harrow-educated black with the manners, accent, and values of an English gentleman, is recruited as an operator and finally promoted to the board from which Russell retires (Smith enjoys jazz and marijuana, but he is tough and reliable).

PAUL MARTINY is a born insider, an established and landed gentleman turned "protector," partly to rebel against the traditions that tie him and partly to expose the ineptitude of pretentious and arrogant establishmentarians. While running a three-thousand-acre farm and participating in various humanitarian organizations to assist paroled convicts, Martiny secretly acts as financial adviser and mentor to top criminals, laundering money, setting up foreign accounts, and protecting their interests in a number of ways, from making sure a stolen political document is placed in safe hands to discharging a dangerous gambling debt.

CONTRIBUTION

Critic D. B. Hughes rightly credits William Haggard with "the renaissance of the spy-adventure tale." Haggard's suspense novels, with their political focus, their sense of realpolitik, yet their preoccupation with propriety and with correct behavior, fill the gap between earlier, romantic spy stories and the more modern, psychological ones. In fact, many critics define the Haggard novel as an erudite amalgam of the romanticism of a John Buchan and the chilling Cold War cynicism of a Len Deighton or a John le Carré. His works, tinged with satire, provide so realistic a portrait of characters and milieus that they seem like novels of manners—even romans à clef. One book had to be hastily revised on the eve of publication to disguise a biting description of a well-known extreme leftist, while another went behind the scenes in Parliament during the Six-Day War. The Money Men (1981) took on the scams of Dutch banking; the Martiny books, the fiddles of bankers, doctors, nursing homes, and politicians. The Power House (1966) openly and contemptuously satirized a prime minister actually in office at the time of publication. The latter was among the first fictionalizations of the growing influence of the Arab world and of the antagonistic diplomatic atmosphere that would necessitate détente; as such it is a significant contribution to espionage fiction. Haggard was one of the very few to have ventured into the world of ministers of state; he was best at giving the reader a sense of the inherent prejudices that affect judgment: "You could never rely on parvenus," says one character, while another thinks, "If there was one thing he loathed it was upper-crust patronage." Haggard's works were published in Sweden, Spain, the Netherlands, Italy, Japan, and the United States.

BIOGRAPHY

William Haggard was born Richard Henry Michael Clayton on August 11, 1907, in Croydon, Surrey, England. He was educated at Lancing College, Sussex, and received a bachelor's degree from Christ Church, Oxford University, in 1929. In 1936 he married Barbara Myfanwy Sant, with whom he had a son and a daughter. He served in the Indian Civil Service from 1931 to 1939 and eventually was appointed magistrate and sessions judge. During World War II he attended college in Quetta and was promoted to staff lieutenant in Indian Army Intelligence, at which rank he served between 1939 and 1945. In 1945 he was designated for ministry duty in Whitehall, an experience that provided the background for Colonel Charles Russell, Haggard's major series character. On receiving his master's degree from Oxford University in 1947, he joined the Board of Trade. In 1965 he was appointed controller of enemy property, a position he held for four years before retiring from government service and turning to a full-time writing career. "I've been a layabout ever since," he said, though in fact he wrote prolifically and traveled widely in Asia, South America, and Europe, particularly Italy. Haggard was a major constituent of the N.A.L./Signet Intelligence Group and a representative author of the Detective Book Club before his death in 1993.

ANALYSIS

A William Haggard novel is more likely to engage the English reader than the American in its portrait of the powers behind the powers, the hierarchy that remains as prime ministers and other such ephemeral authorities come and go. It is a top-level view of the behind-the-scenes machinations of national and multinational corporations and security agencies and the politics that inevitably affect them. Often these dealings involve major breakthroughs in science and industry, resulting in discoveries with potential military application.

In The High Wire (1963), for example, the plot centers on a major foreign power's attempt to acquire, by blackmail, kidnapping, torture, or even murder, the secret of a new weapon being developed by British industry, while in The Antagonists (1964) the United States and the Soviet Union, fearful of an apocalyptic military secret, struggle either to subvert or to eliminate a world-famous scientist residing in Great Britain. The Arena (1961) depends on a foreign power's struggle to take over a British company to have access to new British discoveries in radar, while Slow Burner (1958), Venetian Blind (1959), Yesterday's Enemy (1976), and The Meritocrats (1985) concern a security leak of restricted nuclear information. The Unquiet Sleep (1962) concerns the damaging effects of a new drug on government personnel, and The Mischief-Makers (1982) an Arab attempt to foment a rebellion among London blacks.

In each novel, Colonel Russell or his minions in British intelligence prove to have been on top of the situation from the beginning but must proceed cautiously, according to the unspoken rules for espionage and counterespionage, judging just how far to push the other side and when to count one's losses and yield to the inevitable. Instead of derring-do, there are quiet, understated discussions, analyses of data and potential actions of all parties, and finally active steps to resolve the issues and personalities in England's best interest, though these steps are often thwarted by, or prove unnecessary because of, the actions of private individuals. Always the situation is politically explosive, the personalities unpredictable, and the realities far more complex than a surface analysis indicates.

Most Haggard novels depend heavily on the character of Colonel Russell, a realist who feels more comfortable with established government—communist or not—than lack of government, who recognizes the necessity of sometimes making national concessions, and who in fact has “almost lost the habit of thinking in terms of countries or nations.” At times Russell feels more respect for a competent counterpart in the Soviet hierarchy than for some of his own country’s secretaries and ministers, especially those of the far Left. The description of his ruminations on an old friend sums up his conservative values:

To the idealists in their world of shadows he was simply another fascist dictator, to the hardline communist a contemptible turncoat. Russell considered him neither of these, indeed they were birds of a similar feather. Both had spent lives on the same tightrope, on the one side the furnace of total power, on the other the bog of wishful thinking. Man was a very dangerous animal and Russell cared little who ruled him in practice. The enemy was the absence of rule. . . . All one could do was to walk one’s tightrope, balancing by the light of realpolitik.

Russell recognizes Great Britain’s declining world status and its need to depend more heavily on strong allies (calling in Americans, for example, to assure the secrecy of a British discovery). He disapproves of liberals on principle and might admire, but never trust, a card-carrying communist. He respects Israeli intelligence for walking a tightrope between political expedience and war.

Russell is a professional, scornful of amateurs for the disgusting messes they often leave and of diplomats for their affectations and incompetence. He finds the agony column of the London Times the only sane and accurate reporting. What intrigues him most from the security files are not those classified “red” (suspects by history or association) or “green” (suspects by political sympathy) but those classified “yellow” (suspects by character), for they are the least predictable and hence potentially the most dangerous. Russell is attuned to the vulnerability and corruptibility of the most polished and successful of diplomats, businesspeople, and scientists, and it is his ability to put himself in their place and anticipate their responses that makes him so effective at his job. Russell may be right wing in sympathies, but he deeply values the rights of citizens and fights to avoid invoking the Security Act, which would give him police-state powers. His response to breaches of security is to focus on human psychology and to try to outguess his opponent by placing himself in his shoes.

THE POISON PEOPLE

His office at the Security Executive is untidy, with silver trophies and excellent Persian rugs—items that spell “an intelligence shrewd but unfussy.” Russell is fascinated by the convolutions of other minds and other cultures (particularly the unpredictable twists of the Byzantine mind or the deep-seated wisdom of the Latin woman); he recognizes values bred in the blood that cannot be denied. In The Poison People (1978), for example, despite his distaste for a friend’s personal vendetta, he understands the man’s desire to punish the Delhi drug master whose heroin killed his son and acts decisively to aid him. Russell is worldly and frankly sexual, attracted to women of verve and independence.

The innocent and kindly are not always safe in Russell’s world and may in fact become the sacrificial lamb whose injury or death allows the enemy to be defeated. Russell may try to prevent such injury but is realistic when it happens. Nevertheless, in a typical Haggard novel, the mild-mannered, who seem incapable of tough decisions, at times prove tougher and more capable than those who judge them and dismiss them. The blackmailer reveals hidden scruples, the gentle man hidden strengths. The ruthless spy is willing to sacrifice himself for the information he wants, while the nonaggressive Jewish scientist unexpectedly sacrifices an entire company to revenge himself on an ex-Nazi industrialist. The notorious saboteur, subversionist, and assassin of The Telemann Touch (1958) proves charming, almost admirable. Moreover, both sides often prove unscrupulous, accept the maxim that “business is business,” and determine to cut their opponents’ throats, either figuratively or literally, if need be.

Haggard was careful not to name countries (he sometimes gives a fictitious name), but he makes the reader feel as if he is learning what happens behind the headlines. His treatment of people and countries centers on two key judgmental words: “civilized” and “barbarian.” His merchants, bankers, brokers, and even Indian Brahmins pride themselves on being civilized (though they are not always so), although the term “barbarian” is reserved for those who break what each “civilized” man thinks are the unspoken rules of conduct, the gentleman’s code. Barbarians may earn one’s respect with their strengths, their sense of honor, and their intelligent maneuverings, but one can never really trust or understand them, for they do not think or act within one’s own framework of values and sensibilities. Colonel Russell may admire a noble barbarian for slaying a foe, but he will disapprove of his toying with said foe. Yet just when one has decided that a Whitehall view dominates, Haggard employs these terms to make the satiric point that, given changing circumstances, the seemingly civilized may prove barbaric and vice versa. A professional assassin denigrates his employer as barbaric and the English as incomprehensible, while a hoodlum’s spokesperson proves civilized. One may, in effect, cut the throat of a client or a company while at the same time following prescribed limits or even fulfilling the obligations of courtesy. Thus it is a quiet irony, a wry sense of the sardonic, that dominates.

Related to such judgments is a class division based on taste and lack of taste. In Haggard’s novels, a character may have a hyphenated name such as William Lampe-Lister or Lionel Lowe-Anderson but remain déclassé, a mere assistant manager or assistant under secretary whose lifestyle, attire, home, and pastimes mark him as limited. Frequently, such limitations are summed up by Haggard’s descriptions of property and possessions. A man who would consider armigerous jewelry more than a little vulgar would also recognize the absurdity of adding Gothic wings to transform an “original Georgian block” into “a Puseyite nightmare, hideous to observe and impossible to live in.” Haggard approves of men strong enough to break the rules in the name of good taste, civilization, and what is right, and for him what is right involves fighting to protect property and family and to prevent financial chaos and the destruction of a way of life.

THE OLD MASTERS AND VENETIAN BLIND

A sign of Haggard’s own taste is the understatement that dominates his canon. His characters suggest rather than spell out in detail, a quality for which his most recent works have been criticized but one that betrays a sense of a way of life and a point of view vital to Haggard’s conception of being English. After a drink or two, for example, a character will “particularize rather disturbingly” his contempt for the Chancery Bench. One of the highest compliments Colonel Russell pays a foreigner is “You talk almost like an Englishman,” by which he means the person is “realistic,” his comments “understated,” his behavior “deep-down tough.” A quiet young man in The Old Masters (1973), for example, wins Russell’s respect when he prepares to fight back: “They tried to burn me. Alive, as it happened. I didn’t like that.” On the other hand, the pretentious and high-handed receive short shrift, as does the secretary in Slow Burner who eventually succumbs to drink and jealousy. Occasionally there are philosophical statements, but in the main these exist to delineate character, as in the musings of Gervas Leat, a man who gambles his life and his love in Venetian Blind:

Life was a gamble, a crazy horse race. Smart Alecs picked their bets or thought they did: the wise man knew the Form Book for a trap. There wasn’t any form. No, she was blind, the goddess, blind and uncaring. Blind were they all. Man came from he knew not where; gambled a little or was gambled with; snuffed like a candle in the night. . . . judgement was futile.

Haggard was criticized for the open carnality of his characters, yet he sensitively captures the nuances of marital accord and discord, the signs and symbols of relationships. His novels always provide a realistic portrait of the two sexes and treat men and women as equals—in foolishness and in intelligence. The female soldier assigned to protect Russell in The Old Masters is a better bodyguard than most men, capable of quick and accurate decisions, impressive physical feats, and a realistic assessment of people and situations, while the huntress in Venetian Blind handles a weapon like a pro:

Margaret broke the gun, single-handed, the butt under her armpit. The spent cartridge, as the ejector threw it, she caught with her free hand. The live she pocketed.

Involuntarily Richard made a gesture of admiration.

“What’s the matter?”

“Not many men can do that.”

William Wilberforce Smith’s wife, Amanda, has “flair, intuition, instinct,” and, not subject “to arbitrary rules of male logic, . . . [can] see through brick walls with uncanny accuracy.” Even the spoiled and unfaithful wife in Closed Circuit (1960) is sufficiently self-aware to answer hypocrisy with shocking truths. Haggard often includes in his novels a love relationship gone wrong and counters it with a love of understanding, sexual attraction, and mutual respect. On the one hand, his women may be limited by their upbringing, frustrated, superficial, and utterly destructive; on the other hand, they may be politically knowledgeable, sharply intelligent, and a real challenge to a man’s intellect and emotions. One will act on a combination of instinct and reason to save a party, a firm, or a loved one, even at heavy cost to herself, while another will exact cruel revenge on those who have injured her or her beloved. Always the relationships and the motivations are complex, and always the women prove capable. In Venetian Blind a seemingly devoted stepdaughter coldly leads her stepfather toward incest to justify murdering him as revenge for her mother’s suicide, while in The Old Masters a devoted First Lady, widowed, marries a man she despises to stabilize her nation, then personally stabs him to death in front of witnesses when she confirms his responsibility for her husband’s death. Cynthia, in The Arena, outmaneuvers her much-loved husband in her manipulation of company block votes, but in doing so she effectively outwits herself, losing her husband while helping the family win a profit.

A Haggard plot is precision-engineered, with a suspense that grows more out of character than action. Suspenseful action—such as that of a stranded cable car dominated by a killer, a carnival ride headed for murder, or a speeding car set to explode—does occur, but it is rare. The narration is third-person limited omniscient, the language sardonic and controlled. Haggard himself described his works as “novels of suspense with a background of international politics” and admits that they are not always “entirely imaginary.”

Gina Macdonald

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

COLONEL CHARLES RUSSELL SERIES: Slow Burner, 1958; The Telemann Touch, 1958; Venetian Blind, 1959; Closed Circuit, 1960; The Arena, 1961; The Unquiet Sleep, 1962; The High Wire, 1963; The Antagonists, 1964; The Hard Sell, 1965; The Powder Barrel, 1965; The Power House, 1966; The Conspirators, 1967; A Cool Day for Killing, 1968; The Doubtful Disciple, 1969; The Hardliners, 1970; The Bitter Harvest, 1971 (also known as Too Many Enemies); The Old Masters, 1973 (also known as The Notch on the Knife); The Scorpion’s Tail, 1975; Yesterday’s Enemy, 1976; The Poison People, 1978; Visa to Limbo, 1978; The Median Line, 1979; The Money Men, 1981; The Heirloom, 1983; The Meritocrats, 1985

PAUL MARTINY SERIES: The Protectors, 1972; The Kinsmen, 1974

WILLIAM WILBERFORCE SMITH SERIES: The Mischief-Makers, 1982; The Need to Know, 1984; The Martello Tower, 1986

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NONFICTION: The Little Rug Book, 1972

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adrian, Jack. “Obituary: William Haggard.” The Independent, November 2, 1993. Obituary describes the life and works of Haggard, who is described as writing intelligent, very good spy and political fiction. Notes that after communism fell out of power in the Soviet Union, Haggard lost his focus, as he was a right-leaning author.

Britton, Wesley. Beyond Bond: Spies in Fiction and Film. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2005. Traces the evolution of the figure of the spy in espionage thrillers and other works of film and fiction; sheds light on Haggard’s work.

East, Andy. The Cold War File. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1983. Examines the representations of espionage in Cold War fiction and of the Cold War in espionage stories, thereby providing perspective on Haggard’s novels.

Haggard, William. Interview. Unicorn Mystery Book Club News 1, no. 9 (1948): 12. A brief interview with Haggard providing insights into his creative process.

Hepburn, Allan. Intrigue: Espionage and Culture. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2005. This study of British and American spy fiction begins with three general chapters on the appeal, emotional effects, and narrative codes of the genre. Helps readers understand Haggard's works.

Hitz, Frederick P. The Great Game: The Myth and Reality of Espionage. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004. Hitz, the former inspector general of the Central Intelligence Agency, compares fictional spies to actual intelligence agents. Although Haggard is not discussed directly, the comparisons can be made with his works.

Winks, Robin W. "Murder Without Blood: William Haggard." The New Republic 177 (July 30, 1977): 30-33. Discussion of Haggard's tone and style, emphasizing the representation of violence and its place in his narratives.

JAMES WILSON HALL

Born: Hopkinsville, Kentucky; 1947

Also wrote as James W. Hall

Types of plot: Thriller; amateur sleuth; psychological; hard-boiled; private investigator

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Thorn, 1987-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

THORN is a solidly built middle-aged man with sun-bleached hair, blue eyes, and the bronzed skin of someone who spends most of his time outdoors. A fisherman who composes poetry in his head and lives with a succession of casual lovers in a stilt house in Key Largo, Florida, Thorn supports himself, barely, by selling hand-tied bonefish flies and carved lures. A cantankerous, isolated hermit far behind the times, he has a tendency to become involved, as a reluctant amateur sleuth or loyal sidekick, in doggedly, often violently, thwarting various nefarious schemes.

"SUGAR" SUGARMAN is a former police officer who spent twenty years with the Monroe County Police Department and is a lifelong friend of Thorn. The product of a Scandinavian mother and a Jamaican father, the middle-aged but tall, handsome, and extremely fit Sugarman runs a private investigation firm that takes on a variety of cases and security-related jobs, and frequently calls on Thorn to assist him. Divorced because of the instability of his freelance employment, he is the father of young twin girls, Janey and Jackie.

CONTRIBUTION

Like John D. MacDonald, Carl Hiaasen, and Elmore Leonard, James Wilson Hall mines the creatively fertile—and increasingly bizarre—territory of South Florida for his crime stories. Like his colleagues, Hall often focuses on issues that affect his adopted state: pollution and the adverse effects of tourism and technology. Hall does not preach about the various evils but rather demonstrates their results by incorporating them as plot elements in his thrillers.

Hall's characters are diverse and fully rounded physically, emotionally, and psychologically. His series hero, Thorn, just wants to be left alone to fish and contemplate life but invariably gets dragged into complex situations that he wriggles out of by a combination of native intelligence, physical prowess, and determination. Unlike many other thriller writers, Hall is extremely adept at drawing sympathetic and authentic female characters that are just as capable (or just as foolish) as his male characters. Protagonists and antagonists are usually introspective, continually challenging their own motivations and reactions to events.

Dialogue throughout Hall's novels—obtuse, profane, and often humorous—is believable. Narration, depending on the circumstances, varies from blunt and fragmented to poetic; Hall waxes especially lyrical when describing the weather, the terrain, the native wildlife, and the many moods of the ocean.

Hall's novels have found a large, diverse readership and have appeared frequently on both domestic and overseas best-seller lists. His books have been translated into a dozen languages, and several have been optioned for film. After receiving numerous critical accolades, Hall garnered the Shamus Award in 2002 for his Thorn novel Blackwater Sound (2001).

BIOGRAPHY

James Wilson Hall was born in 1947 in Hopkinsville, Kentucky, the son of a realtor. An avid, if indiscriminate, reader from an early age, Hall devoured everything from the Hardy Boys series to books by Ernest Hemingway. In high school he was an athlete, starring in basketball and tennis. During his senior year, he attended Riverside Military Academy, where he received an appointment to the Air Force Academy at graduation. He rejected the appointment to attend Florida Presbyterian University (later Eckard College), intending to become a minister, but later switched his major to literature. Hall, who as an undergraduate married his high school sweetheart, received a scholarship to the Breadloaf Writers' Conference between his junior and senior years in college.

Hall worked at a variety of jobs to help pay for his college education, including landscaper, lifeguard, yacht washer, go-cart mechanic, and ranch hand. Following graduation, Hall attended Johns Hopkins University, receiving his masters of fine arts in 1969. He received a doctorate from the University of Utah in 1973. Hall landed a position as teacher of literature and creative writing at Florida International University in Miami, where he has remained ever since, and is now a tenured professor. Hall's students have included such successful authors as Dennis Lehane, Barbara Parker, Vicki Hendricks, and Christine Kling.

Hall has contributed primarily poetry and occasional short stories to such publications as Antioch Review, Georgia Review, North American Review, Poetry, and Southern Poetry Review since the 1960's. He published his first poetry collection, The Lady from the Dark Green Hills: Poems, in 1976. He followed with The Mating Reflex (1980), Ham Operator: Poetry and Fiction (1980), and False Statements (1986).

Hall's first novel, Under Cover of Daylight (1987), introduced his series character, Thorn, a professional fisherman and lure maker with a dark past who inevitably becomes embroiled as a reluctant amateur sleuth in various cases, often of an environmental nature. Hall continued the series, producing nonseries crime novels as well, including Bones of Coral (1991), Body Language (1998), and Forests of the Night (2004). He has also published a collection of short stories, Paper Products (1990), contributed a chapter to the collaborative effort Naked Came the Manatee (1996), and released Hot Damn! Alligators in the Casino, Nude Women in the Grass, How Seashells Changed the Course of History, and Other Dispatches from Paradise (2002), a collection of humorous essays from his late 1990's stint as a columnist. Hall's crime fiction has frequently made the best-seller lists, and he has achieved a measure of critical acclaim as well, receiving a John D. MacDonald Award, a San Francisco Review Critic's Choice Award for Gone Wild (1995), a nomination for the Dashiell Hammett Prize for Buzz Cut (1996), and a Shamus Award for Blackwater Sound.

ANALYSIS

James Wilson Hall's early and acknowledged crime-writing influences—Ernest Hemingway, John D. MacDonald, Ross Macdonald, Carl Hiassen, and Elmore Leonard—are evident, particularly in his early work. From Hemingway, he borrowed a terse, lean, tough style. John D. MacDonald lent dark humor, a focus on South Florida, and a love for the environment. Ross Macdonald brought a lyrical quality and a concentration on the theme that the past can exert a profound effect on the present. Hiassen and Leonard added their talents in characterization, realistic dialogue, and unexpected plot turns.

It is to Hall's credit that he has taken the best aspects of these writers and made them uniquely his own. His larger-than-life characters stick in the memory primarily because they have been given a psychological dimension that adds considerable depth—a feature often lacking in the casts of plot-driven thrillers. Suspense heightens because major protagonists and antagonists, ticking time bombs of hidden psychoses, are unpredictable, out of step or out of touch with the rest of the world; the reader never knows when their pasts will catch up with them and cause an explosion. Good or bad, his characters have some quality—guilt, lapsed memories, uncertainties, irrational fears, compassion for animals, a love of words—that makes them sympathetic, if flawed, and human.

A sense of place is key to Hall's work. South Florida—a modern ethnic melting pot with a fragile ecology subject to the depredations of greed, corruption, and attendant violence—is portrayed so sharply that it becomes a character in itself. These stories, which delve into pollution that imperils wildlife and human life alike, the adverse effect of millions of visitors on the environment, the treatment of ailing patients, or the negative results of technology, would not be the same if played out elsewhere.

Stylistically, Hall has, after echoing the techniques of other writers, found his own voice, a blend of the blunt and the beautiful. He usually writes in third person, past tense. Sentences are typically short, punchy, and full of slang and street language—except when they deal with nature, at which time they lengthen into picturesque, evocative description. Literary devices, such as similes and metaphors, are used sparingly but effectively. A patina of humor, sometimes dark and ironic, sometimes wistful and nostalgic, coats much of Hall's writing, giving an extra layer of meaning to his work.

BONES OF CORAL

The nonseries thriller Bones of Coral concerns Shaw Chandler, a longtime Miami paramedic who, called out from the firehouse one night, finds his father—a fugitive confessed murderer, whom he has not seen for twenty years—dead of a gunshot wound, a supposed suicide. Suspicious of the nature of his father's demise, Shaw takes a sabbatical from work to visit his mother Millie, an alcoholic dying of cancer in the Florida Keys. He reunites with Trula Montoya, his childhood sweetheart and a former soap opera star who suffers from a mild form of multiple sclerosis; she is one victim among many stricken with the disease, which several scientists have attributed to the illegal disposal of toxic substances in South Florida.

Based on actual research into a genuine environmental problem, Bones of Coral presents a fascinating cast of memorable, subtly shaded characters, including Trula's father, Richard Montoya, a former biolab science officer who runs a facility for injured wildlife; former naval officer Douglas Barnes, an emotionless, iron-handed control freak who manages a waste recycling plant where one can dispose of anything, for a price; his retarded, physically imposing son, Dougie, who has no pain threshold, composes childish rhymes, and at his father's command eliminates people who pose impediments; and Dougie's girlfriend—and briefly wife—Elmira, a red-headed hooker, who will do anything her husband requests.

BUZZ CUT

Buzz Cut (1996), a Thorn series thriller with a subtext, features South Florida-based fisherman and flytier extraordinaire Thorn and his lifelong friend private eye "Sugar" Sugarman. In this instance, the subtext concerns relationships: Thorn's casual relationship with a live-in woman; Sugarman's estrangement from his mother, Lola Jack Sugarman Sampson, now married to a tycoon who owns a fleet of cruise ships; Lola's strained relationships with her two natural children, Sugarman and Butler Jack; and the longstanding enmity of Lola's absconded stepdaughter, Monica Sampson, toward her wealthy father.

The essential plotline, as befits a swift-paced read in which large numbers of people are placed in peril, concerns a scheme hatched by Butler Jack—a villain with a social conscience, who intends to use his ill-gotten gains to provide support for orphaned children worldwide—to extort millions from his stepfather. If Butler does not receive $58 million, he will use remote-controlled or time-delayed devices hidden aboard a cruise liner to blow up the ship with thousands of people aboard. Sugarman, in charge of security for the ship, enlists Thorn's aid to stop the threat, an almost impossible task on such a large vessel containing so many places where something could be hidden.

Filled with colorful shipboard scenes of tourists frolicking and gorging themselves, poetic descriptions of the mood of the ocean and lingering sunsets, and hard-boiled depictions of extreme violence—because of the effects of Butler Jack's weapons of choice, a commando knife and a jury-rigged stun gun that delivers 400,000 volts—Buzz Cut chugs along like a runaway dreadnaught. The prose of the straightforward narration, told from a variety of viewpoints, is choppy, laden with fragments, as though Hall abhorred compound sentences. The novel is spiced with etymological digressions from a killer with a photographic memory for words and peppered with slang, salty profanities, and a few apt similes. Characters are sketched, rather than fully drawn, but given depth through their internal observations and spoken insights. What most matters, however, is the plot. With all its entanglements juxtaposed against a barely plausible master plan devised by a semi-sympathetic madman, Buzz Cut delivers an entertaining read that, like popcorn, satisfies immediate hunger without ruining the appetite.

BODY LANGUAGE

The nonseries thriller Body Language explores the delayed effects of past bad deeds while examining the illogic of evil. The novel concerns Alexandra “Alex” Collins Rafferty, who at the age of eleven shot and killed seventeen-year-old Darnel Flint, the neighbor who raped her—a crime her father, Lawton, then a police officer, covered up. Nearly twenty years later, Alex is in a loveless marriage to Stan Rafferty, an armored-car driver who keeps a mistress and plans the perfect robbery so that he can run away with his lover. Alex cares for her aging father, who is in the early stages of Alzheimer’s, and maintains a platonic relationship with Jason Patterson, a stockbroker and black-belt karate instructor who has taught her martial arts and is infatuated with her. Alex works as a forensic photographer with the Miami Police Department in league with Homicide Lieutenant Dan Romano, a crusty, overweight, middle-aged officer; together they investigate the depredations of a serial killer called “the Bloody Rapist,” who rapes women, slashes their throats, and repositions the bodies in contorted shapes before leaving a trail of his own blood away from the scenes of the crimes.

A well-conceived, mature, and extremely suspenseful work that keeps the reader guessing, Body Language presents a number of separate threads that converge at the end. Alex’s relationship with her father is especially poignant, and Lawton’s struggles to remember past events, though sometimes played for humor, are particularly moving.

BLACKWATER SOUND

What would happen if all electronic devices—in computers, cell phones, automobiles, boats, and airplanes—suddenly stopped working? That is the main premise of Hall’s Shamus Award-winning novel. Blackwater Sound brings back Thorn and Sugarman, and as a bonus also reintroduces Alex Collins and her father, Lawton. Together, they collectively battle the evil Braswell family—father A. J., who is obsessed with tracking the gigantic marlin that pulled his favorite, genius son Andy into the ocean’s depths; ruthless, murderous daughter Morgan, who runs MicroDyne, a computer chip-coating company branching out into high energy radio frequency (HERF) technology that has the capacity to fuse electronic circuits; and son Johnny, who has a thing for knives. A tense, exciting page-turner littered with bodies, the novel offers something for every fan of Hall's work: lush descriptions of tropical nights, suspenseful fishing scenes, sudden violence, crisp dialogue, and a full cast of quirky, psychologically bent characters.

Jack Ewing

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

THORN SERIES: Under Cover of Daylight, 1987; Tropical Freeze, 1989 (also known as Squall Line); Mean High Tide, 1994; Gone Wild, 1995; Buzz Cut, 1996; Red Sky At Night, 1997; Blackwater Sound, 2001; Off the Chart, 2003; Magic City, 2007

NONSERIES NOVELS: Bones of Coral, 1991; Hard Aground, 1992; Naked Came the Manatee, 1996 (with others); Body Language, 1998; The Putt at the End of the World, 2000 (with others); Rough Draft, 2000; Forests of the Night, 2004

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

SHORT FICTION: Paper Products, 1990

POETRY: The Lady from the Dark Green Hills: Poems, 1976; The Mating Reflex, 1980; Ham Operator: Poetry and Fiction, 1980; False Statements, 1986

NONFICTION: Hot Damn! Alligators in the Casino, Nude Women in the Grass, How Seashells Changed the Course of History, and Other Dispatches from Paradise, 2002

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adams, Michael. "Audio Reviews." Review of Body Language, by James Wilson Hall. Library Journal 124, no. 1 (January, 1999): 184. A positive review of the audio version of Body Language, featuring Miami Police photographer Alexandra Collins Rafferty, which notes the colorful dialogue and humor in a complicated plot involving a failing marriage, failing memory, and a failed robbery attempt against the main thrust of the plot, the identification and tracking of a serial rapist and murderer.

Hall, James Wilson. The Official Website of Bestselling Author James W. Hall. <http://www.jameswhall.com>. The author's own Web site contains a brief biography, frequently asked questions, author comments about why he wrote particular books, interviews, a family photo album, and other information.

_____. "PW Interview: James W. Hall: Serious South Florida Thrillers." Interview by Brewster Milton Robertson. Publishers Weekly 243, no. 28 (July 8, 1996): 62-63. This interview provides tidbits of biographical material and a brief publishing history of the author.

Ott, Bill. Review of Buzz Cut, by James Wilson Hall. Booklist 92, no. 16 (April 15, 1996): 1394. A favorable review of Buzz Cut, which notes the high-tech gadgetry; the introspection of the hero, Thorn; the amusing interplay among characters; and the black humor throughout the book.

_____. Review of Rough Draft, by James Wilson Hall. Booklist 96, no. 6 (November 15, 1999): 579-580. A mostly favorable review of Rough Draft, a tale of Hannah Keller, former Miami police officer turned writer, who is simultaneously trying to solve the murder of her parents, save her psychologically damaged son, and avoid a psycho hit man. The reviewer notes computer technology plays a major role in the novel, warns of an "overwhelming gore factor," and praises Hall as a thriller writer who creates believable female characters.

_____. Review of Red Sky at Night, by James Wilson Hall. Publishers Weekly. Review of Red Sky at Night, by James Wilson Hall. 244, no. 21 (May 26, 1997): 63. In this review, the anonymous critic deems the novel "awkward" and labels the villain "cartoonish" and "talky" in a tale involving the harvesting of dolphin endorphins for use on military veterans.

BRETT HALLIDAY

Davis Dresser

Born: Chicago, Illinois; July 31, 1904

Died: Montecito, California; February 4, 1977

Also wrote as Asa Baker; Matthew Blood; Kathryn Culver; Don Davis; Hal Debrett; Peter Field; Anthony Scott; Jerome Shard; Christopher Shayne; Peter Shelley; Elliot Storm; Anderson Wayne

Type of plot: Private investigator

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Jerry Burke, 1938-1939

Mike Shayne, 1939-1977

Morgan Wayne, 1952-1954

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

MIKE SHAYNE, a semi-hard-boiled private investigator, operates out of a Miami office. Widowed, the thirty-five-year-old redhead never seems to age. He prefers his brain and his fists to a gun. Shayne is “an ordinary guy like the reader himself,” his creator claims, and “his most important attribute is absolute personal honesty.”

CONTRIBUTION

Some seventy Mike Shayne novels, more than three hundred issues of Mike Shayne Mystery Magazine (always with a lead Shayne novella), and three annuals have appeared, all using the Brett Halliday pseudonym. It is impossible to determine how many of these stories Davis Dresser actually wrote, though it is believed that most books that appeared under the Halliday name after 1958 are the work of either Robert Terrall or Ryerson Johnson.

Brett Halliday broke from the hard-boiled cliché of the heavy-drinking, two-fisted, womanizing private investigator. Although Shayne consumes his share of cognac (usually Martell) and is not beyond violence (he “resolves” an early case by pushing the villain in front of a speeding car), the Miami-based private investigator more often than not uses his brainpower to solve the complicated, though fair-play plots that his creator fashioned. Moreover, Shayne becomes a family man (though his wife dies in childbirth). Halliday is better known for his popularity (some sixty-five million to seventy-five million copies of his novels alone have been sold) than his style, which is basically straightforward, “nuts-and-bolts prose.” Although the creator of one of the most recognizable and longest-running detectives, Halliday was never accorded the honors of some of his peers. He was, however, one of the founders of the Mystery Writers of America.

BIOGRAPHY

Brett Halliday was born Davis Dresser in Chicago, Illinois, the son of Justus Dresser and Mary Dresser. Growing up in Texas, he ran away from home at the age of fourteen and enlisted in the army. Two years later his true age was discovered, and he was discharged. Traveling throughout the Southwest, he worked variously in construction, on oil fields, digging graves, and other such jobs. During the 1920's he attended college in Indiana, where he received a certificate in civil engineering. For a while he worked as an engineer and surveyor before finding himself down and out in Los Angeles—“hungry, jobless, and broke.”

In 1927 Halliday began to write, failing to win the Dodd, Mead Red Badge contest. Finding engineering work was difficult during the Depression, and he turned to the pulp magazines. Under various pseudonyms, he wrote romances, mysteries, and Westerns. For Mum's the Word for Murder (1938), his first mystery, he used the pen name Asa Baker. In 1939, after having been rejected twenty-two times, Dividend on Death, the first Mike Shayne detective novel, appeared under the Brett Halliday pseudonym. Although Shayne was not originally conceived of as a series, when Bill Sloane, Halliday's editor at Henry Holt, asked for a second book, Halliday turned out The Private Practice of Michael Shayne (1940), a book that later was sold to Hollywood.

Halliday was married three times. Interestingly, his wives—Helen McCloy, Kathleen Rollins, and Mary Savage—were also writers. Under the pseudonym Hal Debrett, he wrote two mystery novels with Rollins. Halliday had one child, Chloe. In addition to his writing, Halliday was the editor of Mike Shayne Mystery Magazine. He also owned a publishing firm, Torquil and Company, whose books were distributed by Dodd, Mead and Company.

Halliday's travels through the Southwest formed the background for a distinguished group of crime tales that Ellery Queen called his "engineering stories." In this group are "Human Interest Stuff," which is frequently anthologized, and "Extradition," which won for Halliday second prize in an Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine contest.

Halliday lived the latter part of his life in Santa Barbara, California. He died in Montecito, California, on February 4, 1977, at the age of seventy-two.

ANALYSIS

The feature that most distinguishes the Mike Shayne series is the relationship between Brett Halliday and his creation. As one critic has stated, "the believability and durability of the Mike Shayne character is due in no small part to the incredibly dramatic circumstances surrounding his origins." In two published essays ("Michael Shayne as I Know Him" and "Michael Shayne"), Halliday claims that his hero is based on a real-life person named Mike, with whom he had a personal relationship, and that the novels are patterned on actual cases from the detective's files. Halliday asserts that his first meeting with "the rangy redhead" occurred on the Tampico waterfront during the writer's oil field days. Four years later, Halliday again ran into Mike in a New Orleans bar.

There are, however, interesting discrepancies between the two accounts. In "Michael Shayne as I Know Him," two thugs follow a woman into the bar, and Mike tells Halliday to "get out of town fast and forget [he'd] seen him." In "Michael Shayne," however, there is no woman, the two thugs are seemingly after the redhead, and Mike growls to Halliday, "Stay here." Furthermore, in the latter account Halliday writes, "They disappeared into the French Quarter, and I've never seen him again." In the former version, however, Mike suddenly appears at Halliday's log cabin in Colorado years after the New Orleans encounter and discusses his "lucrative private detective practice in Miami." They proceed to meet off and on for the next few years, with Halliday serving as the detective's best man and comforting the redhead after the death of his wife.

What is fact and what is fiction? In some ways the answer does not matter, for, in either case, Halliday created a highly memorable character, one who has appeared in books, magazines, and films as well as on radio and television—even in comic books. In fact, Shayne has been called "the best and most enduring of the tough guy private eye school of mystery fiction." The tough-guy school (the word "tough" appears more than a dozen times in Dividend on Death), prominent in the 1930's and 1940's, was an outgrowth of the hard-boiled style typified by Raymond Chandler and Dashiell Hammett; its distinctive characteristics include the use of the private investigator as the central character, the whodunit plot featuring more deduction than violence, and the lack of personal and sociological insights.

Shayne is the prototypical tough guy private investigator. At the core of his being, Halliday stresses, the detective "not only does not lie to anyone else; what is more important, he does not lie to himself." His success is based on "his ability to drive straight forward to the heart of the matter without deviating one iota for obstacles or confusing side issues." Although he lives in a violent world, Shayne relies on his thought process. A recurring scene in the series is the private investigator sitting up late into the night ruminating on a case, while alternately drinking cognac and ice water. He has, as Halliday writes, "an absolutely logical mind." Even his sternest critics have noted that Shayne, unlike many of his mean-street contemporaries, has "an occasional brain wave" and performs "some legitimate detecting."

Little is revealed about Shayne's personal life. In fact, Halliday professes,

I know nothing whatever about Shayne's background. . . . I don't know where or when he was born, what sort of childhood and upbringing he had. It is my impression that he is not a college man, although he is well educated, has a good vocabulary, and is articulate on a variety of subjects.

For example, in Dividend on Death the only biographical information occurs when Shayne momentarily recalls “he was a freckled Irish lad kneeling by his mother’s side in a Catholic chapel.”

Appropriately, all ghostwriters for Mike Shayne Mystery Magazine were given a “bible” (a writer’s guide), “Mike Shayne of Miami,” that outlines the detective’s basic personality traits. It lists biographical data (starting only from the point of his wife’s death), his physical description (red hair, gray eyes, long legs), his mannerisms (rubbing the lobe of his left ear with his left thumb and forefinger, scraping his thumb across his stubble), his mentality (always truthful, fearless, sensitive, logical), his likes and dislikes (fighting and drinking cognac versus dirty fighting and drunks), his habits (wears pajamas, sits at rear tables in restaurants)—as well as his environment and friends. “Mike Shayne of Miami” concludes by suggesting that Shayne is “the supreme individualist, the Renaissance Man in a Rip-off Age.” In other words, ghostwriters in the 1980’s dealt with essentially the same character and milieu that Shayne’s creator inaugurated in 1939 with Dividend on Death.

Typical of the tough-guy school, Shayne’s reflections reveal very little of himself, his background, or his deep, personal thoughts. The narrator often explains that the detective is lost in ratiocination, but the audience is rarely privy to the actual content of those thoughts. In Dividend on Death, for example, the narrator says at various times that “there was nothing in his face to show what he was thinking” and “he puffed lazily, thinking about the sleeping girl in his bedroom.” Furthermore, as the detective pushes ahead relentlessly, readers do not know the details of what the redhead is pondering: “Things were evidently coming to a head, but the pattern as he saw it didn’t make any sense,” and “there’s only one piece lacking in the whole puzzle.”

Shayne, as a member of the tough-guy school, is not a social observer in the Raymond Chandler-Ross Macdonald tradition. He does, however, make the obvious comments for someone in his profession. At the end of A Taste for Violence (1949), the redhead, after having exposed a corrupt labor leader, hopes his discovery “causes a stink that spreads across the state and throws the white light of suspicion on every other double-crossing labor leader who may be doing the same thing.” In Dividend on Death, Shayne notes, “I learned a hell of a long time ago in this business not to believe anybody or anything—not even what I see with my own eyes.” When Phyllis Brighton tries to seduce him, he observes, “You can’t turn things like this on and off, you know—like an electric switch.” In the entirety of Dividend on Death the only time Shayne makes what could be loosely construed as a social statement comes when the readers are told that the detective “had no downtown office and no regular staff. That sort of phony front he left to the punks with whom Miami is infested during the season.”

Another dominant trait of Mike Shayne should be noted: his acting on behalf of his view of justice over law. In a world of incompetent “John Laws”—such as Peter Painter, chief of Miami Beach’s detective bureau—and immoral criminals preying on defenseless

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Brett Halliday personally edited Mike Shayne Mystery Magazine, every issue of which featured a new Mike Shayne story.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

innocents, Shayne feels superior to legal technicalities. In the first Shayne novel, the detective destroys incriminating evidence. When he finds Phyllis Brighton (in a bloody nightgown) standing over her dead mother with a bloody knife in hand, he “knows” she has been set up. As a result, he takes the nightgown and knife from her and locks her in her room (leaving the key in the door) to provide her with an alibi. Later, Shayne finds Dr. Pedique, Phyllis’s physician, dead, and to help her he burns the doctor’s suicide note. His vigilante attitude is perhaps best shown in a scene in which Shayne, cooking sausage and eggs while cleaning the knife and nightgown, nonchalantly reflects “on the convenience of being able to destroy evidence while you prepared breakfast.” Moreover, Shayne thinks nothing of blackmailing—“call it anything you like”—Peter Painter into paying him double the reward to solve the Brighton case. Nor does his conscience suffer when he seduces an innocent nurse and hires a thief to steal a painting by Raphael—both misdeeds to save his client.

Nailing down Shayne’s motivation—and, hence, Halliday’s themes—is difficult. More often than not, readers are left with the suspicion that the Miami-based sleuth acts not out of friendship or for the public good but in his own best interest. When Shayne, having been retained for five thousand dollars, arrives in Kentucky in A Taste for Violence to discover that his client has been murdered, his first words to Lucy Hamilton, his confidante and secretary, are, “I cashed his check for five grand in Miami. I wonder if it had time to clear through his bank?” At the end of Dividend on Death, Shayne broods, but not over the eight corpses he has seen, the girl whom he has casually seduced, or the ramifications of humankind’s inhumanity. Instead, he contemplates the profit-and-loss sheet in his hand showing $24,200 on the plus side.

Another characteristic feature of the Shayne series is its fusion of classic detection with the violent story line of the hard-boiled tradition. Often borrowing motifs from the English cozy tradition, Halliday favors what one critic has called “a whodunit format with some honest-to-God detection going on.” No less a mystery critic than Anthony Boucher admired Halliday’s twists, puzzles, and labyrinthine plots. Jacques Barzun and Wendell Hertig Taylor noted “the plots are complicated but often adroitly worked out.” The New York Times praised one Halliday novel as an “agreeably old-fashioned whodunit of murder.” According to another critic, “The various switcheroos, who’s got which gun/body, whose side is he/she on gambits fly by so fast that one is almost forced to take notes to keep things straight.”

DIVIDEND ON DEATH

Dividend on Death sets the pace for the series. The plot centers on that gothic staple, the heiress framed for murder. Shayne discovers her in the familiar isolated family mansion complete with the usual cast of suspects—the phony doctor, the brutish chauffeur, the slim secretary, and the sexy nurse. Halliday even twists the locked-room convention when Shayne locks Phyllis Brighton, the innocent heiress, in her room to provide her with an alibi. Later, Shayne discovers the conventional buried chest, but this time it contains not treasure, but a body. The final solution involves several crimes all occurring in the same time frame and place: an attempt to buy a smuggled painting, a plan involving a man's killing his brother and taking his place, and a mobster's complex ploy to steal the valuable painting by substituting one of his minions for a nurse.

As with most whodunits, Dividend on Death is flawed by coincidences, withheld information, and improbabilities. During the course of the novel, on the basis of which The New York Times described Halliday as "an inexpert storyteller," Shayne is hired by three separate clients for three seemingly separate cases. Unbeknown to the clients or to Shayne at first, the three cases are actually interrelated: All are tied to an attempt to grab the Brighton fortune. Moreover, throughout the novel the reader is told that Shayne talked to this character or that, but the reader never discovers the content of these conversations. Constantly, the narrator suggests that the detective has an idea or hunch but does not make the reader aware of the content. Shayne even makes some near-incredible leaps of intuition that help solve the crime. At one juncture he takes a quick look at a chauffeur and immediately realizes the man is a former convict and must have known one of the Brighton brothers, who was also in prison. Why does Shayne think all convicts are in the same prison?

Halliday, then, is a greater craftsman than artist, a writer remembered more for his voluminous output than for his innovations, more for the attractiveness of his central character than for the detective's originality.

Hal Charles

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

JERRY BURKE SERIES (AS BAKER): Mum's the Word for Murder, 1938; The Kissed Corpse, 1939

MIKE SHAYNE SERIES: 1939-1945 • Dividend on Death, 1939; The Private Practice of Michael Shayne, 1940; The Uncomplaining Corpses, 1940; Bodies Are Where You Find Them, 1941; Tickets for Death, 1941; The Corpse Came Calling, 1942 (also known as The Case of the Walking Corpse); Blood on the Black Market, 1943 (revised as Heads You Lose, 1958); Murder Wears a Mummer's Mask, 1943 (also known as In a Deadly Vein); Michael Shayne's Long Chance, 1944; Murder and the Married Virgin, 1944; Dead Man's Diary, and Dinner at Dupre's, 1945; Marked for Murder, 1945; Murder Is My Business, 1945

1946-1950 • Blood on Biscayne Bay, 1946; Counterfeit Wife, 1947; Blood on the Stars, 1948 (also known as Murder Is a Habit); Michael Shayne's Triple Mystery, 1948 (contains Dead Man's Diary, A Taste for Cognac, and Dinner at Dupre's); A Taste for Violence, 1949; Call for Michael Shayne, 1949; This Is It, Michael Shayne, 1950

1951-1958 • Framed in Blood, 1951; When Dorrinda Dances, 1951; What Really Happened, 1952; One Night with Nora, 1953 (also known as The Lady Came by Night); She Woke to Darkness, 1954; Death Has Three Lives, 1955; Stranger in Town, 1955; The Blonde Cried Murder, 1956; Shoot the Works, 1957; Weep for a Blonde, 1957; Murder and the Wanton Bride, 1958

MORGAN WAYNE SERIES (AS BLOOD): The Avenger, 1952; Death Is a Lovely Dame, 1954

NONSERIES NOVELS (AS DEBRETT): Before I Wake, 1949; A Lonely Way to Die, 1950

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: 1934-1940 • Mardi Gras Madness, 1934 (as Scott); Test of Virtue, 1934 (as Scott); Love Is a Masquerade, 1935 (as Culver); Ten Toes Up, 1935 (as Scott); Virgin's Holiday, 1935 (as Scott); Ladies of Chance, 1936 (as Scott); Stolen Sins, 1936 (as Scott); Let's Laugh at Love, 1937 (as Dresser); Million Dollar Madness, 1937 (as Culver); Too Smart for Love, 1937 (as Culver); Green Path to the Moon, 1938 (as Culver); Once to Every Woman, 1938 (as Culver); Romance for Julie, 1938 (as Dresser); Satan Rides the Night, 1938 (as Scott); Temptation, 1938 (as Scott); Girl Alone, 1939 (as Culver); Death on Treasure Trail, 1940 (as Davis); Death Rides the Pecos, 1940 (as Dresser); Return of the Rio Kid, 1940 (as Davis); The Hangman of Sleepy Valley, 1940 (as Dresser; also known as The Masked Riders of Sleepy Valley)

1941-1953 • Gunsmoke on the Mesa, 1941 (as Dresser); Lynch-Rope Law, 1941 (as Dresser); Rio

Kid Justice, 1941 (as Davis); Two-Gun Rio Kid, 1941 (as Davis); Charlie Dell, 1952 (as Wayne; also known as A Time to Remember); Murder on the Mesa, 1953 (as Dresser)

EDITED TEXTS: Twenty Great Tales of Murder, 1951 (with Helen McCloy); Dangerous Dames, 1955; Big Time Mysteries, 1958; Murder in Miami, 1959; Best Detective Stories of the Year (Sixteenth Annual Collection), 1961; Best Detective Stories of the Year (Seventeenth Annual Collection), 1962

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Barzun, Jacques, and Wendell Hertig Taylor. A Catalogue of Crime. Rev. ed. New York: Harper & Row, 1989. List, with commentary, of the authors' choices for the best or most influential examples of crime fiction. Halliday's work is included and evaluated.

Breu, Christopher. Hard-Boiled Masculinities. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 2005. Study of the representation of masculinity in hard-boiled detective fiction; sheds light on Halliday's work.

"Davis Dresser (Brett Halliday)." In American Hard-Boiled Crime Writers, edited by George Parker Anderson and Julie B. Anderson. Detroit: Gale Group, 2000. Compares Halliday to other hard-boiled detective writers. Bibliographic references and index.

Halliday, Brett. "Mike Shayne." In The Great Detectives, edited by Otto Penzler. Boston: Little, Brown, 1978. Halliday provides his own description of his most famous character in this book listing the greatest fictional detectives of all time.

Ruehlmann, William. Saint with a Gun: The Unlawful American Private Eye. New York: New York University Press, 1974. Scholarly study of American detective fiction in which private investigators are forced to break the law to achieve justice. Provides perspective on Halliday's character.

DONALD HAMILTON

Born: Uppsala, Sweden; March 24, 1916

Died: Ipswich, Massachusetts; November 20, 2006

Types of plot: Espionage; hard-boiled; thriller

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Matt Helm, 1960-1993

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

MATT HELM is an American working for an unnamed bureau that specializes in doing the government's dirty work—principally counterespionage and assassination of enemy spies. Having learned his trade during World War II, Helm retired from active duty until his past forced him back into the business. When working, he is the consummate professional, unsentimental and utterly pragmatic.

MAC is Helm's no-nonsense boss and may even exceed Helm in lack of sentimentality. He has been known to suggest ending aircraft hijackings by shooting down the hijacked planes, figuring it would not take long for hijackers to get the message. Little else is revealed about him, not even his full name.

CONTRIBUTION

Donald Hamilton brought the toughness and realism of the Dashiell Hammett detective school to what might be termed spy novels. His series character, Matt Helm, is an outdoorsman, photographer, and writer living in New Mexico, rather like Hamilton himself at one time. As Hamilton picked up boating as a hobby in later years, so did Helm.

The Matt Helm series has done for the United States what Ian Fleming's James Bond books did for Great Britain—provide the public with a contemporary model of the life and work of a secret agent. Donald Hamilton created a shadowy world of deception and disillusion for his master counterspy, Matt Helm, feeding him a steady diet of treachery to fuel his air of skepticism, and furnishing ample opportunities for him to display his bone-bruising toughness. Helm's introduction signaled the birth of a novel character in espionage fiction—the consummate professional who willingly subverts all sentimentality when it interferes with the greater good of the mission. At the time of his creation, Helm was a strong departure from the antihero, “amateur spy” protagonists then in vogue. One critic has described Hamilton as “the Hammett of espionage” for his role in reshaping the espionage novel.

Crime novelist Robert Skinner has cited Hamilton as a primary influence on his own work and said that Hamilton influenced Loren Estleman, Bill Crider, Ed Gorman, and James Sallis. Hamilton's early work featured main characters who are drawn into violent situations against their will and who must learn to cope in order to survive. Matt Helm appears to be a man out of his element in dangerous settings but is actually more durable and practical than any of his opponents, many of whom tend to underestimate him badly.

Matt Helm first appeared on the screen in 1966, with singer Dean Martin portraying him in The Silencers, the first of four adaptations of Hamilton stories. Performing in his trademark laidback fashion, Martin played Helm as a hedonistic playboy who must be dragged into government assignments. The films attempted to cash in on the popularity of the James Bond films but instead were perceived as parodies with more outlandish gimmicks, large numbers of sexy women, and dialogue laced with double-entendres. The films bore little resemblance to their source material, and Martin bore no resemblance at all to his literary namesake. Nevertheless, the films were popular and inspired a short-lived television series, with Anthony Franciosa as Helm, that departed even more radically from Hamilton's novels.

BIOGRAPHY

Donald Bengtsson Hamilton was born to Bengt L. K. Hamilton and Elise (Neovius) Hamilton on March 24, 1916, in Uppsala, Sweden, a small city about fifty miles north of Stockholm. The Hamilton name is common in that country, particularly among the minor nobility. In fact, had his family not moved to the United States when he was eight years old, he could have rightfully claimed the title Count Hamilton.

Hamilton's family prospered in America, where his physician father joined the medical faculty of Harvard College. Hamilton intended to follow his father's lead into medicine, but he changed instead to chemistry, receiving a bachelor of science degree in the subject from the University of Chicago in 1938. He married Kathleen Stick in 1941; they had four children: Hugo, Elise, Gordon, and Victoria.

Hamilton spent World War II doing research as a reserve officer in the Naval Engineering Experiment Station at Annapolis, Maryland. He left the navy in 1946 at the rank of lieutenant, deciding to indulge his passions for writing and photography. He quickly graduated from short stories to novels, at the same time writing nonfictional magazine articles on guns, hunting, photography, and boating—a sideline he still maintains. He lives and works in Santa Fe, New Mexico, a part of the country that provides the setting for much of his writing.

After nine mystery, espionage, and Western novels, he published Death of a Citizen in 1960. An editor liked the book but offered two recommendations: change the hero's first name (Hamilton had called him George) and consider making him a series character. Hamilton followed both pieces of advice, and the series continued with twenty-four more Matt Helm books after that first one. Two Helm books, The Retaliators (1976) and The Terrorizers (1977), were nominated for Edgar Allan Poe Awards for best paperback originals. Hamilton continued writing the series until 1993, and it eventually had twice as many titles as Fleming's Bond series. Hamilton died quietly, in his sleep, on November 20, 2006.

ANALYSIS

Donald Hamilton served a brief apprenticeship writing short stories after World War II and published his first novel, Date with Darkness, in 1947. Following those came a string of fast-paced Westerns and mysteries. He began his writing with hard-boiled mysteries that had elements of espionage. Two of them in particular contained the elements that would characterize his Matt Helm series. Line of Fire (1955) had what seems at first to be an assassin as its hero and is told in down-to-earth first person as the Helm books would be. The other formative book is Assignment: Murder (1956), in which mathematician James Gregory, involved in a nuclear project, becomes a target of those who want the project stopped.

Line of Fire involves a different kind of hero, a man who is suicidal because of his emasculation in a hunting accident. An expert with guns (often the case with Hamilton's protagonists), he is strong-armed into faking an assassination attempt so that an aspiring political candidate can garner media attention and public sympathy. The job goes awry, plunging the hero into terrible danger before he manages to redeem himself. This intriguing early book demonstrates Hamilton's willingness to tinker with the popular image of heroes.

LINE OF FIRE

Some of the characteristics of the Matt Helm series that would start five years later are foreshadowed in Line of Fire, from assassination to good girl/bad girl dichotomies. The sardonic first-person narration that later characterized the Helm novels is on display here, as is the question of the morality of what the protagonist is doing and the use of a knife, like the one that Helm always carries.

The story opens with gunsmith and marksman Paul Nyquist zeroing in on a gubernatorial candidate, but he wounds the man instead of killing him. Only later do readers learn that this is exactly what Nyquist was supposed to do, having been coerced into the job by a man with whom he has a strange bond. Nyquist had been injured earlier in an accident while hunting with the man, a wound that has left him impotent. The man's girlfriend works hard to cure Nyquist of his affliction. Although Nyquist does not kill the candidate, he does kill a gangster who is with him when the gangster tries to kill a young woman who blunders onto the scene. After saving the woman, Nyquist vainly tries to keep her clear of the situation and finally ends up marrying her to protect her, although the relationship does grow from that point.

ASSIGNMENT: MURDER

Assignment: Murder (reissued in 1966 as the better-known Assassins Have Starry Eyes) edges even closer to the Helm prototype. The book tells the story of James Gregory, an atomic weapons research physicist who is shot on the opening day of the New Mexico deer season. To save his life, Gregory shoots back and kills his assailant, then passes out.

All this happens by the novel's fifth page, establishing what would normally be considered a fast pace. Even before that flurry of action occurs, however, Hamilton managed to establish his lead character through his musings on why men camping alone live so spartanly, what attracts him to the wide-open West, why atomic research has become unpopular, why modern automobiles have become so ridiculously dandified, and why men hunt animals. During his recuperation and further adventures, Gregory's narration espouses more of his personal philosophy. Like Matt Helm, who appeared in Hamilton's next book, Gregory is fair but nonapologetic in advancing and defending his attitudes. Others can love him or hate him—it makes little difference to him—but they had better respect him.

A problem that surely vexed Hamilton in writing Assignment: Murder was how to explain his hero's considerable fighting skills. He established Gregory as a large man who has spent years hunting, a somewhat lame explanation. In Death of a Citizen, he introduced a character who comes by his fighting prowess more honestly. Matt Helm is introduced as a former member of a clandestine intelligence group (a thinly veiled Office of Strategic Services or OSS) during World War II. His particular specialty was assassinating important Nazis. When the war ended, he had settled down as a Western writer and photographer with a wife and three children. His fifteen years of peaceful retirement are shattered when Tina, a former partner in assassination, walks into a party he is attending. When he last knew her, she kept a paratrooper's knife hidden in her underwear and a poison pill in her hair. Remarkably, all this information is revealed without strain by the close of the book's first page.

In a plot twist anticipating the frequent duplicities found in the Helm series, Tina pretends to be still working for a peacetime version of the OSS. In truth, she has long since gone over to the Russians and now has orders to kill an important scientist who happens to be an acquaintance of Helm. The job would be easier with Helm's help. When other methods of gaining his assistance fail, she kidnaps his daughter. He must revert to his old ways, including killing Tina by torture, to save his child. His wife, an uncomprehending witness, can no longer bear to live with him. He is thus shed of his family and his inhibitions, permitting his old boss to recruit him again into the espionage business.

MATT HELM SERIES

Inevitably, Matt Helm is compared to Ian Fleming's secret-agent hero, James Bond, and Hamilton is accused of writing derivative books. Some comparisons are obvious. Both men are counterspies capable of violently dispatching their enemies without a moment's regret. Bond answers to "M"; Helm to Mac. Each ranges far in defending his nation's interests and has virtually unlimited resources to do so. Helping to fuel the argument, four Helm books were converted into films from 1966 to 1969, with Dean Martin starring as Helm, although they departed from Hamilton's theme of toughness to spoof the Bond films.

Despite these likenesses, the differences between the Bond series and Helm's are greater than the similarities. Bond is primarily an urban creature, most at home in some European gambling casino with a sophisticated woman on his arm. Helm is more comfortable beside a trout stream, in the wilderness between assignments. If he has feminine company, he must have first satisfied himself that she is not vamping him for some sinister motive. Moreover, Helm first saw print in 1960, before Bond's popularity became entrenched in the United States with the help of John F. Kennedy's widely reported interest and the first of the Bond films. Responding to the suggestion that he had copied the concept, Hamilton said that he had read only one Fleming novel. "I've deliberately avoided reading the James Bond novels for fear that I would unintentionally borrow something from him, or bend over too far backward to avoid any similarity."

If anything, Hamilton's series owes more to another English writer, John Buchan, than to Ian Fleming. Buchan wrote The Thirty-nine Steps, published in 1915, establishing a model for most thrillers. The recipe calls for a tough, physical hero, with something of a tainted past, who is set into motion in a protracted chase in a wilderness setting strewn with obstacles and is chased himself even as he pursues his target. The hero cannot call on the usual resources, such as the police or the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), for that would be too easy. If the hero is involved with a woman (and he always is), she is physically attractive—although not to the point of incredibility—and the hero is unsure whether she is on his side. The entire mix is seasoned with a heavy dose of moral ambivalence.

The first few books in the series nail down Helm's character solidly; the ones since then merely repeat his philosophy, although this repetition never quite becomes tiresome. Fans become intimate with the six-foot, four-inch, two-hundred-pound warrior, a man with old-fashioned tastes for simple food, martinis, and women in skirts instead of slacks. A strong biographical parallel becomes obvious when Helm reveals that he has, like his creator, Swedish ancestry. Helm never tires of expressing his preference for honest trucks and foreign cars over Detroit iron. For example, in Death of a Citizen, Helm speaks of his personal vehicle:

The truck is a 1951 Chevy half-ton job, with a four-speed gearbox and a six-cylinder engine developing a little less than ninety horsepower, and it'll shove any of your three-hundred-horsepower passenger cars right off the road, backwards, from a standing start. It has no damn fins over the taillights, or sheet metal eyebrows over the headlights.

Helm is an expert rifleman and is skillful with a pistol. He handles edged weapons well, as might be expected from his Viking parentage, although he never engaged in a sword duel, unless the machete fight in The Ambushers (1963) is counted. He knows and uses tricks of hand-to-hand combat but thinks that fighting with the fists is foolish because a professional would never dream of fighting for sport—only to kill.

Above all, the key to the man and the series is that Helm is a professional. In his eyes, being a professional is less a matter of being paid for one's work than an attitude. Each book in the series reminds the reader that Helm despises amateurish weaknesses when they interfere with getting the job done. The banes of his life are the weak-kneed amateurs with whom he is forced to work and on whom he cannot rely. He husbands his respect for those rare individuals who, like him, will not let mere sentiment stand in the way of the mission. Hamilton built his character around this central concept. He believed that too many antiheroes were turning up in espionage fiction, including his own. He was tired of people who became involved against their wills and fought against getting their hands dirty. He thought of Helm as “a refreshing change from the pacific citizens whom I’d been arranging to get reluctantly enmeshed in sinister spiderwebs of intrigue.”

Hamilton provides Helm with foils against which to demonstrate his mental toughness. Other government agents, most notably the FBI, turn up frequently in his plots. Usually, Helm finds these fellow agents to be obstacles, either because of their basic incompetence or their insistence on following the letter of the law. The older agents, like himself, are generally more reliable than the younger ones, and men more than women. Female professionals do exist, however, and Helm is quick to respect those he meets, regardless of whether they are on his side. One of the rare, lasting love interests he develops is found in The Revengers (1982), in which Helm meets a female journalist. She seems to become particularly dear to him after he learns of an incident in her past. She responded to being raped by two men by going back with some other, tougher men who held the rapists down while she castrated them with a pocket knife. To his way of thinking, that act qualified her as a pro.

To Helm, politics come and go; professionalism is forever. Nevertheless, his high regard for the way people do their jobs would not prevent him from killing them if necessary. Nor does vanity rule Helm. He is willing to take a physical beating and to be captured by the enemy camp if it will help accomplish the objective. Attractive women often make advances to him, but he is always wary, fearing that a woman who offers herself to him has a motive other than romance.

Helm answers only to a shadowy boss who goes by the code name “Mac.” Mac has much faith in Helm, and he gives his best agent considerable latitude. Over the course of the series, a number of notable villains surfaced. The most prominent of these tend to last two or three books before they are done in.

The typical plot opens with Helm (code-named “Eric”) being called to action by Mac, usually by phone. Mac gives him brief and incomplete instructions, either because Mac is holding back fundamental information deliberately or because he has an incomplete grasp of the facts. Often, there is some doubt as to the loyalty of some key person. Helm is then turned loose to penetrate to the heart of the problem. Seldom does he merely react; he acts, causing something to happen. Often, by the novel’s climax he will have allowed himself to be captured by the enemy to discover the truth. Only after the mission is satisfied does he worry about preserving his life.

THE RAVAGERS

Published in 1964, The Ravagers is the eighth book in the Matt Helm series and serves as a model of Hamilton’s writing at its best. Opening with the words, “It was an acid job, and they’re never pleasant to come upon,” the novel makes the reader immediately aware that this book will pull no punches.

Helm is sent to find out why another agent has not checked in on schedule. He learns the answer: The agent has been murdered by a poison injection after his face was splashed with acid. Mac sends Helm to take over the dead agent’s mission. Helm is to follow the wife of an important scientist (perhaps because of Hamilton’s scientific background, scientists appear often in the series) as she crosses Canada with her daughter and a packet of stolen research material she is suspected of planning to deliver to the Russians. Nevertheless, the plot has a twist; Mac tells Helm that he is merely to give the appearance of an honest chase. In truth, the papers were doctored to mislead the Russians in their research. FBI agents are also involved and try in earnest to stop the delivery, but Helm does not trust them. According to Helm, no cynical and experienced agent is going to be happy entrusting his life and mission to the irresponsible cretins working for some other department. Half the time we don’t even trust the people in our own outfit.

Helm poses as a private investigator when he meets the woman, although she assumes that he is an FBI agent. When a shoot-out occurs in a hotel room between the real FBI agent and a Russian agent, Helm despises his momentary weakness in not killing the American himself before an important Russian contact is shot. Mac also disapproves:

We were not assigned to this job to be nice to little girls, or to clumsy young operatives from other bureaus; quite the contrary. Being nice to people is not our business. If you simply have to be nice, Eric, I will refer you to a very pleasant gentleman who recruits for the Peace Corps.

Eventually, the woman turns out not to be a traitor—she switched worthless information for the doctored packet. The “daughter” with whom she is traveling, however, is a female Russian agent playing an adolescent. She is holding the woman’s real daughter hostage to ensure her cooperation. At the end, Helm thinks that he has failed because the bogus papers never made it into Russian hands. Then he learns that it did not matter. The whole operation was only a ploy to lure a Russian atomic submarine into coastal waters to make the pickup; when it does so, it is quietly destroyed in retaliation for the destruction of an American submarine. Even if Helm can keep up, the reader might understandably feel somewhat dizzy after all the plot switches.

Hamilton’s writing style, particularly for the first two-thirds of the series, is as direct, forceful, and hard-hitting as his hero. The first ten or twelve books are lean and fast paced. In the beginning, the books run about sixty thousand words, although the changing demands of the marketplace have driven the word count up to nearly twice that in the later novels. It is difficult to maintain the earlier, crackling level of suspense in the swollen scenes all too common in the later works.

Despite all the hard-nosed toughness of the Helm books, they are similar in many ways to mysteries. The books are written in the first person, and Hamilton plays scrupulously fair in letting readers discover the facts as soon as Helm does—and draw their own conclusions as to the final answer. The only elements of mystery fiction missing are locked rooms, secret messages, and amateurs who win.

THE MONA INTERCEPT

Although The Mona Intercept (1980) is Hamilton’s sole attempt to write a major blockbuster, it has all the elements of his other suspense thrillers: The Everyman who is dragged into events with which he must cope or die, the dedicated and ruthless government agent, the “good” and “bad” woman, are all here, but the characteristics are spread across a much larger cast than usual. The central thrust of the novel is an attempt by a Cuban terrorist to hijack a vessel at sea, with various ramifications for world peace. Mystery genre expert Robert Winks, in his 1982 book Modus Operandi, terms the book “a possibly unwise experiment with substantially weightier fiction.”

The book’s story line moves well enough, but not as fast as it does in Hamilton’s slimmer novels. It probably did not live up to its author’s expectations, and he went back to doing what he did best: Matt Helm, who returned in The Revengers after a five-year absence and continued through eight additional novels.

Richard E. Givan
Updated by Paul Dellinger

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

MATT HELM SERIES: 1960-1970 • Death of a Citizen, 1960; The Wrecking Crew, 1960; The Removers, 1961; The Silencers, 1962; Murderers’ Row, 1962; The Ambushers, 1963; The Shadowers, 1964; The Ravagers, 1964; The Devastators, 1965; The Betrayers, 1966; The Menacers, 1968; The Interlopers, 1969

1971-1980 • The Poisoners, 1971; The Intriguers, 1972; The Intimidators, 1974; The Terminators, 1975; The Retaliators, 1976; The Terrorizers, 1977

1981-1993 • The Revengers, 1982; The Annihilators, 1983; The Infiltrators, 1984; The Detonators, 1985; The Vanishers, 1986; The Demolishers, 1987; The Frighteners, 1989; The Threateners, 1992; The Damagers, 1993

NONSERIES NOVELS: A Date with Darkness, 1947; The Steel Mirror, 1948; Murder Twice Told, 1950; Night Walker, 1954 (also known as Rough Company); Line of Fire, 1955; Assignment: Murder, 1956 (also known as Assassins Have Starry Eyes); The Mona Intercept, 1980

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Smoky Valley, 1954; Mad River, 1956; The Big Country, 1958; Texas Fever, 1961; The Two-Shoot Gun, 1971 (also known as The Man from Santa Clara)

NONFICTION: On Guns and Hunting, 1970; Cruises with Kathleen, 1980

EDITED TEXT: Iron Men and Silver Stars, 1967

SCREENPLAY: Five Steps to Danger, 1957 (with Henry S. Kesler and Turnley Walker)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Banks, R. Jeff, and Guy M. Townsend. "The Matt Helm Series." The Mystery FANcier 2 (March, 1978): 3-11. Survey of the story lines and themes in the first twenty Matt Helm novels.

Erisman, Fred. "Western Motifs in the Thrillers of Donald Hamilton." Western American Literature 10 (February, 1976): 283-292. Brief essay that attempts to find links between Hamilton's early Western writing and his later thrillers.

Greene, Douglas G. John Dickson Carr: The Man Who Explained Miracles. New York: Otto Penzler Books, 1995. Cites Carr's view of Hamilton's books, in which Carr cites Matt Helm as "my favorite secret agent."

Hamilton, Donald. "Shut Up and Write." In Colloquium on Crime: Eleven Renowned Mystery Writ- ers Discuss Their Work, edited by Robin W. Winks. New York: Charles Scribners' Sons, 1986. Essay in which Hamilton discusses his own work and offers advice to other writers.

Sennett, Frank. "The Death of Matt Helm?" Booklist 98, no. 17 (May 1, 2002): 1456-1458. Sennett looks at the history of the Matt Helm series and how Helm was perceived as a more rugged James Bond. It notes how Hamilton's work peaked in popularity in the 1960's and 1970's and faded in the following decades.

Winks, Robin. Modus Operandi: An Excursion into Detective Fiction. Boston: Godine, 1982. Personal defense of the mystery that argues detective fiction does not differ from more "respectable" literature and appeals to readers for the same reasons as other writing. Includes a discussion of Hamilton's writings.

_____. "The Sordid Truth: Donald Hamilton." The New Republic 173 (July 26, 1975): 21-24. A brief appreciation of Hamilton's Matt Helm series by one of the most distinguished critics in the mystery and detective genre.

DASHIELL HAMMETT

Born: St. Mary's County, Maryland; May 27, 1894

Died: New York, New York; January 10, 1961

Types of plot: Private investigator; hard-boiled

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Continental Op, 1923-1946

Sam Spade, 1929-1932

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

The CONTINENTAL OP, so called because he is an operative for the Continental Detective Agency, is never given a name in any of the stories and novels he narrates. About thirty-five or forty years old, short and fat, the Continental Op is the quintessential hard-boiled detective, bound only by his private code of ethics, trusting no one and resisting all emotional involvement.

SAM SPADE, a private investigator, is a taller and somewhat younger version of the Continental Op. His character is rendered more complex in The Maltese Falcon (1929-1930) by his romantic involvements with women in the case, but he is finally guided by the rigid code of the hard-boiled detective—which champions tough behavior at the expense of personal relationships.

CONTRIBUTION

Dashiell Hammett's fundamental contribution to the genre is the virtual creation of realistic detective fiction. Unlike the eccentric and colorful amateur detectives of the British school following in the tradition

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Dashiell Hammett. (AP/Wide World Photos)

of Sherlock Holmes, Hammett's distinctively American protagonists are professionals, working against professional criminals who commit realistic crimes for plausible motives. Raymond Chandler observed that Hammett "took murder out of the Venetian vase and dropped it into the alley" where it belonged.

Hammett established the hard-boiled school of characterization and perfected an almost entirely objective narrative style. Even his first-person narrators such as the Continental Op and Nick Charles (in The Thin Man, 1934) restrict themselves to the reporting of observed actions and circumstances, revealing their own thoughts and emotions only between the lines, telling the reader no more than they reveal to other characters through dialogue. This style became fast, crisp, and idiomatic in Hammett's hands. In the third-person narratives, particularly in The Glass Key (1930), this technique is developed to the extent that the reader can do no more than speculate as to the protagonist's motives and feelings. Such a style is perfectly suited to the depiction of the hard-boiled detective, a man who pursues criminals ruthlessly and with professional detachment, using any means that come to hand, including violent and even criminal behavior. The detective is bound not by the law but by his own private code of ethics, which keeps him one step removed not only from the criminals but also from the corrupt political and social world of Hammett's fiction.

BIOGRAPHY

Dashiell Hammett was born Samuel Dashiell Hammett on May 27, 1894, in St. Mary's County, Maryland, to Richard Hammett and Annie Bond

Hammett. The family moved first to Philadelphia and then to Baltimore, where Hammett attended public school and, in 1908, one semester at Baltimore Polytechnic Institute. He left school at the age of thirteen and held several different jobs for short periods of time until 1915, when he became an operative for the Pinkerton Detective Agency, the turning point of his life and the event that provided him with the background for his realistic detective fiction. Hammett left the agency to join the army in 1918, reaching the rank of sergeant by the time of his discharge in 1919. He then returned to detective work, but hospitalization for pulmonary tuberculosis in 1920 interrupted his work and eventually ended it in 1921, shortly after his marriage to Josephine Dolan, a nurse he had met at the hospital. They were to have two daughters, Mary, born in 1921, and Josephine, born in 1926.

Hammett began publishing short stories in The Smart Set in 1922 and published the first Continental Op story, "Arson Plus," in 1923 in Black Mask, the pulp magazine that would publish his first four novels in serial form. The appearance of the first two novels in book form in 1929 made him a successful writer, and the next two, following quickly on that success, made him internationally famous. During this time Hammett had moved away from his family (the move was made—at least ostensibly—on the advice of a doctor, to prevent his younger daughter's being exposed to his illness), and in 1930 he went to Hollywood as a screenwriter. It was then, at the height of his fame, that he met Lillian Hellman, with whom he had a close relationship until his death.

Hammett was almost finished as a creative writer, however, publishing only one more novel, The Thin Man, in 1934, and writing no fiction in the last twenty-eight years of his life, except a fifty-page fragment of a novel called "Tulip." Though he stopped writing, royalties from his previous books and from a series of sixteen popular films and three weekly radio shows based on his characters and stories, as well as occasional screenwriting, provided him with income and public exposure. Hammett taught courses in mystery writing at the Jefferson School of Social Science from 1946 to 1956.

The reasons that Hammett stopped writing will never be fully known, but his involvement in left-wing politics from the 1930's to the end of his life has often been cited as a factor. He was under investigation by the Federal Bureau of Investigation as a suspected communist from the 1930's until his death, despite his volunteering for the army again and serving from 1942 until 1945. In 1946, he was elected president of the New York Civil Rights Congress, a position he held until the mid-1950's. Given the national temper at that time, any left-wing political involvement was dangerous, and in 1951 Hammett received a six-month sentence in federal prison for refusing to answer questions about the Civil Rights Congress bail fund. After his release from prison, his books went out of print, his radio shows were taken off the air, and his income was attached by the Internal Revenue Service for alleged income-tax infractions. Hammett was also called to testify before Joseph McCarthy's Senate subcommittee in 1953 and before a New York State legislative committee in 1955, both times in connection with his presumed role as a communist and a subversive. He spent his remaining years in extremely poor health and in poverty, living with Hellman and other friends until his death on January 10, 1961. He is buried in Arlington National Cemetery.

ANALYSIS

Before Dashiell Hammett laid the foundation of the modern realistic detective novel, virtually all detective fiction had been designed on the pattern established by Edgar Allan Poe in three short stories featuring the detective C. Auguste Dupin: "The Murders in the Rue Morgue," "The Mystery of Marie Rogêt," and "The Purloined Letter." The basic ingredients of the formula were simple: a brilliant but eccentric amateur detective, his trusty but somewhat pedestrian companion and chronicler, an even more pedestrian police force, and an intricate and bizarre crime. The solution of the puzzle, generally set up as something of a game or contest to be played out between the author and the reader, was achieved through a complex series of logical deductions drawn by the scientific detective from an equally complex series of subtle clues. According to what came to be the rules of the genre, these clues were to be available to the sidekick, who was also the narrator, and through him to the reader, who would derive interest and pleasure from the attempt to beat the detective to the solution.

Such stories were structured with comparable simplicity and regularity: A client, as often as not a representative of the baffled police force, comes to the detective and outlines the unusual and inexplicable circumstances surrounding the crime; the detective and his companion investigate, turning up numerous confusing clues that the narrator gives to the reader but cannot explain; finally, the detective, having revealed the identity of the criminal, who is ideally the least likely suspect, explains to his companion, and thus to the reader, the process of ratiocination that led him to the solution of the crime.

The canonical popular version of this classic tradition of the mystery as a puzzle to be tidily solved is Arthur Conan Doyle's Sherlock Holmes series, though purists have objected that essential information available to Holmes is frequently withheld from the reader to prevent his victory in the game. The success of the series paved the way for similar work by other British writers such as Agatha Christie, whose Hercule Poirot books are virtually perfect examples of this formula. Though this classic model was invented by the American Poe and practiced by many American mystery writers, its dominance among British writers has led to its being thought of as the English model, in opposition to a more realistic type of mystery being written around the 1920's by a small group of American writers.

Hammett proved to be the master of the new kind of detective story written in reaction against this classic model. As Raymond Chandler remarked in his seminal essay on the two schools, "The Simple Art of Murder," "Hammett gave murder back to the kind of people that commit it for reasons, not just to provide a corpse; and with the means at hand, not hand-wrought dueling pistols, curare and tropical fish." Rather than serving as the vehicle for an intentionally bewildering set of clues and an often-implausible solution, the realistic story of detection shifted the emphases to characterization, action, and—especially—rapid-fire colloquial dialogue, a resource limited in the English model to the few highly artificial set speeches needed to provide background and clues and to lead to the detective's closing monologue revealing the solution. The essentials of the realistic model are found complete in Hammett's earliest work, almost from the first of his thirty-five Op stories, just as the entire classical formula was complete in Poe's first short stories. Though Hammett's contribution extends well beyond the codification of this model—his significance for literary study rests largely on his questioning and modifying of these conventions in his novels—a sketch of these essentials will clearly point up the contrast between the classical and the realistic mystery story.

Hammett's familiarity with the classical paradigm is established in the seventy-odd reviews of detective novels he wrote for the Saturday Review and the New York Evening Post between 1927 and 1930, and his rejection of it is thorough. In fact, he specifically contrasted his notion of the detective with that of Doyle in describing Sam Spade (a description that is applicable to the Op as well):

For your private detective does not . . . want to be an erudite solver of riddles in the Sherlock Holmes manner; he wants to be a hard and shifty fellow, able to take care of himself in any situation, able to get the best of anybody he comes in contact with, whether criminal, innocent by-stander, or client.

Rather than a tall, thin, refined, and somewhat mysterious amateur such as Sherlock Holmes, who relies entirely on his powers of reasoning and deduction to clear up mysteries, Hammett's Continental Op is distinctly unglamorous and anti-intellectual. The Op is nearing forty, about five and a half feet tall, and weighing 190 pounds; he works as a modestly paid employee of the Continental Detective Agency, modeled loosely on the Pinkerton organization. Though certainly not stupid, the Op relies on routine police procedures and direct, often violent action to force criminals into the open, rather than on elaborate chains of deductive logic. The colorful and eccentric Sherlock Holmes (even his name is striking), with his violin, cocaine, and recondite scientific interests, is replaced by the anonymous and colorless Op, with no history, hobbies, or interests outside his work and no social life beyond an occasional poker game with police officers or other operatives. As he remarks in a 1925 short story, "The Gutting of Couffingnal," in his most extensive discussion of his ideas about his work,

Now I'm a detective because I happen to like the work. . . . I don't know anything else, don't enjoy anything else, don't want to know or enjoy anything else. . . . You think I'm a man and you're a woman. That's wrong. I'm a manhunter and you're something that has been running in front of me. There's nothing human about it. You might just as well expect a hound to play tiddly-winks with the fox he's caught.

RED HARVEST

In Red Harvest (1927-1928), the first of the novels featuring the Op, a character comments directly on the disparity between the methods of the Op and those of his more refined and cerebral predecessors:

“So that’s the way you scientific detectives work. My God! for a fat, middle-aged, hard-boiled pig-headed guy you’ve got the vaguest way of doing things I ever heard of.”

“Plans are all right sometimes,” I said. “And sometimes just stirring things up is all right—if you’re tough enough to survive, and keep your eyes open so you’ll see what you want when it comes to the top.”

Hammett humorously underscored the difference in methods in a 1924 short story, “The Tenth Claw,” which parodies the classical detective plot with a set of nine bewildering clues, including a victim missing his left shoe and collar buttons, a mysterious list of names, and a bizarre murder weapon (the victim was beaten to death with a bloodstained typewriter). The solution, the “tenth claw,” is to ignore all nine of these confusing and, as it turns out, phony clues and use routine methods such as the surveillance of suspects to find the killer. The Op relies on methodical routine, long hours, and action to get results, not on inspiration and ratiocination. Rather than presenting a brilliant alternative to ineffectual police methods, the Op works closely with the police and often follows their standard procedures.

As the detective is different, so are the crimes and criminals. The world of the traditional mystery is one of security and regularity, disrupted by the aberrant event of the crime. Once the detective solves the crime through the application of reason, normalcy is restored. This worldview was clearly a comfortable one from the point of view of the turn-of-the-century British Empire. The world of the hard-boiled detective is one in which criminal behavior constitutes the norm, not the aberrance. There are usually several crimes and several criminals, and the society is not an orderly one temporarily disrupted but a deeply corrupt one that will not be redeemed or even much changed after the particular set of crimes being investigated is solved. One of the chapters in Red Harvest is titled “The Seventeenth Murder” (in serial publication it had been the nineteenth), and the string has by no means ended at that point. The criminals include a chief of police and a rich client of the Op, not only gangsters, and the Op himself arranges a number of murders in playing off rival gangs against one another. Indeed, it is only at the very end that the reader, along with the Op himself, learns that he did not commit the seventeenth murder while drugged. At the novel’s close, most of the characters in the book are either dead or in prison. Rather than emphasize the solution of the crime—the murder that the Op is originally called in to investigate is solved quite early in the book—the novel emphasizes the corruption of the town of Personville and its corrupting effects on the people who enter it, including the detective himself. Many critics point to the critique of capitalist society of this early work as evidence of Hammett’s Marxist views.

THE MALTESE FALCON

Though he appeared only in The Maltese Falcon and a few short stories, Sam Spade has become Hammett’s most famous creation, largely because of Humphrey Bogart’s portrayal of him in John Huston’s faithful film version (the third made of the book). Hammett’s decision to shift to an entirely objective third-person narration for The Maltese Falcon removes even the few traces of interpretation and analysis provided by the Op and makes the analysis of the character of the detective himself the central concern of the reader. The question is not “who killed Miles Archer, Spade’s partner?” but “what kind of man is Sam Spade?” In fact, Archer’s death is unlikely to be of much concern to readers until they are reminded of it at the end, when Spade turns over to the police his lover, Brigid O’Shaughnessy, as the murderer. The reasoning behind Spade’s solution makes it fairly clear that he has known of her guilt from the start, before they became lovers, and leaves open the question of whether he has really fallen in love but is forced by his code to turn her in or whether he has been cold-bloodedly manipulating her all along. Spade’s delay in solving the case may also be interpreted variously: Is he crooked himself, hoping to gain money by aiding the thieves in the recovery of a priceless jeweled falcon, or is he merely playing along with them to further his investigation? After all, it is only after the falcon proves worthless that Spade reports the criminals. Spade was having an affair with his partner’s wife (he dislikes them both), and he frequently obstructs the police investigation up to the moment when he solves the case. Clearly, the mystery of the novel resides in character rather than plot.

THE GLASS KEY

Hammett's fourth novel, The Glass Key, does not even include a detective and is as much a psychological novel as a mystery. Again, it is the protagonist, this time Ned Beaumont, a gambler and adviser to mob leaders, whose character is rendered opaque by the rigorously objective camera-eye point of view, which describes details of gesture and expression but never reveals thought or motive directly.

THE THIN MAN

Hammett's last novel, The Thin Man, is a return to first-person narration, as Nick Charles, a retired detective, narrates the story of one last case. The novel is in many ways a significant departure from the earlier works, especially in its light comic tone, which helped fit it for popular motion-picture adaptations in a series of "Thin Man" films (though in the book the Thin Man is actually the victim, not the detective). The centerpiece of the book is the relationship between Nick and his young wife, Nora, one of the few happy marriages in modern fiction, based largely on the relationship between Hammett and Lillian Hellman, to whom the book is dedicated.

Hammett's creation of the hard-boiled detective and the corrupt world in which he works provided the inspiration for his most noteworthy successors, Raymond Chandler and Ross Macdonald (whose detective, Lew Archer, is named for Sam Spade's partner), and helped make the tough, cynical private eye a key element of American mythology.

William Nelles

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

CONTINENTAL OP SERIES: $106,000 Blood Money, 1927 (also known as Blood Money and The Big Knockover); Red Harvest, 1927-1928 (serial; 1929, book); The Dain Curse, 1928-1929 (serial; 1929, book); The Continental Op, 1945; The Return of the Continental Op, 1945; Dead Yellow Women, 1946; Hammett Homicides, 1946

SAM SPADE SERIES: The Maltese Falcon, 1929-1930 (serial; 1930, book); The Adventures of Sam Spade, and Other Stories, 1945

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Glass Key, 1930 (serial; 1931, book); The Thin Man, 1934; Complete Novels, 1999

OTHER SHORT FICTION: Secret Agent X-9, 1934 (with Alex Raymond); Nightmare Town, 1948; The Creeping Siamese, 1950; Woman in the Dark, 1951; A Man Named Thin, and Other Stories, 1962; The Big Knockover: Selected Stories and Short Novels, 1966 (Lillian Hellman, editor); Nightmare Town: Stories, 1999 (Kirby McCauley, Martin H. Greenberg, and Ed Gorman, editors); Crime Stories, and Other Writings, 2001; Lost Stories, 2005

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

SCREENPLAYS: City Streets, 1931 (with Oliver H. P. Garrett and Max Marcin); Mister Dynamite, 1935 (with Doris Malloy and Harry Clork); After the

Thin Man, 1936 (with Frances Goodrich and Albert Hackett); Another Thin Man, 1939 (with Goodrich and Hackett); Watch on the Rhine, 1943 (with Hellman)

NONFICTION: The Battle of the Aleutians, 1944 (with Robert Colodny); Selected Letters of Dashiell Hammett, 1921-1960, 2001 (Richard Layman with Julie M. Rivett, editors)

EDITED TEXT: Creeps By Night, 1931 (also known as Modern Tales of Horror, The Red Brain, and Breakdown)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Brucoli, Matthew J., and Richard Layman. *Hard-boiled Mystery Writers: Raymond Chandler, Dashiell Hammett, Ross MacDonal*d. New York: Carroll and Graf, 2002. A handy supplemental reference that includes interviews, letters, and previously published studies. Illustrated.

Gale, Robert L. A Dashiell Hammett Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2000. An encyclopedia devoted to Hammett. Includes bibliographical references and an index.

Hammett, Jo. Dashiell Hammett: A Daughter Remembers. Edited by Richard Layman, with Julie M. Rivett. New York: Carroll & Graf, 2001. A compelling memoir generously illustrated with photographs drawn from family archives.

Johnson, Diane. Dashiell Hammett: A Life. New York: Random House, 1983. The most comprehensive biography of Hammett, this book adds considerable information to the public record of Hammett's life but does not provide much critical analysis of the works. More than half the volume deals with the years after Hammett stopped publishing fiction and during which he devoted most of his time to leftist political activism.

Marling, William. The American Roman Noir: Hammett, Cain, and Chandler. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1995. An examination of the works of Hammett, Chandler, and James M. Cain by a reviewer. Marling sees their writings as a response to the events following 1927, which he describes as a pivotal year in terms of technology and economics.

Mellen, Joan. Hellman and Hammett: The Legendary Passion of Lillian Hellman and Dashiell Hammett. New York: HarperCollins, 1996. Although primarily a biographical study, this scrupulously researched work provides insight into the backgrounds of Hammett's fiction. Includes very detailed notes and bibliography.

Metress, Christopher, ed. The Critical Response to Dashiell Hammett. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994. A generous compilation of reviews and general studies, with a comprehensive introduction, chronology, and bibliography.

Nyman, Jopi. Hard-Boiled Fiction and Dark Romanticism. New York: Peter Lang, 1998. Studies the fiction of Hammett, James M. Cain, and Ernest Hemingway. Includes bibliographical references

Panek, LeRoy Lad. Reading Early Hammett: A Critical Study of the Fiction Prior to the "Maltese Falcon." Jefferson, N.C.: McFarland & Company, 2004. An absorbing analysis of Hammett's earliest work, including magazine writing and essays on various topics, and particular focus on Hammett's Continental Op character.

Symons, Julian. Dashiell Hammett. San Diego: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1985. A brief but substantive book by a leading English writer of crime fiction and criticism. Symons believes that Hammett created "A specifically American brand of crime story . . . that transcends the form and limits of [its] genre and can be compared with the best fiction produced in America between the two world wars." His considerations of the works support this judgment. Contains a useful select bibliography.

JOSEPH HANSEN

Born: Aberdeen, South Dakota; July 19, 1923

Died: Laguna Beach, California; November 24, 2004

Also wrote as Rose Brock; James Colton; James Coulton

Types of plot: Hard-boiled; private investigator

PRINCIPAL SERIES

David Brandstetter, 1970-1991

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

DAVID BRANDSTETTER, a claims investigator for an insurance company in the Los Angeles area, is a middle-aged, tough, rather humorless hero. When he first appears, Brandstetter is a homosexual whose long-time partner has recently died. Otherwise a typical man, Brandstetter has a unique perspective on human motivation that helps him spot deception in voice, manner, and explanation.

CONTRIBUTION

Joseph Hansen's novels featuring David Brandstetter, the sympathetic and wary insurance claims investigator who happens to be gay, are unusual in a genre in which machismo is an essential element. Writing in the tradition of Ross Macdonald and Raymond Chandler, Hansen is clinical, unsentimental, and compelling. Over the years, Brandstetter finds a lover and learns more about himself. As Hansen moves his private investigator about, he provides a sense of the ordinariness of gay life. His intelligent and sensitive style draws readers to the plot and characters, stressing the universal characteristics of his hero's homosexual lifestyle. Although his novels fit into the Sam Spade-Philip Marlowe-Lew Archer mold—aging detective, sunny California, a society rife with corruption—Hansen provides fresh angles, third-person narrative, coolly realistic locales, and flawless dialogue to demonstrate the ways in which people juggle their morals to suit their needs. In the process, Hansen creates complex human experiences and enriches the mystery and detective genre.

Though Hansen was not the first to depict a gay detective—George Baxt preceded him by several years with novels featuring flamboyant black homosexual detective Pharoah Love—Hansen was recognized for his skillful and sensitive treatment of gays as human beings. Hansen's Gravedigger (1982) was nominated for the 1983 Shamus Award as best novel, and he received an Edgar nomination in 1984 for "The Anderson Boy" and a Shamus nomination in 1987 for "Merely Players." The Out/Look Foundation in 1991 honored Hansen for outstanding contributions to the lesbian and gay communities, and he won Lambda Literary Awards in 1992 for Country of Old Men (1991) and in 1994 for Living Upstairs (1993). He received the Private Eye Writers of America's Lifetime Achievement Award in 1992.

BIOGRAPHY

Joseph Hansen was born on July 19, 1923, in Aberdeen, South Dakota, the son of shoe shop operator Henry Harold Hansen and Alma Rosebrock Hansen. The Hansens moved often during the Great Depression, and Joseph's education was divided among public schools in Aberdeen, South Dakota; Minneapolis, Minnesota; and Pasadena, California, as his family drifted from the Midwest to the West Coast in search of work. Hansen, who identified himself as a homosexual in his late teens, was more interested in writing for the school newspaper and acting in school plays than in languishing in classrooms and never attended college. Despite his sexual orientation, in 1943 he fell in love with and married lesbian Jane Bancroft, who in 1944 bore one daughter, Barbara Bancroft—who later underwent gender reassignment—during their marriage, which lasted more than fifty years (Jane died in 1994).

In 1944, Hansen received an encouraging option contract in 1944 from Houghton Mifflin Company on the basis of a few pages of a first novel. However, that novel was never published, nor were four other novels, several plays, and numerous short stories written during the 1940's. Hansen struggled to keep food on the table while working in bookshops, as an assistant to the literary agent Stanley Rose, and for ten years as a billing clerk in a Hollywood film-processing plant.

Professional recognition came slowly, but by the late 1950's several of Hansen's poems had been published in mainstream magazines: Saturday Review, The New Yorker, Harper's Magazine, and The Atlantic Monthly. In 1962, he tried his hand at editing as well as at writing short stories for One, a small, pioneering magazine for homosexuals. When editorial difficulties arose, in 1965 he helped found a similar magazine, Tangents, which he edited until 1970. In 1969, he also produced a radio show, Homosexuality Today, on KPFK-FM in Los Angeles.

Beginning with his work at One, Hansen adopted the pseudonym James Colton and wrote several novels—including his first full-length work, Lost on Twilight Road (1964) and his first short-fiction collection, The Corruptor, and Other Stories (1968)—under that name between 1964 and 1971. Most were paperback originals, intended for sale in sex-oriented bookstores. In writing these books, Hansen honed his fiction-writing skills, discovered his writer's voice, and learned what he wanted to say. He intended to write honestly and unapologetically about homosexuality in a manner interesting and acceptable to all kinds of readers. Under the Colton pseudonym (later Coulton), Hansen published his first mystery, Known Homosexual (1968), a forerunner of the Brandstetter mysteries.

In 1969, Harper and Row contracted with Hansen to publish the first Dave Brandstetter mystery, Fade-out, which appeared in 1970. During his career, Hansen published more than forty books, including mystery novels, gothic novels (under the pseudonym Rose Brock), collections of poetry, and several collections of short stories. In addition, he taught fiction writing at the University of California, Los Angeles (1977-1986), and at the Beyond Baroque Foundation, Venice, California (1975-1976). In 1974, Hansen received a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts, and the following year he received a grant from the British Arts Council for a lecture tour of Northumberland.

In his later years, after ending the Brandstetter series, Hansen continued to write, concentrating on short stories primarily concerning his straight private eye and horse ranch owner Hack Bohannon, for such collections as Bohannon's Country: Mystery Stories (1993) and Bohannon's Women: Mystery Stories (2002). He also began—with Living Upstairs (1993)—a series set in the 1940's and 1950's about young, aspiring gay writer Nathan Reed that was planned for twelve novels but ended after only three entries on the author's death. Hansen died November 24, 2004, at the age of eighty-one.

ANALYSIS

In the article "The Mystery Novel as Serious Business," Joseph Hansen sketched his ideas on a writer's responsibility and the serious purpose of the detective genre. In his view, the mystery novel, treated as serious business, has a unique capacity to work the "kind of magic" that any fine writer possesses. "A good and honest novel lets us experience for a brief while what it is like to be another human being, someone with a different background and a different set of problems," writes Hansen. The Brandstetter novels are, therefore, aimed at a general audience, not a gay audience. Hansen maintains that the mystery of death, in which lives unfold within the framework of a compelling story, will illuminate some aspect of the mystery of life.

Naturally, one aspect of human life that Hansen consistently demystifies is homosexuality. Brandstetter is ordinary but always human, with expectations, jealousies, and occasionally a lovers' quarrel, all carefully crafted by Hansen. A variety of homosexual and bisexual characters appear in the Brandstetter novels, none stereotyped or unbelievable. Gay subculture is encountered but never dominates. Troublemaker (1975) centers on the murder of an owner of a gay bar and Early Graves (1987) on the serial murders of acquired immunodeficiency syndrome (AIDS) victims, but the sexual preference of victims or their friends is never sensationalized. It is simply an aspect of their lives, although they or others may feel secretive or uncomfortable about it.

While demystifying homosexuality, Hansen renders human sexuality a complex phenomenon and the enterprise of categorizing individuals a risky business. The unhappiest people are those who hide or do not accept who they are. Sex or sexual preference is not portrayed as the problem—the absence of self-acceptance is. In A Smile in His Lifetime (1981), a novel outside the Brandstetter series, the emotional landscape of Whit Miller is very bleak. Miller is a bisexual who is growing apart from his wife and toward a largely homosexual existence, something he has been struggling with since the day he was married. Gender confusion is an idea consistently raised by Hansen. Brandstetter frequently catches fleeting glimpses of a fleeing felon or someone who has struck him from behind that may have been a young man or may “have been a her.” It is always “too dark.”

In addition to demystifying homosexuality, Hansen draws parallels between the personal issues and love relationships of his detective and those of the characters he is investigating. In Fadeout, Brandstetter’s lover has just died of cancer. While investigating a murder, Brandstetter clears one young man of the crime, and the young man later becomes his new lover. One love fades out; another fades in. In Death Claims (1973), Brandstetter and the new lover are drifting apart. Each lays claim to the memory of a dead lover. Brandstetter investigates the death of a female bookseller who struggled to survive through skin graft surgery, nurtured by the love of a younger woman. Finding the murderer, he restores the young woman’s belief in herself and her strength to survive. Brandstetter and his lover bury the past and restore their relationship. Plot, theme, and title run parallel. Troublemaker involves a pair of interlopers. One tries to break up Brandstetter’s relationship with his lover, and another is the killer of a bar owner. Brandstetter locates the murderer, one of the victim’s associates, and the other interloper, saving his relationship.

Brandstetter is in the business of reconstructing people’s lives and discovering their meaning, both personal and social. Hansen, the writer, parallels the detective he created. He believes that the mystery novel “ought to look straight at the real world . . . concern itself with real problems that face real people.” Early Graves, the ninth Brandstetter novel, exemplifies this stand. It opens with Brandstetter returning home from a business trip to find an unknown dead man on his doorstep. The victim appears to be the latest casualty of a serial killer of young gay men who are all dying of AIDS. Someone left the body for Brandstetter to find, and he wants to know why, a desire that leads him on a search through lives filled with grief, as families and lovers face the hard truth about AIDS. At the same time, Brandstetter is grieving about the premature end of his live-in relationship with Cecil Harris. Cecil, a young black reporter, in an act of misplaced pity, married an underage blind girl (in The Little Dog Laughed, 1986) to save her from her abusive, gold-digging mother. Eventually, the serial murderer meets an early grave—and Cecil’s marriage does also.

Many critics attribute Hansen’s success to the subtlety and sensitivity with which he confronts contemporary social issues through Brandstetter’s actions and opinions as the character ages. Critics point out that some social evil or problem—AIDS, political graft, secret military operations in Central America, toxic-waste dumping, religious fraud—often lies at the heart of Brandstetter’s cases. Through the fast-paced detective genre, Hansen can illustrate some aspect of human nature or societal ill without making shrill value judgments. Critics agree that Skinflick (1979) is more about the methods people use to rationalize unethical actions than about catching the murderer of a hypocritical religious fundamentalist. Gravedigger is a nonsensational treatment of evil in the form of a Charles Manson-type mass murderer. Nightwork (1984), which involves murder in the cover-up of illegal toxic-waste dumping, was written to expose a problem that, in Hansen’s words, “no one, not on any level of government, no one in the world, is effectively doing anything about.” In that novel, one villain is caught, but the real killer of untold numbers by slow poisoning remains at large. Questions remain unanswered, but the book’s message is that people must treat one another with respect and decency.

Hansen’s concern for how individuals treat their fellow humans is elaborated in several novels outside the Brandstetter series. In Backtrack (1982), a mystery featuring an eighteen-year-old protagonist who discovers aspects of his dead father’s life that lead him to await his own killer, Hansen shows what happens when parents do not care; it is a story that seeks to explain why children become runaways and has been called brilliant.

The Brandstetter mysteries are keenly linked through symbol, incident, and character so that they are best read in chronological order. In a real sense they form a single multivolume novel, one in which it is possible to learn much about being a gay male in the United States at the end of the twentieth century. At the same time, the series is a study of the social and political issues confronting American society in the same time period. The social consciousness of the Brandstetter novels increases with each succeeding volume.

Certain characters and Brandstetter activities serve to link each volume: Brandstetter's ninth stepmother, Amanda; Barker, the police chief; Leppard, the police detective; Romano, the restaurateur; Brandstetter's father in the early novels; Owens, his lifelong buddy; and various lovers who come and go. Settings of the novels are quite detailed, and that of Brandstetter's home in particular roots him and the story in a specific time and place. Brandstetter's habits—a glass of Glenlivet before dinner and longing for a good meal either cooked at home or at Romano's restaurant—are part of the Brandstetter formula. His character appears more interested in a good meal than good sex.

Like Ross Macdonald's Lew Archer, Brandstetter is ever the questioner trying to make sense out of things that do not fit. When asked what he knows by the police or a friend, Brandstetter always replies, "I only ask questions." In Skinflick, when asked if he, the claims investigator, will not pay the insurance to the beneficiaries, Brandstetter replies, "I don't want to hold it back . . . but a couple of things are wrong and I have to find out why."

Hansen, like Macdonald, saw the writer as private investigator. In discussing fiction writing, he singled out Gertrude Stein as a writer to the last breath because of her dying words, a "final beautiful sentence": "Very well then—what is the question?" Hansen's Brandstetter asks not only who had reason to murder but also why, and then why they do what they do in everyday life. The answers to Brandstetter's questions reveal individuals' actions and motives, but Hansen refrained from having anyone answer bigger questions about graft, toxic-waste dumping, or AIDS; he confines his craft to meticulously describing things the way they are. The reader may leave a Hansen novel outraged, cynical, or simply more knowledgeable. His stories are not mere social tracts but compelling tales that move one to sympathy, wonder, and amusement.

FADEOUT

With Fadeout, Hansen not only introduced Dave Brandstetter but also found his own voice within the mystery genre. Written in the Ross Macdonald style of hard-boiled Southern California detective fiction, it established Hansen as a mature mystery writer. In this action-filled novel, Hansen reveals people and their complex interests through what they do rather than what they say. With Fadeout, he fundamentally changed the way gays are portrayed in detective fiction. There are no pitiable gay blackmail victims or flighty dancer types, as in the work of Ngaio Marsh, for example, but a gay, macho detective hero. Thus Hansen succeeded in further humanizing the form he inherited from the classic hard-boiled writers.

According to Hansen, the writer of fiction has a responsibility to deal honestly with important aspects of contemporary life. He intended to portray a decent, tough-minded, caring kind of man who was contentedly homosexual and, in so doing, to contradict conventional social ideas about homosexuals. Thus, as Brandstetter is introduced in Fadeout, his twenty-year relationship with an interior decorator named Rod Fleming has just ended with Rod's death from cancer. In contrast, Brandstetter's father, Carl Brandstetter, has recently remarried for the ninth time. Just as the myth that gays do not have long-term, stable relationships is exploded, so is the social image of the middle-aged male homosexual as obsessed with seducing young men or boys. In Brandstetter's relationships with Anselmo, a young Latino in Fadeout, and Cecil Harris, a young black reporter in The Man Everybody Was Afraid Of (1978), the young men are the pursuers and seducers of the middle-aged investigator, not vice versa. Brandstetter yearns for, rather than actively searches for, a lover when he is without one.

A COUNTRY OF OLD MEN

A Country of Old Men is the insurance investigator's final bow. Retired from his profession, feeling his age, and living comfortably with young African American television journalist-producer Cecil Harris, Brandstetter—now the owner of a favorite restaurant that he patronized for thirty years—responds to a call from old friend Madge Dunston. While walking on the beach, she found a young abused boy who apparently was kidnapped after witnessing the murder of Howard "Cricket" Shales, a musician, former convict, and drug dealer who a woman named Rachel Klein may have shot.

In the course of his investigation, Brandstetter bumps into many old friends and acquaintances who figure in the story. Mystery writer Jack Helmers, whom Brandstetter has known from high school, is rumored to be working on a roman à clef novel depicting youthful shenanigans from fifty years ago that could be embarrassing to the now grown-up pranksters, such as Charlie Norton and Morse Campbell, who visit Brandstetter after long absences to pump him for information about the forthcoming book. A powerful political figure, Alejandro Hernandez, reappears in an attempt to make a bargain with Brandstetter. The investigator seeks the assistance of longtime gay friend Ray Lollard, who has lived for years with another of Brandstetter's friends, Kovacs, an artist who is dying of AIDS. Amanda, the ninth wife of Brandstetter's father, and widow of record, stops by to announce she is remarrying, to actor Cliff Callahan. Los Angeles Police Department homicide lieutenant Jeff Leppard, with whom Brandstetter has crossed paths before, cooperates with the investigator in unraveling the events leading up to the murder.

Although the investigator, through his usual dogged persistence and thoroughness in examining every lead, does eventually expose the real killer and the motive behind the crime, A Country of Old Men is more than simply a complex, well-plotted mystery. It is also an examination of the different forms of abuse to which humans fall prey, a compassionate exploration of the inevitability of aging, and an affectionate swan song to a popular and unique character, Dave Brandstetter.

Kathleen O'Mara

Updated by Jack Ewing

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

DAVID BRANDSTETTER SERIES: Fadeout, 1970; Death Claims, 1973; Troublemaker, 1975; The Man Everybody Was Afraid Of, 1978; Skinflick, 1979; Gravedigger, 1982; Nightwork, 1984; Brandstetter and Others, 1984; The Little Dog Laughed, 1986; Early Graves, 1987; Obedience, 1988; The Boy Who Was Buried This Morning, 1990; A Country of Old Men, 1991; The Complete Brandstetter, 2006 (omnibus)

NATHAN REED SERIES: Living Upstairs, 1993; Jack of Hearts, 1995; The Cutbank Path, 2002

NONSERIES NOVELS: Known Homosexual, 1968 (as Colton; also as Hansen as Stranger to Himself, 1977, and Pretty Boy Dead, 1984); A Smile in His Lifetime, 1981; Backtrack, 1982; Job's Year, 1983; Steps Going Down, 1985

OTHER SHORT FICTION: The Dog, and Other Stories, 1979; Bohannon's Book: Five Mysteries, 1988; Bohannon's Country: Mystery Stories, 1993; Blood, Snow and Classic Cars: Mystery Stories, 2001; Bohannon's Women: Mystery Stories, 2002

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Lost on Twilight Road, 1964 (as Colton); Strange Marriage, 1965 (as Colton); Cocksure, 1969 (as Colton); Gard, 1969 (as Coulton); Hang-Up, 1969 (as Colton); Tarn House, 1971 (as Brock); The Outward Side, 1971 (as Colton); Todd, 1971 (as Colton); Longleaf, 1974 (as Brock)

NONFICTION: Dynamics of the Cuban Revolution: The Trotskyist View, 1978; The Leninist Strategy of Party Building: The Debate on Guerilla Warfare in Latin America, 1982; A Few Doors West of Hope: The Life and Times of Dauntless Don Slater, 1998

POETRY: One Foot in the Boat, 1977; Ghosts: And Other Poems, 1998

SHORT FICTION: The Corrupter, and Other Stories, 1968 (as Colton)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Breen, Jon L. Introduction to The Fine Art of Murder: The Mystery Reader's Indispensable Companion, edited by Ed Gorman, Martin H. Greenberg, and Larry Segriff with Jon L. Breen. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1993. Cites Hansen as creator of the first realistic gay detective and provides a brief history of homosexuality in mystery fiction.

Callendar, Newgate. "Criminals at Large." Review of Death Claims, by Joseph Hansen. The New York Times Book Review, January 21, 1973, p. 26. Praises Hansen—labeled of "the Ross Macdonald school"—for managing to avoid clichés while engaging the reader in the emotional problems of his gay hero and notes his smooth handling of crime elements and his plausible denouement.

Clemons, Walter. "The New Stellar Sleuths." Review of Gravedigger, by Joseph Hansen. Newsweek 99, no. 23 (June 7, 1982): 71-72. Favorable review focuses especially on the writing in the story in which Brandstetter investigates a claim made by a financially and sexually unstable father concerning his missing daughter, who is possibly a victim of a cult.

DeAndrea, William L. Encyclopedia Mysteriosa: A Comprehensive Guide to the Art of Detection in Print, Film, Radio, and Television. New York: Prentice Hall, 1994. Brief entries on Hansen and on his gay detective, Dave Brandstetter.

Geherin, David. "Dave Brandstetter." In The American Private Eye: The Image in Fiction. New York: Frederick Ungar Publishing, 1985. A discussion of Hansen's popular detective as a unique creation: an investigator who because he works for insurance companies, unlike other private eyes, looks into only deaths, usually murders. The chapter also shows how Hansen, without proselytizing, helped advance gay rights through his fiction by portraying homosexuals as real individuals rather than stereotypes—while simultaneously providing outstanding, well-written mysteries.

Hansen, Joseph. "The Mystery Novel as Serious Business." The Armchair Detective (Summer, 1984). Hansen describes his theories of writing mysteries. Sheds light on his published works.

_____. "PW Interviews: Joseph Hansen." Interview by Barbara A. Bannon. Publishers Weekly 227, no. 24 (December 17, 1982): 14-15. The interview includes biographical information, and Hansen comments on his writing techniques and working habits.

Pronzini, Bill, and Marcia Muller, eds. 1001 Midnights: The Aficionado's Guide to Mystery and Detective Fiction. New York: Arbor House, 1986. Muller reviews several of Hansen's works, including the collection Brandstetter and Others (1984), which contains two short stories featuring the investigator, "Election Day" and "Surf." Other works reviewed include Fadeout, Nightwork, and Troublemaker—all of which Muller praises for their rich characterizations, memorable settings, explorations of various aspects of gay life, and well-constructed plots.

Publishers Weekly. Review of Brandstetter and Others, by Joseph Hansen. 226, no. 20 (November 16, 1984): 55. Review of Hansen's short-story collection, which is praised for its well-crafted tales that focus primarily on murder and "twisted love"; it is noted that several of the stories appeared previously in Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine.

Teachout, Terry. Review of Gravedigger, by Joseph Hansen. The National Review 34, no. 10 (May 28, 1982): 645-647. A highly favorable review that points out Hansen's particular strengths: few flashy similes, detached third-person narration, and a quiet, unassuming protagonist who happens to be gay, death investigator Dave Brandstetter. Teachout considers Hansen a worthy successor to Ross Macdonald, though without that author's thoughtfulness or overall scope of story.

Zubro, Mark Richard. "The Gay and Lesbian Mystery." In The Fine Art of Murder: The Mystery

Reader's Indispensable Companion, edited by Ed Gorman, Martin H. Greenberg, and Larry Segriff with Jon L Breen. New York: Carroll & Graf, 1993. Provides a few paragraphs about Hansen as a trendsetter for making Dave Brandstetter a real, three-dimensional character.

THOMAS W. HANSHAW

Born: Brooklyn, New York; 1857

Died: London, England; March 3, 1914

Also wrote as Dashing Charley; Old Cap Collier; H. O. Cooke; Old Cap Darrell; R. T. Emmett; Charlotte May Kingsley; A U.S. Detective

Type of plot: Amateur sleuth

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Hamilton Cleek, 1910-1925

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

THE MAN WHO CALLS HIMSELF HAMILTON CLEEK was born the true prince of the fictional Balkan kingdom of Maurvania, but at the opening of the stories about him, he has become the VANISHING CRACKSMAN, an associate of Margot, queen of the French Apaches. He is successful as a thief because of his "weird birthgift": He can make his face assume the features of other people. Consequently, he is called "the man of the forty faces." After falling in love, however, he reforms, putting his talents at the service of Scotland Yard.

AILSA LORNE is the incredibly pure woman with whom Cleek falls in love.

DOLLOPS is Cleek's Cockney servant and assistant, the inventor of an unusual method of stopping crooks: He lays gummed paper in their paths, and while they are extricating their feet from the mess, they are arrested by the detectives.

SUPERINTENDENT MAVERICK NARKOM represents Scotland Yard. He is continually asking Cleek for help in solving "riddles" and is continually astonished by Cleek's ability to find the solutions to them.

CONTRIBUTION

The saga of Hamilton Cleek in many ways summarizes the forms of popular literature of the era just before World War I. Thomas W. Hanshaw used elements of the crook story and the Balkan romance and combined them with tales featuring an infallible sleuth to produce some of the most extraordinary detective stories of the era. Hanshaw's inventiveness in plotting and his love of the bizarre and exotic influenced later writers, especially Ellery Queen and John Dickson Carr.

BIOGRAPHY

Thomas W. Hanshaw's writing life divides into two sections. Until the turn of the century, when at the age of about forty-three he moved from his native United States to England, he had made a living as a writer of melodramas for the stage and as a prolific author of dime and nickel novels. Beginning in the late 1870's, Hanshaw contributed sensational romances to the story paper Young Men of America, and some of these tales were reprinted in dime-novel format. According to dime-novel expert J. Randolph Cox, Hanshaw used many pseudonyms, some of which were house names, including Old Cap Collier, Dashing Charley, Old Cap Darrell, H. O. Cooke, Charlotte May Kingsley, R. T. Emmett, and a U.S. Detective. He may have been one of the many authors who wrote as Bertha M. Clay in a series of the most popular, though saccharine, romances of the era.

The second phase of his life began when he moved to England with his wife and daughter. Almost immediately, his first clothbound book, The World's Finger:

An Improbable Story (1901), was published, to be followed by other novels that emphasized mystery and detection, though Hanshew always tried to have something for everybody and therefore included romance, adventure, and an occasional anarchist. His stories also appeared in popular fiction magazines such as Cassell's, The Red Magazine, and The Story-Teller.

In 1910, when he was in his fifties, Hanshew hit his vein of gold with the publication of The Man of the Forty Faces, the first book about Hamilton Cleek. It was followed by more than fifty short stories and a series of Edison silent films, featuring Thomas Meighan as Cleek. Hanshew died in 1914, but his wife and daughter continued the series based at first on Hanshew's notes and retaining his name as author and later as coauthor with his wife, Mary E. Hanshew. The final two volumes of Cleek's adventures, published in the 1930's, were credited solely to his daughter, Hazel Phillips Hanshew.

ANALYSIS

The turn of the century was an extraordinary time in popular fiction, when stories of detectives, criminals, magicians, living mummies, space invaders, and romantic adventurers took the public's fancy in books and in magazines. Types of popular fiction were not always distinct, and some authors seem consciously to have made a determination about what sold, combining as many popular elements as possible into a single book. Richard Marsh, for example, realized that both detective stories and occult mysteries had large audiences, so in The Beetle (1897) he set an aristocratic detective to investigate the case of a man who literally turns himself into an insect.

THE WORLD'S FINGER

Thomas W. Hanshew's The World's Finger, accurately subtitled "An Improbable Story," brings together several elements from popular fiction of the period. Especially in its declamatory dialogue, it reveals Hanshew's training as a dime novelist in the United States, but he included a number of comments expressing the prejudices of his adopted country: "That's the worst of you Continental people," cries one of the characters, "you squeal and howl when the jig's up and you find yourselves in a corner."

The plot of The World's Finger reflects the vogue for the detective stories of Fergus Wright Hume. As in Hume's The Mystery of a Hansom Cab (1886) and The Chinese Jar (1893), the suspense is created by the competition between rival detectives. In The World's Finger, Scotland Yard superintendent Maverick Narkom, who plays the heavy through much of the book, opposes private detective George Yardley, who had resigned from the police because of his hatred of the overbearing Narkom. Narkom is in love with the heroine, who has accepted the proposal of a nobleman. When his rival is charged with murder, Narkom seizes the chance and promises to track down the real criminal in exchange for the heroine's hand in marriage. One of Narkom's nasty characteristics is that he is prejudiced against the aristocracy, for he has the features of an aristocrat but is of low birth. Hanshew, however, admired those of high birth and disliked those who spent their lives in "workshops [which] vomited their hordes of wage-workers out on the muddy pavement." The major exception was the Cockney, whom Hanshew found good for a bit of comedy.

Though the social positions in The World's Finger are backward-looking, the cleverness of Hanshew's plotting hints at what would come with the Golden Age two decades later. The book begins with the discovery of a corpse, from which lead the bare footprints of the murderer, but the footprints stop at a blank wall. A diamond shirt-link is also found, leading to the strange image of an upper-class murderer in evening dress but wearing no shoes or socks, a murderer who, moreover, can disappear when he reaches a wall. To make matters more mysterious, the body of one of the constables investigating the case is found, yet there seems to be no way for the murderer to have come and gone without being seen. These problems are solved quite quickly by an inventive explanation that would be used by later writers, especially Thomas Burke in "The Hands of Mr. Ottermole." More mysteries appear, however, some of them concerning inheritance. Hanshew mentions M. E. Braddon in the book, and it is clear that her sensational novels contributed this emphasis on family rights. When a bit more than one-third of the book has been told, the complexities have become so great that one of the characters laments, “Upon my word it is the most mysterious affair of which I have ever heard. It doubles and twists and contradicts itself at every turn.” The detection at this stage is done by a young woman, and her deductions are far cleverer and more persuasive than those of the bemused men about her.

Had the book maintained this level, it would have become one of the classics of detective fiction, but it declines into problems involving identical twins, unnecessary kidnappings, ridiculous police procedure, and (the always popular, at least in 1901) Italian anarchists. Even with its flaws, however, The World's Finger was successful enough that Hanshaw followed with similar novels; the work also helps the modern reader understand Hanshaw's strengths and weaknesses. His willingness to toss almost anything into a plot makes his books marvelous examples of popular culture, but when his tales reach novel length, they form a gooey mishmash.

“THE AMETHYST PIN”

Hanshaw's major strength was in his plots, especially his imaginative openings with impossibilities. This skill was best displayed in his short stories. In 1905, for example, George Yardley reappeared in “The Amethyst Pin,” a detective story published in The Monthly Story Magazine. Once again, Hanshaw used his favorite elements—identical twins, snobbish social attitudes, and (replacing the mysterious Italians) a mysterious Russian. The plot is surprisingly tight, however, with a single focus—the question of identity—and some convincing detection. Using the short-story form, Hanshaw was able to make the highly improbable seem believable.

THE MAN OF THE FORTY FACES

According to a statement at the end of The Man of the Forty Faces, Hamilton Cleek appeared as a character in a stage play a year or two before he was first featured in book form. Hanshaw had written melodramas as a young man, and the period before World War I was a time of detective plays, especially Sherlock Holmes (1899), by William Gillette and Arthur Conan Doyle. Certainly the Cleek of the books resembles the stage version of Holmes, with his dramatic revelations and his pouncing on the criminals, handcuffs ready. Hanshaw followed with a series of short stories, twelve of which were collected in 1910 as The Man of the Forty Faces.

A brief summary of how Hamilton Cleek puts his services to the use of Scotland Yard will indicate the flavor of the Cleek stories, especially in Hanshaw's eclectic borrowing of elements from various forms of popular fiction. After a brief opening scene, The Man of the Forty Faces introduces a challenge from the Vanishing Cracksman to Superintendent Maverick Narkom of Scotland Yard. (Narkom has lost the hatred of aristocrats that he had in The World's Finger; he has also lost what little intelligence he demonstrated in the book.) The Cracksman announces that he will steal diamonds from Sir Horace Wyvern's wedding party no matter what steps the police take to stop him. He succeeds, but instead of disappearing with the booty he agrees to return it in exchange for an interview with Narkom and Sir Horace. At this meeting, the Cracksman explains that he has become a thief because of his birthgift: “His features seemed to writhe and knot and assume in as many moments a dozen different aspects.” One glance at Sir Horace's niece, Ailsa Lorne, however, has persuaded him to offer his intelligence and ability at disguise to Scotland Yard. In prose reminiscent of his days writing dime-novel romances as Charlotte May Kingsley, Hanshaw has Cleek explain that “I'm tired of wallowing in the mire. A woman's eyes have lit the way to heaven for me. I want to climb up to her, to win her, to be worthy of her, and to stand beside her in the light.” He then asks Sir Horace, an expert on brain diseases (whose methods prove to be phrenology), to examine his skull. Sir Horace announces that his cranium shows that he must remain a thief. The Cracksman refuses to accept that fate and promises to become a detective, helping Scotland Yard with its riddles. Narkom agrees.

The Cracksman refuses to reveal his true name; he is only “The Man Who Calls Himself Hamilton Cleek.” He does, however, admit that he had been a thief in France, associated with Margot, queen of the French Apaches. In most of the Cleek books, Margot and her henchmen try to capture Cleek and make him return to his life of crime. In addition, a mysterious group of men from the Balkan kingdom of Mauravania, led by Count Irma, also threaten Cleek. Eventually, Hanshew reveals that Cleek is in reality the true prince of Mauravania, and his subjects want him and his multitude of faces back home.

Hanshew decided that Cleek should begin his career as a cracksman because of the success of gentleman burglars in such books as E. W. Hornung's The Amateur Cracksman (1899), Guy Boothby's A Prince of Swindlers (1900), and Barry Pain's The Memoirs of Constantine Dix (1905). Hanshew's innovation was to turn the thief into a detective, something that had been hinted at but not yet fully developed in Maurice Leblanc's stories of Arsène Lupin. Cleek as a detective is based directly on Sherlock Holmes. In reaction to Holmes's eccentricity, many authors of the period described their fictional sleuths as ordinary in appearance. Arthur Morrison's Martin Hewitt, M. McDonnell Bodkin's Paul Beck, Baroness Orczy's Old Man in the Corner, and C. L. Pirkis's Loveday Brooke are the sort that no one would look at twice. Such restraint was not for Hanshew. Cleek, like Holmes, is vivid because of his quirks. Cleek loves flowers, he peppers his talk with music-hall jokes, and when he notices a clue overlooked by Narkom, a queer, one-sided smile appears on his face.

Cleek's Mauravian origins are yet another borrowing. With the publication of Anthony Hope's The Prisoner of Zenda (1894) and George Barr McCutcheon's Graustark (1901), romances set in nonexistent Balkan principalities had become very popular. In these novels, manly Britishers or Americans with plenty of derring-do solve difficulties—generally concerning succession to the throne—in old-fashioned kingdoms. In the Cleek stories, the formula is inverted. Because he has all the characteristics of a manly Britisher, Cleek refuses to return with Count Irma and instead makes a life in Great Britain, where Ailsa Lorne awaits.

This extraordinary combination of cracksman-detective-Balkan prince solves cases that are often improbable but always ingenious. When Narkom asks Cleek to investigate a riddle, the reader can be certain that it is no ordinary problem. In Cleek's world, corpses are constantly found in locked rooms with no way for the murderer to have entered or exited, or so it seems until Cleek presents an extraordinary explanation. Only Cleek can discover how a man turned a somersault and disappeared into thin air. Only Cleek can solve the riddle of the corpse with nine fingers. Only Cleek can determine how valuable papers vanished from a locked room that was sheathed with steel plates. Cleek alone knows, almost at a glance, how an Asian idol can dispense death to anyone who dares stay overnight with it.

Many of Cleek's cases have solutions that are as imaginative and bizarre as the seeming impossibility with which they begin. Almost any object in a Cleek case can hide poison: a soda siphon, a boomerang, a notebook, an alcohol lamp, and even the wings of a moth. Murderers are as much masters of disguise as Cleek himself, though they lack his "weird birthgift." One criminal, who happens to be a midget, disguises himself as a baby; another works a locked-room trick by making witnesses believe that he is a piece of statuary. Cleek resolves riddles by showing how a murderer can descend through a skylight on a balloon and how jewels can impossibly disappear by being secreted in the pouch of a kangaroo.

Even though few writers would have dared imitate Hanshew's cheerfully improbable solutions, John Dickson Carr, Ellery Queen, and others read the Cleek saga during their formative years and learned much from Hanshew's ingenious plots. Carr wrote to Queen that "if you told me a new Cleek story had been discovered, I would rather read that story than any discovery except a new story about Father Brown." Like Hanshew, Carr and Queen often began their cases with a seemingly inexplicable situation and then explained everything through a brilliant detective. Hanshew is seldom read anymore, and his sleuths seem unalterably part of another era, but The Man of the Forty Faces was one of the most important influences on the Golden Age detective story of the 1920's and the 1930's.

Douglas G. Greene

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

HAMILTON CLEEK SERIES: The Man of the Forty Faces, 1910 (also known as Cleek, the Master Detective; revised as Cleek, the Man of the Forty Faces, 1913); Cleek of Scotland Yard, 1914; The Riddle of the Night, 1915 (with Mary E. Hanshew and Hazel Phillips Hanshew); Cleek's Greatest Riddles, 1916

(with M. Hanshew and H. Phillips Hanshew; also known as Cleek's Government Cases); The Riddle of the Purple Emperor, 1918 (with M. Hanshew and H. Phillips Hanshew); The Mystery of the Frozen Flames, 1920 (with M. Hanshew and H. Phillips Hanshew; also known as The Riddle of the Frozen Flames); The Riddle of the Mysterious Light, 1921 (with M. Hanshew and H. Phillips Hanshew); The House of Discord, 1922 (with M. Hanshew and H. Phillips Hanshew; also known as The Riddle of the Spinning Wheel); The Amber Junk, 1924 (with M. Hanshew and H. Phillips Hanshew; also known as The Riddle of the Amber Junk); The House of the Seven Keys, 1925 (with M. Hanshew and H. Phillips Hanshew)

NONSERIES NOVELS: Beautiful but Dangerous: Or, The Heir of Shadowdene, 1891; The World's Finger: An Improbable Story, 1901 (also known as The Hoxton Mystery); The Mallison Mystery, 1903; The Great Ruby, 1905; The Shadow of a Dead Man, 1906; Fate and the Man, 1910

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Young Mrs. Charnleigh, 1883; Leonie: Or, The Sweet Street Singer of New York, 1884; A Wedded Widow: Or, The Love That Lived, 1887; Arrol's Engagement, 1903 (as Kingsley)

PLAYS: Oath Bound: Or, Faithful unto Death, pb. c. 1870; The Forty-Niners: Or, The Pioneer's Daugh- ter, pb. 1879; Will o' the Wisp: Or, The Shot in the Dark, pb. 1884

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cox, J. Randolph. "Cleek and His Forty Faces: Or, T. W. Hanshew, a Dime Novelist Who Made Good." Dime Novel Round-Up 42 (March/April, 1973): 30-34, 41-43. Brief biography of Hanshew emphasizing the popularity and success of his most famous character.

Greene, Douglas G. "The Incredible Hamilton Cleek: Or, Sherlock Holmes from Graustark." The Poisoned Pen 5 (November/December, 1982): 11-14. Compares Cleek to Conan Doyle's famous master sleuth.

Haining, Peter. The Classic Era of American Pulp Magazines. Chicago: Chicago Review Press, 2000. Looks at the relationship of pulp fiction to its more respectable literary cousins, as well as its function within American culture. Provides perspective on Hanshew's work.

Sampson, Robert. Glory Figures. Vol 1. in Yesterday's Faces: A Study of Series Characters in the Early Pulp Magazines. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1983. The first of six volumes focused on pulp fiction's most interesting and influential characters. Sheds light on Hanshew's novels.

CYRIL HARE

Alfred Alexander Gordon Clark

Born: Mickleham, Surrey, England; September 4, 1900

Died: Dorking, Surrey, England; August 25, 1958

Types of plot: Police procedural; amateur sleuth

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Inspector Mallett, 1937-1958

Francis Pettigrew, 1942-1958

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

INSPECTOR MALLET of Scotland Yard, who appears in six of Hare's nine books, is mentioned in a seventh, and features in a small number of short stories, is a large man with a prodigious memory, the ability to appear as if from nowhere, and a great fondness for food.

FRANCIS PETTIGREW, who appears in five books

(three of them with Mallett), is a middle-aged, moderately successful lawyer who barely makes a living and is drawn reluctantly into amateur investigation. Pettigrew gradually supplants Mallett, though Mallett—by now retired—reappears (with Pettigrew) in Hare's last book.

CONTRIBUTION

The best of Cyril Hare's work in the detective genre is marked by closely observed characterization and a constant striving for verisimilitude. His characters are more fully rounded and more varied than many of those in the purely puzzle-based detective stories produced by the majority of his immediate British precursors; in particular, he offers accurate, vivid, and well-characterized portrayals of certain social groups. He is notable for his use of conversation, which is lively, contributes to plot and characterization rather than merely padding out an episode, and reproduces the vocabulary and manner of speech of different social classes; for the fine quality of his writing; for his often subtle humor; and, notwithstanding his concentration on characterization and authentic atmosphere, for the novelty of his puzzles, their careful and convincing construction, and their genuine surprise endings. Without directing the genre along any fresh and innovative paths, Hare enriched the body of well-written and enduring detective fiction that emerged in Great Britain during the period from just before to just after World War II.

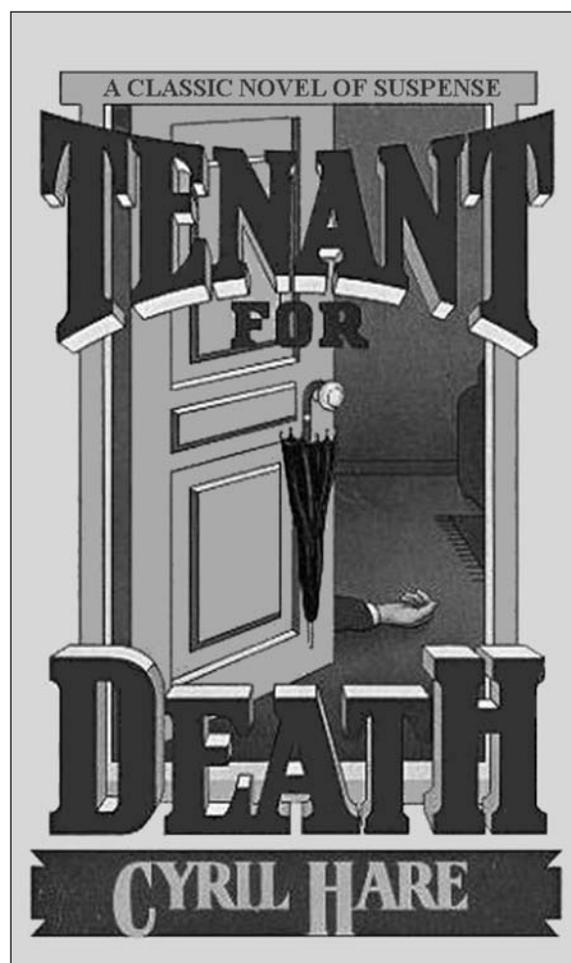

BIOGRAPHY

Cyril Hare, born as Alfred Alexander Gordon Clark, was educated at a British public school, where he claimed to have been starved of food and crammed full of learning. Thence he went to New College, Oxford, where he gained first-class honors in history. He was always destined for the law, however, and he was called to the bar in 1924 and practiced, mostly in the criminal courts, as a member of the chambers of Roland Oliver, one of the most prestigious firms of London lawyers.

In 1933, he married Mary Barbara Lawrence, and the couple had one son and two daughters. For some time, he had contributed lightweight, humorous material to Punch and other magazines; a few years after his marriage, he began writing detective fiction under the pseudonym Cyril Hare, derived from his home address (Cyril Mansions) and his practice address (Hare Court). He continued to do so for the rest of his life, often making use of material drawn from his own experience both within and outside the legal profession. At the start of World War II, he undertook a tour as a judge's marshal, from which came Tragedy at Law (1942). Later, after a brief spell in the ministry of economic warfare (which helped him to write With a Bare Bodkin, 1946), he spent nearly five years as a temporary official in the public prosecutions department.

He returned to private practice in 1945, and in 1950, he was appointed a county court judge in his native Surrey, where he was concerned with civil rather than criminal proceedings. He was a supporter of amateur music making (this is reflected in When the Wind Blows, 1947) and was always much in demand as a public speaker. In the last years of his life, his other commitments limited his time for writing fiction, and his last works declined in quality.

ANALYSIS

Cyril Hare's first two novels are solid, workmanlike detective stories. Well plotted and convincingly structured, they are typical of British detective fiction in the late 1930's but are not remarkable for any innovations.

TENANT FOR DEATH

The first, the rather ordinary Tenant for Death (1937), introduces Hare's first series detective, the burly Scotland Yard man Inspector Mallett. Mallett has a lively intelligence, but he is no supersleuth and sometimes admits to being baffled. Yet unlike some of his near contemporaries, such as Anthony Berkeley's Roger Sheringham and Nicholas Blake's Nigel Strangeways, he does not confidently assert mistaken conclusions only to have them subsequently disproved. Hare took some pains over the characterization of his detective, and in Tenant for Death and his next two novels, Death Is No Sportsman (1938) and Suicide Excepted (1939), there are numerous references to Mallett's enormous appetite, his extensive knowledge of food, his excellent memory, and his ability to appear suddenly and unexpectedly before someone.

DEATH IS NO SPORTSMAN

It was Death Is No Sportsman that, despite its conventional format (including the murder of a thoroughly unpopular man; a larger-than-usual role for the official detective; and a limited group of suspects, the least likely of whom turns out to be the criminal), first showed Hare's talent for creating a microcosm of society (in this case, a weekend fishing club) with accuracy, loving care, and gentle mockery of the characters' human weaknesses and idiosyncrasies. There is also an ending that surprises, inasmuch as both detective and reader are cunningly persuaded to be skeptical of all evidence save the false. On the other hand, once the falseness of the evidence in question is perceived, only one person can possibly be guilty: Indeed, because the evidence rests on the unsupported word of one person (the murderer, in fact), the alert reader may well penetrate the mystery before Hare intended. That may constitute a structural weakness, one found in much of Hare's later work, which, if it should be anticipated by his regular readers, may dilute some of their enjoyment.

Although in this respect the influence of the ingenious but dull Freeman Wills Crofts is perceptible, there is more to Hare's novels than the mere construction and demolition of a seemingly unbreakable alibi. Although Suicide Excepted and Tragedy at Law are notable for their inclusion of perhaps the most unlikely murderers in Hare's work—though not necessarily the best surprise endings—they also constitute two of the five major novels that he produced in the period between 1939 and 1951.

TRAGEDY AT LAW

Many of Hare's stories feature some technicality of civil or criminal law that would not be immediately obvious to the layman. In Suicide Excepted, a clause in an insurance policy causes three amateur detectives to seek to overturn the verdict of a coroner's jury, though the underlying reason still comes as a surprise. Tragedy at Law involves a little-known legal technicality relating to the timing of civil proceedings. What is most striking about the five principal novels, however, is the feeling of tremendous human warmth they generate, their constant demonstration of Hare's ability to provide deft, well-observed, authentic, and affectionate portraits, laced with inoffensive humor, of particular professional and social milieus—a bereaved family coping with the gathered relatives and the legal complexities arising from the dead man's estate, a county court judge and his entourage on circuit, government officials conducting their business, a local musical society with its triumphs and petty musical jealousies, and a dying peer's house party and his butler's struggles to keep up standards despite the restrictions imposed by an unsympathetic, egalitarian postwar society.

In many of these novels, Hare drew on his personal experience—of the wartime civil service, amateur music associations in his home county, and the law and its workings. In an article published shortly after his death, he told of an incident involving the head of the chambers in which, as a young man, he had first practiced law. On learning that Hare was convinced that a prisoner he was defending had been wrongly accused, his principal remarked skeptically, "On the whole, it is sometimes not a bad thing for a young man to believe in his client's innocence." Readers of Tragedy at Law will recognize that as a remark made by "a sarcastic senior" to Pettigrew when Pettigrew was a young man. One can only wonder how many other similar comments and situations found their way into his writing, which also shows the precision of expression and accuracy of effect that one might well expect of a lawyer pleading his case or a judge summing up the evidence.

In Tragedy at Law, Mallett deduces the solution to a curious series of mysterious events, but he cannot explain the underlying motive or prevent a murder that occurs very late in the story. It is another character, Francis Pettigrew, who provides the final piece of information and precipitates the denouement. After the introduction of Pettigrew, whom Hare obviously regarded with some affection, Mallett's role gradually diminished, and Hare came to prefer writing about the activities of his modest, barely successful, benevolent lawyer. The best of the Pettigrew novels is the third, When the Wind Blows.

WHEN THE WIND BLOWS

When the Wind Blows depends on an esoteric fact about matrimonial law; it also includes some of Hare's delightful cultural cross-references—in this case, the reader will be helped toward the solution of the mystery by familiarity with Charles Dickens's David Copperfield (1849-1850) and especially by knowledge of a peculiarity of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's Prague Symphony (though it must be conceded that the peculiarity is fairly well known among the musically literate and that the reader's realization of it and its inevitable consequence too early in the narrative is enough to destroy the puzzle).

Pettigrew, whose earlier disappointment in love is chronicled as part of the background to Tragedy at Law, is now happily married to a woman much younger than himself; her fortune enables him to worry less about his own financial position, to be happy despite his relative lack of professional success, and to concentrate instead on living a pleasant life. As ever, he is a reluctant participant in events; just as he is pressed into participating in the musical life of the local community, so he finds himself drawn into investigating a murder the solution of which is of no interest to him whatever. It is in this novel, incidentally, that Mallett is only briefly mentioned and does not appear: The official investigation is carried out by the carefully portrayed and initially unsympathetic Inspector Trimble, a character who in fact comes to life even more convincingly than the nearly ubiquitous and ultimately caricatural Mallett. Hare's delightful sense of humor may be seen here in the portrait of the gruff orchestral conductor Clayton Evans; the almost hilarious misadventures of Judge William Barber in Tragedy at Law provide another example.

AN ENGLISH MURDER

Tragedy at Law was Hare's own favorite novel, an opinion that is shared by many of his readers; nevertheless, his masterpiece is perhaps the single novel in which he included neither Pettigrew nor Mallett, An English Murder (1951). It is Christmas. The dying Lord Warbeck has convened one last festive gathering of family and friends. These consist of his son, Robert, a dislikable neofascist; his cousin, Sir Julius, chancellor of the exchequer in the postwar socialist government; Mrs. Carstairs, the ambitious wife of the man who stands next in succession to the chancellorship; and Lady Camilla Prendergast, whose matrimonial hopes once extended to Robert and who is making one last attempt to discover his intentions toward her. To these are added Dr. Wenceslaus Bottwink, a historian of Middle-European, Jewish extraction, who has suffered greatly at the hands of prewar fascist regimes; Briggs, the butler, and his daughter Susan; and Sir Julius's bodyguard, Detective Sergeant Rogers.

The title, An English Murder, is justified in a number of ways. The setting, traditional in British detective fiction, is a country house conveniently cut off by snow. The Englishness is explicitly underlined, however, by Dr. Bottwink, whose amused observation emphasizes the illogicality and unlikelihood of the relationships between social classes, the speech patterns, and the quaint customs stocially maintained even when murder occurs. Moreover, Bottwink's gentle amusement is evidently shared by Hare himself. By the time the unpleasant Robert is poisoned, all but one of the guests, as well as Briggs and Susan, have a substantial motive. Consequently, this is probably the only detective story of quality in which the butler cannot be ruled out as a serious and genuine suspect: By this device, Hare pokes gentle fun at the British joke about detective fiction—"the butler did it."

Hare often provides the reader with a clue to the mystery by means of a reference to a book. In An English Murder, the clue is Lord Rosebery's Pitt, a biography of British Prime Minister William Pitt the Younger; once again, when the technicality on which the plot turns is appreciated, there can be only one criminal, though Dr. Bottwink experiences a shudder of apprehension when, for a time, it appears that his diagnosis must be wrong. It is not to reveal too much to say that the final justification for the title is that the motive could have existed, as the pedantic but sympathetic Bottwink himself remarks, nowhere but in England, or, more properly, Great Britain. A decade and a half later, the peculiarity of the British constitution that, according to Bottwink, had needed correction since at least 1789, would at last be amended; however gentle its thesis, An English Murder is one of the more eloquent and pleasurable fictional protests to appear in the postwar period.

Lord Warbeck's ancestral home is in the imaginary region of southern England used in most of Hare's work. An impression of unity of place is thus afforded to the whole body of his novels, though in An English Murder the supporting references—to the fictional county of Markshire and the flooding of the fictional River Didder, for example—are fewer. Initially, the atmosphere is more conspicuously one of political dispute. The characters are well drawn, from the obnoxious Robert with his juvenile expressions of hatred for Jews and socialists to the respectful Briggs; from the urbane but ailing Lord Warbeck to the boring Mrs. Carstairs; from the polite and well-bred Lady Camilla to the pert Susan; from the consummate politician Sir Julius to the self-effacing Bottwink, constantly claiming that his knowledge of England is imperfect but just as constantly showing remarkable powers of insight into his companions' behavior. There are well-judged episodes indicative of social stratification, such as the worried Briggs's dilemmas over the proper company (guests or staff?) in which Bottwink and Rogers should take their meals, and there is at least a hint that the worst sin that a guest can possibly commit is to take a tray of tea upstairs to another guest, thus usurping one of the rightful duties of the butler. At the behest of Sir Julius, Rogers investigates the crime; the stolid bodyguard is forced to admit defeat, however, and he would simply have handed his dossier over to the local police when the thaw came had not Dr. Bottwink, supplementing his powers of observation with his knowledge of history and the British constitution, presented him with the solution.

HE SHOULD HAVE DIED HEREAFTER

The technique and relative lack of inspiration of his last two novels show Hare's declining powers. He Should Have Died Hereafter (1958) echoes his genius in, for example, the deft portrayal of a country hunting fraternity and a deeply mistrustful village community. Despite the usual reliance on a technicality (a little-known area of the law of succession), despite the references to other books and the flashes of dry humor, despite even the presence of Pettigrew and his young and sympathetic wife, however, this relatively obvious—and, in the end, explicit—reworking of Arthur Conan Doyle's short story "The Adventure of Silver Blaze" is unfortunately a rather predictable, ill-structured, and disappointing swan song.

William S. Brooks

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

INSPECTOR MALLETT SERIES: Tenant for Death, 1937; Death Is No Sportsman, 1938; Suicide Excepted, 1939

FRANCIS PETTIGREW SERIES: When the Wind Blows, 1947 (also known as The Wind Blows Death); That Yew Tree's Shade, 1954 (also known as Death Walks the Woods)

NONSERIES NOVELS: Tragedy at Law, 1942; With a Bare Bodkin, 1946; An English Murder, 1951 (also known as The Christmas Murder); He Should Have Died Hereafter, 1958 (also known as Untimely Death)

OTHER SHORT FICTION: Best Detective Stories of Cyril Hare, 1959 (also known as Death Among Friends, and Other Detective Stories)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

PLAY: The House of Warbeck, 1955

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: The Magic Bottle, 1946

EDITED TEXTS: Roscoe's Criminal Evidence, 1952 (by Henry Roscoe; with Alan Garfitt); Leith Hill Musical Festival, 1905-1955: A Record of Fifty Years of Music-Making in Surrey, 1955

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Barzun, Jacques, and Wendell Hertig Taylor. "Preface to When the Wind Blows." In A Book of Prefaces to Fifty Classics of Crime Fiction, 1900-1950. New York: Garland, 1976. Preface by two preeminent scholars of mystery and detective fiction, arguing for the novel's place in the annals of the genre.

Bennett, Reynold. "Cyril Hare: The Male Agatha Christie." The Poisoned Pen 5 (May/June, 1983):

23-25. Compares Hare to Christie both in terms of the tone and quality of their work and in terms of their relation to British World War II-era culture.

Gilbert, Michael. Introduction to Best Detective Stories of Cyril Hare. London: Faber, 1959. Fellow mystery author Gilbert selected and edited the Hare stories collected in this anthology. His introduction provides insight into Hare's writing.

Horsley, Lee. Twentieth-Century Crime Fiction. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005. Comprehensive overview of the development of crime fiction in the twentieth century helps contextualize the nature and importance of Hare's distinctive contributions.

Shibuk, Charles. "Cyril Hare." The Armchair Detective 3 (October, 1969): 28-30. Brief profile and overview of Hare's career, geared toward the intellectually curious fan of the genre.

THOMAS HARRIS

Born: Jackson, Tennessee; 1940

Types of plot: Master sleuth; police procedural; psychological; horror; inverted

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Hannibal Lecter, 1981-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

HANNIBAL LECTER, a brilliant psychiatrist and cannibalistic serial killer, plays a minor but key role in the first two books of the series and dominates the third and fourth. Lecter combines elements of Sherlock Holmes and Holmes's nemesis Dr. Moriarty. In the beginning of the series, Lecter, who is imprisoned, advises Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) instructor Will Graham and then FBI trainee Clarice Starling on their cases; he also secretly advises another killer to exterminate Graham's whole family and provides the murderer with the necessary information. Lecter's brilliance and remorseless intensity are directed against many adversaries with whom the readers cannot sympathize, reducing revulsion at Lecter's actions. Lecter is cultured, dryly humorous, and without conscience.

JACK CRAWFORD, an FBI official, connects the books and represents the law-and-order perspective that guides them. He is a mentor to the protagonists; he regrets putting them in danger, physical or psychological, but is realistic and even manipulative. In The Silence of the Lambs (1988), he is section chief of the behavioral science unit; his exact title is unclear in Red Dragon (1981).

CONTRIBUTION

Thomas Harris excels in three areas: psychological insight into his characters, details of crime and crime detection (including suspect profiling), and a style that is accessible yet finely crafted and impressive in its thematic and original imagery. Because of this combination, his books are not only exceedingly popular but also more widely respected than many in the detective and mystery genres.

Serial killers appeared in fiction before Harris's novels, but as David Sexton notes, before Red Dragon, "none had been so closely modeled about what was known" about real serial killers. Harris studied the work of Robert Ressler, who originated criminal profiling, and John Douglas; both worked in the FBI's behavioral science unit, which Harris visited as early as 1978. The portrait of the FBI and profiling in Harris's books is so positive that many critics believe Harris even affected popular ideas concerning real serial killers, the menace they present, and the best methods for apprehending them.

Certainly, many crime novels concerning serial killers would not have been written, or at least not have taken the shape they have, without Harris's novels. In addition, the film of The Silence of the Lambs (1991) transformed serial-killer films, providing new realism and depth of characterization instead of the nearly supernatural villains and endless interchangeable victims of the slasher films. Ironically, Harris's most famous creation, Hannibal Lecter, is not a realistic serial killer but a popular-culture icon who has been compared to Dracula and Mr. Hyde.

BIOGRAPHY

Little has been published about Thomas Harris's life, which he carefully keeps private. Even the month and day of his birth do not appear in any published accounts. However, he is no hermit. Those who know him—including his mother, with whom he is close—say that Harris is a southern gentleman, a good friend, and a gourmet cook.

Born to William Harris and Polly Harris, Thomas Harris is an only child, raised primarily in Rich, Mississippi, near his birthplace, Jackson, Tennessee. As an adolescent, Harris was bookish and probably unhappy; he read constantly. After attending Clarksdale High School and Cleveland High School, Harris left Mississippi for Baylor College in Waco, Texas.

While earning his bachelor's degree in English from 1961 to 1964, Harris began writing professionally. He covered crime stories for the Waco Herald-Tribune and was eventually hired as a full-time reporter. One assignment took him to Mexico to investigate a child-prostitution ring. He also began having pieces published in the magazines True and Argosy. No sources have tracked down those pieces or even established whether they were short stories or true-crime reports. Given the histories of the magazines, the latter is likelier. At Baylor, Harris married a fellow student, Harriet; they had one daughter, Anne, and were divorced by 1964. After graduation, Harris traveled in Europe. He moved to New York City in 1968 to work for Associated Press as a reporter, covering crime, and then editor.

In 1973 Harris and coworkers Sam Maull and Dick Riley conceived the novel that would become Black Sunday (1975), inspired by acts of terrorism committed in 1972 at the Lod Airport in Tel Aviv by the Japanese Red Army, supported by the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, and at the Munich Olympics by the Black September Organization. All three researched and began writing; the advance was split three ways. However, Harris made financial arrangements with his cowriters and continued the project alone. The novel received mixed reviews but became a best seller. A film of the novel, directed by John Frankenheimer and featuring Bruce Dern as a terrorist, appeared in 1977. Encouraged by the book's reception, Harris left the Associated Press in 1974 to write novels full time.

When Harris's father was dying in the mid-1980's, Harris returned to Mississippi for eighteen months. He connects Red Dragon, dedicated to his father, to that time. When Putnam published the novel in 1981, Harris lived in Italy. This novel was filmed in 1986 as Manhunter, directed by Michael Mann and featuring William Petersen, later of the television show CSI (began in 2000), as Will Graham. The film was financially unsuccessful but garnered a loyal following for Harris.

Harris works slowly and carefully. His third novel, The Silence of the Lambs, sold well and garnered positive reviews from major periodicals; in 1989 it won the Anthony Award (from the World Mystery Convention), World Fantasy Award (World Fantasy Convention), and Stoker Award (Horror Writers' Association of America) for the year's best novel. The film adaptation fully established the reputation of an already popular writer: Released by Orion Pictures in 1991, it earned $272.7 million and saved the company from bankruptcy. Also, it was only the third film to win five major Academy Awards: best director (Jonathan Demme), best actress (Jodie Foster), best actor (Anthony Hopkins), best adapted screenplay (Ted Tally), and best picture.

Harris reportedly did not want to write another book featuring Hannibal Lecter, but Delacorte published Hannibal in 1999. Despite mixed-to-negative reviews, it became a best seller and was nominated as best novel for the 2000 Bram Stoker Awards. In 2001 the film, directed by Ridley Scott and starring Anthony Hopkins, earned $351.7 million worldwide and set a record for opening receipts for an R-rated film. Harris allowed the screenplay to change the book's ending; still, many critics found the result too gruesome and morally upsetting, and Jodie Foster declined the role of Clarice Starling, which went to Julianne Moore. Brett Ratner directed a new film based on Red Dragon, released in 2002 under that name, featuring Anthony Hopkins as Hannibal Lecter.

In 2004, Harris signed a contract with Bantam to write two books for an eight-figure sum. The first, Hannibal Rising, was released in December, 2006, when production had already begun on the 2007 film, directed by Peter Webber and starring Gaspard Ulliel as young Hannibal.

ANALYSIS

Thomas Harris's first three novels—Black Sunday, Red Dragon, and The Silence of the Lambs—share many characteristics with each other and with standard thrillers or crime novels; however, Hannibal and Hannibal Rising, although they still contain some traditional elements of the genre, are shaped by having a charming sociopathic cannibal as the protagonist. Harris's second and third books have strong elements of police procedurals, featuring fingerprinting (including off a corpse's eyeball), an autopsy, and serotyping.

In the first three novels, the protagonist is a government agent, motivated by human concern and duty to ferociously uphold the law, although the agent is still an outsider. Black Sunday features Major David Kabakov of Mossad, the Israeli secret service, who tracks the Palestinian terrorists to the United States, where he alienates American law enforcers because of not only his insightfulness but also his ruthlessness. Red

Dragon features Will Graham, a peacefully retired FBI agent called back into reluctant temporary service to stop a serial killer. The Silence of the Lambs features Clarice Starling, a student at the FBI Academy who becomes central to stopping another serial killer. Graham and Kabakov embrace their ability to stop murder but grapple painfully with the costs to themselves and others. Starling is a woman in a man's world, angry but not yet melancholy as Graham and Kabakov are—perhaps one reason the book was more successful.

However, while the perspectives and values of law enforcement agencies are firmly upheld in these novels, the criminal antagonists are drawn convincingly and with sympathy. All their crimes are portrayed as the result of their having been hurt, though also of how they have chosen to react to those hurts. Black Sunday really has two antagonists: Michael Lander, an American veteran and prisoner of war during the Vietnam War, and Dahlia Iyad, part Mata Hari and part an early example of Harris's strong female characters. Francis Dolarhyde in Red Dragon compels both compassion and revulsion, as he struggles with his last chance to love a living woman instead of having sex only with the dead. Jame Gumb in The Silence of the Lambs is pitiful but less well developed. This is partly because, as the novel says, he is defined by "a sort of total lack that he wants to fill" and treats others like things. It is also because Hannibal Lecter overshadows him.

In the first two Lecter novels, Harris portrays Lecter as an unsympathetic character and discourages readers' empathy. In response to Starling's questions, Lecter himself says, "Nothing happened to me, Officer Starling. I happened. You can't reduce me to a set of influences. . . . You've got everybody in moral dignity pants—nothing is ever anybody's fault." In Hannibal, this changes. Hannibal shows Starling cut free from the FBI after a scandal and the death of Jack Crawford. Soon, she no longer provides the legal perspective that condemns Lecter as a monster. Moreover, Lecter is surrounded by worse monsters, including Mason Verger, a rich sexual deviant who literally drinks the tears of children in his martini. The major law officer, Police Commissioner Rinaldo Pazzi, of Florence, Italy, decides to take Verger's bribe and deliver Lecter to the rich man for his private vengeance but is killed by Lecter. In a complete reversal for Harris, this police officer compels both compassion for his situation and revulsion at his choices.

Moreover, in Hannibal and Hannibal Rising, Harris reveals why Hannibal Lecter became a serial killer: The privileged son of Eastern European nobility, the young Lecter endured the horrors of World War II's Eastern Front, including the cannibalization of his younger sister Mischa by opportunistic soldiers. Hannibal Rising actually contradicts earlier descriptions of Lecter's childhood: For example, Red Dragon mentions his childhood cruelty to animals, while in Hannibal Rising this is absent, and he is almost saccharinely sweet to his old horse.

Interestingly, although Hannibal Rising follows the general approach of the first novel in the series and gives Lecter unlikable characters to kill, it also reintroduces the legal perspective of the earlier books. Inspector Pascal Popil is willing to work with young Lecter, partly out of love for his literally fabulous stepmother Lady Murasaki and partly because the war has left him with a less stable sense of morality, but he sees Lecter as Crawford, Graham, and Starling do, as a monster.

BLACK SUNDAY

When Black Sunday was published in 1974, many found the idea of a major terrorist attack on United States soil too unbelievable. Even David Sexton's The Strange World of Thomas Harris (2001) says the novel is "of its time and no more" and not truly frightening. However, after September 11, 2001, the novel's premise became more plausible and chilling. In Black Sunday, an insane American joins with terrorists to explode the Aldrich blimp, which films the Super Bowl, to kill everyone present, including the United States president. The novel also shows American ambivalence about the Vietnam War and fears about the mental state of the returning veterans.

RED DRAGON

Red Dragon portrays Harris's best criminal, Frances Dolarhyde, a man who thinks of himself as deformed (despite corrective surgery) and finds families to kill by the home movies they send to be processed at the lab where he works. The novel introduces Harris's theme of metamorphosis, as Dolarhyde wants the killings to bring about his Becoming, a transmutation into the superhuman Red Dragon, named for the watercolor by William Blake, The Great Red Dragon and the Woman Clothed in the Sun. When Dolarhyde meets and begins to love a strong, independent blind woman, Reba McClane, he has to struggle with his alter ego not to kill her.

THE SILENCE OF THE LAMBS

While the details of FBI procedure are sketchy in Red Dragon, they are copious and realistic in The Silence of the Lambs, from scenes at the FBI Academy in Quantico, Virginia, to depictions of the agency's work with local police departments. Though Harris is accused of painting too positive a picture of the FBI, he does depict the bureau's sexism and rigid yet politically opportunistic hierarchy. Serial killer Jame Gumb, who kills obese women to make a suit of their skins, is partially based on Ed Gein, an actual murderer in Wisconsin. Gumb's character has raised complaints from activists representing transgendered people, though the book establishes that Gumb is not a true transgendered person. Still, Gumb's wishes, and his raising of death's head hawkmoths, continue Harris's theme of transformation. Moreover, Gumb's plan and the efforts of protagonist Clarice Starling to fit into the male-oriented FBI develop themes of gender in the book.

HANNIBAL AND HANNIBAL RISING

Many readers have found Hannibal and Hannibal Rising disappointing, though these books have enthusiastic fans. Some of those fans see the end of Hannibal, in which Clarice Starling and Hannibal Lecter live together as lovers, as a tale in which Beauty tames the Beast. However, the Beast has already fed Beauty the brains of a member of the Department of Justice, which, partly still influenced by Lecter's drugs and hypnotism, Starling enjoyed. In many ways, Hannibal undermines all the values supported in The Silence of the Lambs: the FBI, law, and mercy rather than murder. The book also is highly elitist, inviting readers to identify with Lecter's wealth and taste and withhold their condemnation as he kills and eats "free-range rude." Hannibal Rising is equally elitist, especially concerning Lecter's life in Paris. More successfully, it shows the growth of Lecter's macabre interests through medicine as well as murder.

Bernadette Lynn Bosky

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

HANNIBAL LECTER SERIES: Red Dragon, 1981; The Silence of the Lambs, 1988; Hannibal, 1999; Hannibal Rising, 2006

NONSERIES NOVELS: Black Sunday, 1975

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Achenbach, Joel. "Hannibal Author Thomas Harris, Toasting the Pleasures of the Flesh but Unwilling to Press It." The Washington Post, June 32, 1999, p. C01. This short piece is representative of failed attempts to interview Harris.
- Anderson, Patrick. The Triumph of the Thriller: How Cops, Crooks, and Cannibals Captured Popular Fiction. New York: Random House, 2007. Contains a chapter on Harris that looks at his life, including his Baptist upbringing, and his creation of Dr. Lecter.
- Caputi, Jane. "American Psychos: The Serial Killer in Contemporary Fiction." Journal of American Culture 16, no. 4 (Winter, 1993): 101. Examines how serial killers were depicted in works in the 1980's, particularly in Red Dragon and in The Silence of the Lambs.
- Fuller, Stephen M. "Deposing an American Cultural Totem: Clarice Starling and Postmodern Heroism in Thomas Harris's Red Dragon, The Silence of the Lambs, and Hannibal." Journal of Popular Culture 38, no. 5 (August, 2005): 819-833. Discusses the sense of betrayal and the outrage that readers felt over the ending of Hannibal and the transformation of Starling.

- Jenkins, Phillip. Using Murder: The Social Construction of Serial Homicide. New York: Aldine De Gruyter, 1994. A book concerning actual serial murder, it persuasively argues that Harris's novels, especially Silence of the Lambs, have done as much to create a fear of serial killers and the feeling that local police cannot handle them as true-crime writing has.
- Magistrale, Tony. "Transmogrified Gothic: The Novels of Thomas Harris." In A Dark Night's Dreaming: Contemporary American Horror Fiction, edited by Tony Magistrale and Michael Morrison. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1996. This basic literary study of the novels provides good analysis of themes such as metamorphosis and comments on gender issues.
- Sexton, David. The Strange World of Thomas Harris. London: Short Books, 2001. Probably a quick job, this collates all known information about Harris (not much) but spends too much time simply retelling or quoting the novels. Good analysis of characters and themes in the novels and their relation to Harris's life.

CAROLYN HART

Born: Oklahoma City, Oklahoma; August 25, 1936

Types of plot: Amateur sleuth; cozy

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Death on Demand, 1987-

Henrie O, 1993-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

ANNIE LAURANCE DARLING is the owner of Death on Demand, a mystery bookstore on the South Carolina island of Broward's Rock. She investigates whatever mysteries come her way. During the early part of the series, she marries Max Darling.

MAX DARLING is a wealthy young man with a penchant for amateur detective work. He has created Confidential Commissions, which investigates problems brought to it.

LAUREL DARLING is Max's attractive, eccentric mother, who interferes with a New Age flair, sometimes to the benefit of the investigation and sometimes otherwise.

HENNY BRAWLEY is Annie's best customer and good friend, an elderly woman who takes action in investigations and sometimes gets herself into trouble.

HENRIETTA O'DWYER "HENRIE O" COLLINS is a widowed, retired journalist who investigates present and past deaths, including the long-ago death of her husband.

CONTRIBUTION

The novels in both of Carolyn Hart's series fall in the cozy genre. Hart uses the methods of Golden Age mystery writers such as Agatha Christie, Ngaio Marsh, and Margery Allingham to provide quickly sketched but interesting characters and a variety of viable suspects. Plots are fairly straightforward, and there is an element of romance, especially in the earlier Death on Demand novels that include the courtship and marriage of two amateur sleuths.

The Death on Demand mysteries are unusual for their self-referentiality. Set in Annie Laurance Darling's mystery bookstore, they constantly evoke parallels with the books sold there. Many of them begin and end with the interesting device of a contest, in which five paintings represent five murder mysteries and the first to guess the references of the paintings wins the prize. This framing device contributes to the "cozy" atmosphere of these novels in that the reader guesses along with the characters in the novel, and the identities are revealed only after the "real" murderer is discovered.

The Henrie O novels tend to be a little more serious but still reader-friendly and direct. They present an older woman, Henrietta O'Dwyer "Henrie O" Collins, as the astute detective, as Christie's Miss Marple novels did, and they assign to her a competence and confidence reassuring to older readers. Hart has said her intent in writing the Henrie O novels is to create a positive image of older women that encourages people to value them and treat them with respect.

Hart received an Anthony Award in 1990 for Honeymoon with Murder (1988); Agatha Awards in 1988 for Something Wicked (1988), in 1993 for Dead Man's Island (1993), and in 2003 for Letter from Home; and Macavity Awards in 1990 for A Little Class on Murder (1989) and in 1993 for "Henrie O's Holiday." She also was given a lifetime achievement award from the Oklahoma Center for the Book.

BIOGRAPHY

Carolyn Hart was born Carolyn Gimpel on August 25, 1936, in Oklahoma City. She received her bachelor's degree from the University of Oklahoma in 1956, the same year that she married Philip Donnell Hart. The couple would later have two children. Growing up in Oklahoma in wartime convinced Hart of the immense importance of newspapers and spurred her ambition to be a journalist. She was a reporter for the Norman Transcript and an editor of another journal before she became a freelance writer in 1961. She taught at the University of Oklahoma School of Journalism and Mass Communications from 1982 to 1985. Although she ultimately became a mystery writer, her enthusiasm for journalism has not waned, and this interest led to her award-winning novel Letter from Home (2003), which, she said, was her book about home and about journalism as well.

Hart has been active in crime writers' associations;

Carolyn Hart. (Library of Congress)

she was president of Sisters in Crime and national director of Mystery Writers of America, and she belongs to many similar organizations. Hart has written more than thirty mysteries and has received Agatha, Anthony, and Macavity awards.

ANALYSIS

Carolyn Hart unfailingly provides cozy, reader-friendly mysteries that project underlying values with wide appeal. The stories imply that most people are basically good and desire community, that love is the power behind positive action, and that evil flourishes in the absence of love. This perspective may seem simplistic, but the strong characterization and detailed setting Hart provides give life to the novels. Many current female mystery writers present a wounded heroine who is trying to come to terms with her own trauma while helping others. Annie Darling is whole; Henrie O has been wounded, but her grief is in the past and has made her more compassionate.

The presence of the gothic, sometimes hovering in the margins, sometimes organic to Hart's novels, implies that there are some things that cannot, and should not, be explained. Her works have a southern feel to them, containing the sense of fatality and inescapability that surfaces in southern thought and a reliance on women's intuition. Her work, like much writing with a gothic slant, has an implied metaphysical or spiritual dimension, in which supernatural events may suggest a perspective beyond that of humans. Although her novels would certainly not be called religious, their sense of poetic justice contributes to the suggestion of spirituality.

Readers find Hart's novels are addictive for a number of reasons: the sensitive and generous main characters, the sense of escape they get on visiting Broward's Island or Hart's other settings, the multiple allusions to other detective novels, and the direct and indirect comments on the genre. Some readers may find the references to other mysteries and the genre annoying, but Hart's fans delight in it, and it helps differentiate her work.

One of Hart's strengths is that she leaves herself open for changes in direction; therefore, her novels are not predictable, except for the series conventions such as the mystery chat and the recurrent contests in the Death on Demand series. Hart is one of the heirs of the Agatha Christie tradition, but she possesses a flexible frame of vision. She has also written some nonseries novels, mystery and otherwise, and novels for children.

WHITE ELEPHANT DEAD

White Elephant Dead (1999) is a typical Death on Demand mystery, set like the others on Broward's Rock, a fictional sea island community off the South Carolina coast. Katherine Girard is murdered while apparently collecting donations for a White Elephant sale; however, it soon becomes clear that she was visiting the houses of the wealthy for blackmail purposes. Henny Brawley, bookstore owner Annie Darling's friend, was injured at the time of the murder, and the dull-witted but arrogant police chief suspects her of the murder. Annie and her husband, Max, follow a trail of puzzling clues to find the real killer. The plot involves revealing the secrets of those on Katherine's blackmail list to determine who had the strongest motivation to kill her.

White Elephant Dead has the appeal and the limitations of the typical cozy. The characters found in many of the Death on Demand novels are present, including Laurel, Annie's mother-in-law and New Age devotee; the self-centered murder mystery writer Emmy; and Henny Brawley, the ultimate mystery fan. The setting of the Death on Demand bookstore lends itself to many comparisons between the current action and events in well-known mystery novels; these comparisons are so numerous that occasional mystery readers less familiar with these works may find them confusing and distracting. However, the attractiveness, generosity, and friendliness of the main characters makes the novel an easy and pleasant read.

RESORT TO MURDER

Resort to Murder (2001), a Henrie O mystery, is set in Bermuda. Henrie O is invited to attend the wedding of her former son-in-law, Lloyd Drake, and Connor Bailey, a beautiful, flirtatious widow, in Bermuda. The resort, however, appears to be haunted: Strange lights appear from a tower from which the resort manager's husband fell to his death the previous year. Henrie O and most of the other members of the party think the haunting is a prank, but a murder soon illustrates how serious the situation is. Although Henrie O is recovering from pneumonia, she is able to follow the clues and unravel the mystery, though not before a second murder takes place.

Although the novel might be thought of as “murder lite,” it is enjoyable reading. Hart is particularly good at describing the natural beauty of the island, and the lush background adds to the romance of this novel. Hart also lets Henrie O act like the elderly, recently ill woman that she is; she does not behave like an athletic college student.

LETTER FROM HOME

In Letter from Home, a nonseries mystery novel, Gretchen “G. G.” Gilman, a well-known journalist, receives a letter from Barbara, a childhood friend living in the small Oklahoma town where Gretchen grew up. She heeds the plea to come back, and when she does, the past she had nearly forgotten explodes in her face, and she is forced to remember.

During World War II, thirteen-year-old Gretchen was able to get a reporting job with a newspaper, as many men were off at war. She covered local issues with an expertise beyond her years. Then Faye, the mother of her friend Barbara, was murdered, and rumors spread about Faye’s misbehavior. Barbara’s father, Clyde, was accused of the murder, and Gretchen determined to get at the truth. The resulting tragedy was one of the events that drove the young reporter away from her hometown. Now an elderly woman, Gretchen goes back home to learn the truth. The truth is painful, but Barbara wants her old friend Gretchen to find it.

This story is richly atmospheric in its evocation of small-town America in the 1940’s. The specifics of that life are portrayed precisely and lovingly. Hart’s nonseries novels tend to be detailed and even poetic, and this one is no exception.

DEATH OF THE PARTY

Death of the Party (2005), the sixteenth Death on Demand mystery, has an intriguing setting. The novel begins with the preoccupations of a number of friends and relatives of Jeremiah Addison, a media mogul who owned a private island and died from a fall during a party held on his estate, Golden Silk. His daughter-in-law knew at the time that it was murder but had her reasons for not sharing her knowledge with the police. Now, a year later, she wants justice—and wants Max Darling, who runs Confidential Commissions, to find out who killed Jeremiah. Max and his wife, Annie, go to the island, and they investigate any possible motives that the attendees could have had for killing the magnate, then follow the chain of evidence toward a conclusion. The murderer begins to take various steps in an attempt to remain undetected, and the suspense builds to a satisfying climax.

Hart likes to use islands as her settings; however, after so many books, Broward’s Rock has become so familiar to her readers that some of the atmosphere has been lost. Taking the action to a private island—and at one point marooning the party on it—in Death of the Party renews the feeling of island life.

Janet McCann

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

HENRIE O SERIES: Dead Man’s Island, 1993; Scandal in Fair Haven, 1994; Death in Lovers’ Lane, 1997; Death in Paradise, 1998; Death on the River Walk, 1999; Resort to Murder, 2001; Set Sail for Murder, 2007

DEATH ON DEMAND SERIES: Death on Demand, 1987; Design for Murder, 1988; Something Wicked, 1988; Honeymoon with Murder, 1988; A Little Class on Murder, 1989; Deadly Valentine, 1990; The Christie Caper, 1991; Southern Ghost, 1992; Mint Julep Murder, 1995; Yankee Doodle Dead, 1998; White Elephant Dead, 1999; Sugarplum Dead, 2000; April Fool Dead, 2002; Engaged to Die, 2003; Murder Walks the Plank, 2004; Death of the Party, 2005; Dead Days of Summer, 2006

NONSERIES NOVELS: Flee from the Past, 1975; A Settling of Accounts, 1976; Escape from Paris, 1982; The Rich Die Young, 1983; Death by Surprise, 1983; Castle Rock, 1983; Skulduggery, 1984; The Devereux Legacy, 1986; Brave Hearts, 1987; Letter from Home, 2003

SHORT FICTION: Crime on Her Mind, 1999

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

CHILDREN’S LITERATURE: The Secret of the Cellars, 1964; Dangerous Summer, 1968; No Easy

Answers, 1970; Rendezvous in Veracruz, 1972; Danger, High Explosives!, 1972

NONFICTION: The Sooner Story, 1890-1980, 1980 (with Charles F. Long)

EDITED TEXTS: Love & Death, 2001; Malice Domestic Four: An Anthology of Original Traditional Mystery Stories, 1995; Crimes of the Heart, 1995

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hart, Carolyn. Carolyn Hart. <http://www.carolynhart.com>. The author's Web site contains a brief biography and information on all her books as well as links to reviews.

_____. "Southern Pleasures." Mystery Readers International 18, no. 4 (Winter, 2003). The author discusses her choice to set the Death on Demand series in the South.

James, Dean. "Carolyn G. Hart." Mystery Scene 43 (1994). Useful discussion of Hart's earlier novels.

Lindsay, Elizabeth Blakesley, ed. Great Women Mystery Writers. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2007. Contains a brief essay on Hart that looks at her works and life.

McDonnell, Brandy. "Busy Author Extols Virtues of Book Fest." Knight Ridder Tribune Business News, May 18, 2007, p. 1. Profile written in conjunction with Hart's leading a workshop for aspiring writers notes her support of these events and her career, which includes plans for a new series set in the fictional Oklahoma town of Adelaide.

Nichols, Max. "Mystery Writer Succeeds After Early Struggles." Journal Record, May 20, 2002, p. 1. Nichols looks at Hart's career, which stalled after she published two mysteries and then took off after her publication of Death and Demand. Describes her early life, her relationship with her husband, and her writing habits.

Wall, Judith. "Hart of the Mystery." Sooner Magazine (Winter, 2007). The University of Oklahoma magazines profiles Hart, one of its graduates. The reviewer notes Hart's struggles, which paid off with a series of award-winning books.

SIMON HARVESTER

Henry St. John Clair Rumbold-Gibbs

Born: Salisbury, Wiltshire, England; June 28, 1910

Died: Place unknown; April, 1975

Also wrote as Henry Gibbs; John Saxon

Type of plot: Espionage

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Roger Fleming, 1942-1951

Malcolm Kenton, 1955-1957

Dorian Silk, 1956-1976

Heron Murmur, 1960-1962

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

DORIAN SILK is a British spy with an unlimited knowledge of languages and local customs of the exotic corners of the world to which he is sent. Sardonic, a hater of cities and bureaucracy, Silk is deeply motivated by the Protestant work ethic but often has trouble completing his missions because so many of the women who are involved in international espionage find him irresistibly attractive and refuse to leave him alone.

CONTRIBUTION

Simon Harvester's espionage novels have been praised for their authenticity and for their ability to offer readers both an adventure and an education. Based on his travels in Third World countries and on his considerable insight into world politics, Harvester's novels are characterized by an underlying anticommunist philosophy. Dorian Silk, introduced in Dragon Road (1956) and featured in thirteen "Road" novels, represents Harvester at his best. The Dorian Silk novels have been called "the truest portrait of a secret service agent."

BIOGRAPHY

Simon Harvester was born Henry St. John Clair Rumbold-Gibbs on June 28, 1910, in Salisbury, Wiltshire, England. Following graduation from Marlborough College, Wiltshire, Harvester studied painting in London, Paris, and Venice. He was married three times and had one son, from his first marriage.

Harvester's career included work as an industrial reporter, film critic, publisher's reader, foreign and war correspondent, chicken farmer, and political analyst. He also served in the Royal Corps of Signals and the Royal Intelligence Corps of the British Army. By the close of World War II, Harvester had visited nearly every Third World country, using his knowledge of many languages (English, French, German, Afrikaans, Arabic, Hindustani, and various dialects) to gather background information for his novels. In 1950, he received the Anisfield-Wolf Award (for improving racial understanding) for Twilight in South Africa (1950). Harvester died in April, 1975.

ANALYSIS

Simon Harvester began his writing career during World War II, after being given a medical discharge from the British army. His first espionage novel, Let Them Prey (1942), was followed by some forty more, with his last work, Siberian Road, being published in 1976, the year following his death. These novels, in particular those published following World War II, are based for the most part on Harvester's own travels and the conclusions he drew as a result of those travels. Often fictionalizations of actual events in international politics, Harvester's novels have been praised for their authenticity and for the education they offer.

Yet the educational value of Harvester's novels is limited, largely because most of the information they contain is dated. In addition, the account of most of the events described in the novels is colored by Harvester's unswerving anticommunist philosophy, a philosophy to which he gave full voice in his nonfictional works, which were published under the name Henry Gibbs. In his nonfiction, Harvester analyzed the political situation in Africa and other emerging nations, giving close attention to Russian influence in these areas. Most of these works, like his award-winning study of South Africa, warn of Russian intrigues.

Harvester's concern over the spread of communism in the Third World is clearly reflected in his fiction, particularly in his efforts to make his novels as true to life as possible. The authenticity of the novels' settings, the topicality of their themes, their frequent reference to the myopia of free world governments, and their sometimes tiresome monologues about the Russian threat to democracy suggest that Harvester intended his fiction to be taken seriously. As a result, Harvester's espionage novels may be read simply as exciting adventures in international espionage or they may be studied as examples of post-World War II anti-communist literature.

Harvester's commitment to realism is also reflected in the care that he took to make his agents as authentic as possible. In creating his spies, Harvester appears to have been inspired by the writings of serious students of espionage, such as Allen Dulles, from whose book The Craft of Intelligence (1963) Harvester quotes in an epigraph in Assassins Road (1965):

There is in the intelligence officer . . . a certain "front-line" mentality, a "first-line-of-defence" mentality. His awareness is sharpened because in his daily work he is almost continually confronted with evidence of the enemy in action. If the sense of adventure plays some role here, as it surely does, it is adventure with a large measure of concern for the public safety.

Harvester's greatest spy, Dorian Silk, is this kind of intelligence officer. Featured in thirteen "Road" novels, Silk is a professional agent's agent. Far from being a James Bond kind of spy, he is convincingly human, neither a soldier of fortune nor a devil-may-care freelancer. If adventure is involved in a Silk story—and it almost always is—there is also, underlying whatever is happening and never far from Silk's mind, "a large measure of concern for the public safety."

The authenticity so evident in Harvester's settings and his characterization of men is strangely absent in the women featured in his stories. Whether this was a concession to what he believed readers of espionage novels wanted or reflective of his own bias, Harvester was apparently unable to escape from a rather jaded, lurid portrayal of the female protagonists in his novels.

Throughout the novels, Harvester's male protagonists are hindered in their fight against the heinous designs of communism by beautiful women whose only goal in life is to sacrifice their bodies to some spy.

MOSCOW ROAD

In Moscow Road (1970), for example, Dorian Silk's important mission to Moscow is sidetracked by an unexpected encounter with Russian agent Irena Gerina. Silk had last seen Irena in Yemen four years before—just after he had killed her husband—and her last words had been a promise to hunt him down and shoot him like a dog. Beautiful in her wrath but even more beautiful now, Irena surprises Silk by informing him that during the intervening four years she has been waiting, not to shoot him, but to let him know that she is his. Calling herself an archetypal primitive woman, Irena Gerina compares herself to the women in Greek tragedies, women who fall in love with the soldiers who kill their husbands and ravish them in the process. Forgoing any resort to euphemisms, Irena simply murmurs, "I want to go to bed with you."

ASSASSINS ROAD

Although Harvester's female characters never seem to stray from this weary stereotype, their language is not always as blunt as Irena Gerina's. In Assassins Road, for example, Harvester achieves an almost Song of Songs quality in Nofret Gohar's appeal to Silk:

"Man, must I die of thirst for the wine of thy love to relieve me?" she murmured huskily. "Must thou torment me? O man, since we parted my body has been a desert burnt by merciless heat awaiting thy presence to give it freshness and meaning. Thou hast obsessed my senses. Thy vigour and strength torment me. I think of thee every minute. I crave to be the instrument under thy hands. Must thou deny us the solace of our passion? I await thee. Must time mock our failure to fill these hours? Thy need is my delight. O lion, thou would find me thy true mate."

Aside from his portrayal of women, Harvester's novels are wholly realistic. His descriptions of cities, villages, and local topography demonstrate a careful attention to detail. Perhaps reflecting his early training as a portrait painter, Harvester's descriptions provide authentic physical and geographic details while evoking subtly the mood of the place described. In Assassins Road, for example, Harvester begins his story with an excellent thumbnail sketch of Jerusalem that also sets the mood for what follows. The opening sentence, "This is a city," when read along with the description, recalls Moby Dick's famous "Call me Ishmael." Also in Assassins Road, Harvester writes,

Some people say you can guess something or know it or imagine it but you cannot "sense" it. That is wrong here. You sense the essential difference of these men. . . . What differentiates these men from others is their eyes. You sense that they believe they live on the verge of some gigantic manifestation of divine intervention. Among the young and middle aged the eyes are hot and brooding; among the old they are contemplative and brooding. You sense that they believe themselves animated by realities unfelt by men elsewhere, as if each one regarded himself as a part of legend.

This attention to detail and the ability to work this detail into authentic descriptions serve Harvester well as he establishes a mood for his stories. Once the story becomes more involved, however, Harvester is not at all selective about the details. His novels suffer as a result, as is evident in the following passage from Zion Road (1968):

According to a cheap pock-marked alarm-clock wedged amid a litter of filthy chipped crockery, each item of which had either a coagulated brown tidemark or a bile-coloured puddle covered by greyish scum, surrounded by makeshift ashtrays overflowing like multiplying bacteria that spread like contagion over an ancient kitchen table, it was nearly quarter to eight when they were taken into the small ground-floor room occupied by Kabak and a man who sat fidgeting at a radio.

The two similes contained in this sample ("overflowing like multiplying bacteria" and "spread like contagion") are also characteristic of the style of Harvester, who was seldom satisfied with a description that did not contain the word "like":

A second pistol hit him on the left side of the head. . . . tinsel streamers whizzed around like comets and plunged into his head. Something hit his head again. . . . The tinsel glowed like molten silver. . . . He tried to stiffen his knees. . . . Instead they seemed to burst like little paper bags full of water. Something hit his face or his face hit it. Out of a black void a roar like a giant wind rushed into him.

In spite of this tendency to overwrite, Harvester involves the reader in the excitement of his stories. The intensity of his feeling about the threat of communism and the effort he put into giving his stories authenticity make them eminently readable—although the reader who attempts several of Harvester's novels in succession will find that scenes and conversations begin to sound familiar. This is not surprising, given the fact that Harvester produced an average of more than two books each year from 1942 until 1975. Even so, the reader who takes Harvester in limited doses, who can skim through some overblown prose and wink at his characterization of women, will find that, among the writers of espionage fiction, Harvester stands out as one of the genre's master storytellers.

Chandice M. Johnson, Jr.

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

ROGER FLEMING SERIES: Let Them Prey, 1942; Epitaphs for Lemmings, 1943; Maybe a Trumpet, 1945; A Breastplate for Aaron, 1949; Sheep May Safely Graze, 1950; Obols for Charon, 1951; The Vessel May Carry Explosives, 1951

MALCOLM KENTON SERIES: The Bamboo Screen, 1955; The Paradise Men, 1956; The Copper Butterfly, 1957; The Golden Fear, 1957

DORIAN SILK SERIES: Dragon Road, 1956; Unsung Road, 1960; Red Road, 1963; Silk Road, 1963; Assassins Road, 1965; Treacherous Road, 1966; Battle Road, 1967; Zion Road, 1968; Nameless Road, 1969; Moscow Road, 1970; Sahara Road, 1972; Forgotten Road, 1974; Siberian Road, 1976

HERON MURMUR SERIES: The Chinese Hammer, 1960; Troika, 1962 (also known as The Flying Horse)

NONSERIES NOVELS (AS GIBBS): A Lantern for Diogenes, 1946; Whatsoever Things Are True, 1947; The Sequins Lost Their Lustre, 1948; Good Men and True, 1949; Witch Hunt, 1951; Cat's Cradle, 1952; Traitor's Gate, 1952; Arrival in Suspicion, 1953; Lucifer at Sunset, 1953; Spiders' Web, 1953; Delay in

Danger, 1954; Tiger in the North, 1955; The Yesterday Walkers, 1958; An Hour Before Zero, 1959; The Moonstone Jungle, 1961; Flight in Darkness, 1964; Shadows in a Hidden Land, 1966; A Corner of the Playground, 1973

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS (AS GIBBS): At a Farthing's Rate, 1943; From All Blindness, 1944; Not to the Swift, 1944; Blue Days and Fair, 1946; Know Then Thyself, 1947; Man About Town, 1948 (with Cyril Campion); Pawns in Ice, 1948; Ten-Thirty Sharp, 1949; Withered Garland, 1950; Taps, Colonel Roberts, 1951; Cream and Cider, 1952; Disputed Barricade, 1952; The Six-Mile Face, 1952; Cape of Shadows, 1954; The Splendour and the Dust, 1955; The Winds of Time, 1956; Thunder at Dawn, 1957; The Tumult and the Shouting, 1958; The Bamboo Prison, 1961; The Crimson Gate, 1963; The Mortal Fire, 1963

NONFICTION (AS GIBBS): Affectionately Yours, Fanny: Fanny Kemble and the Theatre, 1947; Theatre Tapestry, 1949; Twilight in South Africa, 1950; Crescent in Shadow, 1952; Italy on Borrowed Time, 1953; Africa on a Tightrope, 1954; Background to Bitterness: The Story of South Africa, 1652-1954, 1954; The Masks of Spain, 1955; The Hills of India, 1961

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Britton, Wesley. Beyond Bond: Spies in Fiction and Film. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 2005. Traces the evolution of the figure of the spy in espionage thrillers and other works of film and fiction. Provides perspective for Harvester's works.

Hepburn, Allan. Intrigue: Espionage and Culture. New Haven, Conn.: Yale University Press, 2005. This study of British and American spy fiction begins with three general chapters on the appeal, emotional effects, and narrative codes of the genre, thus helping readers understand Harvester's novels.

Hitz, Frederick P. The Great Game: The Myth and Reality of Espionage. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004. Hitz, the former inspector general of the Central Intelligence Agency, compares fictional spies to actual intelligence agents with the intent of demonstrating that truth is stranger than fiction. Although Harvester is not directly discussed, the work helps place his fiction within the genre.

McCormick, Donald, and Katy Fletcher. Spy Fiction: A Connoisseur's Guide. New York: Facts on File, 1990. Includes an entry on Harvester, comparing him to his contemporaries, precursors, and followers.

Smith, Myron J., Jr., and Terry White. Cloak and Dagger Fiction: An Annotated Guide to Spy Thrillers. 3d ed. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1995. Detailed annotated bibliography of spy fiction comments on Harvester's works and career.

JOHN HARVEY

Born: London, England; December 21, 1938

Also wrote as Jon Barton; William S. Brady; L. J. Coburn; J. B. Dancer (joint pseudonym with Angus Wells); Jon Hart; Jon B. Harvey; William M. James; Terry Lennox; John J. McLaglen; James Mann (joint pseudonym with Laurence James); Thom Ryder; J. D. Sandon; Michael Syson

Types of plot: Police procedural; private investigator; hard-boiled; thriller

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Scott Mitchell, 1976-
Charlie Resnick, 1989-
Frank Elder, 2004-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

SCOTT MITCHELL is England's toughest—and best—private eye. At core, he is kindhearted, but he usually does not have the opportunity to show his softer side as he becomes swept up in a series of ultraviolent cases.

CHARLIE RESNICK is a detective inspector with the Nottingham Criminal Investigative Division in the East Midlands of England. A large, bulky, rumpled man of Polish heritage in his forties, he has been a police officer since the mid-1970's. An avid jazz fan, he lives in a large house with four cats named after musicians (Dizzy, Miles, Pepper, and Bud). A compassionate man, Resnick broods over past cases, particularly those in which someone died. Formerly married to an unfaithful wife, Elaine, he has relationships with several women before taking up with high school teacher Hannah Campbell.

HANNAH CAMPBELL, an attractive high school English teacher in her mid-thirties, has blond hair with red highlights. She began an affair with Resnick during the course of an investigation involving one of her students. Their relationship is a loving one, though not always smooth because several of her past relationships have colored her attitude toward men. In addition, she is not a cat lover.

FRANK ELDER, in his early fifties, has been a police officer since he was twenty. He worked his way up the ladder from uniformed officer in Leeds and Huddersfield to detective in Lincolnshire, and eventually to detective inspector in West London and in the Nottinghamshire Major Crime Unit. Discouraged by law enforcement's failure to make inroads against rampant crime, he retired on a pension. Elder, however, continues to investigate cases informally, sometimes acting as a consultant to the police. Separated from his wife, Joanne, because of her infidelity, he has a teenage daughter, Katherine, called Kate.

CONTRIBUTION

A prolific writer since the mid-1970's, John Harvey has written—in his own name and under a number of pseudonyms—in a wide variety of subgenres, including motorcycle adventure stories, Westerns, war stories, private eye novels, police procedurals, amateur sleuth novels, and thrillers. In addition to novels, he has written poetry, short stories, books for juveniles, and novelizations of films and television shows. He also has written for television and radio. Probably the best known of Harvey's many creations is Charlie Resnick, the competent, unambitious detective inspector who is the central character in a series of well-regarded police procedurals and a number of short stories.

Harvey has received considerable commercial and critical success during his lengthy career. His first Resnick series novel, Lonely Hearts (1989), was short-listed for the Gold Dagger Award by the Crime Writers' Association (CWA) and was named one of the one hundred most notable crime novels of the twentieth century by the Times of London, and his adaptation of the novel for television earned a bronze medal for best screenplay at the 1992 New York Festival. Often nominated for other CWA awards, Harvey has won the Sherlock Award for the best British detective novel for Last Rites (1998), the Sony Radio Drama Silver Award for his adaptation of Graham Greene's The End of the Affair (1999), and the Grand Prix du Roman Noir for Cold Light (1994). Harvey's first entry in a crime series featuring retired detective Frank Elder, Flesh and Blood (2004), won the CWA's Silver Dagger Award for fiction and the American Barry Award as best British crime novel of the year. In 2007, Harvey won the Prix du Polar Européen for Ash and Bone (2005). The same year he was honored with the CWA's Cartier Diamond Dagger Award for sustained excellence in crime writing.

BIOGRAPHY

John Barton Harvey was born December 21, 1938, in London and spent much of his childhood in Nottingham. He attended Goldsmith's College at the University of London, where he earned a teaching certificate in 1963. He married and fathered twins Tom and Leanne, before he was divorced in the mid-1970's. Between 1963 and 1974, Harvey taught English and drama at a succession of secondary schools in London, Derbyshire, Andover, Hampshire, and Hertfordshire. From 1970 to 1974 he also studied at Hatfield Polytechnic, earning a bachelor's degree in English.

From the early 1970's onward, Harvey contributed short stories to various periodicals and in 1975 wrote his first novels—Avenging Angel and Angel Alone—a pair of violent motorcycle epics under the pseudonym

Thom Ryder. This work apparently unlocked the floodgates of his creativity, and over the next decade Harvey poured out a veritable torrent of novels, mostly under a variety of pseudonyms, including dozens of Westerns in numerous series, such as the Hawk, Peacemaker, and Gringos series. Under his own name, Harvey also produced a hard-boiled private eye series featuring Scott Mitchell (beginning with Amphetamines and Pearls, 1976), wrote novelizations of films and television shows, and turned out books for juveniles (such as What About It, Sharon? 1979), television scripts, and occasional poetry chapbooks (Providence, 1978).

For more than twenty years (1977-1999), Harvey was editor and publisher of Nottingham's Slow Dancer Press, supporting the work of underpublished writers, and he edited Slow Dancer magazine from 1977 to 1993. In the meantime, he returned to education, earning a master's degree with a specialty in American studies in 1979 at the University of Nottingham, where he served as part-time instructor in film and literature from 1979 to 1986.

Since 1989, when Lonely Hearts, the first in his acclaimed Charlie Resnick series of police procedurals was published, Harvey has achieved considerable recognition under his own name as a writer of fiction. He is also renowned as a film and book reviewer for the Nottingham News, Trader, and Time Out; as a poet (with such volumes as Ghosts of a Chance and Territory, both 1992); as a teacher-tutor with the Arvon Foundation and with the Squaw Valley Community of Writers' Fiction Workshop (1995); and as a television and radio scriptwriter. His award-winning Frank Elder crime novels (Flesh and Blood, Ash and Bone, and Darkness and Light, 2006) have stirred interest among a new generation of readers for his earlier work.

Harvey became a father again in 1998, with the birth of a daughter, Molly Ernestine Bolling, to his partner Sarah. After living in London and in Cornwall—where his Frank Elder novels are set—Harvey and his family moved back to Nottingham in 2004.

ANALYSIS

John Harvey learned the writing craft well while writing dozens of novels, primarily Westerns, between the mid-1970's and mid-1980's. His acquired skills have been particularly evident since 1989, when he published Lonely Hearts, the initial entry in the Charlie Resnick series of police procedurals. It is to Harvey's credit that he makes it seem easy to bring together various elements of storytelling—characterization, dialogue, setting, voice, plotting, and pacing—to create a coherent whole. He produces novels whose overall effect is synergistic: works that result in much greater effect than the sum of their parts. Harvey's unflinchingly hard-boiled, naturalistic Resnick novels are not so much read as they are experienced; they are masterful examples of what Samuel Coleridge meant when he wrote of the writers' goal to create a "willing suspension of disbelief." Harvey accomplishes this effect through stylistically simple, straightforward, reportorial writing that does not clamor for attention.

Resnick and the other characters who stalk the pages of Harvey's novels are first and foremost authentic and believable. Each of the players has unique qualities: small quirks, flaws, habits, interests, prejudices, and beliefs that bring them to life as individuals. They speak as real people do—in non sequiturs, with profanity, in darkly humorous asides and insults, in lies and half-truths designed to save face or hide exposure—stuttering and fumbling in their attempts to express the inexpressible. Charlie Resnick in particular is a brilliant creation, a police officer who feels sympathy and compassion for both those who abide by the law and those who break it, because he knows that life is hard and filled with temptations to which anyone can succumb and that existence does not consist merely of black-and-white absolutes but rather a succession of grays.

Told in third person from various viewpoints, central of which is Resnick's, the plots are almost mundane because they deal with ordinary—though frequently horrific—crimes. These are often the result of dysfunctional families in which abused children grow up to become abusers. Other interrelated themes concern the huge gap between the haves and the have-nots, or the animosity among natives and aliens in British society. Whatever their root causes, conflicts suddenly and inevitably spin out of control with violent consequences for perpetrator and victim alike. Resnick's modern, technologically advanced world is one of isolation, despair, uncertainty, and confusion, which the author has keenly observed and deftly drawn.

The language of Harvey's novels is deceptively simple, with few similes, metaphors, or other literary devices cluttering a narrative propelled by a common, everyday vocabulary. Dialogue, reproducing the speech patterns and regional inflections of different classes of citizens, carries the heaviest burden, advancing plot, shading character, and establishing atmosphere. Suspense comes through the presentation of a variety of disparate perspectives that slowly coalesce, as characters are placed in jeopardy, suspects are eliminated, motives come to light, and clues are revealed. Harvey's Resnick novels, which routinely receive stellar reviews, have been called, with good reason, a series that transcends genre.

EASY MEAT

The eighth novel in the Resnick series, Easy Meat (1996), centers on the activities of the Snape family, a group of dysfunctional people. Matriarch Norma Snape is the slovenly mother of three children—Nicky, Sheena, and Shane—over whom she has little control. Sixteen-year-old Sheena hangs out with a pack of wild, violent, drugged-out girls, and it will be only a matter of time until she gets into serious trouble. Shane, eighteen, is a lazy lout who spends most of his days watching television or palling around with a bunch of racists who delight in mischief, particularly in beating up Irishmen and homosexuals. Fifteen-year-old Nicky specializes in burglary—during the course of a break-in, he beats an elderly couple senseless, a crime that draws the attention of detective inspector Charlie Resnick and his crew. Charlie is attracted to Hannah Campbell, one of Nicky's teachers, and they become lovers.

Forensic evidence uncovered by those under Resnick's command leads to the capture of Nicky, and the juvenile is placed in detention while awaiting trial, where he promptly dies by hanging, apparently a suicide. Bill Alston, a police officer nearing retirement, is assigned to lead the investigation into Nicky's death and shortly afterward is beaten to death while walking his dogs.

A fascinating study of urban violence, with the underlying theme of the debate regarding nature-versus-nurture theories of human behavior, Easy Meat presents a complex plot revolving around mindless prejudice, while providing glimpses at British police procedures and office politics that hamper investigations. Characters are exceedingly well drawn and speak in natural, slangy, profane voices that make them come alive. The lean, atmospheric narration, in which not a word is wasted, evokes a unique setting. Harvey nonjudgmentally explores the tangled relationships among the assorted cast in the course of demonstrating that there is a fine line between good and the evil in society.

IN A TRUE LIGHT

In the nonseries novel In a True Light (2001), minor artist Sloane is sixty years old and just released from a British prison following a two-year sentence for forging paintings at the instigation of London gallery owner Robert Parsons. Picking up the pieces of his life, Sloane returns to the studio he set up before his incarceration, where he finds a letter from a long-ago lover, Jane Graham, a well-known abstract painter living in Italy. She has leukemia and wants to see Sloane before she dies. Sloane travels to Italy, where Jane informs him that their liaison in New York City in the late 1950's resulted in the birth of a daughter, Connie. On her deathbed, Jane extracts a promise from Sloane that he will attempt to find Connie, now in her early forties and residing somewhere in New York.

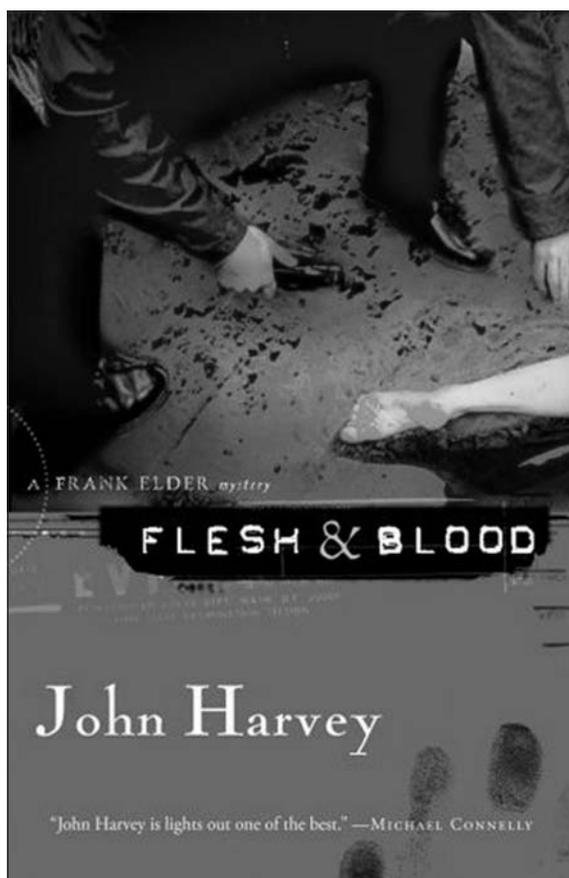

Sloane travels to the United States and, playing detective, follows Connie's trail. He manages to track her down and discovers that his daughter, long dependent on drugs and alcohol, has become a lounge singer. She is in the clutches of her manager-lover, Vincent Delaney, a money launderer with ties to the mob. Delaney has a history of violence toward women and is under surreptitious observation by New York detectives Catherine Vargas and John Cherry as a suspect in the murder of nightclub singer Diane Stewart. It is up to Sloane, working in reluctant concert with the police, to rescue Connie and put an end to Delaney's vicious ways.

A study of various characters in conflict with one another and with themselves, In a True Light contains the hallmarks of Harvey's other crime fiction. Characters are believable, dialogue rings true, and settings—which range from London to rural Italy and from Phoenix, Arizona, to New York City—are economically described. Though a crime story, the novel is not quite as dark or as introspective as Harvey's series work. As in much of the author's fiction, a musical thread runs through the narration, reflecting Harvey's longstanding interest in jazz.

FLESH AND BLOOD

The first in a trilogy, Flesh and Blood features retired detective inspector Frank Elder, a tall, thin man in his fifties who lives by himself in a cottage in Cornwall, where he is haunted by dreams of former cases. He becomes involved on a freelance-consultant basis in the long-ago disappearance of Susan Blacklock, occasioned by the release from prison of Shane Donald, after serving thirteen years. Donald, who in league with the still-incarcerated Alan McKeirnan, raped, tortured, and killed a teenage girl, may have been involved with several other girls who vanished. A suspenseful, semiprofessional procedural tale offering all the innate qualities of the author's earlier series, Flesh and Blood includes a Charlie Resnick cameo.

Jack Ewing

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

SCOTT MITCHELL SERIES: Amphetamines and Pearls, 1976; The Geranium Kiss, 1976; Junkyard Angel, 1977; Neon Madman, 1977

CHARLIE RESNICK SERIES: Lonely Hearts, 1989; Rough Treatment, 1990; Cutting Edge, 1991; Off Minor, 1992; Wasted Years, 1993; Cold Light, 1994; Living Proof, 1995; Easy Meat, 1996; Still Waters, 1997; Last Rites, 1998; Now's the Time: The Complete Resnick Short Stories, 1999

FRANK ELDER SERIES: Flesh and Blood, 2004; Ash and Bone, 2005; Darkness and Light, 2006

NONSERIES NOVELS: Frame, 1979; Blind, 1981; Endgame, 1982 (as Mann); Dancer Draws a Wild Card, 1985 (as Lennox); In a True Light, 2001; Gone to Ground, 2007

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS (AS MCLAGLEN): River of Blood, 1976; Shadow of Vultures, 1977; Death in Gold, 1977; Cross-Draw, 1978; Vigilante! 1979; Sun Dance, 1980; Billy the Kid, 1980; Till Death . . ., 1980; Dying Ways, 1982; Hearts of Gold, 1982; Wild Blood, 1983

NOVELS (AS HART): Black Blood, 1977; High Slaughter, 1977; Triangle of Death, 1977; Guerilla Attack, 1977; Death Raid, 1978

NOVELS (AS JAMES): Blood Rising, 1979; Blood Brother, 1980; Death Dragon, 1981; Death Ride, 1983; The Hanging, 1983

NOVELS (AS SANDON): Cannons in the Rain, 1979; Border Affair, 1979; Mazatlan, 1980; Wheels of Thunder, 1981; Durango, 1982

NOVELS (AS BRADY): Blood Money, 1979; Killing Time, 1980; Blood Kin, 1980; Desperadoes, 1981; Whiplash, 1981; Dead Man's Hand, 1981; Sierra Gold, 1982; Death and Jack Shade, 1982; Border War, 1983; Killer! 1983; War Party, 1983

NOVELS (AS JOHN B. HARVEY): Cherokee Outlet, 1980; Blood Trail, 1980; Tago, 1980; The Silver Lie, 1980; Blood on the Border, 1981; Ride the Wide Country, 1981; Arkansas Breakout, 1982; John Wesley Hardin, 1982; California Bloodlines, 1983; The Skinning Place, 1983 (also known as The Fatal Frontier, 1997)

NOVELS: Avenging Angel, 1975 (as Ryder); Angel Alone, 1975 (as Ryder); Kill Hitler!, 1976 (as Barton); Forest of Death, 1977 (as Barton); Lightning Strikes, 1977 (as Barton); The Raiders, 1977 (as Coburn); Evil Breed, 1977 (as Dancer); Bloody Shiloh, 1978 (as Coburn); Judgment Day, 1978 (as Dancer); The Hanged Man, 1979 (as Dancer)

POETRY: Provence, 1978; The Old Postcard Trick, 1985; The Downeast Poems, 1989; Sometimes Other Than Now, 1989 (with Sue Dymoke); Ghosts of a Chance, 1992; Territory, 1992; Bluer than This, 1998

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: What About It, Sharon? 1979; Reel Love, 1982; Sundae Date, 1983; Whose Game Are You Playing? 1983; Footwork, 1984; Last Summer, First Love, 1986; Wild Love, 1986; Daylight Robbery!, 1987; Hot Property!, 1987; Kidnap!, 1987; Downeast to Danger, 1988; Runner!, 1988; Terror Trap!, 1988

EDITED TEXTS: Blue Lightning, 1998; Men from Boys, 2003

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Drew, Bernard A., Martin H. Greenburg, and Charles G. Waugh, eds. Western Series and Sequels: A Reference Guide. New York: Garland, 1986. This guide lists each of the Western series—published both in the United Kingdom and the United States—that Harvey wrote before beginning his popular Charlie Resnick detective series, giving interesting details about the characters who populated the books and naming other known authors who wrote for the series under pseudonyms.

Harvey, John. Mellotone: John Harvey—Charlie Resnick, Slow Dancer. <http://www.mellotone.co.uk>. The author's Web site contains sections detailing with his Resnick series and other fiction and his scripts and poetry, as well as biographic information including his long stint with Slow Dancer Press, late-breaking news, and Harvey's musical interests. Profusely illustrated with many photographs and excerpts from Harvey's work, the site also contains archived editions of a newsletter that gives updates on Harvey and his best-known character, Charlie Resnick.

Sadler, Geoff. Twentieth-Century Western Writers. Chicago: St. James Press, 1991. A fairly lengthy article under Harvey's name, listing the Western series for which he wrote, including biographic details, author comments, and brief critical remarks about his contributions to each series that provide insight into his later crime novels.

Stasio, Marilyn. "Crime." Review of Cutting Edge, by John Harvey. The New York Times Book Review, July 7, 1991, p. 19. A favorable review of Cutting Edge, in which the reviewer notes the detective hero's compassion and intelligence in seeking to understand why people do violence to their fellow humans and author Harvey's ability to create characters with a full range of psychological issues.

_____. "Crime." Review of Flesh and Blood, by John Harvey. The New York Times Book Review, July 25, 2004, p. 19. A favorable review of Flesh and Blood, in which the reviewer calls particular attention to the author's skill in bringing compassion and understanding toward ordinary people—including murderers.

JEREMIAH HEALY

Born: Teaneck, New Jersey; May 15, 1948

Also wrote as Terry Devane

Types of plot: Hard-boiled; private investigator

PRINCIPAL SERIES

John Francis Cuddy, 1984-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

JOHN FRANCIS CUDDY, a native of South Boston, graduated from Holy Cross College in Worcester, Massachusetts, and served with the Military Police in Vietnam in the late 1960's, mustering out with the rank of captain. After returning to Boston, he tried a year of law school, married Elizabeth Mary ("Beth") Devlin and went to work as a private investigator for the Empire Insurance Company, only to lose his wife to cancer and his job not long thereafter because of his personal code of ethics. Self-employed as an investigator, Cuddy tends to specialize in cases that fall into gray areas of the law. A fitness enthusiast, he is not above resorting to violence, yet frequently visits his wife's grave, bearing flowers, to confer with her about his ongoing cases.

CONTRIBUTION

During the 1970's, with the mystery novels of Robert B. Parker and William G. Tapply, Boston emerged as a fertile territory for the growth and development of detective fiction. Jeremiah Healy, who settled in Boston around that time after receiving a law degree from Harvard University, combined keen powers of observation and a strong sense of place to create novels that might be seen as the East Coast counterpart to the San Francisco-based mysteries of Stephen Greenleaf, featuring John Marshall "Marsh" Tanner. Like Tanner, Healy's John Cuddy is a hard-boiled loner and bears the emotional scars of the Vietnam War. Significantly, both Tanner and Cuddy managed to hold their own against such emerging feminine competition as Sue Grafton's Kinsey Millhone and Sara Paretsky's V. I. Warshawski. These four writers, along with a handful of others, may be seen as the 1980's generation in mystery and detective fiction, producing novels that are often grimly realistic while remaining idealistic and that contain a strong element of social observation and criticism.

To an even greater degree than Greenleaf, Healy excels at the creation of colorful, memorable secondary characters, from athletic trainers and journalists to prostitutes and gangsters. Rather early in the series, he provided Cuddy with a secondary love interest, Assistant District Attorney Nancy Meagher (pronounced “Mah-har”), who like Cuddy is a native of South Boston. As the series progresses, Meagher often acts as a foil for Cuddy, either questioning his judgment or causing him to avoid conflicts of interest between them.

BIOGRAPHY

Jeremiah Francis Healy III was born May 15, 1948, in the New York City suburb of Teaneck, New Jersey. After graduating from Rutgers, he attended law school at Harvard, receiving the Juris Doctor degree in 1973. He then served six years in the U.S. Army Reserve. Like his fictional character Cuddy, Healy rose to the rank of captain of the military police; unlike Cuddy, however, he was never sent overseas. After five years with a Boston law firm, Healy spent eighteen years as a professor at the New England School of Law in Boston, an institution founded to promote the legal education and training of women. Married in 1978 to Bonnie M. Tisler, he left teaching in 1995 to become a full-time writer, dividing his time among Boston, south Florida, and a lakeside house in Maine. Over the years, he has lectured extensively on the art and craft of mystery writing and has served on a number of professional organizations for mystery writers.

As the twentieth century drew to a close, Healy began to experiment with other fictional forms, initially with short stories featuring John Cuddy and a legal thriller, The Stalking of Sheilah Quinn (1998), followed by Turnabout (2001), a mystery narrated from the perpetrator’s point of view. In 2001, he launched a new series of legal thrillers under the gender-neutral pseudonym of Terry Devane, featuring the young attorney Mairead (pronounced “Muh-RAID”) O’Clare, her boss Sheldon Gold, and private investigator Pontifco Murizzi, a former police detective. Like the Cuddy mysteries, the O’Clare thrillers are set in Boston, with a strong sense of place; however, they are told from a variety of viewpoints, including that of an omniscient narrator. In 2004, Healy was successfully treated for prostate cancer, an experience recalled at some length in an essay posted on his Web site for the edification of potential future patients.

ANALYSIS

By his own account, Jeremiah Healy first became interested in crime fiction while in high school, but he did not attempt his first novel until he was well into his thirties, having practiced law for five years before becoming a law professor. By that time, he was extremely well versed in the mystery tradition and familiar as well with twists and turns in the law. From the start, his novels have been notable for their intertextuality, with frequent, often tongue-in-cheek allusions to the work of other mystery writers and shared thematic issues. Healy’s concern with troubled youth whose problems are frequently compounded by parental affluence recalls the later work of Ross Macdonald, as does his penchant for social criticism bordering on satire, with a focus on current events and sensitive political issues such as child pornography, spousal abuse, and assisted suicide.

John Cuddy’s career as a private investigator gets off to a running start in Blunt Darts (1984) when barely two months after his wife’s death, he refuses to sign off on an insurance claim that he knows to be fraudulent and is terminated by Empire Insurance after eight years of service including a recent promotion. After consulting a lawyer, Cuddy chooses unemployment compensation over filing a wrongful-termination lawsuit and strikes out on his own, having acquired a private investigator license as part of his job with Empire. Healy thus establishes the guidelines and framework for the entire Cuddy series: Cuddy is a man of strong convictions who does not suffer fools gladly. The dialogue is tart and crisp in the hard-boiled tradition of Raymond Chandler or Dashiehl Hammett. Cuddy is a man of few words, all of which hit their mark. As an investigator, he is persistent to the point of impertinence, frequently making enemies with whom he will later clash in some form of physical combat. Trained in several martial arts as well as conventional boxing, Cuddy frequently provokes potential bullies into attacking him to humiliate them with his superior force and skill, a tendency that does not sit well with his friend Nancy Meagher. Intensely loyal, Cuddy will vow to avenge a client or witness who has been killed in the course of his investigation, even when the case itself has apparently collapsed. As a rule, Cuddy’s cases end with violent confrontations, not infrequently featuring such bizarre weapons as crossbows and spearguns.

To counteract the effects of advancing age, Cuddy takes on a series of physical challenges that come to form an integral part of the plot in certain novels. At the start of Rescue (1995), for example, both he and Meagher take up scuba diving, their training described in such detail as to constitute a brief how-to manual. In Right to Die (1991), Cuddy, who is around the age of forty and beginning to feel it, trains to run the Boston Marathon for the first time, much to Meagher's disapproval. Cuddy's account of the training, conducted with the help of an acquaintance known only as Bo, a former coach who is now among Boston's homeless, competes for the reader's attention with the central plot of the novel. Bo, meanwhile, is only one of several dozen colorful, if enigmatic, characters who populate the Cuddy novels, adding mainstream dimensions to the traditional mystery genre.

From the start of the Cuddy series, Healy took great pains to showcase his adopted city, taking his readers on extended tours of Boston's nooks and crannies, including the notorious Big Dig highway project. As the series progresses, Cuddy's cases lead him increasingly afield in search of background or evidence, to locations described with great attention to detail, including the inhabitants. Healy's readers thus get detailed guided tours of such far-flung locales as the Maine woods, the Florida Keys, and Big Sky country. Cuddy's trips also allow Healy to make incisive observations about such phenomena as air travel and suburban development.

Like most fictional private detectives, Cuddy is frequently at odds with the local police, either at home or on the road. In Boston, he has managed a reasonable working relationship, perhaps even a grudging friendship, with Detective Lieutenant Robert Murphy, a physically imposing African American, who owes his post to a bigoted superior who thought he was promoting an Irishman. To be avoided is Murphy's female colleague, Bonnie Cross, a white woman whose demeanor more closely matches her last name than her first. Once out of Boston, Cuddy is very much on his own, frequently detained by the authorities and often suspected of the very crimes he is attempting to investigate.

In Blunt Darts, the supposed victim of an abduction turns out to be the perpetrator of the multiple murders eventually committed, and Cuddy becomes the most likely suspect in the eyes of the police. In Shallow Graves (1992) and Invasion of Privacy (1996), he finds himself working in uneasy concert with a mid-level mobster, Primo Zuppone, with whom he shares an interest in New Age music and progressive jazz.

An occasionally heavy drinker, Cuddy is notable among fictional detectives for his frequent and sometimes tearful visits to the grave of his wife, Beth, who died of a brain tumor at the age of thirty. At the start of the series, with his grief still fresh, Cuddy appears to be merely unburdening himself about the pressures of work, but as the series progresses, his visits take on the shape of real conversations, with feedback from Beth that may cause Cuddy to take a fresh look at the evidence at hand. Also memorable is Cuddy's evolving relationship with Nancy Meagher's cat Renfield, named for the Englishman in Bram Stoker's Dracula (1897) who devours small animals. At the start of Shallow Graves, Cuddy drops Renfield a foot or two onto the floor, provoking a severe reaction that makes Meagher suspect Cuddy of handling the cat too roughly. Over the days and weeks to come, it develops that the cat, by then nearly a year old, suffers from a congenital deformity requiring surgery to break and reset his hind legs.

As it happens, Meagher is away on business when Renfield is released from surgery, and it falls to Cuddy to pick him up and look after him until her return. Over the next several volumes, Cuddy frequently (and ruefully) recalls a veterinarian's comment that the cat has imprinted on him, that he has in fact become the cat's best friend, like it or not. In any case, Meagher's furry companion remains a fixture in the Cuddy series.

From the start, the Cuddy novels have seemingly dared the reader to solve the mystery at hand, with a multiplicity of misleading clues and with criminals' motives that may remain implausible to the reader even when fully explained by Cuddy in the final pages. Not infrequently, the perpetrator appears to be certifiably insane, defying all efforts on the part of Cuddy—or the reader—to follow a logical trail of deduction. For Healy, at least in the Cuddy series, the art of deduction is less important than is exposition and exploration of those social problems or issues that might, or might not, have caused a particular crime to take place, along with the simple pleasure of telling a good story.

SHALLOW GRAVES

In Shallow Graves, shortly after running the Boston Marathon, an event described in detail in Right to Die, Cuddy is hired by his former employer, Empire Insurance, to investigate a claim filed by a modeling agency in the mysterious death of Mau Tim Dani, a young Amerasian model. Having left Empire on less than the best of terms, he is reluctant to take the case, all the more so when he learns that the case was assigned to Detective Lieutenant Robert Holt, with whom he has tangled in the past. Holt, for his part, is not about to tell Cuddy that Mau Tim Dani was the granddaughter of mob boss Tommy the Temper Danucci, born to the Vietnamese wife of his son Joseph. Cuddy, however, takes on the case as a favor to Harry Mullen, a former subordinate subsequently promoted into his old job. Before long, Cuddy is caught in a squeeze play among the mob, the police, and the top management at Empire, forging an uneasy alliance with mob enforcer Primo Zuppone as he proceeds in search of Mau Tim Dani's killer. There is no shortage of suspects, from the modeling agents to former boyfriends and drug dealers, not to mention other mobsters. Cuddy, meanwhile, cannot help but wonder why he is being set up and by whom.

RESCUE

In Rescue, Cuddy takes on a case with no client in his search for a young boy known only as Eddie Straw because of the strawberry birthmark on his right forehead and cheek. Days earlier, Cuddy had stopped to change a flat tire for a couple of young apparent runaways, teenage Melinda and ten-year-old Eddie. When Melinda turns up dead not long thereafter, Cuddy, haunted by memories of dead soldiers in Vietnam, becomes nearly obsessed with finding Eddie. After locking horns as usual with the local police, Cuddy follows a murky, treacherous trail into New Hampshire, then as far south as the Florida Keys, tracking the murderous religious zealots to whom Eddie has been turned over by his own parents, who mistook his birthmark for the mark of Cain and believe that he is ripe for exorcism. Traveling under the name of John Francis, having already killed one man in self-defense back in New Hampshire, Cuddy attempts to infiltrate the Church of the Lord Vigilant, where he believes Eddie to be held captive. His Florida venture is facilitated by Miami attorney Justo Vega, a former fellow military police officer in Vietnam. Cuddy also makes the acquaintance of retired Marine Colonel Howard Greenspan and his wife, Doris. In time, Greenspan, mortally ill with cancer, will give his life helping Cuddy in a daring underwater midnight raid on the church compound, and Doris Greenspan will volunteer to explore her options for adopting the newly freed Eddie rather than returning him to the parents who banished him. Rescue is also notable for Cuddy's visit, en route to Florida, to the Vietnam Memorial in Washington, D.C.

SPIRAL

The thirteenth volume in the Cuddy series, Spiral is longer and more intricately plotted than Rescue and more than twice as long as Blunt Darts. The action begins with a rude shock, the sudden death of Nancy Meagher in a plane crash en route to San Francisco. Initial plans called for Cuddy to make the trip with her but a prior work commitment kept him in Boston. Only after liftoff did Cuddy retrieve a voice message that the job had been canceled; in short, he could and probably should have been on that flight himself. Working through his grief at the grave of his wife, Beth, he is startled when Beth "tells" him that he has been spared for a reason. Not long thereafter, he is summoned back to Florida by Justo Vega, the Miami attorney and former army buddy initially featured in Rescue. Their former commanding officer in Vietnam, retired Colonel Nicolas Helides, wants Cuddy's help in a matter that cannot be discussed over the telephone. Arriving at the colonel's estate in Fort Lauderdale, Cuddy finds his former boss, now over seventy, considerably weakened by a stroke and surrounded by an entourage of servants, bodyguards, and a flirtatious second wife. His mission for Cuddy at first seems simple, to find out who murdered the colonel's barely adolescent granddaughter, whose body was found in a swimming pool on the premises. Born Veronica Helides, the child was better known as Very Held, a pseudonym chosen for her role as lead singer in the revival of Spiral, a rock band originally formed by her father Spi (short for Spiro) in the 1960's. A portrait soon emerges of a spoiled, difficult, and precocious child, indulged by her father to suit his own ambitions, already familiar with drugs and sex and well aware of her seductive charms, as revealed in videotaped performances.

As in Shallow Graves, which likewise deals with the death of a young woman rushed into adulthood, there is no shortage of viable suspects, and more bodies are found as Cuddy and Justo Vega move closer to the truth. Returning to Boston at the close of the case, Cuddy learns from Meagher's landlord that he and his family can no longer keep Renfield because of his mother's cat allergies. In a final scene, Cuddy agrees to keep Renfield, as they face an uncertain future together. Healy has told interviewers that it was time to arrange either a wedding or a funeral involving Nancy Meagher and that what he chose was best for Cuddy.

David B. Parsell

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

JOHN FRANCIS CUDDY SERIES: Blunt Darts, 1984; The Staked Goat, 1986; So Like Sleep, 1987; Swan Dive, 1988; Yesterday's News, 1989; Right to Die, 1991; Shallow Graves, 1992; Foursome, 1993; Act of God, 1994; Rescue, 1995; Invasion of Privacy, 1996; The Only Good Lawyer, 1998; Spiral, 1999; Cuddy Plus One, 2003

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Stalking of Sheilah Quinn, 1998; Turnabout, 2001; Uncommon Justice, 2001 (as Devane); Juror Number Eleven, 2002 (as Devane); A Stain upon the Robe, 2003 (as Devane)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Healy, Jeremiah. Jeremiah Healy/Terry Devane. <http://www.jeremiahhealy.com>. Author's Web site collects articles and comments by and about Healy. Also contains information about books written as Terry Devane.

_____. "Plot and Structure in the Mystery Novel." Writer 103, no. 11 (November, 1990): 11. Healy discusses the importance of plot and structure and suggests that writers use an outline. Sheds light on his own writing process.

_____. "Writing Effective Dialogue." Writer 108, no. 10 (October, 1995): 4. In this how-to article, Healy demonstrates some of his writing techniques and approach to fiction writing.

Herbert, Rosemary. The Fatal Art of Entertainment: Interviews with Mystery Writers. New York: G. K. Hall, 1994. Healy is one of thirteen mystery writers interviewed in this work. Contains a brief introductory essay and photograph besides the interview of Healy, which describes the writer's character and work habits.

Lochte, Dick. "The Return of the Private Eye." Playboy, March 1, 2000, 96. Places Healy within the context of late twentieth century detective fiction.

Pierce, J. Kingston. "Cuddy Edge." January Magazine (April, 2000). Good retrospective on the Cuddy series, including an informative interview with Healy.

Scaggs, John. Crime Fiction. New York: Routledge, 2005. Contains a chapter on hard-boiled fiction that takes a close look at the subgenre that Healy favors.

Snell, George. "Mystery Writer in Love with Boston." Worcester Telegram and Gazette, October 15, 1997, p. B1. Explores Healy's ongoing, if stormy, relationship with his adoptive city.

O. HENRY

William Sydney Porter

Born: Greensboro, North Carolina; September 11, 1862

Died: New York, New York; June 5, 1910

Types of plot: Amateur sleuth; inverted; police procedural; private investigator

CONTRIBUTION

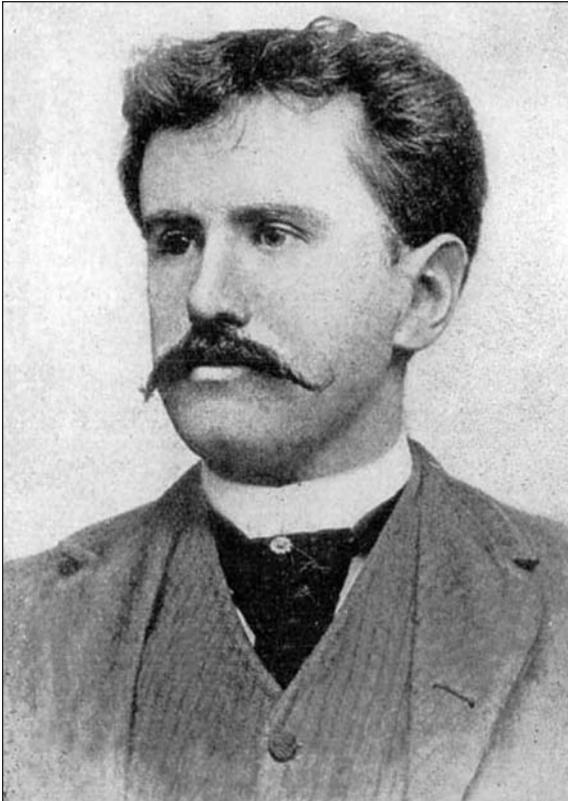

According to Dorothy L. Sayers, surprise is a hallmark of mystery and detective fiction and the setting forth of riddles to be solved is the chief business of an author in the genre. In this sense, almost all the nearly three hundred stories that O. Henry wrote might broadly be labeled “mysteries,” though there is also a narrower selection (several per volume of short stories, and nearly all of Cabbages and Kings, 1904, and The Gentle Grafter, 1908) that are more obviously of this mode. O. Henry is a minor classic of American literature; he fares best when judged on the whole of his artistic accomplishment rather than on the merits of individual stories. Like Edgar Allan Poe’s tales, O. Henry’s are brief and immediate; like Guy de Maupassant’s, they end suddenly and surprisingly. O. Henry’s unique contribution to the mystery and detective genre is the whiplash ending within the context of a vivid and varied depiction of American life and manners.

BIOGRAPHY

Although O. Henry was born in a small town, he was to feel most comfortable personally and professionally in New York City, observing and chronicling the little lives of little people. He was a private and gentle man in his life and in his writing, and he harbored a humiliating secret. Although his work cannot be called “autobiographical” without a considerable amount of qualification, his writing certainly was based on his own experiences and observations. His production coincides with the four main stages of his life: childhood in North Carolina; youth in Texas; adulthood in New Orleans, Honduras, and the federal penitentiary in Columbus, Ohio; and maturity in New York City.

Christened William Sidney Porter (he changed the spelling of his middle name to “Sydney” in 1898), O. Henry had a peaceful childhood in North Carolina. The early death of his mother at the age of thirty from tuberculosis meant that O. Henry’s nurture and tutelage after the age of three were provided by his paternal aunt Evelina. Long walks with friends and much reading offset boredom as he clerked in his uncle’s drugstore, and his becoming licensed as a practicing pharmacist would serve him well later. He was scarcely twenty when a Greensboro physician and his wife, concerned about Porter’s delicate health, brought him south with them to the Rio Grande. For nearly two years on a sheep ranch in La Salle County in southwest Texas, Porter learned to rope and ride, went on weekly mail runs, played the guitar, sketched, and read almost everything in the ranch library. His discomfort with the raw frontier, with its frequent shootings and lootings, prompted his move to the more urban Austin. He married Athol Estes after a whirlwind courtship and then worked first as a draftsman at the Texas Land Office and next as a bank teller. He fathered a son, who died; a daughter, Margaret, lived. He also began publishing a humorous weekly, The Rolling Stone, which lasted a year, and later wrote features for the Houston Post, continuing his hobby of sketching and illustration. The first use of his most popular pen name, O. Henry, appeared in 1886.

Although bank practices in Texas in the 1890’s were notoriously loose, O. Henry was nevertheless indicted by a grand jury for embezzlement of funds while serving as a teller. When he fled first to New Orleans and then to Honduras, his guilt seemed evident, though he maintained his innocence. In 1898, after the death of his wife, he was sentenced to five years at the federal penitentiary at Columbus, ultimately serving only three years and three months before being released for good behavior. Letters written in prison express his desperation and humiliation at serving time, though he enjoyed work in the prison hospital as a drug clerk and outside the prison as a private secretary.

O. Henry. (Courtesy, Austin History Center, Austin Public Library)

An often-quoted line from his first authorized biographer, C. Alphonso Smith, asserts, "If ever in American literature the place and the man met, they met when O. Henry strolled for the first time along the streets of New York." O. Henry saturated himself with the atmosphere of the city. He gained inspiration for his stories by strolling in the rough Hell's Kitchen section or on Broadway and along the byways of Manhattan, and by haunting especially restaurants of all varieties. In 1903-1904 alone, he published more than one hundred stories in the New York Sunday World. His extravagance, generosity, and the steady drinking, which led to his death at forty-eight, required a steady income, which meant that he lived his life attached to publication deadlines. Normal family life (with his daughter and the childhood sweetheart who became his second wife, Sara Lindsay Coleman) was sacrificed to furious writing activity.

Practically all of his short stories and sketches first appeared in periodicals; before his death, nine volumes in book form were published, and after his death eight more volumes appeared. In the last year of his life, he tried his hand as a playwright and a novelist but without much success.

ANALYSIS

O. Henry's involvement in the mystery and detective genre was almost accidental. He did write a few mysteries, some detective stories, some narratives about con artists, but all served his larger purpose of experimenting with the surprise ending. His intermittent writing in the genre produced no definite theory of mystery or detective fiction and seldom a consistent hero. The common ground for the whole of his fiction seems to be the theme of appearance and reality: Things are not what they seem, and they do not turn out as one might expect. It is not necessarily that the author gives false leads; he simply might not tell the whole story or give all the evidence at once.

In some of his stories, O. Henry stretches the notion of things not being what they appear by turning traditional expectations of the mystery and detective genre upside down and writing spoofs. He satirizes François-Eugène Vidocq, the French criminal who started the first modern detective agency and whose reputation as a master of disguise had an immense influence on writers of crime fiction. One of O. Henry's satires, entitled "Tictocq" (Rolling Stones, 1912), has its eponymous detective investigate a stolen pair of socks that turns out not to be missing after all. In "Tracked to Doom" (Rolling Stones), Tictocq and murderer Gray Wolf are disguised as each other, and despite Tictocq's witnessing a murder and Gray Wolf's confessing to it, the murderer is not discovered. Three humorous parodies of Arthur Conan Doyle's fictional detective Sherlock Holmes are "The Sleuths" (Sixes and Sevens, 1911), "The Adventures of Shamrock Jolnes" (Sixes and Sevens), and "The Detective Detector" (Waifs and Strays, 1917); these stories present the detective as compulsively tedious and illogical, wrongheadedly instructing sidekick Whatsup on the fine points of investigation. Another crime story, "Tommy's Burglar" (Whirligigs, 1910), is in fact a contrived but delightful spoof on crime stories in general, showing a criminal following the orders of an eight-year-old and repenting before he really completes the crime. They are detective mysteries with an absurd twist.

CABBAGES AND KINGS

Cabbages and Kings was O. Henry's first published collection of stories, and it is also the volume that most consistently contains a common hero, Frank Goodwin. The book is based on O. Henry's experiences in Honduras and is set in South America—fictive Coralio, Anchuria—and also briefly in New Orleans and New York City. In this work some important character types and techniques begin to appear. There are detectives, grafters and schemers who have a change of heart, a starving artist, a deposed president, a disguised hero (the president's son), beautiful women, and a likable drunkard who commits blackmail. There are mysteries and clues that are dropped one by one and a convoluted plot with a generous dose of political revolution and intrigue. The volume opens with a proem introducing the main characters and closes with three separate "scenes," which present solutions to the mysteries.

The title of the book is borrowed from Lewis Carroll's well-known ballad in which the Walrus instructs the oysters to listen to his tale of many things—shoes, ships, sealing wax, cabbages, and kings. O. Henry gives his reader "many things" in the book—prose, rhymes, theatrical contrivances, stories that are cycles or tangents, and parallel intrigues. Some of the stories directly carry forward the main plot, but others seem almost independent of it. These interpolated stories carry the mystery along in the sense that they are red herrings, leading the reader onto false paths and delaying the solution.

O. Henry sets the stage for the pseudonovel by evaluating his intention:

So, there is a little tale to tell of many things. Perhaps to the promiscuous ear of the Walrus it shall come with most avail; for in it there are indeed shoes and ships and sealing-wax and cabbage-palms and presidents instead of kings. Add to these a little love and counterplotting, and scatter everywhere throughout the maze a trail of tropical dollars—dollars warmed no more by the torrid sun than by the hot palms of the scouts of Fortune—and, after all, here seems to be Life, itself, with talk enough to weary the most garrulous of Walruses.

The book is a loose sort of novel that revolves around a complicated and ingenious plot—the theft by the book's hero of what seems to be Anchuria's national treasury and the mistaken identities of the Anchurian president and a fugitive American insurance company president who embezzles funds. The main mystery is rooted in a mistake; it is not the Anchurian president who shoots himself when it becomes apparent that he will lose the money he has stolen but the insurance company president.

The deception in the book extends to its tone. Early in the story, O. Henry calls Coralio an "Eden" and writes poetically about a sunset:

The mountains reached up their bulky shoulders to receive the level gallop of Apollo's homing steeds, the day died in the lagoons and in the shadowed banana groves and in the mangrove swamps, where the great blue crabs were beginning to crawl to land for their nightly ramble. And it died, at last, on the highest peaks. Then the brief twilight, ephemeral as the flight of a moth, came and went; the Southern Cross peeped with its topmost eye above a row of palms, and the fireflies heralded with their torches the approach of soft-footed night.

Later, O. Henry debases Coralio as a "monkey town":

Dinky little mud houses; grass over your shoe tops in the streets; ladies in low-neck-and-short-sleeves walking around smoking cigars; tree frogs rattling like a hose cart going to a ten blow; big mountains dropping gravel in the back yard; and the sea licking the paint off in front—no, sir—a man had better be in God's country living on free lunch than there.

The purposeful inconsistency in tone emphasizes the distinction between appearance and reality that is so central to all O. Henry's mysteries.

THE GENTLE GRAFTER

The Gentle Grafter is the next nearest thing in O. Henry's writings to an extended and unified work in the mystery and detective genre. The book includes fourteen stories that are all con games of one sort or another. Biographers believe that O. Henry picked up the plots for these stories in the prison hospital while doing his rounds of visits to sick or wounded inmates. One relatively well-rounded character, Jeff Peters, dominates all but three stories in the volume. Only two other short stories use this character—"Cupid à la Carte," in Heart of the West (1907), and a story that O. Henry thought was the best of his Jeff Peters stories, "The Atavism of John Tom Little Bear," published in Rolling Stones.

The stories in The Gentle Grafter add an unusual ingredient to mystery and detective fiction; they are tall tales, picaresque fiction, and are told, in the fashion of American humor, as oral tales. Roughly half of them are set in the South. They feature amusing dialogue, with puns, colloquial speech, and academic buffoonery from a rogue who is very much in the tradition of Lazarillo de Tormes and Robin Hood. His sidekick, Andy Tucker, shares in the petty grafting ruses, whether hawking "Resurrection Bitters" or conspiring with a third swindler, a resort owner, to dupe a group of schoolteachers into believing that they are in the company of the explorer Admiral Peary and the duke of Marlborough. In "Jeff Peters as a Personal Magnet," the reader is led to believe that Peters will fall into a trap. The author, however, has simply tricked the audience by presenting dialogue without interpreting it. At the end, the disguises are lifted and Peters goes scot-free.

O. Henry writes about street fakers and small-town swindlers in a melodramatic way to achieve humor. A serious point behind the humor might be his observation that there really was not much difference between inmates in the penitentiary and the robber baron financiers of New York City to whom he referred as "caliphs." "The Man Higher Up," like many of O. Henry's stories, suggests that the line between wealth and crime is a thin one indeed. Swindling is profitable.

Although the criminals in The Gentle Grafter are nonviolent, O. Henry also memorialized street fighters such as the Stovepipe Gang in "Vanity and Some Sables." After O. Henry called on real-life safecracker Jimmy Connors in the hospital of the Ohio penitentiary, he portrayed the criminal as Jimmy Valentine in "A Retrieved Reformation" (Roads of Destiny, 1909). The Valentine story was later made into a play and even became a popular song. A vogue for "crook plays" soon developed on Broadway, for which O. Henry was in part responsible.

Some of O. Henry's mystery and detective fiction circumvents any horror or terror behind death. The deaths occur almost incidentally, with the brutality played down as in "The Detective Detector" (Waifs and Strays), in which New York criminal Avery Knight shoots a man in the back merely to prove a point. If the murders are not consistently bloodless in O. Henry's fiction, they tend often to be devices of plot, moving the action along to something more important. The surprise or coincidence that evolves is often given more prominence than the crime itself. A torn concert ticket in "In Mezzotint" (O. Henry Encore, 1936) becomes more significant than a suicide. An overcoat button solves a mystery in "A Municipal Report" (Strictly Business, 1910), while a murder happens offstage. In "Bexar Scrip No. 2692" (Rolling Stones), clues do not solve a murder or even reveal that one has occurred, and the shrewd land agent who is guilty dies without incurring suspicion.

THE TRIMMED LAMP

In "The Guilty Party" (The Trimmed Lamp, 1907), a murder and a suicide take place within a dream, and the case is "tried" in the next world. The real villain of the story is a father who refused to play checkers with his daughter, thus consigning her to the street to become a criminal, and behind that individual villain is the larger villain eminently more culpable for O. Henry: social injustice. "Elsie in New York" (The Trimmed Lamp) shows an innocent country girl struggling against impossible odds to land an honest job; she is discouraged at every turn by false moralists, ironically becoming a prostitute because that is the path of least resistance. In a rare example of direct social satire, O. Henry ends the story by emphasizing the injustice:

Lost, Your Excellency. Lost, Associations, and Societies. Lost, Right Reverends and Wrong Reverends of every order. Lost, Reformers and Lawmakers, born with heavenly compassion in your hearts, but with the reverence of money in your souls. And lost thus around us every day.

Emphasis is usually on the wrong people being judged or on the right people being misjudged. People are easily fooled by confidence men. Appearances are deceiving, and when appearances are all one has to act on, the wrong conclusions happen, and only the reader who sees through the eye of the omniscient narrator or hears the tale told knows that they are wrong.

O. Henry's brand of mystery focuses on events rather than on psychological motivation. He treats his characters like puppets, allowing them to do nothing that might give away the secret until the end. He structures his tales along the lines of a riddle or an error, a pun or a coincidence, that becomes sharply and suddenly significant. His endings are strongly accentuated, and the whole plot points toward them. It is not his habit to provide analysis, reflection, extended resolution, or denouement following the story's climax.

O. Henry granted only one interview about his work during his lifetime—to George MacAdam of The New York Times Book Review and Magazine; it first appeared in the April 4, 1909, issue, but it was not published in full until twelve years after his death. In it, he revealed his secret of writing short stories: "Rule 1: Write stories that please yourself. There is no Rule 2." His technique further included writing something out quickly, even though he was not always sure from the outset exactly where it was going, thus letting the story evolve out of its own momentum. He told MacAdam that he would then send the story off unrevised and hardly recognize it when it was published. When a period of inactivity would plague him, O. Henry would let life act as a stimulus for a piece of fiction by mingling with the humanity that was his inspiration—getting out among crowds or striking up a conversation with someone.

O. Henry's stories are very much like a game or puzzle—perhaps the reader is fooled, perhaps one of the characters is. The emphasis is often on discovering the identity of a sought-after person. Sometimes, O. Henry's intrusive narrator parodies the process. In "A Night in New Arabia" (Strictly Business), for example, he blurts out a prediction that comes as a surprise: "I know as well as you do that Thomas is going to be the heir." O. Henry almost cavalierly tosses off to the reader a hint that is a legitimate clue if taken seriously. He uses half of a silver dime to solve a question of identity in "No Story" (Options, 1909), money secretly spent to give rise to a marriage proposal in "Mammon and the Archer" (The Four Million, 1906), a mole by the left eyebrow to identify a suicide victim whose lover will never find her in "The Furnished Room" (The Four Million). In "The Caballero's Way" (Heart of the West), a forged letter and a girl in her own clothes mistakenly taken for a disguised man lead the caballero to murder his beloved rather than his rival.

If O. Henry learned from his grandfather to be continually vigilant for "what's around the corner," as biographers commonly assert, he used that perspective well in his mystery and detective fiction, glancing sideways at the genre through rose-colored glasses until what he wrote appeared to be almost a cartoon that he himself skillfully drew.

Jill B. Gidmark

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

SHORT FICTION: Cabbages and Kings, 1904; The Gentle Grafter, 1908

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

SHORT FICTION: The Four Million, 1906; Heart of the West, 1907; The Trimmed Lamp, 1907; The Voice of the City, 1908; Options, 1909; Roads of Destiny, 1909; Let Me Feel Your Pulse, 1910; Strictly Business, 1910; The Two Women, 1910; Whirligigs, 1910; Sixes and Sevens, 1911; Rolling Stones, 1912; Waifs and Strays, 1917; Postscripts, 1923; O. Henry Encore, 1936; Tales of O. Henry, 1969; The Voice of the City, and Other Stories: A Selection, 1991; The Best of O. Henry, 1992; Collected Stories: Revised and Expanded, 1993; Heart of the West, 1993; Selected Stories, 1993; The Best Short Stories of O. Henry, 1994; One Hundred Selected Stories, 1995

PLAY: Lo, pr. 1909 (with Franklin P. Adams)

NONFICTION: Letters to Lithopolis, 1922; The Second Edition of Letters to Lithopolis from O. Henry to Mabel Wagnalls, 1999 (with Mabel Wagnalls)

MISCELLANEOUS: Rolling Stones, 1912; O. Henry-ana, 1920

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Arnett, Ethel Stephens. O. Henry from Polecat Creek. Greensboro, N.C.: Piedmont Press, 1963. Described by Porter's cousin as a delightful and authentic story of O. Henry's boyhood and youth, this entertaining biography of the early years goes far in illuminating both the character-shaping environment and experiences of Porter and his fiction. Supplemented by illustrations, notes, a bibliography, and an index.

Bloom, Harold, ed. O. Henry. Broomal, Pa.: Chelsea House, 1999. Collection of essays that constitute a study guide and handbook of O. Henry criticism, assembled by leading scholars in the field. Bibliographic references and index.

Current-Garcia, Eugene. O. Henry: A Study of the Short Fiction. New York: Twayne, 1993. An introduction to O. Henry's stories, largely drawn from Current-Garcia's earlier Twayne volume. Focuses on O. Henry's frequent themes, his romanticism, and his narrative techniques, such as his use of the tall-tale conventions. Includes critical excerpts from discussions of O. Henry by other critics.

Gallegly, Joseph. From Alamo Plaza to Jack Harris's Saloon: O. Henry and the Southwest He Knew. The Hague: Mouton, 1970. By investigating contemporary photographs, literature, popular pursuits, news items, and personalities—both real and fictional—from the contemporary scene of the author, Gal-legly provides significant insight into the southwestern stories.

Jennings, Al. Through the Shadows with O. Henry. Lubbock: Texas Tech University Press, 2000. Reprint of a classic O. Henry study, with a new introduction by Mike Cox and afterword by Patrick McConal, who consider the reception of Henry's work in the twentieth century.

Stuart, David. O. Henry: A Biography of William Sydney Porter. Chelsea, Mich.: Scarborough House, 1990. A good, updated edition of a portrait of O. Henry. Includes bibliographical references and index.

Watson, Bruce. "If His Life Were a Short Story, Who'd Ever Believe It?" Smithsonian 27 (January, 1997): 92-102. Biography of O. Henry strewn with anecdotes and some literary criticism. Includes photographs.

Wyatt-Brown, Bertram. Hearts of Darkness: Wellsprings of a Southern Literary Tradition. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2003. Discusses the distinctively southern aspects of Henry's stories, as well as his influence on other southern American authors. Bibliographic references and index.

JOAN HESS

Born: Fayetteville, Arkansas; January 6, 1949

Also wrote as Joan Hadley

Types of plot: Cozy; amateur sleuth

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Claire Malloy, 1986-

Theodore Bloomer, 1986-

Arly Hanks, 1987-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

CLAIRE MALLOY OWNS a bookstore in Farberville, Arkansas. When the series begins, she is thirty-eight years old; her daughter, Caron, is fourteen. Both have copper-colored hair, green eyes, and freckles; both are highly intelligent, verbal, and witty. In the course of her work, Claire is drawn into situations where crimes occur. She envisions herself as a modern, logical version of Nancy Drew or Agatha Christie's Jane Marple, but she is impulsive, often exposing herself to danger.

THEODORE BLOOMER is a tall, balding sixty-one-year-old retired florist with a background in intelligence work. Whatever his strengths, he cannot withstand his domineering sister, Nadine Caldicott, when she orders him to rescue or chaperon her daughter Dorrie, a college student. Bloomer's quiet, logical approach to crimes in different cultures allows him to protect the young woman.

AERIAL "ARLY" HANKS is police chief of Maggody, Arkansas. Raised there, she has gone away to college, married, lived a luxurious life in New York, and divorced her unfaithful husband. She returns to Maggody, where her lack of interest in her appearance and in finding another husband are the despair of her mother. Arly's education and New York life allow her realistically to assess Maggody and its eccentric inhabitants, but her sympathies lie with these people, their hopeless dreams, and their muddled efforts simply to survive.

CONTRIBUTION

The Arly Hanks novels are Joan Hess's finest achievement, blending wit, crime, character development, deft plotting, and social satire. In both the Hanks and Claire Malloy series, Hess is ruthless toward predators, whether creative, sexual, religious, or medical, but her satiric approach to everyday life is otherwise gentle. In "A Tribute to Joan Hess," M. D. Lake compares her approach to that of P. G. Wodehouse; they share common qualities in their visions of the absurdities of life. In the Hanks series, Hess is perhaps closer to Charles Dickens in her ability to create a community of odd people performing improbable actions made believable for the moment by the warmth and compassion with which most of the characters are developed. Hess accomplishes this through shifts in points of view. Although most events are seen through Arly's eyes, many other characters narrate sections, revealing their views and often proving themselves intelligent, resourceful, and imaginative. They sometime rise to heroism. A single point of view dominates the Malloy novels, but the relationship and conflicts between mother and daughter add a realistic note often absent from depictions of female sleuths, while Claire's warmth and sympathy for other women allow development of many believable characters. The Theodore Bloomer novels are workmanlike. In the hands of a lesser writer, they would be noteworthy, but readers expect more of Hess, and the Bloomer novels have been less successful than the others.

BIOGRAPHY

Joan Hess was born Joan Edmiston on January 6, 1949, in Fayetteville, Arkansas, the daughter of Jack D. Edmiston, a grocer, and Helen Tidwell Edmiston, a building contractor. She received a bachelor's degree in art from the University of Alabama in 1971 and a master's degree in education in 1974 from Long Island University. She returned to Fayetteville, married Jeremy Hess in 1973, and was divorced in 1986. She is the mother of two children. Hess was teaching preschool art and raising her children when she and a friend began to write romances, hoping to make money. The romances were not published, but Hess learned that she enjoyed the creative process. At her agent's insistence, she turned to mysteries, which she had been reading since childhood.

Hess wrote Strangled Prose (1986), her first Claire Malloy novel, very quickly. Her agent was nervous that too many novels, published too quickly, would hurt sales, so she published her two Theodore Bloomer novels under the name Joan Hadley. Returning to her own name, she began the Hanks series.

Besides her mysteries, Hess has written two young-adult novels, Future Tense (1987) and Red Rover, Red Rover (1988). She has contributed columns, articles, and stories to Mystery Scene, Alfred Hitchcock's Mystery Magazine, Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine, and Clues. Her short stories have appeared in a number of anthologies including Malice Domestic, Sisters in Crime, and Cat Crimes, and she has edited a number of collections, including Funny Bones (1997), The Year's Twenty-five Finest Crime and Mystery Stories: Sixth Annual Edition with Ed Gorman and Martin H. Greenberg (1997; reprinted 1999 as Crime After Crime), and Malice Domestic 9 (2000). In 1995, she published To Kill a Husband: A Mystery Jigsaw Puzzle Thriller; the reader is instructed to read the book and then to assemble the thousand-piece jigsaw puzzle to discover the mystery's solution.

Strangled Prose was nominated for an Anthony Award and was selected best first novel in a poll of Drood Review readers. Mischief in Maggody (1988) was nominated for an Agatha Award. A Diet to Die For won the American Mystery Award for best traditional novel of 1989. In 1993, O Little Town of Maggody was nominated for both Agatha and Anthony awards. Her short story, "Too Much to Bare," received both Agatha and McCavity awards in 1991; "The Last to Know," was nominated for both awards in 1993. In 1995, Miracles in Maggody was nominated for the Agatha Award.

ANALYSIS

Joan Hess is the fifth generation of her family to live in Fayetteville, Arkansas, on which the town of Farberville in the Claire Malloy series is loosely based. She possesses a strong sense of community, which is one of the dominant themes in her novels. In the Malloy novels, however, the community is one of women, especially of the vulnerable and the old, who exist within the larger community but are not fully understood by that community or protected by it. In the Theodore Bloomer novels, the communities are outside the United States and must be understood by Bloomer if the crimes are to be solved. Maggody is an isolated community, frequently invaded by a variety of human predators.

CLAIRE MALLOY SERIES

In Claire Malloy, Hess has created a complex and believable amateur sleuth. Claire, first-person narrator of the novels, is a widow. Her husband taught at Farber College. Unknown to his wife, he was among the professors who seduced female students and coerced them into having sex. While driving on an icy road to a nearby motel with a female student, his vehicle was rammed by a chicken truck and he died amid bloody feathers. The student survived and her father kept her name out of the news and police reports. Left on her own, Claire has worked hard to establish a business. Her Book Depot brings in an adequate income. She has protected Caron, her daughter, from the circumstances of her father's death. Caron envies the luxuries possessed by her wealthier peers and sometimes launches imaginative money-raising schemes. In their impulsiveness, their imagination, and their independence, mother and daughter are more alike than either wants to admit.

STRANGLER PROSE

In Strangled Prose, Mildred Twiller, who writes romance novels under the name Azalea Twilight, talks Claire Malloy into hosting an autograph party on publication of her new book, Professor of Passion. Claire is reluctant, but she feels sympathy for Mildred, whose husband is one of the campus's more active womanizers. Once Claire gives her word, she will not break it, even though she mildly sympathizes with members of the Farber Women's Organization (FWO), who threaten to hold a violent protest against the sexism of the romance genre. Instead, at the reception, one FWO member reads select passages from Professor of Passion. The novel exposes the sexual antics of Farber College male professors and contains a barely disguised account of the death of Claire's husband. Claire, embarrassed, flees and becomes a suspect when Mildred is murdered. Farberville police lieutenant Peter Rosen investigates. He becomes a series character and romantically interested in Claire, but Claire, independent and understandably made wary by the betrayals of her marriage, resists commitment.

Other women, vulnerable like Mildred, often lure Claire into investigations. In Dear Miss Demeanor (1987), Caron and her friend Inez Brandon (later Inez Thornton), insist that Miss Emily Parchester, a dithery, ladylike veteran high school teacher, be exonerated when Parchester is accused of embezzlement by a high-handed and unpleasant male principal. When the principal is murdered, Parchester is a logical suspect. In Roll Over and Play Dead (1991), Claire is pet-sitting Parchester's bassets when they are stolen, and she tries to find them. In Busy Bodies (1995), Miss Parchester invites Claire to tea. Claire discovers that Parchester's quiet neighborhood is being wildly disrupted by a performance artist whose displays feature noise, coffins, and near nudity, ending in murder. In Tickled to Death (1994) Claire's best friend, Luanne Bradshaw, becomes infatuated with a man who may have killed his former wives. In A Really Cute Corpse, Claire reluctantly takes over the Miss Thurberfest beauty contest, despite her feminist misgivings, when Luanne is injured. In Poisoned Pins (1993) and A Diet to Die For, vulnerable women are exploited in a very odd sorority house and an equally odd diet center.

THE NIGHT-BLOOMING CEREUS AND THE DEADLY ACKEE

As a result of a 1985 trip to Israel with an extended family of in-laws, Hess wrote The Night-Blooming Cereus (1986), the first of two works featuring Theodore Bloomer and his self-obsessed, spoiled niece, Dorrie Caldicott. To the horror of her wealthy parents, Dorrie is living on a kibbutz; Bloomer is sent to retrieve her. In Israel, he finds that Dorrie inexplicably refuses to leave until her college roommate returns with her, and the roommate, from a less privileged background, has resolved to stay there permanently. In the second novel, The Deadly Ackee (1988), Bloomer is coerced by his sister and niece into chaperoning a college-break trip to Jamaica. Murders follow. The novels are well-constructed, and comedy is provided by a larger-than-life intelligence agent. Bloomer, however, must necessarily view both the kibbutz and the Jamaican community of The Night-Blooming Cereus as an outsider. Third-person narration adds further distance between the reader and the communities, and few members of the community come to life as they do in the other series.

ARLY HANKS SERIES

Maggody is an Ozarks town, its streets lined with closed shops. The building of highways and shopping centers outside the town's boundaries have devastated it. About 755 people remain. For most, full-time employment means working for minimum wage at the poultry plant in nearby Starley City. Arly Hanks has returned to Maggody, embittered and weary, after college and divorce, although she matures and changes as wounds heal and the series progresses. The only qualified applicant, she has become Maggody's chief of police. Her mother, Ruby Bee Hanks, owns Ruby Bee's Bar and Grill and Flamingo Motel; a motherly figure, she is nonetheless a successful bouncer when necessary. Ruby Bee's best friend, Estelle Oppers, once a lounge singer in Little Rock, now operates Estelle's Hair Fantasies. Her own monumental red beehive hairdo is a reminder of decades long past. The two, both curious, involve themselves in Arly's investigations.

Much of the area's population is made up of inbred Buchanons. In Maggody's terms, the most successful of these are Mayor Jim Bob Buchanon, owner of the Kwik-Stoppe Shoppe, later Jim Bob Buchanon's Supersaver Buy 4 Less. Obsessed with sex, he is married to the overly pious Barbara Ann Buchanon, who stresses purity, cleanliness, and traditional values. Known as Mrs. Jim Bob, she is president of the Missionary Society of the Voice of the Almighty Lord Assembly Hall. There she joins forces with the mail-order minister, Brother Verber, whose alcoholic battle against sin requires purchase of pornographic magazines and other research materials. The most cunning Buchanons live on Cotter Ridge, which towers over the town. There, Robin Buchanon sells ginseng and sex to support her large brood of feral children. She has been, in her own way, a conscientious mother. Somewhere on the ridge, Roz Buchanon has a still, producing moonshine, and he is devoted to his sow Margie, but he sometimes conducts rescue missions. Least intelligent are obese Dahlia O'Neill Buchanon and her husband, Kevin, but even they fully understand the duties of matrimony and parenthood and will risk their lives for each other.

Residents make trouble for themselves, as in the first book, Malice in Maggody (1987), when Jim Bob and his cronies try to keep an agent from the Environmental Protection Agency from approving a sewage treatment plant that they think will ruin their fishing. Most of Maggody's woes, however are caused by outsiders. The villains who come to Maggody are not successful evildoers; if they were, they would not need a town like Maggody. Their bungling creates the crimes and often adds to the comedy. In The Maggody Militia (1997), self-appointed General Sterling Pitts and his survivalists intend to perform paintball maneuvers at the beginning of hunting season, when anything that moves becomes a target. In Martians in Maggody (1994), odd geometric designs appear in Roz Buchanon's pasture. Media descend, as do two professors, and Dahlia Buchanon becomes convinced that she has been kidnapped and impregnated by aliens. In Mortal Remains in Maggody (1991) pornographic filmmakers arrive, and Dahlia is convinced she has a future in Hollywood. Televangelist and faith healer Malachi Hope intends to establish a permanent theme park in Maggody in Miracles in Maggody, while a native son, turned country music star, returns in O Little Town of Maggody because his publicists believe a well-publicized country Christmas can cancel out reports of his erratic behavior. In Malpractice in Mag- gody (2006), a questionable therapist attempts to set up a treatment center for just this type of celebrity. In each case, murder follows. Arly, working with other area law enforcement officers—sometimes lazy, stupid, or corrupt—must solve the crime while helping her fellow townspeople out of the messes they have made.

Betty Richardson

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

CLAIRE MALLOY SERIES: Strangled Prose, 1986; Murder at the Murder at the Mimosa Inn, 1986; Dear Miss Demeanor, 1987; A Really Cute Corpse, 1988; A Diet to Die For, 1989; Roll Over and Play Dead, 1991; Death by the Light of the Moon, 1992; Poisoned Pins, 1993; Tickled to Death, 1994; Busy Bodies, 1995; Closely Akin to Murder, 1996; A Holly, Jolly Murder, 1997; A Conventional Corpse, 2000; Out on a Limb, 2002; The Goodbye Body, 2005; Damsels in Distress, 2007

THEODORE BLOOMER SERIES (AS HADLEY): The Night-Blooming Cereus, 1986; The Deadly Ackee, 1988

ARLY HANKS SERIES: Malice in Maggody, 1987; Mischief in Maggody, 1988; Much Ado in Maggody, 1989; Madness in Maggody, 1991; Mortal Remains in Maggody, 1991; Maggody in Manhattan, 1992; O Little Town of Maggody, 1993; Martians in Maggody, 1994; Miracles in Maggody, 1995; The Maggody Militia, 1997; Misery Loves Maggody, 1998; Murder @Maggody.com, 2000; Maggody and the Moonbeams, 2001; Muletrain to Maggody, 2004; Malpractice in Maggody, 2006

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Future Tense, 1987; Red Rover, Red Rover, 1988

SHORT FICTION: Death of a Romance Writer, and

Other Stories, 2002; Big Foot Stole My Wife!, and Other Stories, 2003; The Deadly Ackee, and Other Stories of Crime and Catastrophe, 2003

EDITED TEXTS: Funny Bones, 1997; The Year's Twenty-five Finest Crime and Mystery Stories: Sixth Annual Edition, 1997 (with Ed Gorman and Martin H. Greenberg; also known as Crime After Crime); Malice Domestic Nine, 2000

MISCELLANEOUS: To Kill a Husband: A Mystery Jigsaw Puzzle Thriller, 1995 (book and jigsaw puzzle)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

DeMarr, Mary Jean. "Joan Hess/Joan Hadley: Separating the Voices." In Women Times Three: Writers, Detectives, Readers, edited by Kathleen Gregory Klein. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1995. A feminist analysis of Hess's writing.

Hess, Joan. "Tickled to Death: An Interview with Joan Hess." An interview by Charles L. P. Silet. Armchair Detective 28 (Winter, 1995): 10-16. This interview with Hess, which takes its title from her 1995 Tickled to Death, discusses her work and life.

Severson, Marilyn Sparks. "Joan Hess/Joan Hadley." In Great Women Mystery Writers: Classic to Contemporary, edited by Kathleen Gregory Klein. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994. A brief appraisal of Hess's work, written near the beginning of Hess's career. Klein's general introduction and bibliography are useful for understanding women writing in the genre.

"A Tribute to Joan Hess." Mystery Scene no. 75 (June, 2002): 14-19. Writers contributing to this article on Hess are Deborah Adams, Dorothy Cannell, Harlan Coben, Parnell Hall, Charlaine Harris, Carolyn Hart, Dean James, M. D. Lake, Margaret Maron, Val McDermid, Elizabeth Peters, and Daniel Stashower.

GEORGETTE HEYER

Born: London, England; August 16, 1902

Died: London, England; July 4, 1974

Also wrote as Stella Martin

Types of plot: Amateur sleuth; historical; private investigator; thriller; cozy; comedy caper

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Superintendent Hannasyde and Sergeant Hemingway, 1935-1953

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

SUPERINTENDENT HANNASYDE and SERGEANT HEMINGWAY are both adept at dealing with “country house and village” murders, where the suspects are likely to belong to the privileged classes. Hemingway gradually replaces Hannasyde as the chief inspector, and he is assisted by a series of young men who act as foils for Hemingway’s cleverness.

CONTRIBUTION

Georgette Heyer’s twelve detective novels are variations of the English country-house mystery. Like her extremely popular historical romances set in the Regency period, her mysteries are witty comedies of manners. Her characters, whether they live in villages, suburban communities, or on London estates, are well-bred and affluent. Heyer has been compared to Jane Austen because, in the world she skillfully creates, manners are morals. Pretension of any kind is ruthlessly exposed. Young women who seek to marry well for mercenary reasons do not succeed in the matrimonial game, but attractive heroines always make a suitable alliance. Although the crimes are solved at the conclusion of her novels, the detection of the murderer is only slightly more important than the resolution of the romantic action, which nearly always results in marriage.

Her mysteries are painstakingly plotted, but suspense is less important than wit in a Heyer mystery. For this reason, her books can be read and reread without a loss of interest. Both violence and passion are suppressed. Maiden aunts and stately dowagers tend to be pleased when a murder occurs because it may give their young relatives something with which to amuse themselves other than tennis, as in Detection Unlimited (1953). Few writers are fortunate enough to have Heyer’s unerring ear for dialogue and sense of the ridiculous. In No Wind of Blame (1939), when an unscrupulous gigolo, whose unpronounceable name leads everyone to call him Prince, pursues his impressionable hostess, his romantic overtures are undercut by a dog who also answers to the name Prince. Many of Heyer’s mysteries are still in print. Like her romances, they are masterpieces of satire and good humor.

BIOGRAPHY

Georgette Heyer, born on August 16, 1902, was the oldest of the three children of George Heyer and Sylvia Watkins. Like the heroine of Helen (1928), one of her early novels, Heyer had a close relationship with her father, after whom she was also named. She received her education at various day schools and later attended The Study, a girls’ school in Wimbledon. She did not attend a university.

In her teens, she became close friends with Joanna Cannan, the daughter of a member of the Oxford University Press, and Carola Oman, the daughter of Sir Charles Oman, a historian. All three women became novelists and published their works under their maiden names. Heyer’s first book, The Black Moth (1921), was published when she was nineteen.

In 1920, she met George Ronald Rougier while their families were spending Christmas at the Bushey Park Hotel. Rougier had wanted to become a barrister, but family pressure prompted him to attend the Royal School of Mines and become an engineer. Heyer became engaged to Rougier in April of 1925, and they were married two months after her father’s death on August 18, 1925. After their marriage, Rougier went prospecting in the Caucasus while Heyer remained in London. She accompanied her husband on his next assignments to Tanganyika and Macedonia. In 1926, Heyer’s first popular success occurred with the publication of These Old Shades, which sold 190,000 copies without the assistance of advertising or reviews. In 1932, at the time that Footsteps in the Dark appeared, her son Richard George Rougier was born.

During the Depression, Ronald opened a sports shop, but with his wife's encouragement he also studied to become a barrister. The income from Heyer's books contributed to the support for the family, and she began to write a detective story and a historical romance every year. Rougier, the first reader of her books, also assisted Heyer in plotting her detective stories. Although Heyer's books were consistently popular, at the time of her death, on July 4, 1974, she had not yet received the critical appreciation that her work merits.

ANALYSIS

During the 1930's, the mystery novel became increasingly respectable. Agatha Christie was already well known, and Margery Allingham, Dorothy L. Sayers, and Ngaio Marsh were establishing themselves in the genre. Georgette Heyer joined this group of talented female writers with Footsteps in the Dark, which appeared the same year as Devil's Cub (1932), one of her popular Regency romances.

FOOTSTEPS IN THE DARK

This experiment in what she called the thriller concerns a haunted house that later proves to be the headquarters for a gang of forgers who are trying to frighten the new owners into moving away. Although not without merit, Footsteps in the Dark served as an apprentice novel for Heyer. Her next two mysteries, Why Shoot a Butler? (1933) and The Unfinished Clue (1934), show that she had mastered the craft.

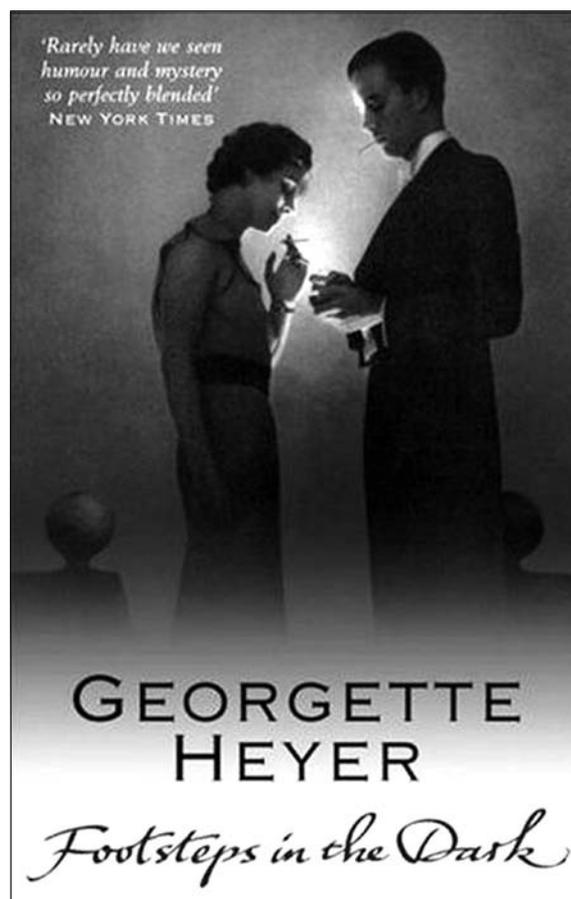

THE UNFINISHED CLUE

Both these novels are related to the country-house mystery, which was to become Heyer's most successful and characteristic genre. Whether the setting is a small English village or an affluent suburb, the interest in a Heyer novel is generated by the characters and their witty dialogue. The Unfinished Clue contains a marvelous character, Lola de Silva, who is an exotic dancer and the highly unacceptable fiancée of Geoffrey Billington-Smith. Lola deplores the lack of absinthe for her cocktails and insists that a painting of a dead hare be removed from the dining room because it will make it impossible for her to eat. After carefully explaining to the detectives her motives and opportunities for killing Geoffrey's father, she acknowledges: "I did not stab the General, because I did not think of it, and besides, in England I find it does not make one popular to kill people."

DEATH IN THE STOCKS

Death in the Stocks (1935) introduced the two detectives Superintendent Hannasyde and Sergeant Hemingway, who were to figure in a number of Heyer's mysteries. Death in the Stocks was reviewed by both The Times of London and The Times Literary Supplement, and it was also dramatized, although unsuccessfully. The adaptation must have been inept, for the dialogue in Death in the Stocks is especially successful. Giles Carrington, the Verekers' cousin and solicitor, solves the murder and also wins the hand of Antonia Vereker, his distant cousin and the murder victim's half sister. Violet Williams, a beautiful but empty-headed gold digger, is engaged to Kenneth Vereker, the victim's half brother and heir. Antonia accuses Violet of not caring if something is good to look at "as long as it reeks of money." In the well-bred world of the Verekers, Violet's lack of taste is emblematic of her mercenary values.

When Kenneth Vereker is cleared of having committed the murder, Hannasyde says that they will have to release him:

"Let him go?" said Hemingway. "You'll have a job to make him go. The last I saw of him he was asking what they'd charge for board-residence till he's finished a set of the most shocking pictures you ever laid eyes on. Portraits of the Police, he calls them. Libels, I call them."

The murderer proves to be Violet, whom Kenneth's relatives and the reader are relieved to have removed from the picture, and marriages supply the final denouement.

NO WIND OF BLAME

Heyer described her novels as a collaborative enterprise with her husband. He devised the plots in terms of figures identified very abstractly as A, B, and C. She then supplied the characterizations:

I do these things with the assistance—and ONLY the assistance of G. R. Rougier. . . . [He] still dines out on his version of what happened over No Wind of Blame, which was a highly technical shooting mystery. . . . I DID know, broadly speaking, how the murder was committed, but I didn't clutter up my mind with the incomprehensible details. Ronald swears that he came home one evening when I was at work on the final, explanatory chapter and that I said to him: "If you're not too busy, could you tell me just how this murder was committed?"

The way in which her mystery novels were constructed may explain why Heyer's detective fiction never became as popular as that of Christie and Sayers. The witty dialogue and amusing incidents, rather than the suspense of the plot, generate the interest in Heyer's novels.

The title of No Wind of Blame is borrowed from William Shakespeare's Hamlet (1602), but the tone is vintage Heyer. It is not surprising that Ronald Rougier had to explain to his wife how the murder was committed. It requires all the ingenuity of the police to work out the complex details of the shooting. The story begins with the arrival of Prince Alexis Varashevili, a phony gigolo, who is only too willing to make up to his hostess Ermytrude Carter both before and after her husband, Wally Carter, has been murdered.

Ermytrude is a former chorus girl who dyes her hair and overdoes her makeup; her large fortune was inherited from Geoffrey Fanshawe, her first husband. In spite of her vulgarity, Ermytrude is kindhearted; she has ungrudgingly provided a home for Mary Cliffe, Wally's cousin and ward. At the end of the novel, she insists on sheltering the offspring of her husband's murderer, even though the awkwardness of assisting them is pointed out to her.

Ermytrude's daughter, Vicky Fanshawe, seems to have inherited her father's intelligence. Pretty, but not at all empty-headed, Vicky eases the atmosphere of the country house party turned into a murder case by dramatizing herself in roles, complete with appropriate costumes. Her roles range from the ingenue to the brazen hussy to Lady Jane Grey on her way to the block. Vicky blocks the prince's pursuit of her mother and promotes the suit of Robert Steel, who is strong, silent, and sincere. Both Vicky and Mary find suitable mates, and it is clear that Ermytrude will soon wed Steel.

The detectives in Heyer's mysteries function intellectually to explain the murder. In No Wind of Blame, Hemingway explains to one of his many subordinates the way a police officer should go about his work and the secrets of his success in detecting criminals:

"The secret of being a highly efficient officer," said Hemingway, fixing him with a quelling look, "is on the one hand never to expect anything, and on the other never to be surprised at anything either. You remember that, my lad, and you may do as well as I have."

A dabbler in psychology, Hemingway gets along well with the gentry whom he has to interview. His ingenuity is complemented by his common sense. He dislikes socialists, young women wearing vermillion nail polish, and men who overly decorate their apartments, but these prejudices do not interfere with his solutions to the crimes.

THEY FOUND HIM DEAD

Two of Heyer's most successful works, They Found Him Dead (1937) and Duplicate Death (1951), involve the Harte family. Lady Harte has extraordinary energy, which she expends on expeditions into the Congo, running for Parliament, and overseeing the lives of her two sons. James Kane, her eldest son by her deceased first husband, is at first the suspect and then the victim of several unsuccessful murder attempts in They Found Him Dead. Timothy Harte is the product of Lady Harte's second marriage with Sir Adrian. To protect his stepbrother from being murdered in his sleep, the youthful Timothy constructs a series of alarms that he attaches to the doorknob. Sir Adrian, who is as vague and urbane as his wife is energetic, naturally sets off the alarm while looking for a book.

When his stepson's fiancée tells Sir Adrian that he can afford to be calm, because Jim is neither his fiancé nor his own son, Sir Adrian replies: "Certainly not in the least like my fiance. And, I am happy to say, not much like my own son either. Though I have no doubt that Timothy will improve as he grows older." It comes as no surprise to the reader that Sir Adrian has already figured out the identity of the murderer before the police reveal it.

DUPLICATE DEATH

In Duplicate Death, Timothy, grown up and a solicitor, has fallen in love with Beulah Birtley, a sullen young woman, who Lady Harte fears is an adventuress. Beulah is employed as a secretary by the sinister Mrs. Haddington, whose blond-haired daughter Cynthia is as pretty as she is vacuous and self-centered. James Kane comes to town to inspect Beulah Birtley and arrives just in time for, first, the murder of Dan Seaton-Carew during a game of duplicate bridge and, second, the murder of Mrs. Haddington in a manner that duplicates the first. It turns out that Beulah was framed for forgery and has spent time in prison, a fact that engages Lady Harte's sympathies and wins her support of the marriage.

In Duplicate Death, in a rare moment of self-revelation and with impeccable wit, Heyer describes Timothy's reaction to being asked about one of his mother's books, a book that he has not read:

Timothy, who shared with his half-brother, Mr. James Kane, an ineradicable conviction that the Second World War had been inaugurated by providence to put an end to their beloved but very trying parent's passion for exploring remote quarters of the globe, bowed, and murmured one of the conventional acknowledgements with which the more astute relatives of an author take care to equip themselves.

Mysteries are more acceptable to critics than romances, so it is not surprising that Heyer's detective fiction has received more critical attention than her Regency romances. For Heyer, however, detective fiction was less profitable; her last detective novel was written in 1953, twenty-one years before her death in 1974. With her twelve books in the mystery and detective genre, she contributed substantially to the tradition of the English country-house mystery, producing a unique blend of humor and crime.

Jean R. Brink

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

SUPERINTENDENT HANNASYDE AND SERGEANT HEMINGWAY SERIES: Death in the Stocks, 1935 (also known as Merely Murder); Behold Here's Poison!, 1936; They Found Him Dead, 1937; A Blunt Instrument, 1938; No Wind of Blame, 1939; Envious Casca, 1941; Duplicate Death, 1951; Detection Unlimited, 1953

NONSERIES NOVELS: Footsteps in the Dark, 1932; Why Shoot a Butler?, 1933; The Unfinished Clue, 1934; Penhallow, 1942

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: 1921-1930 • The Black Moth, 1921; Instead of the Thorn, 1923; Powder and Patch, 1923 (also known as The Transformation of Philip Jettan); The Great Roxhythe, 1923; Simon the Coldheart, 1925; These Old Shades, 1926; Helen, 1928; The Masqueraders, 1928; Beauvallet, 1929; Pastel, 1929; Barren Corn, 1930

1931-1940 • The Conqueror, 1931; Devil's Cub, 1932; The Convenient Marriage, 1934; Regency Buck, 1935; The Talisman Ring, 1936; An Infamous Army, 1937; Royal Escape, 1938; The Corinthian, 1940; The Spanish Bride, 1940

1941-1950 • Beau Wyndham, 1941; Faro's Daughter, 1941; Friday's Child, 1944; The Reluctant Widow, 1946; The Foundling, 1948; Arabella, 1949; The Grand Sophy, 1950

1951-1960 • The Quiet Gentleman, 1951; Cotillion, 1953; The Toll-Gate, 1954; Bath Tangle, 1955; Sprig Muslin, 1956; April Lady, 1957; Sylvester: Or, The Wicked Uncle, 1957; Venetia, 1958; The Unknown Ajax, 1959

1961-1975 • A Civil Contract, 1961; The None-such, 1962; False Colours, 1963; Frederica, 1965; Black Sheep, 1966; Cousin Kate, 1968; Charity Girl, 1970; Lady of Quality, 1972; My Lord John, 1975

SHORT FICTION: Pistols for Two, and Other Stories, 1960

RADIO PLAY: The Toll-Gate, 1974

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bargainnier, Earl K. "The Dozen Mysteries of Georgette Heyer." Clues: A Journal of Detection 3 (Fall/Winter, 1982): 30-39. Brief but comprehensive overview of all twelve of Heyer's mystery novels.

Boucher, Anthony. Introduction to A Blunt Instrument. Oxford, England: William Heinemann, 1966. Appreciation of Heyer's novel written by a fellow author of crime fiction.

Byatt, A. S. "Miss Georgette Heyer." The Times (London). July 6, 1974. Heyer's obituary, written by the author of Possession.

Fahnestock-Thomas, Mary, ed. Georgette Heyer: A Critical Retrospective. Saraland, Ala.: Priddy-World Press, 2001. This hefty volume includes several of Heyer's uncollected short stories and essays, as well as book reviews, criticism, and a bibliography of her works and film and theater reviews of their theatrical and cinematic adaptations.

Hodge, Jane Aiken. The Private World of Georgette Heyer. London: Bodley Head, 1984. Covers Heyer's romantic and historical fiction, as well as her mystery stories.

Klein, Kathleen Gregory, ed. Great Women Mystery Writers: Classic to Contemporary. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1994. Contains an essay on Heyer's life and works.

Kloester, Jennifer. Georgette Heyer's Regency World. London: William Heinemann, 2005. While focused on Heyer's historical fiction, this study provides many insights into the role and importance of setting in her work.

CARL HIAASEN

Born: Fort Lauderdale, Florida; March 12, 1953

Types of plot: Comedy caper; amateur sleuth; private investigator

CONTRIBUTION

Carl Hiaasen is noted for creating a distinctive landscape filled with Florida's social, political, and environmental issues and ills. His fictional world is populated by an array of bizarre cliché-flouting characters, from reporters who become reluctant investigators to ludicrously grotesque villains and environmental avengers such as a former governor and ecological fanatic turned Everglades hermit. Within his world Hiaasen creates wildly absurdist situations laced with his own particular humor while reflecting a strong environmental consciousness. His years as an investigative reporter and columnist for the Miami Herald have given him a keen insight into Florida's ills, which he attacks in his novels. His investigative reporting has won many significant awards and finalist status for the Pulitzer Prize on two occasions, and his novels, which combine sociopolitical satire, black humor, broad slapstick, and environmental criticism, have achieved both a critical and popular following and appear in bookstores nationwide. His distinctive style, themes, and satiric wit, which he uses to call attention to corporate greed, government corruption, and the destruction of his beloved Florida wilderness, offer a black-comedy world not yet rivaled by other authors of crime and detective fiction. Like Elmore Leonard, Hiaasen has taken crime fiction into the mainstream by subverting old formulas with matters of social and environmental importance. His place in the canon of contemporary authors seems assured.

BIOGRAPHY

The son of a lawyer and a teacher, Carl Hiaasen was born and raised in south Florida. Having received his first typewriter at an early age, he forged a satirical voice by publishing an underground newsletter in high school. Hiaasen married Connie Lyford in 1970, attended Emory University, where he submitted satiric pieces to the school newspaper, and then transferred to the University of Florida, graduating with a journalism degree in 1974. After beginning his writing career at Cocoa Today (now Florida Today), he joined the Miami Herald in 1976 and gained recognition as an investigative reporter. As a reporter, he has focused on developments and projects that threaten Florida's ecology and natural beauty for the sake of profit. He became a Pulitzer Prize finalist for a series on doctors committing malpractice in 1980 and for a series on drug smuggling in 1981. Since 1985 Hiaasen has been writing a weekly column that has been known to irritate regional developers and bureaucrats, who blame him for discouraging tourism. For his journalism and commentary advocating the preservation of Florida's ecology, Hiaasen received the Damon Runyon Award from the Denver Press Club in 2003-2004, the Newspaper Guild's Heywood Broun Award, and honors from the Florida Society of Newspaper Editors.

Hiaasen began writing fiction in 1981, when he and William D. Montalbano (a former Miami Herald editor) collaborated to write three novels drawing on their experience as reporters and relying on detective and adventure fiction formulas. In 1986 the author ventured out on his own with Tourist Season and has continued to write mystery and detective fiction as well as novels for young adults and nonfiction. His novels reflect his offbeat imagination and satirical comic sense and are infused with social and political awareness, often centering on south Florida environmental concerns. Beginning in 1987, his fiction became more socially pointed and comical: He wrote, for example, of corruption in the fishing world (Double Whammy, 1987); corrupt plastic surgeons and feckless lawyers (Skin Tight, 1989); dishonest, ecology-destroying landowners (Native Tongue, 1991), and greed and iniquity in the wake of a devastating hurricane (Stormy Weather, 1995). Deviating from his normal mode in 1996, he joined with twelve other authors to write Naked Came the Manatee, an absurdly fast-paced mystery originally published in serial form in the Miami Herald's magazine section, which brought together noted characters associated with each author.

In 1998 Hiaasen focused on the Walt Disney Company, describing with wild humor the company's international aspirations in the nonfictional Team Rodent: How Disney Devours the World. In 1999, Kick Ass:

Carl Hiaasen. (Elena Seibert)

Selected Columns of Carl Hiaasen appeared, followed by Paradise Screwed: Selected Columns of Carl Hiaasen in 2001.

After Sick Puppy (2000) and Basket Case (2002), two more novels featuring the Hiaasen's distinctive humor and convoluted crime situations, he wrote his first novel for the young-adult market, Hoot (2002). It won the Newberry Honor for excellence in children's literature. The story deals with the danger facing burrowing owls owing to greedy land developers. A second young-adult novel, Flush (2005), dealt with illegal sewage dumping off the Florida coast. The author's 2006 comic caper, Nature Girl, introduced within his socially conscious agenda such zany characters as a bipolar heroine intent on improving the world, a hapless telemarketer, and a Seminole failed alligator wrestler.

Hiaasen was divorced from his first wife in 1996; his son from that marriage is a newspaper reporter. He married Fenia Clizer in 1999 and settled with her and their son in the Florida Keys. Hiaasen's fiction mirrors his passion as an environmentally concerned Floridian and journalist.

ANALYSIS

As an investigative reporter for the Miami Herald, Carl Hiaasen focused on the corruption in the business world and in politics that negatively affected the Florida environment. The issues and the people that served as fodder for his columns are fictionalized in his novels, forming the basis for outlandish characters and situations. The novels that Hiaasen coauthored with fellow journalist William B. Montalbano are conventional works of detective and action fiction encompassing such subjects as the cocaine trade, smuggling, and murder on foreign soil. These novels do not have the characteristics that make Hiaasen's later work noteworthy. Hiaasen introduced his distinctive style and themes in his first solo novel, Tourist Season. Claiming that Florida produces stories and people as bizarre as those in his novels, Hiaasen created a distinctive genre of comedy mysteries, also described as environmental thrillers, which hold a world of out-sized ecology-destroying crooks and promoters, greedy businessmen, corrupt politicians, obtuse tourists, confused retirees, hard-luck rednecks, and crazed ecoteurs. The writer views this world with a sardonic eye and a wildly absurdist wit that stings any who by thought or deed threaten the environment in south Florida or who in any way deceive their fellow citizens.

Hiaasen protagonists who stand against crooked schemers include journalists who have become amateur detectives, former state investigators turned fishermen, a private investigator, and occasionally a woman. Usually central characters, after dealing with absurdly outlandish complications, are successful in preventing bad guys from achieving their unlawful, often antienvironmental ends, and they frequently contribute to such villains meeting an outrageously funny demise, such as a hit man impaled on a stuffed swordfish.

TOURIST SEASON

Hiaasen's first solo novel, Tourist Season, allowed him to give full rein to his offbeat humor and imagination. A group of fanatic but inept activists want to rid Florida of all perceived problems by terrorizing its tourists and developers. Tourists are kidnapped, thrown into a pool, and awarded freedom if they can swim across it without being eaten by the resident alligator—but none make it. A local politician's body is discovered in a suitcase with a toy alligator in his throat, and an Orange Bowl Queen is kidnapped during a game by one of the terrorists who is a former Miami Dolphins football star. The leader of the militant environmentalists is Skip Wiley, a former columnist for the Miami Herald whose lawless, militant measures probably represent many of Hiaasen's own fantasies. Protagonist Brian Keyes, a reporter turned private investigator, eventually solves the mystery, saves the Orange Bowl Queen, and confronts the ecoterrorist leader before the latter is blown up on an island rezoned for dynamiting. The last act of the wounded leader before the island explodes is to climb a tree to put a nested eagle to flight.

DOUBLE WHAMMY

The comic mystery Double Whammy combines Florida landscape overdevelopment with a story of rigged big-money bass-fishing tournaments. Protagonist R. J. Decker, a news photographer turned private detective, is hired to investigate wrongdoing on the bass-fishing circuit. Decker enlists the help of a deranged hermit named Clinton "Skink" Tyree, a former Florida governor whose idealism caused him to vacate his office when the surrounding corruption became unbearable and to flee into the swamp where he ate roadkill and became a prankster-ecoterrorist. Skink is a wildly bizarre figure who appears in three other Hiaasen novels (Sick Puppy, Native Tongue, and Stormy Weather) but becomes more of a teacher-helper than avenger. In Double Whammy, Decker and Skink discover nefarious connections among bass-fishing tournaments, television shows, an outdoor Christian network, and an evangelist real-estate developer who has built his newest lake-and-town project on a polluted landfill that will not sustain aquatic life. The novel also includes a macabre murderer who threatens victims by carrying a pit bull's severed head locked onto his arm. Critical comments praise the writing style and macabre-funny aspects of the plot, and a sports magazine has commended Hiaasen's comprehensive knowledge of the cheating schemes plaguing fishing tournaments as well as the political corruption depriving Florida of much of its wetlands.

NATIVE TONGUE

Hiaasen, for the source of his plot in Native Tongue, again turns to such south Florida issues as multiple theme parks, endangered species, and overdevelopment. The hero, Joe Winder, is a burned-out newspaperman reduced to being a public relations hack for a Walt Disney World Resort-like theme park in the Florida Keys. The park is owned by a mobster in the federal Witness Protection Program who wants to further develop Key Largo by bulldozing land and erecting condominiums and golf courses. However, his plans fall apart when two endangered mango voles, part of a popular park exhibit, disappear and Winder and former governor Skink conspire to thwart his plans. The intrigue culminates in the park's burning down and the landscape's being temporarily undisturbed. The ruthless developer is ultimately killed by a hit man as a result of his past organized-crime connections. However, the novel's most outlandish villain is a chief of security so reliant on steroids that he drags an intravenous infusion set along with him. Although he menaces Winder, he meets a perverse fate by drowning in a water tank while being sodomized by the park's performing dolphin. Most reviewers found the novel inventive, satirically rich, and convincing in conveying an environmental message.

STRIP TEASE

The first Hiaasen novel to make the best-seller list, Strip Tease, is perhaps the best known owing to its adaptation as a motion picture in 1996 with Demi Moore and Burt Reynolds. However, more significant, it marks Hiaasen's first woman protagonist. Erin Grant is a well-realized and sympathetic character who dances at a topless club to make enough money to gain custody of her child from her former husband, a petty thief specializing in stolen wheelchairs. When an unbalanced politician develops an unhealthy attraction to Erin, he sets in motion a chain of events that end in murder. The novel encompasses corrupt politicians controlled by ruthless sugar-industry magnates with Cuban interests and touches on custody battles and feminist concerns about women forced to strip to earn a living. The villains are less comic than in preceding novels, yet blackly humorous elements are not lacking. Among them are a widely known congressman slathered head to foot in Vaseline, death by a golf club, and the mad search for a snake to replace the deceased prop of one stripper. The novel, superior to its screen adaptation, is an effective indictment of the powerful sugar lobby wrapped in a black comedy about upscale strip clubs.

SKINNY DIP

In this screwball Florida escapade treating anti-environmental crooks, villain Chaz Perrone, an inept, shady marine scientist hopes to make a fast buck by doctoring water samples so that a ruthless agribusiness tycoon can continue to illegally dump fertilizer into the endangered Everglades. When Perrone suspects that his wife, Joey, has learned about his scam, he pushes her overboard from a cruise liner in the Atlantic. However, unbeknown to him, his wife survives the fall by clinging to a bale of Jamaican pot and is pulled from the ocean by Mick Stranahan, a retired investigator for the Florida State Attorney's Office who is now a loner fisherman in a waterfront bungalow. Mick, making a second appearance as a Hiaasen protagonist (the first was in Skin Tight), persuades Joey not to immediately report her husband's crime to the police, but instead to play dead and with Mick's help to bedevil Perrone until he incriminates himself and gives away his scam. Joey proceeds to taunt and haunt her homicidal husband, whose nerves become so frayed that his work suffers. His erratic behavior causes his cohorts in pollution to grow uneasy. Meanwhile Mick finds that despite six failed marriages and island solitude, he is still capable of romance. Mick and Joey, as a team, survive and overcome attacks from the villains, exact revenge on Perrone, and affectionately find each other. The story is an engaging, amusing, and satirical romp with ever-present Hiaasen environmental themes. More than a few critics have noted that the novel marks the author at the top of his comic form and brings back an appealing protagonist who may well appear again. The novel has been considered for screenplay adaptation.

Christian H. Moe

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: Powder Burn, 1981 (with William D. Montalbano); Trap Line, 1982 (with Montalbano); A Death in China, 1984 (with Montalbano); Tourist Season, 1986; Double Whammy, 1987; Skin Tight, 1989; Native Tongue, 1991; Strip Tease, 1993; Stormy Weather, 1995; Lucky You, 1997; Sick Puppy, 2000; Basket Case, 2002; Skinny Dip, 2004; Nature Girl, 2006

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

SHORT FICTION: Naked Came the Manatee, 1996 (with others); Tart of Darkness (2003, Sports Illustrated)

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: Hoot, 2002; Flush, 2005

NONFICTION: Team Rodent: How Disney Devours the World, 1998; Kick Ass: Selected Columns of Carl Hiaasen, 1999; Paradise Screwed: Selected Columns of Carl Hiaasen, 2001

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Brannon, Julie Sloan. "The Rules Are Different Here: South Florida Noir and the Grotesque." In Crime Fiction and Film in the Sunshine State, edited by Steve Glassman and Maurice O'Sullivan. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1997. Describes grotesquery in the characters, events, and settings of novels by Hiaasen and Charles Willeford and stresses that both writers paint south Florida as a bizarre place operating under different rules from normal society.

"Carl Hiaasen." Current Biography Yearbook 1997, edited by Elizabeth A. Schick. New York: Wilson, 1997. Well-detailed account of relationship between the author's career as an investigative journalist and the dominant themes of his fiction.

Grunwald, Michael. "Swamp Things." The New Republic, November 15, 2004, 33-37. Discusses the novel Skinny Dip and its author's environmental concerns with the south Florida ecosystem.

Hiaasen, Carl. Carl Hiaasen Official Web Site. <http://www.carlhiaasen.com>. The author's Web site offers information on the author's life as well as his novels, a bibliography, and interviews with Hiaasen that are of particular interest.

Horsley, Lee. Twentieth-Century Crime Fiction. New York: Oxford University Press, 2005. Chapter examines the use of crime fiction as a sociopolitical critique, including the destruction of the Florida environment. Contains a discussion of Hiaasen's Stormy Weather.

Nyberg, Ramesh. "Murder, Mayhem and Mirth: An Interview with Carl Hiaasen." Writer's Digest 75 (January, 1995): 38-40. Interviewer lucidly identifies Hiaasen's use of humor, satire, and his personal value system in his works, as he draws the author out about the origin and characters of several novels.

PATRICIA HIGHSMITH

Born: Fort Worth, Texas; January 19, 1921

Died: Locarno, Switzerland; February 4, 1995

Also wrote as Claire Morgan

Types of plot: Inverted; psychological; thriller

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Tom Ripley, 1955-1993

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

TOM RIPLEY, a New Yorker, became an American expatriate at the age of twenty-six. Once married to the spoiled Heloise Plisson, he was also a fringe member of French high society at one time. In his small chateau in a village outside Paris, he leads an apparently quiet life, yet has committed several murders and managed narrow escapes from the law and those dear to his victims. Occasionally sensitive and generally witty and charming, Ripley is a bold psychopath.

CONTRIBUTION

Patricia Highsmith's novels and short stories have been considered by critics to be among the very best work in modern crime fiction. Her highly original suspense novels, closer to the tradition of Fyodor Dostoevski than to the Golden Age of mysteries, are noted for the intriguing portrayal of characters who inadvertently become involved in crime, perhaps imagining committing a crime or carrying the guilt for a crime that goes undetected. Acute psychological studies of such antiheroes, together with complex plot structure, precise prose, and suspenseful development of unease within a finely drawn context, characterize her work. Highsmith's focus on crimes committed by ordinary people in moments of malaise suggests that the lines between good and evil, guilty and innocent, and sanity and insanity are indeed problematic.

BIOGRAPHY

Patricia Highsmith was born on January 19, 1921, in Fort Worth, Texas, the daughter of Jay Bernard Plangman and Mary Coates Plangman, later Highsmith. By the time she was born, her mother had left her father and started a relationship with a man who would become her stepfather, Stanley Highsmith, an illustrator for telephone directory advertisements. Her mother, also a commercial artist, was quite talented. Highsmith was reared by her beloved grandparents until the age of six, when she joined her mother in New York City. Highsmith recalled her childhood years with her mother and stepfather as a kind of hell, in part because of their ever-increasing arguments. She never had a close relationship with her mother.

While attending Julia Richman High School, Highsmith was the editor of the school newspaper and went on to receive a bachelor's degree from Barnard College in 1942. She began writing at seventeen and published her first short story, "The Heroine," in Harper's Bazaar. To a remarkable degree, Highsmith's first stories set the pattern for her career. Her first novel, Strangers on a Train (1950), was made into a film by Alfred Hitchcock. In the late 1940's, she was also involved in political activism, not unlike the female protagonist of her novel Edith's Diary (1977). Her popular novel The Talented Mr. Ripley (1955) was nominated for the Mystery Writers of America's Edgar Allan Poe Award in 1956 and received the Grand Prix de Littérature Policière in 1957. In 1964, The Two Faces of January received the Crime Writers' Association's Silver Dagger Award for the best foreign crime novel of the year. Although Highsmith was highly lauded in her native country, Europeans took her work even more seriously, as evidenced by a greater number of interviews and critical studies as well as by sales figures.

Patricia Highsmith. (© Hope Curtis)

After 1963, Highsmith lived in Europe. Although she was engaged to be married at one time, she was a lesbian and preferred to live alone most of her adult life. She enjoyed cats, gardening, carpentry, and travel and resided in many European countries. Highsmith painted, sculpted, daydreamed, and above all wrote: She tried to write eight pages daily, and her prose bears witness to a fine craftsmanship. She died in Switzerland in 1995.

ANALYSIS

Patricia Highsmith's novel Strangers on a Train demonstrates her ingenious opening gambits (two strangers agree to murder each other's logical victim, thus allowing for alibis while avoiding all suspicion), her depiction of the double, and the play with and against the strictures of crime fiction. Carefully developed suspense leads not to the detection or punishment of the criminal but to an odyssey through the minds of the perpetrators of violence.

Within the bounds of the suspense thriller genre, as Anthony Channell Hilfer observes, Highsmith capitalizes on various features: the psychological dimensions of a hero whose morality tends toward the unconventional and the absence of the central detective figure. She builds suspense in Strangers on a Train, as in The Talented Mr. Ripley and other novels in the Ripley series, by the vacillation in the characters' minds that may or may not lead them into murder and the fear or danger of exposure for criminal acts. A counterpoint between the thoughts and deeds of a seemingly ordinary person and one who invents his own rules, or "morality," creates a riveting psychological tension that focuses the works.

The reader is thus thrilled and intrigued, waiting to see what will happen next while experiencing a precarious excitement in a world not exempt from violence, nerve-racking police visits, and corpses. Nevertheless, the genre's array of devices is handled adroitly by Highsmith, who can make of improbable situations a believable and illuminating relationship between characters and their social milieu. Her originality resides, to some extent, in her refusal to tie up ends into a comforting package for the reader. Unexpected endings provide a twist of sorts, but the reader is prepared for them because of the gradual buildup of motifs in contrast to sensational devices used by less skillful writers. The presence of suicide, doubt, or anxiety rather than neat resolutions marks her novels from beginning to end.

Highsmith's most daring departure from the crime-fiction genre is the total evasion of conventional morality intrinsic in even the hard-boiled detective stories. She indicates one reason that she rejects "boring" expectations of justice: "The public wants to see the law triumph, or at least the general public does, though at the same time the public likes brutality. The brutality must be on the right side however."

The intense engagement of readers in the novels' psychic process is especially noteworthy in Highsmith. Her readers feel anxiety and confusion not unlike that of the characters. For example, the moral dilemmas experienced by Bernard Tufts in Ripley Under Ground (1970) or Howard Ingham of The Tremor of Forgery (1969) are placed squarely on the reader. One is drawn inside the skin of one or two characters who in turn obsessively observe one or two others. This compulsive spying within the novel has its counterpart in the reader's voyeuristic role. Readers' discomfort also stems from the narrator's abstention from explicit moral judgment, effected both by the apparently logical, impartial presentation of events told from the interior view of one or two protagonists and by the fact that criminals are not apprehended (their apprehension would restore order). Furthermore, most readers would find it difficult, indeed morally repulsive, to identify with psychopaths such as Charles Bruno of Strangers on a Train or Ripley. Nevertheless, Ripley at least has enough charm, verve, and plausibility to awaken fascination and abhorrence simultaneously. The reader's unease is a mirror of the process in the interior world: Guy Haines reacts to Bruno in Strangers on a Train and Jonathan Trevanny to Ripley in Ripley's Game (1974) with a similar love/hate, as both Guy and Jonathan are insidiously induced into acts they would not ordinarily contemplate.

The uncanny relationship between pairs (of men, usually) is a recurrent theme that Highsmith discusses in her book Plotting and Writing Suspense Fiction (1966): Her recurrent pattern "is the relationship between two men, usually quite different in make-up, sometimes obviously the good and the evil, sometimes merely ill-matched friends." Acknowledging the necessity of sympathy for criminals, because she writes about them, Highsmith finds them "dramatically interesting, because for a time at least they are active, free in spirit, and they do not knuckle down to anyone." Ripley, with his bravado and creative imagination, is a perfect example of the criminal-as-hero who can be liked by the reader. His ability to influence others, as well as his willingness to take great risks to fashion his own life and identity, make him in some sense "heroic." Bruno of Strangers on a Train is of a somewhat different ilk, as his creator points out: "I think it is also possible to make a hero-psychopath one hundred percent sick and revolting, and still make him fascinating for his blackness and all-around depravity." Bruno's evil character is necessarily offset by the good character of Guy, who thus provides the reader with a likable hero. Other Highsmith characters, such as Howard Ingham of The Tremor of Forgery, are less attractive to readers because of their indecisiveness, but few are as repulsive as the obnoxious Ralph Linderman of Found in the Street (1986) or Kenneth Rowajinski of A Dog's Ransom (1972).

Highsmith's male characters are rather a sorry lot—hopeless, weak, suicidal, or psychopathic—while the women depicted are usually vivid and secondary. Her male protagonists are nevertheless compelling, probably because they are more true to life than readers may like to admit—perhaps also because of the intensity of their depiction, a point stressed by the author herself and the critic and novelist Julian Symons.

Like her audacious creature Ripley, Highsmith pushes things to the limit, not only problems of reader identification but also plot plausibility. She has a predilection for unusual plots that "stretch the reader's credulity." If the plot idea is not entirely original, she finds a new twist. To make the corpse-in-rug theme amusing (in The Story-Teller, 1965), she decides to have no corpse in it at all:

In this case, the person carrying the carpet would have to be suspected of murder, would have to be seen carrying the carpet (perhaps in a furtive manner), would have to be a bit of a joker.

To this renovated device, she adds the idea of a writer-hero who confuses the line between reality and fiction, thus exploring the everyday schizophrenia that she believes all people possess to some degree.

Although Highsmith stated that entertainment was an explicit goal and moral lessons have no place in art, her desire to explore human behavior and morality are demonstrated by the precise social milieu and character development in her work. Part of her success can be attributed to the accurate conveyance of emotions and "felt experiences." Murder, as she says, "is often an extension of anger, an extension to the point of insanity or temporary insanity." Furthermore, Highsmith was interested in the interplay between social issues and psychological factors, as demonstrated by her depiction of the deleterious effects of incarceration on an individual in The Glass Cell (1964) and the degraded position of women in society in Edith's Diary. The characters who reflect a standard morality gone awry—Ralph and his old-fashioned views in Found in the Street or OWL and his patriotic fervor in The Tremor of Forgery—are often depicted quite negatively. Social criticism, though, is less important to Highsmith's work than the exploration of human psychology.

Although violence, aggression, anxiety, guilt, and the interplay between the hunter and hunted are essential to her novels, Highsmith was a master at conveying a range of emotions, sensations, and moods. She recorded minutely her characters' physical appearance, dress, and surroundings along with their musings and actions; in her view, “The setting and the people must be seen clearly as a photograph.”

STRANGERS ON A TRAIN

The stylistic arrangement of words on a page, intrinsic to narration, is particularly important in the rhythm and mood set from the beginning of any Highsmith novel. Highsmith said that she prefers a beginning sentence “in which something moves and gives action,” for example, the opening words of Strangers on a Train: “The train tore along with an angry, irregular rhythm.” Very quickly, she sets up the initial situation of the novel: Guy, as restless as the train, wants to divorce his wife, Miriam, but fears that she may refuse. Thus, the reader understands his mood, appearance, and problem within the first page. Guy’s vulnerability and initial outflow of conversation with the manipulative Charles Bruno prove to be his undoing. Their ensuing relationship fulfills Bruno’s plan that Guy murder Bruno’s hated father in exchange for the murder of Guy’s wife.

THE TALENTED MR. RIPLEY

The opening paragraph of The Talented Mr. Ripley is a fine example of the economical use of language:

Tom glanced behind him and saw the man coming out of the Green Cage, heading his way. Tom walked faster. There was no doubt that the man was after him. Tom had noticed him five minutes ago, eyeing him carefully from a table, as if he weren’t quite sure, but almost. He had looked sure enough for Tom to down his drink in a hurry, pay and get out.

The sentences are brief and direct and immediately create a mood of apprehension. The dramatic, “frenetic” prose as Highsmith described it, is in perfect consonance with Ripley’s character, the rapid action of the plot, and the underlying Kafkaesque tone. Very soon, readers realize that Ripley is afraid of being arrested, a fear underlined subtly throughout the series even though he is never caught. His choice to live on the edge, perfectly established in the beginning, has a rhythmic counterpoint in Ripley’s humor and élan that come into play later.

RIPLEY UNDER GROUND

As the Ripley series develops, there is an escalation in crime, and Ripley’s initial (faint) qualms give way to a totally psychopathic personality. At the same time, by the second book in the series, Ripley Under Ground, he is very suave and aesthetically discerning. The ambience of life in Villeperce, the town outside Paris where Ripley resides, complete with small château and wealthy wife, Héloïse, faithful and circumspect housekeeper, Madame Annette, and the local shops and neighbors are recorded thoroughly. The precise sensory descriptions in all of Highsmith’s novels reveal her familiarity with the geographic locations she evokes.

THE BOY WHO FOLLOWED RIPLEY

Highsmith also conveys meticulously Ripley’s sometimes endearing and more often horrifying traits. For example, he is very fond of language and wordplay and often looks up French words in the dictionary. His taste in music, finely delineated, has a theatrical function that weaves through the entire series. In the fourth of the Ripley series, The Boy Who Followed Ripley (1980), Tom enjoys the good humor of a Berlin bar:

It gave Tom a lift, as A Midsummer Night’s Dream overture always gave him a lift before he went into battle. Fantasy! Courage was all imaginary, anyway, a matter of a mental state. A sense of reality did not help when one was faced with a gun barrel or a knife.

He buys presents for Héloïse at the most improbable moments (right after successfully accomplishing a murder, for example).

In contrast to Highsmith’s often depressed or anxious characters, Ripley’s humor is highlighted: As he sees advertisements for inflatable dolls in the newspaper, he muses,

How did one blow them up, Tom wondered. It would take all the breath out of a man to do it, and what would a man’s housekeeper or his friends say, if they saw a bicycle pump and no bicycle in his apartment? Funnier, Tom thought, if a man just took the doll along to his garage with his car, and asked the attendant to blow her up for him. And if the man’s housekeeper found the doll in bed and thought it was a corpse? Or opened a closet door and a doll fell out on her?

The reader might surmise that Highsmith pokes fun at and lauds her own craft simultaneously. With Ripley, Highsmith has created a character who is so inventive that he seems to write himself. Ripley is one of those rare “persons” who does not feel enough guilt to “let it seriously trouble him” no matter how many murders he commits.

THE TREMOR OF FORGERY

Other Highsmith novels, such as her favorite, The Tremor of Forgery, deal with less dramatic characters and plots. Although this novel portrays Ingham’s fascinating experience in Tunisia, the pace is deliberately slower and the implications of Ingham’s moral judgments are probed in a subtle way quite different from that of the Ripley series. The vertigo of Ingham’s Tunisia, as he attempts to grasp the meaning of love, morality, and his own emotions, is reminiscent of the work of Henry James, E. M. Forster, and André Gide rather than a typical suspense novel. Indeed, Howard Ingham never discovers whether he inadvertently killed an unknown intruder one evening, an incident that carries a symbolic significance throughout most of the novel (and one that remains an open question at the end for the reader as well). The novel ends with the same sense of slow expectation with which it commenced, perfectly in tune with Ingham’s doubts. Readers are even more engaged in the puzzling world of this novel than in that of the Ripley novels, simply because the latter are more resolved, more pat perhaps. In her fiction, Highsmith conjures up a variety of worlds in their interior and exterior facets, with a style that transcends simple categorization and delights her uneasy readers.

During her lifetime, several of Highsmith’s works were the basis for screen adaptations, including Alfred Hitchcock’s masterful rendering of Strangers on a Train in 1951 (another remake, Once You Kiss a Stranger, was released in 1969) and René Clement’s stunning Purple Moon (from The Talented Mr. Ripley) in 1960 starring Alain Delon. While both the Hitchcock and Clement films were cinematic classics, Highsmith later revised her thinking on granting film rights to her books. She disliked the tampering usually dictated by Hollywood, the omissions and additions to curry favor or in pursuit of maximum appeal—so she insisted on a contract clause that her books not be mentioned as the basis for a film unless she expressly gave her approval to do so. Such a clause, while legally difficult to enforce, did not give all directors pause as evidenced by the number of her books optioned for films.

At the end of the twentieth century, scores of filmgoers were given a new taste of Highsmith, with a stunning version of The Talented Mr. Ripley from Academy Award-winning director Anthony Minghella. Starring Matt Damon as Ripley, the film was both a critical and box office success, replete with Oscar nominations. Although Minghella was not completely faithful to Highsmith’s 1955 masterpiece, he believed that she would have appreciated the finished product had she lived to see it. “If I were to please anyone with this adaptation,” Minghella noted in a press release, “I would have liked it to have been her.”

Marie Murphy

Updated by Fiona Kelleghan and
Taryn Benbow-Pfalzgraf

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

TOM RIPLEY SERIES: The Talented Mr. Ripley, 1955; Ripley Under Ground, 1970; Ripley’s Game, 1974; The Boy Who Followed Ripley, 1980; The Mysterious Mr. Ripley, 1985 (contains The Talented Mr. Ripley, Ripley Under Ground, and Ripley’s Game); Ripley Under Water, 1991

NONSERIES NOVELS: Strangers on a Train, 1950; The Blunderer, 1954 (also known as Lament for a Lover, 1956); Deep Water, 1957; A Game for the Living, 1958; This Sweet Sickness, 1960; The Cry of the Owl, 1962; The Two Faces of January, 1964; The Glass Cell, 1964; The Story-Teller, 1965 (also known as A Suspension of Mercy, 2001); Those Who Walk Away, 1967; The Tremor of Forgery, 1969; A Dog’s Ransom, 1972; Edith’s Diary, 1977; People Who Knock on the Door, 1983; Found in the Street, 1986

OTHER SHORT FICTION: The Snail-Watcher, and Other Stories, 1970 (also known as Eleven); Kleine Geschichten für Weiberfeinde, 1974 (Little Tales of Misogyny, 1977); The Animal-Lover’s Book of Beastly Murder, 1975; Slowly, Slowly in the Wind, 1979; The Black House, 1981; Mermaids on the Golf Course, and Other Stories, 1985; Tales of Natural and Unnatural Catastrophes, 1987; The Selected Stories of Patricia Highsmith, 2001; Nothing That Meets the Eye: The Uncollected Stories of Patricia Highsmith, 2002

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: The Price of Salt, 1952 (as Morgan; also known as Carol); Small g: A Summer Idyll, 1995

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: Miranda the Panda Is on the Veranda, 1958 (with Doris Sanders)

NONFICTION: Plotting and Writing Suspense Fiction, 1966

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bloom, Harold, ed. "Patricia Highsmith." In Lesbian and Bisexual Fiction Writers. Philadelphia: Chelsea House, 1997. Highsmith is discussed by several scholars of gay and lesbian studies, who contextualize her work in terms of that discipline. Bibliographic references.

Cochran, David. "'Some Torture That Perversely Eased': Patricia Highsmith and the Schizophrenia of American Life." In America Noir. Washington, D.C.: Smithsonian Institution, 2000. A work of cultural criticism focused on the repressed tensions of American culture that produce symptomatic structures in Highsmith's fiction.

Dubose, Martha Hailey, with Margaret Caldwell Thomas. Women of Mystery: The Lives and Works of Notable Women Crime Novelists. New York: St. Martin's Minotaur, 2000. Highsmith's works and life experiences are compared to those of Margery Allingham and Dorothy L. Sayers, among others. Bibliographic references and index.

Harrison, Russell. Patricia Highsmith. New York: Twayne, 1997. This first book-length study of Highsmith in English explores the aesthetic, philosophical, and sociopolitical dimensions of her writing.

Hilfer, Anthony Channell. "Not Really Such a Monster: Highsmith's Ripley as Thriller Protagonist and Protean Man." Midwest Quarterly: A Journal of Contemporary Thought 25 (Summer, 1984): 361-374. Hilfer studies Highsmith's Ripley as a "subversive variation" of a suspense thriller protagonist, one through which Highsmith flouts moral and literary expectations. He argues that Ripley's lack of a determinate identity makes his role-playing credible.

Lindsay, Elizabeth Blakesley, ed. "Patricia Highsmith." In Great Women Mystery Writers. 2d ed. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2007. Essay containing biographical detail as well as analysis of her works.

Meaker, Marijane. Highsmith: A Romance of the 1950's, a Memoir. San Francisco: Cleis Press, 2003. A portrait of Highsmith written by a woman who had a relationship with her.

Summers, Claude J., ed. Gay and Lesbian Literary Heritage. New York: H. Holt, 1995. Includes an excellent essay by Gina Macdonald on Highsmith's life work to the time of her death in 1995.

Tolkin, Michael. "In Memory of Patricia Highsmith." Los Angeles Times Book Review, February 12, 1995, p. 8. A tribute to Highsmith as "our best expatriate writer since Henry James," and an excellent analysis of why her heroes, especially Ripley, are not appreciated in America.

Wilson, Andrew. Beautiful Shadow: A Life of Patricia Highsmith. New York: Bloomsbury, 2004. This biography of Highsmith examines the author's troubled life and devotion to her work. A rare source of biographical information.

REGINALD HILL

Born: Hartlepool, England; April 3, 1936

Also wrote as Reginald Charles Hill; Dick Morland; Patrick Ruell; Charles Underhill

Types of plot: Police procedural; private investigator; thriller

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Andrew Dalziel and Peter Pascoe, 1970-
Joe Sixsmith, 1993-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

ANDREW DALZIEL is detective superintendent of the Yorkshire police, a flamboyantly larger-than-life figure whose girth, garrulousness, and proudly old-fashioned investigative techniques mask his exceptional physical prowess, acute intelligence, and surprising grasp of contemporary social and cultural realities.

DETECTIVE PETER PASCOE is Dalziel's younger, more sensitive crime-fighting partner. As introspective and as mild-mannered as Dalziel can be overbearing, Pascoe uses less bluff and brute force, relying instead on psychological insight. His is the character who grows the most from novel to novel. As the series goes on, Pascoe and his wife, Ellie, become as much a focus as the criminal investigations.

JOE SIXSMITH is a laid-off lathe operator who becomes a private investigator to pay the bills. As a working-class black man in the gritty town of Luton, Joe inhabits a role that allows for a more direct examination of issues of race and class than in the Dalziel and Pascoe books.

CONTRIBUTION

Reginald Hill introduced Andy Dalziel and Peter Pascoe in A Clubbable Woman (1970), and followed this work with An Advancement of Learning (1971). Such titles indicated early on the wordplay and double entendres that would become staples of the series: The victim in the first novel is not just "clubby" but bludgeoned to death, and the second novel's title as well as its chapter epigrams come from the writings of Sir Francis Bacon. Hill has been praised for his precise characterization, from the ample use of Yorkshire dialect and manners to the deployment of various points of view in the narration, voice-over techniques, interior monologues, and fragments of letters and diaries. In the later novels, Hill has been given to ingenious plots that function on several levels other than the investigation of the central crime. He has said he does not consider his books police procedurals per se but simply good stories.

BIOGRAPHY

Reginald Hill was born in 1936 in Hartlepool in northeast England, where his father played soccer for the local professional team. When Hill was three years old the family moved to Cumbria. He grew up there, went on to attend Oxford University, and became a teacher for several years in Yorkshire, the setting for his acclaimed Andrew Dalziel and Peter Pascoe crime novels. Hill has said that, like most children, he was fond of stories but decided to become a writer when he discovered—at the age of seven—that one could be paid "for making things up." His first novel, A Clubbable Woman, was published in 1970, and introduced the mid-Yorkshire police duo of Andrew "Fat Andy" Dalziel and Peter Pascoe, who have gone on to be featured in more than twenty novels and in a popular British television series. In addition, Hill has written a series of mysteries featuring the private detective Joe Sixsmith as well as several thrillers under the pseudonym Patrick Ruell. In 1990 Hill was awarded the Gold Dagger for Bones and Silence (1990), and in 1995 the British Crime Writers' Association honored him with its Cartier Diamond Dagger for his lifetime contribution to the genre. The Dalziel and Pascoe mystery Good Morning, Midnight (2004) received the 2004 People's Choice Award from the Mystery Thriller Book Club.

ANALYSIS

Though Reginald Hill is the author of more than forty books in many genres, he is known first and foremost as the creator of Yorkshire detective superintendent Andrew Dalziel and Chief Inspector Peter Pascoe, who together have been solving crimes since A Clubbable Woman was published in 1970. That novel introduced readers to Dalziel (pronounced “Dee-ell”), sometimes referred to behind his back as Fat Andy and by other even less flattering nicknames by friend and foe alike. Coarse, corpulent, given to glaringly impolite remarks about race, class, and gender, Dalziel nonetheless confounds both criminal and law enforcement minds with his almost clairvoyant perception of human motivation. He also possesses a physical prowess that belies his considerable girth. More than one reviewer has applied the term “Falstaffian” to the superintendent: He can outdrink his staff even as he out-thinks them, out-joking and outfoxing his adversaries as well as his allies.

This is not to say Dalziel requires no help. Peter Pascoe begins the series as a fresh recruit, a university-educated representative of a kinder, gentler police mind-set that the old-fashioned Dalziel openly scorns. Much of the humor and human interest in Hill’s writing develops from this tension between personalities and philosophies. With each successive case, it becomes increasingly clear that Dalziel’s blunt force needs Pascoe’s nuances to solve modern-day crimes. Their partnership thus grows from an initial wariness (even distaste) through a mutual grudging respect to a shared affection and reliance on each other’s strengths.

Ellie Pascoe, Peter’s wife, begins the series as a foil to both men. An academic who disapproves of Dalziel’s excesses, she also proves to Peter that he is often less enlightened—and more Dalziel-like—than he would care to admit. In later books, Ellie takes on more and more importance as a character: In Arms and the Women (1999), for example, it is Ellie’s situation that provides the main plot and her voice that controls much of the narrative. Peter and Ellie’s courtship (college sweethearts years before, they are reacquainted in An Advancement of Learning) and the progress of their married relationship into parenthood over the course of many novels is just one of several story lines Hill maintains from book to book.

Hill allows other recurring characters to develop as well, personalities who collectively become a rich and varied supporting cast rather than merely a set of stereotypes. These finely drawn roles include Sergeant Edgar “Wiely” Wiely, whose chiseled features are repeatedly mocked by Dalziel even as the superintendent counts on Wiely’s nearly photographic memory. Through the early novels Wiely keeps his homosexuality closely closeted to preserve his police career ambitions, but as he comes out, he gives the stories added depth and human interest. Another character, Detective Shirley Novello, similarly has to navigate a career environment traditionally hostile to her presence. One of Hill’s many accomplishments is that such roles never seem gratuitous; each character is given a fair share of the plot—investigative and personal—without the author’s using them as spokespersons for a cause or social issue.

Indeed, the intricate weave of private life with professional life is one of the most pronounced features of the Dalziel and Pascoe mysteries. In The Wood Beyond (1996), the crime plot is paralleled by and then intersects with Pascoe’s family history; in Good Morning, Midnight, Dalziel’s past implicates him in a questionable suicide case that Pascoe must investigate. Often cited as Hill’s main accomplishment is the sheer vitality of his writing, credited with “raising the British mystery to new heights,” as The New York Times has said. In the words of Donna Leon of The Sunday Times (London), Hill’s gifts include a “formidable intelligence, quick humor, compassion, and a prose style that blends elegance and grace.” The intelligence is easily perceived in the range and intricacy of Hill’s storytelling: A tragic but seemingly isolated incident often has implications and motives far beyond its Yorkshire locale, and the plot often crosses continents, even generations. No crime seems minor in Hill’s world, where investment swindlers cross paths with pornographers and where old family scandals merge with contemporary drug trafficking or international arms deals.

Grim as these elements may be, Hill maintains a quick humor. The dialogue is rife with puns and the arch remark; Dalziel’s sarcasm or Ellie’s playful skewering of Peter’s ego would be enough to delight and amuse even those readers who fail to catch the witty allusions (usually unattributed, much less explained) to William Shakespeare, John Keats, or Homer. In some novels, however, the erudition is on display from the start. Not only does Hill favor epigraphs from a wide variety of classic authors to open sections or chapters, but he also uses such sources to frame the entire story. Arms and the Women, for example, obviously calls to mind George Bernard Shaw's famous play Arms and the Man (pr. 1894, pb. 1898). The Wood Beyond borrows its title from the opening of Dante's La divina commedia (c. 1320; The Divine Comedy, 1802), and Pascoe must in the course of the novel descend through the darker circles of his own family's past. Similarly, Good Morning, Midnight begins with the Emily Dickinson poem of the same name. Dialogues of the Dead (2001) provides no fewer than three alternative titles (one of them a spurious reference to a board game), an entry from the Oxford English Dictionary, a stanza from the nineteenth century poet Heinrich Heine, and a passage from Thomas Lovell Beddoes before the opening chapter. Such devices contribute to the overall appeal of Hill's work and prepare the reader for the multiple layers of plot and the variety of narrators given full voice by the time Dalziel can declare the case closed and his single-malt scotch open.

THE WOOD BEYOND

The Wood Beyond, the fourteenth in the Dalziel and Pascoe series, is widely regarded as having secured Hill's reputation as Britain's finest living mystery novelist. Just as the series has fully developed the endlessly surprising persona of Andrew Dalziel, Hill devotes the bulk of this installment to Peter Pascoe, whose sleuthing discovers a great-grandfather executed for cowardice during World War I. Whether this or the discovery of a human skeleton on the grounds of an animal research clinic is the main story line is hard to say. Dalziel, meanwhile, becomes romantically involved with a woman who happens to be a suspect in yet another case. In its complexities of plot and depth of feeling, The Wood Beyond marks a turning point in Hill's career.

ARMS AND THE WOMEN

Just two novels later, Hill turns to Ellie Pascoe to provide the focus. In the intervening novel, the Pascoes very nearly lost their daughter, and at the outset of Arms and the Women, Ellie is the victim of an attempted kidnapping. Sent away for safekeeping as well as for recuperation, she unwittingly becomes ensnared in a web of plots involving the Irish Republican Army, Colombian drug dealers, and unnamed government agents. As the tension mounts, Hill releases it with wildly comic passages from Ellie's novel in progress, an updating of Homer's Odyssey (c. 725 B.C.E.; English translation, 1614), in which, despite Ellie's best intentions, the hero winds up looking, acting, and sounding maddeningly like her husband's boss, Fat Andy.

DIALOGUES OF THE DEAD

Dialogues of the Dead, Hill's tour de force, begins a kind of series-within-the-series, as this novel and the next two, Death's Jest-Book (2002) and Good Morning, Midnight, form a trilogy bound by the same set of crimes and a continued plot. What begins as a pair of seemingly unrelated accidental deaths evolves into a gruesome case of serial murders, apparently perpetrated by the Wordman, an anonymous writer of "dialogues" sent to a local newspaper as part of a short-story competition. The Wordman's letters, as well as the interpolated interior monologues of the murderer, drop intriguing clues along the way, and from the novel's baffling "paranomania" (obsession with wordplay) to its disturbing epilogue, Dialogues of the Dead is vintage Hill.

BORN GUILTY

Born Guilty (1995), the second Joe Sixsmith novel, begins with the middle-aged Joe trying to elude his meddling aunt and her matchmaking efforts. When Joe comes upon a boy's corpse in a cardboard box, he must elude even more determined characters, including abusive police officers, drug addicts and dealers, and various others whose interest in Joe may or may not be wholesome. This work is briefer and grittier than the Dalziel and Pascoe novels tend to be and a bit less complex in its plotting but no less gripping in its emotional content and just as appealing in its characterization.

THE STRANGER HOUSE

In The Stranger House (2005), a nonseries mystery, Hill employs a number of the features that have made his Dalziel and Pascoe series so effective: a pair of seemingly mismatched protagonists, an intricate plot involving overlapping personal and family histories, the eccentricities of village England, and multiple narrators. The Stranger House, the local inn in the village of Illthwaite, gives the novel its name and also—typically for Hill—provides an overall metaphor for the diverse backgrounds ultimately linking the main characters' families or "houses." Though neither main character is a detective (one is a mathematician, the other a former novice priest turned historian), together they ferret out the clues to their respective mysteries, going back decades in one case and centuries in the other.

James Scruton

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

DALZIEL AND PASCOE SERIES: A Clubbable Woman, 1970; An Advancement of Learning, 1971; Ruling Passion, 1973; An April Shroud, 1975; A Pinch of Snuff, 1978; Pascoe's Ghost, and Other Brief Chronicles of Crime, 1979; A Killing Kindness, 1980; Deadheads, 1983; Exit Lines, 1984; Child's Play, 1987; Under World, 1988; One Small Step, 1990; Bones and Silence, 1990; Recalled to Life, 1992; The Only Game, 1993; Pictures of Perfection, 1994; The Wood Beyond, 1996; On Beulah Height, 1998; Arms and the Women, 1999; Dialogues of the Dead, 2001; Death's Jest-Book, 2002; Good Morning, Midnight, 2004; Death Comes for the Fat Man, 2007

JOE SIXSMITH SERIES: Blood Sympathy, 1993; Born Guilty, 1995; Killing the Lawyers, 1997; Singing the Sadness, 1999

NONSERIES NOVELS: Fell of Dark, 1971; Asking for the Moon, 1994; The Castle of the Demon, 1971 (as Ruell); A Fairly Dangerous Thing, 1972; Red Christmas, 1972; A Very Good Hater, 1974; Death Takes the Low Road, 1974; Urn Burial, 1975 (as Ruell); Another Death in Venice, 1976; The Spy's Wife, 1980; Who Guards a Prince?, 1982; Traitor's Blood, 1983; Death of a Dormouse, 1987 (as Ruell); The Long Kill, 1988 (as Ruell); Dream of Darkness, 1989; The Only Game, 1991; The Four Clubs, 1997; The Stranger House, 2005

OTHER SHORT FICTION: There Are No Ghosts in the Soviet Union, 1988

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Heart Clock, 1973 (as Morland); Albion! Albion!, 1974 (as Morland; also known as Sin- gleton's Law); Captain Fantom, 1978; The Forging of Fantom, 1979

TELEPLAY: An Affair of Honor, 1972

RADIO PLAY: Ordinary Levels, 1982

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cohu, Will. "A Writer's Life: Reginald Hill." The Daily Telegraph, June 23, 2005, p. O12. Hill describes how he got started in writing and how he does his writing. Contains some biographical information.

Herbert, Rosemary. The Fatal Art of Entertainment: Interviews with Mystery Writers. New York: G. K. Hall, 1994. Hill talks about his preference for character over plot and describes his childhood shyness.

Hill, Reginald. "The Plot's the Thing." Writer 108, no. 11 (November, 1995): 11. Hill discusses the importance of plot, saying its touchstones are pace, point of view, and continuity. Sheds light on his works. This issue of Writer also contains an interview with Hill that looks at writing mysteries.

Kirkus Reviews. Review of Death Comes for the Fat Man, by Reginald Hill. 75, no. 2 (January 15, 2007): 53. Favorable review of a Dalziel and Pascoe novel in which Fat Andy Dalziel lies in a coma for much of the work.

Priestman, Martin, ed. The Cambridge Companion to Crime Fiction. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003. This general work features chapters on private investigators, thrillers, and postwar British crime fiction. Add perspective to Hill's work.

Richards, Huw. "College Drop-out Loves Life of Crime." Times Educational Supplement, September 20, 2001, p. 34. Discusses how Hill gave up teaching to become a full-time writer and examines the Dalziel and Pascoe television series.

Scaggs, John. Crime Fiction. New York, Routledge, 2005. Contains chapters on police procedurals, thrillers, and detectives.

The Yorkshire Post. "A Fresh Chapter Opens in a Life of Crime." March 22, 2007, p. 1. Contains a discussion of Hill's series and the popular British television series that it spawned as well as details of Hill's personal life.

TONY HILLERMAN

Born: Sacred Heart, Oklahoma; May 27, 1925

Types of plot: Psychological; police procedural

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Joe Leaphorn, 1970-

Leaphorn and Chee, 1980-

Jim Chee, 1988-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

JOE LEAPHORN is a lieutenant of the Navajo Tribal Police. When Leaphorn makes his appearance in The Blessing Way (1970), he is in his early thirties; the middle-aged Leaphorn of A Thief of Time (1988) is widowed and has become a minor legend among his peers in law enforcement. Leaphorn is a graduate of the University of Arizona, but it is his Navajo way of thinking that gives him the unique ability to see a pattern in the apparent randomness of violent crime.

JIM CHEE, sergeant of the Navajo Tribal Police, is in his early to middle thirties, unmarried and studying to be a Navajo singer, or shaman. Despite his college degree and sophistication, he is deeply committed to the traditions of his people.

CONTRIBUTION

Tony Hillerman's seven novels set among the Indians of the American Southwest are an anomaly in detective fiction, yet his work embraces many of the characteristics of this genre. Hillerman tells a thinking person's detective story. Indeed, his protagonists Joe Leaphorn and Jim Chee of the Navajo Tribal Police are part of the problem-solving approach to crime that stretches back to Sherlock Holmes, whose powers of ratiocination enabled him to find the solution to the most intricate of crimes with a minimum of violence. Their powers of analysis, however, must be applied not only to the people who follow the Navajo way but also to the white society that surrounds their world. Leaphorn and Chee must enter into the white world and relate it to the Navajo way of thinking. Hillerman depicts their encounters with the clutter and alienation of urban life in a poignant prose that is tinged with sadness, but it is when he is exploring the physical and mythic landscapes of the Navajo people that his writing becomes truly poetic. It is this duality of viewpoint, which sheds light on both cultures and manages to emphasize the essential humanity of both peoples, that is Tony Hillerman's major achievement.

BIOGRAPHY

Tony Hillerman was born Anthony Grave Hillerman on May 27, 1925, in Sacred Heart, Oklahoma, where he grew up on a farm in "worn-out cotton country." He played cowboys and Indians with the children of the neighboring farmers, many of whom were Blackfeet, Pottawatomies, and Seminoles whom the white kids had to bribe to be Indians "because they wanted to be cowboys, too." His father, August Alfred Hillerman, and his mother, Lucy Grove Hillerman, were evidently more concerned about his education than they were about maintaining the prejudices of the day, for they decided that their son would receive his grade-school education at St. Mary's Academy, a Catholic boarding school for Indian girls in the tiny town of Sacred Heart. August Hillerman was sensitive about being a German during Adolf Hitler's rise to power. He made it a point to tell his family that "people are basically alike. Once you know that then you start to find out the differences." This respect for individuals and their differences infuses Hillerman's work.

In 1943, World War II interrupted Hillerman's studies at the University of Oklahoma. He served in Germany, receiving the Bronze Star, the Silver Star, and the Purple Heart. He came home with a patch over one eye and weak vision in the other, which caused him to drop his studies in chemistry and take up journalism, a profession less demanding on his eyes. In 1948, he took his degree in journalism, married Marie Unzner, and became a crime reporter for a newspaper in Borger, Texas. Evidently, he made the right choice of profession. Following the crime-reporter position, his career as a journalist took him through a series of jobs that led to his becoming the editor for The New Mexican in Santa Fe, New Mexico. By his mid-thirties, he was the editor of an influential newspaper located in the capital of New Mexico.

All the while Hillerman had been harboring a desire to tell stories, but it was risky business for a family man with six children to quit a good job to become a writer of fiction. Nevertheless, with the encouragement of his wife, he took a part-time job as an assistant to the president of the University of New Mexico, where he studied literature. In 1966, he earned his masters of arts in literature and joined the department of journalism, where he taught until he retired in 1985 to devote more time to writing.

The publication of his first novel, The Blessing Way, met with immediate critical success. His third novel, Dance Hall of the Dead (1973), won the Edgar Allan Poe Award from the Mystery Writers of America. He later received the same body's Grand Master Award, as well as the Center for American Indians Ambassador Award and the Navajo Tribe's Special Friend Award—officially inducting him as a “friend of the Dinee”—the Navajo people. Commercial success followed critical acclaim, giving Hillerman time to devote to his family and work.

Tony Hillerman. (Courtesy, University of New Mexico)

ANALYSIS

Tony Hillerman is a storyteller with a knack for the intricate plot that baffles the reader but yields to the intellect of his protagonists. Inevitably, his novels begin with a crime unnerving in its violence and sense of horror. In The Blessing Way, a young Navajo, Luis Horseman, is hiding deep within the vastness of the Navajo Reservation. He needs to avoid the “Blue Policeman,” but he is nervous, for he is hiding in Many Ruins Canyon, haunted by the ghosts of the Anasazi, who linger about the “Houses of the Enemy Dead.” The tone is one of lonely foreboding; it is at this point that Horseman “saw the Navajo Wolf”:

He had heard nothing. But the man was standing not fifty feet away, watching him silently. He was a big man with his wolf skin draped across his shoulders. The forepaws hung limply down the front of his black shirt and the empty skull of the beast was pushed back on his forehead, its snout pointing upward.

The Wolf looked at Horseman. And then he smiled.

“I won’t tell,” Horseman said. His voice was loud, rising almost to a scream. And then he turned and ran, ran frantically down the dry wash. . . . And behind him he heard the Wolf laughing.

Thus the first chapter of The Blessing Way ends with questions dangling against a backdrop of menace and terror, a pattern made familiar in Hillerman’s following works. Later in the novel, Horseman’s body is discovered, “the dead eyes bulging and the lips drawn back in naked terror.” Hillerman’s protagonist, Lieutenant Joe Leaphorn, must enter into this world of witchcraft and violence and unravel the puzzle of Horseman’s murder. This is a task for which he is ideally suited:

Leaphorn never counted on luck. Instead he expected order—the natural sequence of behavior, the cause producing the natural effect, the human behaving in the way it was natural for him to behave. He counted on that and upon his own ability to sort out the chaos of observed facts and find in them this natural order. Leaphorn knew from experience that he was unusually adept at this.

In this novel, as in the others of the Leaphorn series, Leaphorn uses his intellect and the knowledge of his people to undo the machinations of criminals whose spiritual deformities bring violence and terror. Thus on one hand, Hillerman works well within the tradition of the ratiocinative detective story. Leaphorn is a Navajo Sherlock Holmes, a coolly logical mind engaged in the solution of a crime committed in most unusual circumstances. The particular genius of Hillerman's work is the result of the unique perspective that his Navajo detectives bring to their work.

Both Joe Leaphorn and Jim Chee must thread their way between cultures, retaining their psychological and spiritual balance as they move between the frenzied complexities of urban white society and the mythic world of the Navajo people, the Dinee. Leaphorn, who is the protagonist of The Blessing Way, Dance Hall of the Dead, and Listening Woman (1978), is sustained by his beloved wife, Emma, his intellectual curiosity, and his faith in the connectedness of things. However, his ability to see the pattern in events causes him "a faint subconscious uneasiness," for it sets him apart from the norm. Intellectual detachment and objectivity enable him to pierce the curtain of appearances and to understand the underlying reality, but he pays a price for his powers. He sees a darkened vision of the human condition, and he is cut off from the traditions of his people, the Navajo way, which provides the sense of belonging and participation necessary to sustain his faith in life.

Indeed, Listening Woman, the third novel of the Leaphorn series, closes with the entombment of ritual sand paintings preserved to save the Dinee from extinction. It is a bleak vision. Although the crime has been solved and the criminals killed or apprehended, Leaphorn is left stranded on a spiritual moonscape in isolated self-exile. Therefore, it is not surprising that in People of Darkness (1980), Hillerman's fourth novel set among the Navajo, he chooses to introduce the younger and brasher Jim Chee, who consciously wrestles with the problems that Leaphorn observes.

THE GHOSTWAY

In The Ghostway (1984), the sixth of Hillerman's Navajo novels, Chee's internal struggles for identity provide the means for exploring Navajo culture and white civilization, at least as it is typified by urban Los Angeles. Hillerman sets the tone of this novel through the words of an old Navajo, Joseph Joe, who witnesses a shootout and murder in the parking lot of a reservation laundromat and reflects, "The driver was Navajo, but this was white man's business." This parking lot murder, Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) involvement, and a runaway Navajo girl lead Chee into the grimy world of greater Los Angeles, where he is confronted with the realities of leaving the reservation and the Navajo way. There are no easy choices for Chee, and Hillerman gives him no pat answers.

Chee is a person moving in two directions. He believes deeply in his people and in the Navajo concept of hozro, to walk in beauty, to achieve harmony with one's surroundings. Moreover, because he comes from a family famous for its singers (medicine men), he is acutely aware that the Dinee are losing their culture, that not enough young Navajo are learning the rituals of curing and blessing necessary to preserve the Navajo way. Chee's uncle, Frank Sam Nakai, is teaching Chee to be a singer, a part of the living oral tradition of the Dinee.

Chee finds himself torn by his love for an Anglo schoolteacher, Mary Landon, who cherishes Chee but who is appalled by the thought of rearing their children in the isolation of a reservation larger than the combined states of New England. This predictable dilemma is made plausible by Chee's sophistication, for Jim Chee is an alumnus of the University of New Mexico, a subscriber to Esquire and Newsweek, an officer of the Navajo Tribal Police, lover of Mary Landon, holder of a Farmington Public Library card, student of anthropology and sociology, "with distinction" graduate of the FBI Academy, holder of Social Security card 441-28-7272.

Mary Landon wants Chee to join the FBI, but for Chee this means ceasing to be a Navajo, leaving the sacred land of the Navajo bounded by the four holy mountains, and giving up any hope of being a restorer of harmony to his people. When Chee pursues the runaway Margaret Billy Sosi into Los Angeles, he has to confront his choices and himself.

Hillerman uses Chee's odyssey in Los Angeles to provide disturbing insights into urban life. Chee encounters children who are prostitutes and old people who have been abandoned to the ministrations of callous caretakers in convalescent homes. In one of the most telling scenes in the novel, Chee questions a resident of the Silver Threads Rest Home. A stroke victim, Mr. Berger has been an overlooked observer of events Chee needs to understand. Chee is aware that despite Berger's stroke and speech impediment, his mind is alert. Chee and Berger engage in a pantomime of the hands in order to relate what Berger has witnessed. Such a scene is dangerous for a novelist, for it hangs between the bathetic and the ludicrous, yet Hillerman handles it with a detached clarity that gives it a memorable poignance.

The balanced and compassionate Chee is counterpoised by Vaggan, a frighteningly efficient professional killer who lives in spartan isolation, carefully preparing for the holocaust he is sure will come. He frequently makes racist speculations on the nature of those who will survive:

This one would never survive, and should never survive. When the missiles came, he would be one of the creeping, crawling multitude of weaklings purged from the living.

Vaggan is convinced that he will be one of the survivors because he is a predator. He would be nothing more than a stock figure of evil if he were not a reflection of easily recognized social illnesses. Moreover, Hillerman gives him a family background that is as sterile and loveless as Vaggan himself. Vaggan shares much with Hillerman's other villains; he is motivated by money, completely alienated from other human beings, and devoid of compassion and sympathy.

Chee is aware that he is not Vaggan's equal in matters of personal combat, yet he twice finds himself confronting Vaggan. Nevertheless, Chee prevails, for he is saved by Margaret Sosi, the young woman he set out to protect, who is a part of the great Navajo family. There is no one to save Vaggan, and he perishes at the hands of the person he sought to destroy.

In The Ghostway, Hillerman develops the central themes of his work. For Hillerman, the sources of evil are alienation and greed, a truism that applies to both Anglo and Navajo societies. According to Navajo mythology, when First Man and First Woman emerged from the flooding waters of the Fourth World, "they forgot witchcraft and so they sent Diving Heron back for it. They told him to bring out 'the way to get rich' so the Holy People wouldn't know what he was getting." Thus Navajo who practice witchcraft prey on others for personal gain; they no longer have harmony or walk in beauty. Cut off from the Navajo way, witches are, however, powerful and hard to kill. The only effective way to kill a witch is to turn the evil around, to turn it back on the witch with the help of a singer, one who walks in beauty. Jim Chee struggles to be such a person. Mary Landon knows that Chee would cease to be a Navajo living away from the holy land of the Dinee, that he would no longer walk in beauty among his people or follow the calling of his uncle, Frank Sam Nakai. She saves Chee from the consequences of his decision by choosing to remove herself from Chee's life. The novel closes with Chee's resumption of his efforts to become a Navajo medicine man, restorer of hozro to the Dinee.

CHEE AND LEAPHORN SERIES

After A Thief of Time, Hillerman merged his two series into one, bringing Jim Chee and Joe Leaphorn together—although they continued to follow their own separate trails. Talking God (1989) moves the detectives from the open spaces of the Southwest and the interconnected community of the reservation to the urban claustrophobia and indifference of Washington, D.C. The introduction of elements alien to the series' previous volumes—such as noirish politico-bad guys—displeased some critics, but the displacement, in much the way Chee's Los Angeles time does in The Ghostway, serves to underline the essential qualities which make Hillerman's detectives unique.

With Coyote Waits (1990) Hillerman returned to the reservation, with Jim Chee. The cases in both Coyote Waits and Sacred Clowns (1993) are tied up in Native American myth, through coyote, the trickster, and witchcraft, and with religious/cultural practice, through the koshare—the sacred clown of the kachina dance.

While each of Hillerman's novels is a separate and well-crafted mystery, there is an underlying spiritual pattern to his work that reveals itself in the Navajo mythology. Both Leaphorn and Chee look into the face of evil and are not dismayed. Both suffer sorrow and loss. In A Thief of Time, Leaphorn loses his beloved Emma, bringing him close to despair. To those who are familiar with Hillerman's work, however, it is no surprise to find that this novel closes with the logical Leaphorn turning to the mystical Chee to help him restore his inner harmony by performing the ceremony of the Blessing Way.

The overall length of Hillerman's series is an achievement in itself. With the publication of Shape Shifter in 2006, Leaphorn and Chee had been working together on and off for thirty-six years. Late in the series, a greater emphasis on the personal lives of its characters began, in some critics's estimation, to weigh down the plots. After such a long relationship with readers, a geriatric Leaphorn and love-struck (up, down, and sideways) Chee may have earned the sympathetic indulgence of fans. The elevation of minor sidekick Bernie Manuelito to central character (and romantic interest of Chee) in The Sinister Pig (2003) infused the series with new energy when, mystery-wise, it seemed to flag.

Like most successful mysteries, Hillerman's stories may follow a pattern, but they are never formulaic. Chee and Leaphorn's lives continue, and they, as well as other characters peopling the books, are quite believably complex. In The Fallen Man (1996), Leaphorn has retired to become a private detective, and though still mourning his wife's loss, he is looking at a possible new relationship. Chee takes over Leaphorn's old job and works through a relationship with Janet Pete, which spans six books and is difficult, engaging, and painfully real. When Sergeant Jim Chee goes to meet the retired Lieutenant Leaphorn in Hunting Badger (1999), he nearly overlooks the "stocky old duffer" sitting in a corner. It is for these reasons, as much as for unpredictable plots, an unflinching integrity in portraying the Southwest landscape and the Native American relationship to it, and his clear, evocative prose, that Hillerman's novels are so successful and well-respected.

David Sundstrand

Updated by Fiona Kelleghan, Jessica Reisman, and Janet Alice Long

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

JOE LEAPHORN SERIES: The Blessing Way, 1970; Dance Hall of the Dead, 1973; Listening Woman, 1978

JOE LEAPHORN AND JIM CHEE SERIES: People of Darkness, 1980; The Dark Wind, 1982; The Ghostway, 1984; A Thief of Time, 1988; Talking God, 1989; Sacred Clowns, 1993; The Fallen Man, 1996; The First Eagle, 1998; Hunting Badger, 1999; The Wailing Wind, 2002; The Sinister Pig, 2003; Skeleton Man, 2004; The Shape Shifter, 2006

JIM CHEE SERIES: Skinwalkers, 1986; Coyote Waits, 1990

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Fly on the Wall, 1971; Finding Moon, 1995

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: The Boy Who Made Dragonfly: A Zuni Myth, 1972; Buster Mesquite's Cowboy Band, 2001

NONFICTION: The Great Taos Bank Robbery and Other Indian Country Affairs, 1973 (also known as The Great Taos Bank Robbery and Other True Stories of the Southwest, 2001); New Mexico, 1974 (photographs by David Muench); Rio Grande, 1975 (photographs by Robert Reynolds); Indian Country: America's Sacred Land, 1987 (photographs by Bela Kalman); Hillerman Country: A Journey Through the Southwest with Tony Hillerman, 1991 (photographs by Barney Hillerman); Talking Mysteries: A Conversation with Tony Hillerman, 1991 (with Ernie Bulow); New Mexico, Rio Grande, and Other Essays, 1992 (photographs by Muench and Reynolds); Seldom Disappointed: A Memoir, 2001

EDITED TEXTS: The Spell of New Mexico, 1976; The Best of the West: An Anthology of Classic Writing from the American West, 1991; The Mysterious West, 1994; The Oxford Book of American Detective Stories, 1996 (with Rosemary Herbert); The Best American Mystery Stories of the Century, 2000; A New Omnibus of Crime, 2005 (with Herbert)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Browne, Ray B. "The Ethnic Detective: Arthur W. Upfield, Tony Hillerman, and Beyond." In Mystery and Suspense Writers: The Literature of Crime, Detec- tion, and Espionage, edited by Robin W. Winks and Maureen Corrigan. New York: Scribner's Sons, 1998. Discusses the place of Hillerman's Navajo detectives and other ethnic detectives in modern crime fiction and how they have affected it.

Coale, Samuel Chase. The Mystery of Mysteries: Cultural Differences and Designs. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 2000. A study of the mysteries of Amanda Cross, Tony Hillerman, James Lee Burke, and Walter Mosely, showing how these writers use the mystery genre to introduce the concerns of minorities into fiction.

Greenberg, Martin, ed. The Tony Hillerman Companion: A Comprehensive Guide to His Life and Work. New York: HarperCollins, 1994. Provides an excellent and perceptive analysis of his writings and descriptions of his characters. This book was nominated for an Edgar in the Best Critical/Biographical Work category.

HarperCollins. Tony Hillerman. http://www.harpercollins.com/authors/4488/Tony_Hillerman/. This is the official Web site for Tony Hillerman, hosted and maintained by his publisher. Aside from the predictable features of a commercial site, a biography and interview make this a worthwhile resource.

Herbert, Rosemary. The Fatal Art of Entertainment:

Interviews with Mystery Writers. New York: G. K. Hall, 1994. Interview with Hillerman focuses on his life and how he came to write, including his relationship with the Navajo.

Hillerman, Tony. Seldom Disappointed: A Memoir. New York: HarperCollins, 2001. Hillerman recollects his early life, including his service as an infantryman during World War II, his education, and his career as a journalist.

Reilly, John M. Tony Hillerman: A Critical Companion. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1996. After chapters on Hillerman's life and his place in the detective genre, Reilly covers the Leaphorn and Chee series book by book through Finding Moon.

Sobol, John. Tony Hillerman: A Public Life. Toronto: ECW Press, 1994. A popular biography. Dated, but full of information and enjoyable to read.

Templeton, Wayne. "Xojo and Homicide: The Post-colonial Murder Mysteries of Tony Hillerman." In Multicultural Detective Fiction. New York: Routledge, 1998. In compiling a critical work on the role of ethnic culture in detective fiction, the novels of Tony Hillerman cannot be overlooked, though Hillerman does not himself belong to the culture about which he writes. This is a scholarly discussion.

CHESTER HIMES

Born: Jefferson City, Missouri; July 29, 1909

Died: Moraira, Spain; November 12, 1984

Type of plot: Hard-boiled

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Harlem Domestic, 1957-1983

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

COFFIN ED JOHNSON and GRAVE DIGGER JONES are famous detectives who are also husbands, fathers, and former residents of Harlem. They have their own personal interpretation of law enforcement and are highly respected, even feared. Possessing the usual traits of hard-boiled heroism (fearlessness, physical stamina, mental acuity, and a sense of fair play), they are characterized by the quickness and severity of their anger when protecting the "good colored people of Harlem" and are distinguished by their revolvers that "can kill a rock."

CONTRIBUTION

In his novels featuring Grave Digger Jones and Coffin Ed Johnson, Chester Himes not only gave American literature its first team of African American detectives but also impressively imposed on it a unique and memorable image of the social, cultural, racial, political, and economic dynamics of Harlem at the midpoint of the twentieth century. In a style that reveals an ever-increasing control of generic conventions (ending at the threshold of parody), Himes's work gradually moves away from the tradition of Dashiell Hammett and Raymond Chandler to make a trenchant commentary on the nature of American society as viewed through the joys and fears of black Americans. Mixing grotesque violence, comic exaggeration, and absurdity (what he later chose to identify as the quintessential element of American life) in a fast-paced, highly cinematic narrative, Himes created a distinctive brand of regionalism in the detective genre.

BIOGRAPHY

Chester Bomar Himes was born on July 29, 1909, in Jefferson City, Missouri, the youngest of three sons born to Estelle Charlotte Bomar and Joseph Sandy Himes, a professor of blacksmithing and wheelwrighting and head of the Mechanical Arts Department at Lincoln University. In 1921 Himes's father obtained a position at Normal College in Pine Bluff, Arkansas, and Chester and his brother Joe were enrolled in first-year studies there (with classmates ten years their senior). In the same year Joe was permanently blinded while conducting a chemistry demonstration he and Chester had prepared. The local hospital's refusal to admit and treat his brother (presumably because of racial prejudice)—one of several such incidents experienced in his youth—made a lasting impression on Chester and contributed to his often-cited "quality of hurt" (the title of the first volume of his autobiography).

In the next two years Himes attended high schools in St. Louis, Missouri, and Cleveland, Ohio, experiencing the loneliness, isolation, and violence frequently accorded the outsider in adolescence (in schoolyard battles he received chipped teeth, lacerations to the head and a broken shoulder that never healed properly). Himes was graduated, nevertheless, from Cleveland's Glenville High School in January, 1926. Preparing to attend Ohio State University in the fall, he took a job as a busboy in a local hotel. Injured by a fall down an elevator shaft, Himes was awarded a monthly disability pension that allowed him to enter the university directly.

Early enthusiasm for collegiate life turned quickly to personal depression and alienation, undermining Himes's academic fervor and success. This discontent led to his flirtation with illicit lifestyles and his subsequent expulsion from the university. Returning to Cleveland, Himes was swept into the dangers and excitement of underworld activities that, as he noted in his autobiography, exposed him to many of the strange characters who populate his detective series.

After two suspended sentences for burglary and fraud (because of the personal appeals of his parents for leniency), Himes was arrested in September, 1928, charged with armed robbery, and sentenced to twenty to twenty-five years of hard labor at Ohio State Penitentiary. His serious writing began in prison. By the time he was paroled to his mother in 1936, Himes's stories about the frustrations and contradictions of prison life had appeared in Esquire and numerous African American newspapers and magazines. In 1937, Himes married Jean Johnson, his sweetheart before imprisonment. Finding employment first as a laborer, then as a research assistant in the Cleveland Public Library, Himes was finally employed by the Ohio State Writers' Project to work on a history of Cleveland. With the start of World War II, Himes moved to Los Angeles, California. His first two novels, If He Hollers Let Him Go (1945) and Lonely Crusade (1947), were based on these experiences. Following trips to New York, back to Los Angeles, and then to New York, where his third novel, Cast the First Stone (1952), was published, Himes and Jean were divorced, and he left for Europe in 1953, sensing the possibility of a new beginning.

Chester Himes. (Library of Congress)

Between 1953 and 1957, Himes lived in Paris, London, and Majorca while finishing work on The Third Generation (1954) and The Primitive (1955). Following the international success of his Harlem Domestic series, Himes moved permanently to Spain in 1969 and, with the exception of brief trips to the United States and other parts of Europe, lived there with his second wife, Lesley Packard, until his death on November 12, 1984.

ANALYSIS

Chester Himes began his Harlem Domestic series with the publication of For Love of Imabelle (1957), following a suggestion by his French publisher, Marcel Duhamel, to contribute to the popular Série noire. Written in less than two weeks, while he was “living in a little crummy hotel in Paris” under very strained emotional and economic circumstances, the novel, when translated and published in Paris in 1958, was awarded a French literary prize, the Grand Prix de Littérature Policière. Rescued from economic dependency and the obscurity of exile, Himes wrote the next four volumes in the series—Il pluet des coups durs (1958; The Real Cool Killers, 1959), Couché dans le pain (1959; The Crazy Kill, 1959), Tout pour plaire (1959; The Big Gold Dream, 1960), Imbroglia negro (1960; All Shot Up, 1960)—all within the next two years. Each successive volume represents a significant expansion and development of essential aspects of Himes’s evolving artistic and ideological vision.

Inspired by two detectives Himes met in Los Angeles in the 1940’s, Grave Digger Jones and Coffin Ed Johnson are serious and, as their nicknames imply, deadly enforcers of social order and justice. Maintaining balance through a carefully organized network of spies disguised as junkies, drunks, and even nuns soliciting alms for the poor at the most unusual times and places, Grave Digger and Coffin Ed are aggressive, fearless, and genuinely concerned with the community’s welfare and improvement. They wage a relentless, unorthodox, and often-personal battle against Harlem’s criminal elements. Fiercely loyal to each other, they are forced to be “tough” and mutually protective: They operate in an arena where most people consider police officers public enemies. Honest, dedicated to their profession, and motivated largely by a moral conscience—tinged with a certain amount of cynicism—they possess a code of ethics comparable (although not identical) to those of the Hammett/Chandler heroes.

Only in the first book of the series is there any implication of venality or dishonesty:

They took their tribute, like all real cops, from the established underworld catering to the essential needs of the people—gamekeepers, madams, streetwalkers, numbers writers, numbers bankers. But they were rough on purse snatchers, muggers, burglars, con men, and all strangers working any racket.

Except for this brief reference—explained perhaps by the fact that Himes had not fully developed their characters, a possibility suggested by their absence in almost the first half of the novel—all the subsequent narratives are explicit in emphasizing their honesty and integrity as detectives.

Grave Digger and Coffin Ed are often brutal in their search for the guilty; this aspect of their characters, however, is directly related to the principal issues of the series and to Himes’s vision of the essence of American life: violence. In a discussion of his perception of the detective genre with the novelist John A. Williams, Himes shed some light on the reasons for the pervasive presence of often-hideous forms of physical violence in his works:

It’s just plain and simple violence in narrative form, you know. ‘Cause no one, no one, writes about violence the way that Americans do. As a matter of fact, for the simple reason that no one understands violence or experiences violence like the American civilians do. . . . American violence is public life, it’s a public way of life, it became a form, a detective story form.

Indeed, more than one critic has attacked Himes’s novels on the basis of gratuitous physical violence. When practiced by Grave Digger and Coffin Ed, however, brutal outbursts are, more often than not, justifiable: Caught between the dangers inherent in their quest for a better community and the long arm of the white institution that supposedly protects them, Grave Digger Jones and Coffin Ed Johnson are forced to be coldly effective through the only means at their disposal. Certainly their role as black representatives of the white power structure defines the very tenuous nature of their relationship to the Harlem community and accounts for most of the novels' uncertainties and much of their suspense.

On another level, however, the excessive physical violence in Himes's novels is related to another aspect of the author's artistic and ideological perspectives—namely, the concern for place, real and imaginary. Harlem represents the center and circumference of the African American experience: It is the symbolic microcosm and the historical matrix of Himes's America. Isolated, besieged by the outside world and turning inward on itself, Harlem is, on one hand, a symbol of disorder, chaos, confusion, and self-perpetuating pain and, on the other, an emblem of cultural and historical achievement. The duality and contradiction of its identity is the source of the tension that animates Himes's plots and propels them toward their often-incredible resolutions. At the core of Harlem's reality, moreover, is violence—physical and psychological.

In a speech delivered in 1948 and subsequently published as "The Dilemma of the Negro Novelist in the U.S." in Beyond the Angry Black (1966), a compilation edited by John A. Williams, Himes noted: "The question the Negro writer must answer is: How does the fear he feels as a Negro in white American society affect his, the Negro personality?" Not until this question is addressed by the writer, Himes went on to say, can there be the slightest understanding of any aspect of black life in the United States: crime, marital relations, spiritual or economic aspirations—all will be beyond understanding until the dynamics of this fear have been exposed behind the walls of the ghetto, "until others have experienced with us to the same extent the impact of fear upon our personalities." It is this conception of fear and its psychological corollary, rage, that sustains Himes's detective stories and links them ideologically to his earlier, nonmystery fiction.

(It is significant that the first novel in the series, For Love of Imabelle, was published in the United States as A Rage in Harlem.)

THE CRAZY KILL

The connection between the image of Harlem and the violence that derives from fear is particularly apparent in The Crazy Kill. The Harlem of this novel is a place, in the words of Coffin Ed, "where anything can happen," and from the narrative's bizarre opening incident to the very last, that sense of the incredibly plausible pervades. When the theft of a bag of money from a grocery store attracts the attention of Reverend Short, Mamie Pullen's minister and a participant at the wake held across the street for Mamie's husband, the notorious gambler Big Joe Pullen, the storefront preacher leans too far out of a bedroom window under the influence of his favorite concoction, opium and brandy, and falls out. He lands, miraculously, in a basket of bread outside the bakery beneath. He picks himself up and returns to the wake, where he experiences one of his habitual "visions." When Mamie later accompanies Reverend Short to the window as he explains the circumstances of his fall, she looks down and sees the body of Valentine Haines, a young hood who has been living with Sister Dulcy and her husband Johnny "Fishtail" Perry, Big Joe's godson. The earlier vision has become reality: a dead man with a hunting knife in his heart.

Grave Digger and Coffin Ed are summoned to discover who murdered Val and, with Detective Sergeant Brody, an Irishman, begin questioning all possible suspects. Perhaps it was Johnny, whose temper is as infamous as his gambling prowess. Perhaps it was Charlie Chink, whose girlfriend, Doll Baby, appeared to be the recent target of Val's affections. Still, why the exotic hunting knife? Why the basket of bread? What conspiracy of silence connects Reverend Short, Johnny's girl Sister Dulcy, and Mamie Pullen, forcing Johnny to travel to Chicago before returning to Harlem and murdering Charlie Chink?

After the initial several hours of questioning, Sergeant Brody, despite his years of experience, is too dumbfounded to explain the web of illogical complications in this case. Grave Digger tells him, in a statement that recurs throughout the novel and the entire series, epitomizing Himes's vision of the city: "This is Harlem. . . ain't no other place like it in the world. You've got to start from scratch here, because these folks in Harlem do things for reasons nobody else in the world would think of."

The plot unravels through a series of mysterious events, including scenes of rage and violence that are the physical consequences of emotional brutalization. Johnny wakes up to find Charlie Chink wandering around nude in his apartment and shoots him six times, stomps his bloody body until Chink's teeth are "stuck in his calloused heel," and then leans over and clubs Chink's head "into a bloody pulp with his pistol butt." These explosions, Himes's work suggests, derive from the most sublimated forms of frustration and hatred; the same forces can be seen in the degree of murderous intent that accompanies Coffin Ed's frequent loss of equilibrium. The repeated examples of "murderous rage" and the number of characters in the series whose faces are cut or whose bodies are maimed are related to this vision of Harlem as a dehumanizing prisonlike world. Even the apparently comic purposes of character description tend to underscore this perspective (Reverend Short, for example, is introduced as having a "mouth shaped like that of a catfish" and eyes that "protrude behind his gold-rimmed spectacles like a bug's under a microscope").

Himes's evocation of a sense of place, however, is not limited to bizarre scenes of physical violence and rage. Beyond the scores of defiant men who are reminders of the repressed nature of manhood in the inner cities, the author gives abundant images of Harlem's social life (rent parties, fish fries, and wakes), its cultural past (Duke Ellington, Billy Eckstein, the Apollo Theatre), its economic and political hierarchies (civil servants, politicians, underworld celebrities), and its peculiar lifestyles and institutions (street gangs, professional gamblers, numbers runners, the homosexual subculture, the heroin trade, evangelist's churches, and soapbox orators). All of this is done with the aplomb of a tour guide whose knowledge of the terrain is complete and whose understanding of the cultural codes of behavior permits explanation to the uninitiated.

A bittersweet, tragicomic tone alternating with an almost Rabelaisian exuberance characterizes Himes's descriptions of the sights, rhythms, and sounds of life in Harlem. Even the diverse enticements and rich peculiarities of African American cooking are a part of Harlem's atmosphere, and the smells and tastes are frequently explored as Himes moves his two detectives through the many greasy spoons that line their beat (at one point in The Crazy Kill the author duplicates an entire restaurant menu, from entrees to beverages, from "alligator tail and rice" to "sassafrasroot tea").

Humor (if not parody) is reflected in the many unusual names of Himes's characters: Sassafras, Susie Q., Charlie Chink Dawson, H. Exodus Clay, Pigmeat, and Fishtail Perry; it is also reflected in the many instances of gullibility motivated by greed that account for the numerous scams, stings, and swindles that occur.

Himes accomplishes all of this with a remarkable economy of dialogue and language, an astute manipulation of temporal sequence, and a pattern of plots distinguished by a marvelous blend of fantasy and realism: a sense of the magically real that lurks beneath the surface of the commonplace. "Is he crazy or just acting?" asks Sergeant Brody about Reverend Short's vision. "Maybe both," Grave Digger answers.

LATER SERIES NOVELS

The last three novels in the series—Ne nous énermons pas! (1961; The Heat's On, 1966; also known as Come Back Charleston Blue, 1974), Retour en Afrique (1964; Cotton Comes to Harlem, 1965), Blind Man with a Pistol (1969; also known as Hot Day, Hot Night, 1970)—continue the character types, stylistic devices, and thematic concerns of the earlier novels. Each one represents a deepening of Himes's artistic control over his material; each one further enhanced his reputation in the genre and increased his notoriety and popularity among the American public. The first two of these were adapted for the screen—Cotton Comes to Harlem (1969) and Come Back Charleston Blue (1972)—and the third, reissued in the United States as Hot Day, Hot Night (1970), was received as the "apotheosis" of Himes's detective novels. Its author was described (on the jacket cover) as "the best black American novelist writing today."

Roland E. Bush

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

HARLEM DOMESTIC SERIES: For Love of Imabelle, 1957 (revised as A Rage in Harlem, 1965); Il pluet des coups durs, 1958 (The Real Cool Killers, 1959); Couché dans le pain, 1959 (The Crazy Kill, 1959); Tout pour plaire, 1959 (The Big Gold Dream, 1960); Imbroglia negro, 1960 (All Shot Up, 1960); Ne nous énervons pas!, 1961 (The Heat's On, 1966; also known as Come Back Charleston Blue, 1974); Retour en Afrique, 1964 (Cotton Comes to Harlem, 1965); Blind Man with a Pistol, 1969 (also known as Hot Day, Hot Night, 1970); Plan B, 1983

NONSERIES NOVELS: Dare-dare, 1959 (Run Man Run, 1966); Une affaire de viol, 1963 (A Case of Rape, 1980)

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: If He Hollers Let Him Go, 1945; Lonely Crusade, 1947; Cast the First Stone, 1952 (unexpurgated edition pb. as Yesterday Will Make You Cry, 1998); The Third Generation, 1954; The Primitive, 1955 (unexpurgated edition pb. as The End of a Primitive, 1997); Pinktoes, 1961

SHORT FICTION: The Collected Stories of Chester Himes, 1990

NONFICTION: The Quality of Hurt: The Autobiography of Chester Himes, Volume I, 1972; My Life of Absurdity: The Autobiography of Chester Himes, Volume II, 1976

MISCELLANEOUS: Black on Black: "Baby Sister" and Selected Writings, 1973

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cochran, David. "So Much Nonsense Must Make Sense: The Black Vision of Chester Himes." The Midwest Quarterly 38 (Autumn, 1996): 1-30. Examines Himes's creation of the hard-boiled cop figure as a reflection of his own experience in Harlem. Argues that he presents Harlem as the underside of American capitalism.

Crooks, Robert. "From the Far Side of the Urban Frontier: The Detective Fiction of Chester Himes and Walter Mosley." College Literature 22 (October, 1995): 68-90. Analyzes the emergence of African American detective fiction in the works of Walter Mosley and Chester Himes. Shows how Himes develops a strategy for disrupting the frontier narrative in a way that lays it bare.

Fabre, Michel, Robert E. Skinner, and Lester Sullivan, comps. Chester Himes: An Annotated Primary and Secondary Bibliography. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1992. This is a comprehensive annotated bibliography of writings by and about Himes.

Himes, Chester. Conversations with Chester Himes. Edited by Michel Fabre and Robert Skinner. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1995. This collection of interviews with Himes provides information about his life and work.

Margolies, Edward, and Michel Fabre. The Several Lives of Chester Himes. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1997. This full-length biography of Himes is indispensable for information about his life.

Muller, Gilbert. Chester Himes. Boston: Twayne, 1989. An excellent introduction to Himes's life and works. Traces the evolution of Himes's grotesque, revolutionary view of life in the United States for African Americans, in several literary modes, culminating in his detective fiction. Chronology, appendix, index, and annotated bibliographies of primary and secondary works.

Pepper, Andrew. The Contemporary American Crime Novel: Race, Ethnicity, Gender, Class. Edinburgh: Edinburgh University Press, 2000. Devotes a chapter to Himes, Walter Mosley, and social-protest detective fiction. Bibliographic references and index.

Sallis, James. Chester Himes: A Life. New York: Walker, 2001. Comprehensive study of Himes's life and biographical reading of his work.

Silet, Charles L. P., ed. The Critical Response to Chester Himes. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 1999. Compilation of essays reading Himes through the lens of various schools of literary criticism. Includes bibliographical references and an index.

Skinner, Robert E. Two Guns from Harlem: The Detective Fiction of Chester Himes. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green State University Popular Press, 1989. Skinner's study of Himes's crime writing presents a comprehensive examination of his crime novels.

ROLANDO HINOJOSA

Born: Mercedes, Texas; January 21, 1929

Also wrote as Rolando Hinojosa-Smith

Type of plot: Police procedural

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Rafe Buenrostro, 1985-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

RAFE BUENROSTRO is chief inspector on the Belken County homicide squad. He was orphaned as a child, and when the series starts, he is a Korean War veteran with a law degree. Rafe became a widower at the age of nineteen when his wife drowned during an Easter family picnic on the bank of the Rio Grande. Later in the series, he marries Sammie Jo Perkins.

CONTRIBUTION

Rolando Hinojosa is the highly regarded American author of the Klail City Death Trip series. Written in Spanish and English, this series emphasizes the consolations of close family or community bonds in a troublesome world that eludes human understanding. Hinojosa highlights the mysteries of life by fashioning a collage of multiple narrative viewpoints, different cultural identities, various generational time periods, and miscellaneous anecdotal stories that are variously comic and serious. He also experiments with dissimilar types or genres of writing, including police procedurals.

Two of the novels in the Klail City Death Trip series, Partners in Crime (1985) and Ask a Policeman (1998), are detective novels. These novels are noteworthy for how they depart from what readers might commonly expect from such works. Instead of sharply individualistic characters dramatically applying exceptional capabilities, Hinojosa's police officers are thoroughly human. They tend to approach a case casually, and often they acknowledge the tedium of following routine procedures. They succeed because of or in spite of their human foibles, but equally often they benefit from or are set back by pure luck.

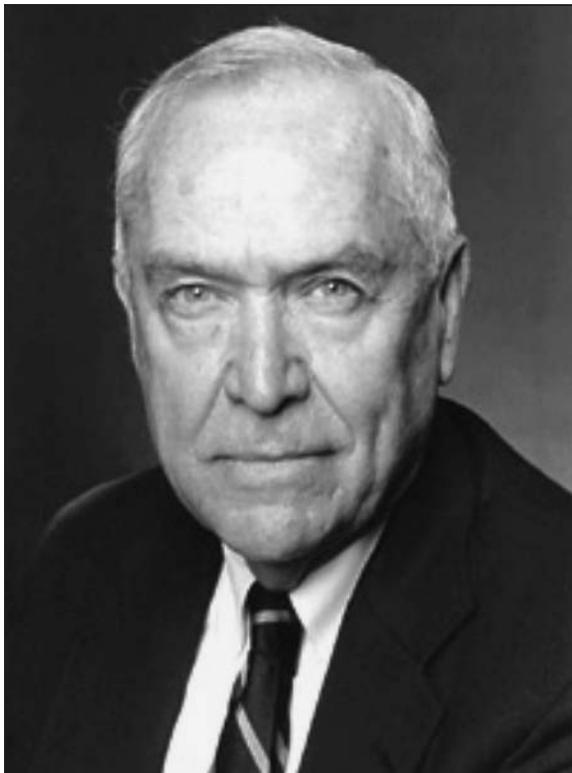

Hinojosa revised the crime novel formula by stressing that societal well-being is maintained less by the heroic actions of extraordinary individuals than by basic forms of everyday cooperation, especially supportive familial interactions. His detectives prevail precisely because they are ordinary people of diverse backgrounds and experiences who have learned how to work well together.

Hinojosa's career as a novelist has been remarkable. His interest in fiction was stirred when, at the age of fifteen, he was awarded an honorable mention in a creative writing contest. His first published book, Estampas del Valle y otras Obras/Sketches of the Valley, and Other Works (1973; English revision, The Valley, 1983), was awarded the Premio Quinto Sol prize for best novel. His second book, Klail City y sus alrededores (1976; Klail City: A Novel, 1987), received the Casa de las Américas award for best Spanish American novel. In 1982 the Southwest Conference on Latin American Studies selected Hinojosa for the Best Writing in Humanities prize, and in 1998 the University of Illinois honored him with an Alumni Achievement Award. He has also received the Lon Tinkle Lifetime Achievement Award (1998), and in 2006 he was installed in the Texas Literary Hall of Fame.

BIOGRAPHY

Rolando Hinojosa, one of five children of Manuel Guzmán Hinojosa and Carrie Effie Smith, was born in the lower Rio Grande Valley town of Mercedes, Texas, on January 21, 1929. His self-educated father earned a living as a rice farmer and then as a horse salesman. During the early years of the Great Depression, Manuel Guzmán Hinojosa would leave his family in Mercedes, where his wife taught elementary school, and cross the nearby Mexican border to work weekdays as a gambler in the communities of Río Rico, Matamoros, and Reynosa. Recalling this time in his life, Hinojosa has half-seriously remarked that he did not know his father until he was four years old, when his father came home to stay. Then Manuel Guzmán Hinojosa joined the three-man Mercedes police force, a fact recalled in the dedication of Ask a Policeman.

Rolando Hinojosa. (Courtesy, University of Texas at Austin)

Until he was in junior high school, Hinojosa primarily spoke and read Spanish. During the late 1940's he served two years in the army, and then as a second lieutenant platoon leader in a reconnaissance regiment, he saw military duty in Korea during 1950-1951. In 1953 Hinojosa earned a bachelor's degree in Spanish at the University of Texas at Austin. After graduating, he taught at Brownsville High School (1954-1956; 1961-1962). He also has worked as a civil servant for the Social Security Administration, an office manager for a clothing firm, and a data processor. In 1963 he married Patricia Louise Sorensen, who died in 1999.

Hinojosa earned a master's degree from New Mexico Highlands University in 1962 and completed a doctorate in English at the University of Illinois in Champaign-Urbana in 1969. After two years as an assistant professor at Trinity University (1968-1970), his academic career developed rapidly. At Texas A&I University (now Texas A&M University) in Kingsville, he was appointed associate professor and chair of modern languages (1970-1974), professor of English and dean of the College of Arts and Sciences (1974-1976), and then vice president of academic affairs (1976-1977). From 1977 to 1981 he held a professorial appointment in English and Chicano studies at the University of Minnesota but then returned to his undergraduate alma mater, the University of Texas, where he served as the director of the Texas Center for Writers (1984-1993) and became the Ellen Clayton Garwood Professor in creative writing.

ANALYSIS

Partners in Crime and Ask a Policeman, Rolando Hinojosa's two police procedurals, are set in Belken County, a fictional locale in the lower Rio Grande Valley of Texas. Both of these novels feature characters, particularly cousins Rafe Buenrostro and Jehu Malacara, who are introduced and developed throughout the diverse range of books included in Hinojosa's Klail City Death Trip series. Therefore, these police procedurals are best understood in relation to the other works in this series. Although Hinojosa's other works do not qualify as detective fiction, their challenging fragmented narrative collage of memories and documents requires that the reader act like a detective while searching for insight into each character's behavior and experience.

The Spanish word for narrative or report is relación, which in The Valley Hinojosa also notes is a south Texas Latino term for "treasure." Hinojosa views his narrative collages as treasure troves not only of Mexican American oral culture but also of more general insights into the human condition. Because life's mysteries resist easy detection, Hinojosa's narratives do not yield their treasure easily. His view of life's essential mysteriousness explains his attraction to the police procedural, in which detectives try to extract truth out of random clues that might or might not be pertinent.

To represent this welter of life-clues, Hinojosa's narrative manner mimics everyday small talk. In Ask a Policeman, one of Rafe Buenrostro's colleagues describes small talk as a Rio Grande Valley custom of combining Old South gentility and Mexican graciousness. Hinojosa honors this custom in his writings. As the narrator in Partners in Crime further explains, civility in storytelling requires that both relaters and listeners take their time, otherwise the story being told will not reveal its treasure because it has not been true to life.

Hinojosa's true-to-life stories highlight the unpredictable and inexplicable role of fate (luck, chance, coincidence, accident) in human lives. Hinojosa's acute sensitivity to fate is aptly summarized in the title of one his short stories: "Sometimes It Just Happens That Way; That's All." The narrator in Partners in Crime expresses this same point of view when observing that people might not deserve the sudden intrusion of violence into their lives, but it occurs anyway. Similar to the point of view in Pedro Calderón de la Barca's La vida es sueño (pr. 1635; Life Is a Dream, 1830), which Hinojosa can quote from memory, an incomprehensible irrationality determines what happens in Partners in Crime and Ask a Policeman.

Hinojosa's homicide detectives must contend with caprice, especially good or bad luck, as life's principal disconcerting element. They find, for example, that clues—such as someone's use of Junior after his name or the absence of children from a school photograph—mean nothing. They find that juries are utterly unpredictable regardless of how open-and-shut a case might seem to be. They find that their own methods are basically haphazard and often lead to unexpected solutions. Hinojosa's detectives sift through countless cues and miscues to reveal some specific truth, but a larger underlying mystery eludes them. They have no explanation for the craziness of either criminals' behavior or, more generally, life's coincidences and accidents.

Unpredictability also defines the detectives' personal lives. To the surprise of his friends, for example, Rafe Buenrostro completes a law degree only to become a county patrol officer. Also, after the death of his wife, Captain Culley Donovan discovers that she had saved boxed wedding presents rather than use these gifts even when they were needed.

Hinojosa's attentiveness to the role of unfathomable fate results in a tinge of humorous absurdity in his books. In both crime novels the detecting reader is clued to the author's view of life's mysterious nonsensicalness by two specific references to Lord Ronald's horse riding off madly in all directions. This strange and literally impossible image alludes to a story in Stephen Leacock's Nonsense Novels (1911). In Leacock's outlandishly comical book, social and narrative conventions are intentionally drawn to the reader's attention only to be flagrantly disregarded. The narrative result is a humorous impression of the absurdity of human behavior, a perception Hinojosa (whose first name can be reassembled to spell "Ronald") shares with Leacock.

Whereas Leacock creates mere caricatures, Hinojosa creates realistic human characters. Although Hinojosa's detectives live in a perplexing world where unpredictable, uncontrollable, unintelligible incidents "just happen," the members of the homicide squad are not dehumanized by fate. It is significant, too, that they are also not overly individualized. They do not bring extraordinary or unique talents to their tasks. Instead, Hinojosa portrays average people dealing with everyday events. His detectives are studies in common human dignity exerting itself against the odds in a difficult world.

Appropriately, Hinojosa's crime novels do not emphasize one detective over another. He provides a panoply of their thoughts about each case, about one another as colleagues and even about each squad member's home life. Hinojosa's detectives specifically remind themselves that they are a team, a unit. They are productively self-aware of and comfortable with their collective identity as a group, and this family-like solidarity is crucial to their success as a squad. Hinojosa intends for the reader to value his thoroughly human detectives as more genuine partners than the so-called partners in crime they pursue.

PARTNERS IN CRIME

Set in October, 1972, Partners in Crime features a triple murder, including the machine-gun slaying of Belken County district attorney Ambrose Gustave Elder. Elder has no premonition that four hours after a breakfast conversation with his wife, he will impulsively punch Harvey Bollinger in his office, an unlucky, capricious incident leading to both his death and many other murders. In the wrong place at the wrong time, Elder loses his life by sheer bad luck. As Rafe and his colleagues search for the Mexican hit men and their motive (cocaine smuggling), they sift through countless details, most of which are false leads. They must also deal with a puzzling charitable arrangement with a retired teacher, whose assignment involves peculiar routine visits to bus-station lockers. Rafe later finds that Lisandro Solís, the head of the Mexican law-enforcement agency, is behind both the killings and drug smuggling. Solís escapes persecution but reappears in Ask a Policeman.

ASK A POLICEMAN

Although Ask a Policeman is a sequel to Partners in Crime, it is faster-paced, more violent, and darker in viewpoint. In this grim story, a drug-trafficking rancher has his brother freed from police custody only to have him murdered by twins who do not know they have killed their own father. As in the earlier novel, luck influences the course of events. However, in this book Hinojosa's typical faint sardonic response to life's underlying absurdity is overshadowed by a bleaker sense of an increasingly pervasive insanity that is leading to an evermore violent world.

The departure of Hinojosa's detectives from the hero paradigm parallels the downgrading of Greek legendary figures to ordinariness in the tragedies of Euripides. It is apt that in Ask a Policeman Rafe reads these classical plays. Rafe's heroism lies in an ordinary inward courage to pursue truth and justice in a tragic Euripidean world of baffling irrationality and injustice.

The extent of human hope in such a dark world is suggested by the poignant last sentence of Ask a Policeman. Having completed his dangerous mission, Rafe returns home at 12:30 A.M. and sees his bedroom light burning. The image implies that his loving wife has anxiously waited for him, but the bedroom-light image has also been anticipated by an earlier allusion to Ernest Hemingway's "A Clean, Well-Lighted Place," a story of lonely men without families. In Ask a Policeman, the small window of light surrounded by night's immense darkness intimates the narrow limits of hope in a tragic Euripidean world. However, that light-filled window also indicates that, even more than the family-like bond formed with his fellow detectives, Rafe's home life with his wife is his sustaining refuge from a taxing world where uncontrollable events "just happen."

William J. Scheick

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

RAFE BUENROSTRO SERIES: Partners in Crime: A Rafe Buenrostro Mystery, 1985; Ask a Policeman, 1998

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Estampas del Valle y otras Obras/ Sketches of the Valley, and Other Works, 1973 (English revision, The Valley, 1983); Klail City y sus alrededores, 1976 (Klail City: A Novel, 1987); Mi querido Rafe, 1981 (Dear Rafe, 1985); Rites and Witnesses, 1982; Claros varones de Belken, 1986 (Fair Gentlemen of Belken County, 1986); Becky and Her Friends, 1990; The Useless Servants, 1993; We Happy Few, 2006

POETRY: Korean Love Songs, 1978

EDITED TEXT: Tomás Rivera, 1935-1984: The Man and His Work, 1988 (with Gary D. Keller and Vernon E. Lattin)

MISCELLANEOUS: Generaciones, Notas, y Brechas/ Generations, Notes, and Trails, 1978; Agricultural Workers of the Rio Grande and Rio Bravo Valleys, 1984

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Hepworth, Candida. "Chicano/a Fiction." In Beginning Ethnic American Literature, edited by Maria Lauret. Manchester, England: Manchester University Press, 2001. Offers a detailed reading of Hinojosa's The Valley, which includes Rafe Buenrostro's childhood memories. Indexed.

Hernández, Guillermo E. Chicano Satire: A Study in Literary Culture. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1991. Hernández argues that Hinojosa's narrative fragments preserve cultural history and interconnect in ways that sustain a people's identity. Indexed.

Jussawalla, Feroza, and Reed Way Dusenbrock, eds. Interviews with Writers of the Post-Colonial World. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi Press, 1992. Focuses on why Hinojosa's books include two languages.

Lee, Joyce Glover. Rolando Hinojosa and the American Dream. Denton: University of North Texas Press, 1999. A good book-length work in English on Hinojosa's works. Attempts to bring a biographical and psychological analysis to the Klail City Death Trip series.

Márquez, Antonio C. "Faulkner in Latin America." Faulkner Journal 2 (1995-1996): 83-100. Identifies Hinojosa's attraction to Faulkner's narrative method as suitable to document the struggle for human dignity in a world of suffering.

Saldívar, José David. The Dialectics of Our America: Genealogy, Cultural Critique, and Literary His- tory. Durham, N.C.: Duke University Press, 1991. Observes how Hinojosa's writings confront and revise the self-image of Americans and their idea of a literary canon. Indexed.

Zilles, Klaus. Rolando Hinojosa: A Reader's Guide. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 2001. Emphasizes the importance of oral tradition and Mexican American history in Hinojosa's representation of the Lower Rio Grande Valley. Indexed.

EDWARD D. HOCH

Born: Rochester, New York; February 22, 1930

Also wrote as Irwin Booth; Anthony Circus; Stephen Dentinger; Lisa Drake; R. T. Edwards; Pat McMahon; R. E. Porter; Matthew Prize; Ellery Queen; R. L. Stevens; Mr. X

Types of plot: Amateur sleuth; espionage; police procedural; private investigator

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Simon Ark, 1955-
 Captain Leopold, 1962-
 C. Jeffrey Rand, 1965-
 Nick Velvet, 1966-
 Carl Crader and Earl Jazine, 1969-
 Matthew Prize, 1984-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

SIMON ARK, who may be two thousand years old, is based on the legend of the Wandering Jew. He is tall, heavyset, "with an expression that was at times saintly." He spends his life seeking evil, and consequently he investigates crimes that seem to involve black magic and other occult phenomena.

CAPTAIN JULES LEOPOLD is head of the homicide department in a large Connecticut city called Monroe. Though born in 1921, Leopold ceases aging toward the middle of the series. In the early stories, he is a widower and something of a loner; later he remarries.

C. JEFFREY RAND is a British secret service agent. He is slender and handsome, with brown hair. In his first cases, he is a cryptanalyst and head of the Department of Concealed Communications. After he retires, he is frequently called back to resolve espionage problems. Rand was born in 1926 but like most of Hoch's series characters he stops aging.

NICK VELVET is a professional thief who steals only things that seem to be valueless, charging his clients twenty thousand to thirty thousand dollars for the service. Born Nicholas Velveta in 1932 in Greenwich Village, he reaches perpetual middle age after about thirty stories in the series. He is just taller than six feet, with dark hair and slightly Italian features.

CARL CRADER is a "Computer Cop," an investigator for the twenty-first century Computer Investigation Bureau. He and his assistant, EARL JAZINE, are in charge of cases that involve tampering with the computers that run almost everything in their science-fictional world.

MATTHEW PRIZE, who was a licensed private eye for almost six years in Los Angeles, has become "Associate Professor of Criminology at Cal State, San Amaro Campus." He reads Ross Macdonald's novels and feels "very guilty for being kind of a smartass myself."

CONTRIBUTION

Edward D. Hoch is the most important post-World War II writer of mystery and detective short stories. In recent years, because of the disappearance of many short-story markets—whether pulp magazines such as Black Mask and Dime Detective or slick publications such as Collier's and American Magazine and their British equivalents—most mystery writers have concentrated on novels. Hoch, however, is a professional short-story writer, with more than 750 stories to his credit. For more than fifteen years his stories appeared in every issue of Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine, and it is a rare anthology that does not include at least one of his tales. Within the limits of the short story Hoch is versatile, trying almost every form and approach, but most of his stories emphasize fair-play clueing and detection. Many of his plot elements are innovative, including combining detection with science fiction and fantasy, but he shares with the Golden Age writers of the 1920's and the 1930's the belief that the puzzle is the fundamental element of the detective story.

BIOGRAPHY

Edward Dentinger Hoch was born on February 22, 1930, in Rochester, New York, the son of Earl G. Hoch and Alice Dentinger Hoch. He tried his hand at writing detective stories during high school and during his two years (1947-1949) at the University of Rochester. (Later, he revised a tale done for a college composition class, and it was published as "The Chippy" in 1956.) He worked for the Rochester Public Library as a researcher from 1949 until November, 1950, when he received his draft notice. He quickly enlisted in the United States Army and spent the next two years stationed at various forts, serving as a member of the military police in 1950 and 1951. While in the army, he continued to write short stories. He received an honorable mention for a story plot he submitted to a cover contest run by The Mysterious Traveler Magazine in 1952, but he could not break into print.

After leaving the army, Hoch looked for a job in the writing or editorial side of a publishing house, eventually landing a position working on "adjustments" for Pocket Books in New York City. Instead of doing creative work, however, he spent his time checking on the accuracy of shipments and accounts. After a year of that, and a raise of only three dollars a week, he returned to Rochester in January, 1954, where he landed work in copywriting and public relations at the Hutchins Advertising Company. He married Patricia McMahon on June 5, 1957.

While still working in advertising, Hoch began to find publishers for his stories. The first to appear in print was "The Village of the Dead," published in the December, 1955, issue of Famous Detective, one of the last of the pulp magazines. It features a psychic sleuth, Simon Ark, the first of Hoch's many series detectives. Twenty-two of his stories were published during 1956 and 1957. In 1968, having won the Edgar Allan Poe Award from the Mystery Writers of America for "The Oblong Room" and with a contract for the novel that would become The Shattered Raven (1969), Hoch decided to devote himself full time to writing.

Hoch became even more prolific as a short-story writer—publishing a story in every issue of Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine from 1973 to 1981. He also became one of the best-known anthology editors in the field, choosing the stories for the annual Best Detective Stories of the Year and its successor, The Year's Best Mystery and Suspense Stories. Under the pseudonym R. E. Porter, he wrote a column for Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine, and in 1982 served as president of the Mystery Writers of America. That year he also honored Rochester Public Library, his first employer, by joining its board of trustees. In 1998 Hoch received an Anthony Award for his short story "One Bag of Coconuts." In 1999 he received the Short Mystery Fiction Society's Golden Derringer Award and, in 2000, The Eye, granted by the Private Eye Writers of America—both for lifetime achievement. In 2001, he received the Mystery Writers of America's Grand Master Award and a Lifetime Achievement Award and an Anthony Award for "The Problem of the Potting Shed" from the Bouchercon World Mystery Convention. In 2005 Hoch received a Barry Award for "The War in Wonderland."

ANALYSIS

Edward D. Hoch writes short stories because he is interested in ideas rather than elaboration of plot or character. “Though I can write a short story in a week or two,” he explains, “a novel takes me two or three months. With the few I’ve attempted, I find myself losing interest about halfway through, anxious to get on to the next idea.” Three of his novels, however, are quite accomplished. The Shattered Raven, which takes place at the Mystery Writers of America’s annual meeting, maintains the puzzlement throughout and gives a good account of what the publisher called with notable hyperbole “the glamorous world of the great mystery fictioneers.”

THE TRANSVECTION MACHINE

His second novel, The Transvection Machine (1971), is a cross-genre work—something very difficult to market successfully because booksellers dislike having to decide where to shelve a book. In The Transvection Machine, a detective novel that takes place in the twenty-first century, the puzzle is well handled, and Hoch carefully leads readers to be sympathetic both with sleuths Carl Crader and Earl Jazine, the Computer Cops, and with the rebels who oppose their computerized society.

THE BLUE MOVIE MURDERS

The Blue Movie Murders (1972) is less daring, but it is a well-written, fairly clued, fast-paced novel with a well-masked least-likely murderer. It is one of many paperback originals that were published under the name Ellery Queen, but were in fact contracted out to various authors. Manfred B. Lee, who with his cousin, Frederic Dannay, had written novels and short stories as Ellery Queen, authorized the use of the Queen name on paperbacks. Lee would approve a plot outline submitted by an author hired by his agents and then edit the final typescript. The Blue Movie Murders is the final paperback original to use the Queen name, for Lee died only a few hours after accepting Hoch’s outline. Dannay did the final editing. It is part of the Trouble Shooter series that was begun by other writers, and it featured Mike McCall, “Assistant to the Governor for Special Affairs.” The series emphasized modern issues, and Hoch dealt sensitively with people involved in the pornographic film industry.

Hoch’s other novels, however, do not work so well. The Fellowship of the Hand (1973) and The Frankenstein Factory (1975), both of which continue the Computer Cops’ investigations, lose narrative drive about halfway through.

THE MATTHEW PRIZE SERIES

In 1984 and 1985, Hoch supplied the plot for three contest novels that were produced in response to the popularity of Thomas Chastain’s Who Killed the Robins Family? And Where and When and How Did They Die? (1983). Each ends just as the detective announces that he or she has solved the crime. Reader could submit their own solutions to the publisher, along with fifty cents, and the winner received fifteen thousand dollars. (The third book, which was published only in Great Britain, had a much smaller prize of one thousand pounds.) Prize Meets Murder (1984), the first in the series, was misleadingly attributed to R. T. Edwards with Otto Penzler—Penzler, whose name is included on all three contest books did none of the writing, though he did market the series. R. T. Edwards was in fact Edward D. Hoch, who devised the plot, and Ron Goulart, who wrote the text. The result is an entertaining, though forgettable, book, which moves along swiftly until the frustrating nonconclusion. (The frustration continued when readers sent to the publisher for the solution, which was not written up as a dramatic final chapter but rather as a list of clues and their interpretation.) Hoch’s collaborator on the two later contest novels, Medical Center Murders (1984) by Lisa Drake and This Prize Is Dangerous (1985) by Matthew Prize, has not been revealed. Neither book sold as well as the first in the series.

THE SHORT STORIES

Yet however one evaluates Hoch’s novels, his major contributions to the mystery and detective genre are his short stories. He has created more than twenty series characters; only those who have appeared in Hoch’s books are listed at the beginning of this article. Others include investigators for Interpol (Sebastian Blue and Laura Charme), a Gypsy (Michael Vlado), a police officer (Nancy Trentino), a priest (Father David Noone), a female bodyguard (Libby Knowles), a New England physician (Dr. Sam Hawthorne), a con man (Ulysses S. Bird), and a Western gunslinger (Ben Snow). His sleuths specialize in different sorts of cases: hard-boiled investigations (Al Darlan), occult crimes (Professor Dark), espionage (Harry Ponder and Charles Spacer), and school crimes (Paul Tower, the Lollypop Cop).

Despite their great variety in plot and detective, most of Hoch's stories have certain elements that make their authorship immediately recognizable. His writing style has been called "deceptively simple," in that the manner of telling never interferes with what is to Hoch the primary emphasis of a short work of fiction—the tale itself. Hoch does not want the narrative style to make the reader aware of the writer's personality, and thus he seldom includes unusual words, extended metaphors, or obscure examples based on his wide reading. Except for some of his earliest apprentice stories, he does not emphasize atmosphere for its own sake; nor does he load the text with action-filled but ultimately meaningless adjectives in the manner of many of the earlier pulp writers.

Hoch's wording is economical and precise. Witness the opening of his "The People of the Peacock": "The man who called himself Tony Wilder had traveled three days by camel to reach the valley oasis not far from where the Euphrates River crossed the arid border between Syria and Iraq." In a single sentence, the reader is introduced to a character, a setting, and the beginning of a situation. With the phrase "who called himself," Hoch already suggests the mystery, and the story will indeed revolve around a question of identity. In the middle of the story, Hoch leads the reader to think that the problem is to identify a spy named Venice, when in fact he has already hinted that the puzzle involves Wilder. To take another example, "Murder of a Gypsy King" begins, "On the long, lonely highway into Bucharest that sunny August afternoon, Jennifer Beatty suddenly changed her mind." Again, Hoch tells the reader who, when, where, and suggests a mystery.

Hoch often uses the first sentence in a story to make the reader ask "why." Sometimes, as in "Captain Leopold and the Murderer's Son," the story begins simply: "Leopold would always remember it as the case he didn't solve." At other times—for example, in "In Some Secret Place"—the unadorned language of the opening is surprisingly full of nuances: "I was almost too young to remember it, and certainly too young to understand it all, but that July weekend of Uncle Ben's funeral has stayed with me through all these years." The reader realizes that the story occurred years ago, when the narrator was young and when a "July weekend" implied long, lazy summer days. The sentence also suggests questions: What happened so long ago that the narrator was "almost too young" to recall and definitely "too young to understand"? Whatever it was had something to do with a funeral and therefore death, and the events were so important that they have "stayed with me through all these years." Few other authors could have said so much, so succinctly, and led readers to want to know more.

Though accepting the modern dictum that one's language should be simple and direct, Hoch in his plotting is a neo-Romantic. Rarely are his stories based on the naturalistic analysis of what has gone wrong with society; instead, the major plot element usually involves the bizarre and the exotic. In this respect, he is a descendant of the first writer of detective novels, Wilkie Collins, whose mysteries featured a seemingly murderous room, a jewel stolen from the head of an Asian idol, and the apparently ghostly manifestations of a young woman dressed in white. In short, ordinary events do not hold much interest for Hoch or for his protagonists. The idea behind the Nick Velvet stories was to explain why anyone would pay Velvet twenty thousand dollars or more to steal worthless items, and Hoch finds all sorts of unexpected things for Velvet to take: the water from a swimming pool, a baseball team, all the tickets to a play, a birthday cake, a penny, a merry-go-round horse, a matador's cape, among other things. On one occasion, he is hired to steal the contents of an empty room; on another he goes after a lake monster.

HOCH'S SLEUTHS AND SPYS

Simon Ark, Hoch's first detective, investigates a witch living on Park Avenue, the death of a woman whose body bursts into flames, a religious cult whose followers attach themselves to crosses, a bullet that kills a person centuries after it was fired, a modern unicorn, a living mermaid, a mummy that washes ashore in Brazil, and a man who is murdered while alone in a revolving door. Sam Hawthorne, a New England country doctor of the 1920's and the 1930's, specializes in impossible crimes. In his first case, he discovers how a carriage disappeared from within a covered bridge, and in later adventures he explains how a boy vanished from an ordinary swing in full view and solves many locked-room murders. Indeed, by the 1970's, Hoch had staked out a position as the successor to John Dickson Carr in mastery of so-called miracle crimes—murders, robberies, and disappearances that seem to have no rational explanation but that, at the conclusion of the story, are shown to have been committed by humans for human motives and by natural means. One of Hoch's most extraordinary plots, for example, involves a man who leaps from a window and then disappears until hours later, when his body hits the pavement. Even Captain Leopold, hero of Hoch's series of police procedurals, cannot avoid bizarre cases. When a child disappears from a Ferris-wheel car, and when an automobile is driven by a dead man, Leopold investigates. In one story, he is the sole suspect in the locked-room murder of his former wife, and in another he combats a super-criminal reminiscent of Arthur Conan Doyle's Professor Moriarty.

Hoch's espionage agents are also experts at unusual crimes. Harry Ponder is faced with the problem of the ambassador who is shot within a locked automobile. Jeffrey Rand, who supposedly handles only decoding messages—certainly a safe, perhaps even a dull occupation—has to unravel mysteries involving a spy who has committed suicide while holding a playing card in his hand, a woman who travels on airplanes with a coffin, and an unidentified British agent who has suddenly started sending coded messages.

No matter whether they begin as thieves, cryptanalysts, gunfighters, or Gypsy chiefs, Hoch's protagonists almost always become detectives. As Hoch explains about Nick Velvet, "he is often called upon to solve a mystery in order to accomplish his mission or clear himself." Most of Hoch's stories are fair-play puzzles; he challenges the reader to foresee the solution before the detective explains. Frequently there is enough mystery in a single Hoch short story to fill a novel. Each of these mysteries is completely clued, and each resolved in a story of about sixty-five hundred words. Hoch is so prolific and so versatile that exceptions can be found to every generalization about his work, except one: His plots are always ingenious.

Douglas G. Greene
Updated by Fiona Kelleghan

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

SIMON ARK SERIES: The Judges of Hades, and Other Simon Ark Stories, 1971; City of Brass, and Other Simon Ark Stories, 1971; The Quests of Simon Ark, 1984

CAPTAIN LEOPOLD SERIES: Leopold's Way, 1985

C. JEFFREY RAND SERIES: The Spy and the Thief, 1971

NICK VELVET SERIES: The Theft of the Persian Slipper, 1978; The Thefts of Nick Velvet, 1978; The Velvet Touch, 2000

CARL CRADER AND EARL JAZINE SERIES: The Transvection Machine, 1971; The Fellowship of the Hand, 1973; The Frankenstein Factory, 1975

MATTHEW PRIZE SERIES: Prize Meets Murder, 1984 (as Edwards); Medical Center Murders, 1984 (as Drake); This Prize Is Dangerous, 1985 (as Prize)

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Shattered Raven, 1969; The Blue Movie Murders, 1972 (as Ellery Queen; edited and supervised by Frederic Dannay)

OTHER SHORT FICTION: Tales of Espionage, 1989 (15 stories by Hoch and 16 by other writers, Eleanor Sullivan and Chris Dorbandt, editors); The Spy Who Read Latin, and Other Stories, 1990; The People of the Peacock, 1991; The Night, My Friend: Stories of Crime and Suspense, 1992; Diagnosis: Impossible—The Problems of Dr. Sam Hawthorne, 1996; The Ripper of Storyville, and Other Ben Snow Tales, 1997; The Night People, and Other Stories, 2001; The Old Spies Club, and Other Intrigues of Rand, 2001; The Iron Angel, and Other Tales of the Gypsy Sleuth, 2003

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: The Monkey's Clue, and the Stolen Sapphire, 1978

EDITED TEXTS: Dear Dead Days, 1972; Best Detective Stories of the Year, 1976-1981; All but Impossible! An Anthology of Locked Room and Impossible Crime Stories, 1981; The Year's Best Mystery and

Suspense Stories, 1982-1995; Great British Detectives, 1987 (with Martin H. Greenberg); Women Write Murder, 1987 (with Martin H. Greenberg); Murder Most Sacred: Great Catholic Tales of Mystery and Suspense, 1989 (with Martin H. Greenberg)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Adey, Robert. Locked Room Murders. 2d ed. Minneapolis: Crossover Press, 1991. Adey analyzes eighty-one of Hoch's impossible crime stories. Each entry has a brief description of the impossible problem (usually, but not limited to, a locked-room murder) presented and, in an appendix at the end of the book, how the crime was solved.
- Barzun, Jacques, Taylor Hertig, and Wendell Hertig. A Catalogue of Crime. 2d ed. New York: Harper and Row, 1989. The authors single out eleven short stories and one anthology for discussion. They emphasize the consistency of Hoch's work and praise the complexity and lifelike quality of his plots.
- Hoch, Edward D. "Shortcut to Murder: An Interview with Edward D. Hoch." Interview by John Kovalski. The Armchair Detective 23 (Spring, 1990): 152-169. Considered the definitive interview with the author, it contains detailed descriptions of many aspects of his career, including his early writing, his writing habits and methods, and the origin of his major series characters. Hoch frankly discusses the reasons for his preference for the short story over the novel.
- McAleeer, John, and Andrew McAleeer. Mystery Writing in a Nutshell. Rockville, Md.: James A. Rock, 2007. This how-to volume on mystery writing contains a foreword by Hoch that reveals much about his views on writing.
- Moffatt, June M., and Francis M. Nevins, Jr. Edward Hoch Bibliography, 1955-1991. Van Nuys, Calif.: Southern California Institute for Fan Interests, 1991. A complete listing of the writings of Hoch through the end of 1991, with complete publishing information, including reprints, identification of those stories about continuing characters, and adaptations to other media.
- Nevins, Francis M., Jr. Introduction to Leopold's Way. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1985. Nevins discusses the series character Captain Leopold in the context of Hoch's many other series characters. He considers the stories among Hoch's best because they are classic detective tales but, in the tradition of crime fiction by Georges Simenon and Graham Greene, they reveal "unexpected nuances of character and emotion and meaning beneath the surface of his deceptively simple style."
- Nolan, Tom. "Short Stories, Hard Covers: New Partners in Crime Fiction." Wall Street Journal, May 9, 2007, p. D.10. In this article about the increasing popularity of short stories, Hoch notes that he has published 938 short stories in fifty-two years and is a regular contributor to Ellery Queen's Mystery Magazine.
- Skillman, Brad. "Edward Hoch: Master in His Own Write." The Dood Review of Mystery 11 (October, 1991): 4-5. Largely based on an interview with Hoch, this article elicited his opinion on the reasons for the relative decline of the mystery short story, including the shrinkage of magazine markets for new writers. Hoch also discusses the continuing trend, begun at the end of World War II, toward the psychological crime story and away from the detective tale.
- Spoto, Mary Theresa. "Needing Burial: Horror and Reconciliation in Edward D. Hoch's 'The Faceless Thing.'" Studies in Weird Fiction 20 (Winter, 1997): 13-17. A close reading of Hoch's short horror story "The Faceless Thing," which Spoto praises for an ending different from traditional horror story endings that reestablish the natural order. Instead, Hoch offers an alternative type of reconciliation that is consistent with the psychology of its characters and provides a closure "that is in harmony with the disharmony of a universe of horror."

RUPERT HOLMES

Born: Northwich, Cheshire, England; February 24, 1947

Types of plot: Historical; amateur sleuth

CONTRIBUTION

Rupert Holmes has contributed to mystery and detective fiction in a variety of ways, and almost everything he has touched has turned to gold (or platinum). Beginning in his late teens, Holmes, like other singer-songwriters of his era, such as Jimmy Buffet, Don McLean, Al Stewart, and the late Warren Zevon, composed songs that told stories often of a dark and dangerous nature, perhaps best exemplified by his 1971 opus, “Timothy,” which described possible cannibalism in a collapsed mine. During more than a decade as a performer whose works were often performed by other recording artists—including Barbra Streisand, Gene Pitney, the Platters, and the Drifters—Holmes found success with such hits as “Escape (The Piña Colada Song)” and “Him.” His songs and arrangements have been featured on many film soundtracks, including A Star Is Born (1976), How Stella Got Her Groove Back (1998), Shrek (2001), and The Sweetest Thing (2002) and on television series like The Shield (beginning in 2002) and Six Feet Under (2001-2005).

In the 1980’s, Holmes began to write plays and scores. His first effort, a musical called The Mystery of Edwin Drood (pr. 1985), adapted from Charles Dickens’s novel of the same name, took five Tony Awards and an Edgar Award, probably because of Holmes’s innovative staging. Others of his plays have also met with critical acclaim: Accomplice: A Comedy Thriller (pr. 1990) won an Edgar; the suspenseful Solitary Confinement (pr. 1992) set box-office records at the Kennedy Center; his serial-killer play Thumbs (pr. 2000) set similar records at the Helen Hayes Theater; and Curtains (pr. 2007) has also proved popular. Other nonmystery Holmes plays, including the nostalgic Say Goodnight, Gracie (pr. 2002) and the musical adaptation of Marty (pr. 2002), have likewise been well reviewed.

Television has also benefited from Holmes’s talents. Though not a mystery—but sometimes incorporating mysterious elements—Remember WENN (1996-1998), the American Movie Classics series that Holmes created and wrote in the 1990’s, won Cable ACE awards for editing (1996) and costume design (1997) and captured an Emmy Award (1996) among its five nominations.

Holmes’s first mystery novel, Where the Truth Lies (2003), was nominated for a Nero Wolfe Award as best American crime novel and was made into a major motion picture. His second mystery novel, Swing (2005), was well reviewed and incorporates a CD of songs composed by the author; the title song is performed by Melissa Manchester.

BIOGRAPHY

Rupert Holmes was born on February 24, 1947, in Northwich, Cheshire, England, the first of two sons born to clarinetist, conductor, and later high school music teacher Leonard Eliot Goldstein—at the time leader of an Army infantry band—and his British war bride Gwendolen Mary Pynn Goldstein. In 1950 the family came to the United States, where Rupert grew up in the New York City suburb of Nanuet. As a youth, he was an avid reader and at the age of nine was determined to become a mystery writer. He was an eager listener to such radio dramas such as Suspense (1942-1962), Have Gun—Will Travel (1958-1960), and Yours Truly, Johnny Dollar (1949-1962). Holmes, who learned to play more than a dozen musical instruments, joined his first rock band, the Nomads, as a teenager. In his senior year, he wrote his first one-act play, “Countdown for George.”

Following graduation from Nyack High School, Holmes attended the Crouse College of Music at Syracuse University for a year before transferring to the Manhattan School of Music. Holmes soon dropped out to work on Tin Pan Alley, acting in a variety of capacities, including studio and session musician, backup vocalist, producer, arranger, and songwriter. Holmes in 1969 married a childhood sweetheart, now attorney Elizabeth “Liza” Wood Dreifuss, and the couple produced three children, Wendy, Nick, and Tim.

To view image, please refer to print edition of this title.

Rupert Holmes (right) with composer John Kander (center) and Debra Monk, one of the stars of his 2007 Broadway musical Curtains, a comic-mystery story about the murder of a Broadway star in 1959. (Hulton Archive/Getty Images)

Holmes composed and arranged songs for a number of groups and individuals, such as the Cuff Links, the Buoys, Gene Pitney, the Platters, the Drifters, and the Partridge Family, and in 1971 penned a major hit with “Timothy.” In the early 1970’s, while his younger brother Richard was training to become an operatic baritone, Holmes embarked on his own singing career, releasing his first album, Widescreen, in 1974. The music gained considerable acclaim for the author’s lush orchestrations of his clever, witty narrative songs and attracted the attention of Barbra Streisand, who recorded some of his songs and engaged the songwriter to produce several of her albums. During a decade of recording—he cut his last album in 1994—Holmes released such critical successes as Singles (1976), Pur- suit of Happiness (1979), Partners in Crime (1979), and Full Circle (1981). His “Escape (The Piña Colada Song)” was a major hit in 1979-1980. Other recording artists, including Dolly Parton, Barry Manilow, and Britney Spears have covered his tunes.

Turning to theatrical composition in the 1980’s, Holmes scored a major success with his first effort in 1985, The Mystery of Edwin Drood, a multiple Tony Award winner. At the same time, the Holmes family suffered a personal tragedy: Their ten-year-old daughter Wendy died suddenly of an undiagnosed brain tumor. Traumatized by the loss, Holmes was for a time unable to compose music. He later returned to work with a string of successful plays—Accomplice; Solitary Confinement; Say Goodnight, Gracie; Thumbs; and Marty—and in the late 1990's created and wrote the Emmy Award-winning television series Remember WENN.

In 2003, Holmes published the first of his well-received historical mystery novels, Where the Truth Lies, which was shortly afterward made into a motion picture. He then published the novel Swing.

ANALYSIS

Since the beginning of his career, Rupert Holmes has been a quick study. He has shown amazing versatility, demonstrating time and again his ability to learn a new art and to master it quickly. This craft started early when, during his college years, he worked in New York City's Tin Pan Alley, performing a variety of tasks including musical session work, writing and arranging songs and jingles, backup singing, and producing recordings. By the age of twenty-four, he had gained a reputation as a writer of songs that told stories in narrative fashion, including the 1971 the Buoy's hit, "Timothy." During the 1970's, Holmes became a recording artist in his own right, compiling a number of albums featuring original tunes frequently covered by other singers. His pop singing career reached its apex late in the decade with the smash "Escape (The Piña Colada Song)," which made it into both domestic and worldwide charts in 1979 and 1980, although it did not win a Grammy, an award that has thus far eluded the writer. Many of Holmes's clever lyrics, frequently featuring criminal acts, as well as his well-written short stories, appeared in Ellery Queen Mystery Magazine.

In the 1980's, Holmes, long a fan of written and broadcast mystery fiction and a lover of historical subjects, became a playwright, turning Charles Dickens's unfinished novel, The Mystery of Edwin Drood (1870), into a musical that garnered five 1986 Tony Awards, including three—best book, best music, and best lyrics—given to Holmes, and picked up an Edgar Award as well, for best play. Much of the success of the play rested on Holmes's innovation of stopping the action at the very point where Dickens had left off, so the audience could vote on which character they thought committed the murder; Holmes wrote lines for all the possible suspects, giving the play a number of alternative endings. The author followed that success with a play, Accomplice, a parody of a traditional Golden Age mystery, which won an Edgar Award. Other Holmes plays include the mystery-thriller Solitary Confinement, which features a man trapped in a building with an assassin hired to kill him, and Thumbs, a drama that brings a spouse-murderer and a serial killer into conflict. During the 1990's, Holmes began to work in television, writing all fifty-six episodes—and all of the incidental music—for the American Movie Channel's first original series, Remember WENN, an Emmy Award-winning comedy-drama Holmes created, set in 1939 at a Pittsburgh radio station.

In the twenty-first century, Holmes added novel writing to his repertoire: Where the Truth Lies (2003) and Swing (2005) combine the author's primary interests, mystery, history and music. Both novels demonstrate the author's considerable writing skills, particularly his ability to juggle many plot points, his eye for telling detail, his ear for realistic dialogue, his creation of large casts of believable characters, and his predilection for mixing humor and drama. In his two novels, Holmes has shown a remarkable talent for matching the style of his writing to the period in which it is placed: Where the Truth Lies, set in the mid-1970's, features breezy, self-conscious, and sometimes satirical, cynical language, whereas the writing in Swing, a story revolving around events in San Francisco in 1940, is more straightforward, harder-edged, and crisper. Neither book displays an excess of literary pyrotechnics, and each, though nothing alike in tone or purpose, provides an entertaining read.

WHERE THE TRUTH LIES

Holmes's first novel is as much a character study as it is a mystery. A multilayered work, the novel is really a story within a story within a story. It is written in the present about events that transpired in the mid-1970's, which involve something that happened in the late 1950's. The bulk of the story unfolds in 1976 and consists of narrative, letters, and excerpts from memoirs.

Narrated in first person by a brash, cynical twenty-six-year-old woman, K. O'Connor, Where the Truth Lies concerns a publishing project in which O'Connor, an up-and-coming celebrity interviewer, is ostensibly assigned to write an objective tell-all biography. The subject is singer Vince Collins, half of a successful act, who broke up with partner comedian Lanny Morris in the late 1950's. The partnership loosely resembles the careers of Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis. In the course of firsthand research that takes her coast-to-coast, O'Connor learns that at the time of the breakup, Collins and Morris were implicated but never charged in the death of a beautiful young red-haired woman named Maureen O'Flaherty. While O'Connor conducts her investigation in an attempt to discover the truth of the matter (or at least provide something sensational for her book), she violates many tenets of the investigative reporter's code. She lies shamelessly to anyone and everyone. She passes herself off as her best friend, complicating both of their lives. She makes promises she has no intention of keeping. She destroys any remaining traces of objectivity—O'Connor has no qualms about plying her sexuality to elicit answers—by becoming romantically involved with both Collins and Morris. In the process of writing about the two men who served as the object of her attention, she becomes as much a central character as they do, a not unexpected eventuality given O'Connor's habit of thrusting herself prominently into the stories that bear her byline.

An acerbic, satiric peek at the attitudes and moralities of the era in which the story is set, Where the Truth Lies begins slowly but compensates for its languid early pace with fascinating vignettes and insider glimpses into the worlds of publishing and entertainment and the lifestyles of the rich and famous. The mysterious element, mostly ignored in favor of comedic, film nostalgia-related, and erotic sequences during the opening third of the novel (as a result of which the reader will never again view Disneyland as an innocent playground), begins to slowly assert itself, and the narrative gains momentum. O'Connor, like a bumbling amateur sleuth-in-training, manages to divorce herself from her feelings, to separate genuine clues from red herrings, to weigh contradictory accounts of events from a variety of sources, and to home in on the most logical explanation for both the death of Maureen and for the breakup of a successful showbiz act. At the end of her search, O'Connor reveals a classic locked-room puzzle, the answer to which is key in disclosing the real crime, and the real murderer.

SWING

Holmes's second novel, Swing, combines history, mystery, and music into a satisfying, atmospheric, and innovative noir-flavored whole. Set in 1940 on Treasure Island during the San Francisco Golden Gate Exposition World's Fair, Swing features the world-weary first-person narrative of thirty-eight-year-old Ray Sherwood, a longtime jazz saxophonist and music arranger touring with Jack Donovan and His Orchestra of Note, which are booked at the Terrace Lounge of the Claremont Hotel. Ray, divorced from his wife following the tragic death of their child, is contacted by an attractive Berkeley coed who proposes that he score her contest-winning composition, "Swing Around the Sun." Ray accepts the offer only to be propelled into a complex murder mystery-thriller involving Jews escaping from occupied France, impersonations, secret codes, enemy agents, and other assorted malfeasance.

Swing has much going for it. Holmes's extensive musical background is used to full advantage throughout—a CD of the tunes mentioned in the novel, with words and music by the author, plus full lyrics that help provide clues to the mystery—were packaged with the book. The novel is laden with evocative period details of a former age, the now-vanished Exposition and the special appeal of San Francisco, aided and abetted with maps, photographs, luggage stickers, and postcards of the era introducing each chapter. The convoluted story, underscored with the uncertainty of a nation currently at peace but troubled by the war in Europe and the lurking menace of Japan, captures well the conflicted emotions of the time. The action, except for a couple of coincidences that strain credulity and several incidents that happen offstage that might have been better dramatized rather than summarized, is for the most part believable; there are a plethora of unexpected plot twists that continually ratchet up the level of suspense. The voices of the characters, including some truly nasty villains, are authentic and unique. The concluding chapter, which resolves a few dangling threads and provides a happy Hollywood ending, somewhat undercuts the downbeat mood of the bulk of the novel but does not seriously detract from what is, for a relatively new novelist, a major accomplishment.

Jack Ewing

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: Where the Truth Lies, 2003; Swing, 2005

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

PLAYS: The Mystery of Edwin Drood, pr. 1985; Twelfth Night, pr. 1986; Accomplice: A Comedy Thriller, pr. 1990; Solitary Confinement, pr. 1992; Goosebumps, pr. 1998; Thumbs, pr. 2002; Say Goodnight, Gracie, pr. 2002; Marty, pr. 2002; Swango, pr. 2003; Curtains, pr. 2007

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Henry, William A., III. "Detective Kit." Review of The Mystery of Edwin Drood, by Rupert Holmes. Time, December 16, 1985, 83. A highly positive review of The Mystery of Edwin Drood, noting Holmes's innovation of stopping the musical in midstream to allow the audience to vote on which character they believe to be the murderer, and praising the show tunes "Perfect Strangers" and "Don't Quit While You're Ahead."

Holmes, Rupert. "Murder, With Music." Interview by Bridget Kinsella. Publishers Weekly 250, no. 22 (June 2, 2003): 33-34. An interview with Holmes, in which he reveals that K. O'Connor, the protagonist of Where the Truth Lies, was inspired by Daphne du Maurier's Rebecca (1938), wherein the first name of the heroine, the second Mrs. DeWinter, is never revealed. This issue of Time also contains a favorable review of Holmes's first novel, in which the reviewer notes the wealth of period detail.

_____. Rupert Holmes Website and Resource Center. <http://www.rupertholmes.com>. The author's personal Web site contains considerable information about his life and work, including extensive biographical data, interviews, and many photos of Holmes at various stages of his career.

Kirkus Reviews. Review of Where the Truth Lies, by Rupert Holmes. 71, no. 10 (May 15, 2003): 702. A starred review of Where the Truth Lies, which is called a "slickly funny showbiz romp with lots of great scenery."

Salamon, Julie. "Back to a World Where Mystery and Music Go Hand in Hand." Review of Swing, by Rupert Holmes. The New York Times, March 19, 2005, p. B11. Reviewer looks at Holmes's background and the effect that the death of his daughter, Wendy, had on his career. Examines how music affects his work, particularly this novel, for which he wrote a number of songs.

"Short Takes." Time, November 23, 1992, 81. Among other items, the article contains a brief, unfavorable review of Solitary Confinement, panned for its "lumpishly predictable plot" and its lifeless characters, who are compared to "pawns on a chessboard."

Stroup, Kate. "A Ham for All Seasons." Review of Where the Truth Lies, by Rupert Holmes. Newsweek 142, no. 3 (July 21, 2003): 58. Stroup notes Holmes's desire to change directions, as his pop hit "Escape (The Piña Colada Song)" has dominated his image. "I realized long ago that my tombstone will be in the shape of a giant pineapple," Holmes said. "Sometimes I feel like the rest of my work is penance for that one sin." Stroup found the descriptions of the devastated family to be the best part of the entertaining book.

CRITICAL SURVEY OF MYSTERY
AND DETECTIVE FICTION

CRITICAL SURVEY OF MYSTERY
AND DETECTIVE FICTION

Revised Edition

Volume 3

Leonard Holton – Elizabeth Peters

Editor, Revised Edition

Carl Rollyson

Baruch College, City University of New York

Editor, First Edition

Frank N. Magill

SALEM PRESS, INC.

Pasadena, California Hackensack, New Jersey

Editor in Chief: Dawn P. Dawson

Editorial Director: Christina J. Moose
Developmental Editor: R. Kent Rasmussen
Project Editor: Rowena Wildin Dehanke
Editorial Assistant: Dana Garey
Research Supervisor: Jeffry Jensen

Research Assistant: Keli Trousdale
Acquisitions Editor: Mark Rehn
Photo Editor: Cynthia Breslin Beres
Production Editor: Joyce I. Buchea
Design and Graphics: James Hutson

Copyright © 1988, 2001, 2008, by Salem Press, Inc.

All rights in this book are reserved. No part of this work may be used or reproduced in any manner whatsoever or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic or mechanical, including photocopy, recording, or any information storage and retrieval system, without written permission from the copyright owners except in the case of brief quotations embodied in critical articles and reviews or in the copying of images deemed to be freely licensed or in the public domain. For information, address the publisher, Salem Press, Inc., P.O. Box 50062, Pasadena, California 91115.

Some of the essays in this work, which have been updated, originally appeared in the following Salem Press sets: Critical Survey of Mystery and Detective Fiction (1988, edited by Frank N. Magill) and One Hundred Masters of Mystery and Detective Fiction (2001, edited by Fiona Kelleghan). New material has been added.

∞ The paper used in these volumes conforms to the American National Standard for Permanence of Paper for Printed Library Materials, Z39.48-1992(R1997).

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Critical survey of mystery and detective fiction. — Rev. ed. / editor, Carl Rollyson.
p. cm.

ISBN 978-1-58765-397-1 (set : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-1-58765-398-8 (vol. 1 : alk. paper) —
ISBN 978-1-58765-399-5 (vol. 2 : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-1-58765-400-8 (vol. 3 : alk. paper) —
ISBN 978-1-58765-401-5 (vol. 4 : alk. paper) — ISBN 978-1-58765-402-2 (vol. 5 : alk. paper)

1. Detective and mystery stories—History and criticism. 2. Detective and mystery stories—Bio-bibliography.
3. Detective and mystery stories—Stories, plots, etc. I. Rollyson, Carl E. (Carl Edmund)

PN3448.D4C75 2008
809.3'872—dc22

2007040208

First Printing

PRINTED IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

CONTENTS

VOLUME 3

Complete List of Contents	li	Le Fanu, Joseph Sheridan	1099
Holton, Leonard	943	Lehane, Dennis	1103
Hornung, E. W.	948	Leonard, Elmore	1107
Household, Geoffrey	953	Leonov, Leonid Maksimovich	1111
Hull, Richard	956	Le Queux, William	1116
Huxley, Elspeth	960	Leroux, Gaston	1120
Innes, Michael	966	Lescroart, John	1125
Jacobs, W. W.	971	Levin, Ira	1129
James, Bill	974	Linington, Elizabeth	1134
James, P. D.	978	Lippman, Laura	1139
Jance, J. A.	985	Lockridge, Richard, and Frances Lockridge	1143
Johnston, Velda	989	Lovesey, Peter	1149
Kaminsky, Stuart M.	994	Lowndes, Marie Belloc	1154
Keating, H. R. F.	998	Ludlum, Robert	1160
Keeler, Harry Stephen	1004	McBain, Ed	1166
Kelly, Mary	1009	McCall Smith, Alexander	1172
Kemelman, Harry	1012	McCarry, Charles	1176
Kendrick, Baynard H.	1019	McClure, James	1181
Kerr, Philip	1023	McCrumb, Sharyn	1185
Kersh, Gerald	1028	Mcdonald, Gregory	1190
King, Laurie R.	1033	MacDonald, John D.	1196
King, Peter	1038	Macdonald, Ross	1200
King, Stephen	1041	McGerr, Patricia	1205
Kirino, Natsuo	1046	McGinley, Patrick	1210
Knight, Kathleen Moore	1051	McGivern, William P.	1214
Knox, Ronald A.	1055	McGown, Jill	1219
Koontz, Dean R.	1062	McInerny, Ralph	1223
Kyd, Thomas	1066	MacInnes, Helen	1230
Lacy, Ed.	1071	McKinty, Adrian	1234
Lathen, Emma	1074	MacLean, Alistair	1238
Latimer, Jonathan	1079	MacLeod, Charlotte	1242
Laurence, Janet	1083	Magnan, Pierre	1248
Leblanc, Maurice	1087	Maitland, Barry	1252
Le Carré, John	1093	Maron, Margaret	1257
		Marquand, John P.	1261
		Marsh, Ngaio	1265
		Mason, A. E. W.	1270

Critical Survey of Mystery and Detective Fiction

Matera, Lia	1274	Natsuki, Shizuko	1354
Matsumoto, Seichō	1278	Nebel, Frederick	1358
Maugham, W. Somerset	1282	Neely, Barbara	1362
Maupassant, Guy de	1288	Neely, Richard	1366
Mayor, Archer	1293
Melville, James	1297	O'Connell, Carol	1370
Millar, Margaret	1301	Oppenheim, E. Phillips	1374
Milne, A. A.	1306	Orczy, Baroness	1379
Mina, Denise	1311
Mitchell, Gladys	1315	Palmer, Stuart	1384
Miyabe, Miyuki	1319	Paretsky, Sara	1388
Morice, Anne	1324	Parker, Robert B.	1394
Morrell, David	1327	Pears, Iain	1398
Morrison, Arthur	1332	Pelecanos, George P.	1403
Mortimer, John	1336	Pentecost, Hugh	1407
Mosley, Walter	1341	Perry, Thomas	1411
Moyes, Patricia	1345	Peters, Elizabeth	1415
Müllner, Adolf	1350

COMPLETE LIST OF CONTENTS

VOLUME 1

Publisher's Note	v	Bramah, Ernest	162
Contributors	ix	Brand, Christianna	166
Table of Contents	xv	Braun, Lilian Jackson	171
Editor's Introduction	xvii	Breen, Jon L.	175
Abbot, Anthony	1	Brett, Simon	179
Adams, Cleve F.	4	Brown, Fredric	183
Akunin, Boris	7	Brown, Sandra	186
Alcott, Louisa May	11	Bruce, Leo	190
Aldrich, Thomas Bailey	16	Bruen, Ken	196
Allen, Grant	20	Buchan, John	200
Allingham, Margery	25	Buckley, William F., Jr.	207
Ambler, Eric	30	Burdett, John	211
Armstrong, Charlotte	35	Burke, James Lee	215
Avallone, Michael	40	Burley, W. J.	220
Babson, Marian	45	Burnett, W. R.	225
Bagley, Desmond	50	Burns, Rex	230
Bailey, H. C.	54	Cain, James M.	236
Ball, John	60	Cannell, Stephen J.	242
Balzac, Honoré de	65	Carmichael, Harry	247
Barnard, Robert	70	Carr, John Dickson	251
Barr, Nevada	75	Carter, Nick	257
Barr, Robert	79	Caspary, Vera	267
Beeding, Francis	84	Caudwell, Sarah	272
Bell, Josephine	88	Chance, John Newton	276
Bennett, Arnold	94	Chandler, Raymond	282
Bentley, E. C.	98	Charteris, Leslie	289
Berkeley, Anthony	102	Chase, James Hadley	295
Bierce, Ambrose	108	Chesterton, G. K.	300
Biggers, Earl Derr	113	Cheyney, Peter	306
Blake, Nicholas	118	Child, Lee	312
Bland, Eleanor Taylor	123	Childers, Erskine	316
Bloch, Robert	128	Christie, Agatha	319
Block, Lawrence	132	Clark, Mary Higgins	327
Boileau, Pierre, and Thomas Narcejac	138	Clarke, Anna	331
Borges, Jorge Luis	142	Cleary, Jon	336
Boucher, Anthony	148	Cody, Liza	340
Box, Edgar	152	Coel, Margaret	344
Braddon, M. E.	157	Cohen, Octavus Roy	349
		Cole, G. D. H., and Margaret Cole	353

Critical Survey of Mystery and Detective Fiction

Collins, Max Allan	360	Crispin, Edmund	422
Collins, Michael	365	Crofts, Freeman Wills	426
Collins, Wilkie	372	Crombie, Deborah	432
Conant, Susan	378	Cross, Amanda	435
Connelly, Michael	382	Crumley, James	441
Connolly, John	386	Cunningham, E. V.	445
Cook, Thomas H.	391
Cornwell, Patricia	395	Daly, Carroll John	452
Cotterill, Colin	400	Daly, Elizabeth	456
Coxe, George Harmon	404	Davidson, Lionel	459
Crais, Robert	408	Davies, L. P.	463
Creasey, John	413

VOLUME 2

Davis, Lindsey	467	Eustis, Helen	598
DeAndrea, William L.	471	Evanovich, Janet	602
Deighton, Len	475
Dent, Lester	481	Fairstein, Linda	607
Derleth, August	485	Faulkner, William	611
Deverell, William	492	Fearing, Kenneth	616
Dexter, Colin	496	Ferrars, E. X.	621
Dibdin, Michael	500	Fish, Robert L.	625
Dickens, Charles	504	Fleming, Ian	630
Dickinson, Peter	510	Fleming, Joan	635
Doderer, Heimito von	515	Fletcher, J. S.	638
Donaldson, D. J.	520	Flower, Pat	644
Dostoevski, Fyodor	524	Follett, Ken.	648
Doyle, Sir Arthur Conan	529	Forester, C. S.	654
Droste-Hülshoff, Annette von	537	Forsyth, Frederick	659
Dumas, Alexandre, père	540	Francis, Dick	663
Du Maurier, Daphne	546	Fraser, Antonia.	667
Dunant, Sarah	551	Freeling, Nicolas	671
Duncan, Robert L.	556	Freeman, R. Austin	676
Dunning, John	561	Furst, Alan	681
Dürrenmatt, Friedrich	564	Futelle, Jacques	685
Eberhart, Mignon G.	569	Gaboriau, Émile	690
Eco, Umberto	573	Garcia-Roza, Luiz Alfredo.	695
Eisler, Barry	578	Gardner, Erle Stanley	700
Elkins, Aaron	581	Gardner, John	706
Ellin, Stanley	585	Garve, Andrew	711
Ellroy, James	589	Gash, Jonathan	714
Estleman, Loren D.	594	Gault, William Campbell	718

COMPLETE LIST OF CONTENTS

George, Elizabeth	723	Halliday, Brett	833
Gerritsen, Tess	727	Hamilton, Donald	838
Gibson, Walter B.	733	Hammett, Dashiell	844
Gilbert, Anthony	741	Hansen, Joseph.	851
Gilbert, Michael	745	Hanshaw, Thomas W.	857
Gill, B. M.	752	Hare, Cyril	861
Gilman, Dorothy	757	Harris, Thomas.	866
Godwin, William.	761	Hart, Carolyn.	870
Gores, Joe	766	Harvester, Simon.	874
Goulart, Ron	771	Harvey, John	878
Graeme, Bruce	777	Healy, Jeremiah	883
Grafton, Sue	781	Henry, O.	888
Graham, Caroline	786	Hess, Joan	893
Graham, Winston	789	Heyer, Georgette	898
Granger, Ann.	794	Hiaasen, Carl.	902
Green, Anna Katharine	797	Highsmith, Patricia.	907
Greene, Graham	804	Hill, Reginald	913
Greenleaf, Stephen.	810	Hillerman, Tony	917
Grimes, Martha	814	Himes, Chester.	922
Grisham, John	819	Hinojosa, Rolando	928
		Hoch, Edward D..	932
Haggard, William	823	Holmes, Rupert	938
Hall, James Wilson.	828

VOLUME 3

Holton, Leonard	943	Kelly, Mary	1009
Hornung, E. W.	948	Kemelman, Harry.	1012
Household, Geoffrey.	953	Kendrick, Baynard H.	1019
Hull, Richard.	956	Kerr, Philip	1023
Huxley, Elspeth	960	Kersh, Gerald	1028
		King, Laurie R.	1033
Innes, Michael	966	King, Peter	1038
		King, Stephen.	1041
Jacobs, W. W.	971	Kirino, Natsuo	1046
James, Bill	974	Knight, Kathleen Moore	1051
James, P. D.	978	Knox, Ronald A.	1055
Jance, J. A.	985	Koontz, Dean R.	1062
Johnston, Velda	989	Kyd, Thomas	1066
Kaminsky, Stuart M.	994	Lacy, Ed.	1071
Keating, H. R. F.	998	Lathen, Emma	1074
Keeler, Harry Stephen	1004	Latimer, Jonathan.	1079

Critical Survey of Mystery and Detective Fiction

Laurence, Janet	1083	Marquand, John P.	1261
Leblanc, Maurice	1087	Marsh, Ngaio	1265
Le Carré, John	1093	Mason, A. E. W.	1270
Le Fanu, Joseph Sheridan	1099	Matera, Lia	1274
Lehane, Dennis	1103	Matsumoto, Seichō	1278
Leonard, Elmore	1107	Maugham, W. Somerset	1282
Leonov, Leonid Maksimovich	1111	Maupassant, Guy de	1288
Le Queux, William	1116	Mayor, Archer	1293
Leroux, Gaston	1120	Melville, James	1297
Lescroart, John	1125	Millar, Margaret	1301
Levin, Ira	1129	Milne, A. A.	1306
Linington, Elizabeth	1134	Mina, Denise	1311
Lippman, Laura	1139	Mitchell, Gladys	1315
Lockridge, Richard, and Frances Lockridge.	1143	Miyabe, Miyuki.	1319
Lovesey, Peter	1149	Morice, Anne	1324
Lowndes, Marie Belloc	1154	Morrell, David	1327
Ludlum, Robert	1160	Morrison, Arthur	1332
 		Mortimer, John	1336
McBain, Ed	1166	Mosley, Walter	1341
McCall Smith, Alexander	1172	Moyes, Patricia	1345
McCarry, Charles	1176	Müllner, Adolf	1350
McClure, James.	1181
McCrum, Sharyn	1185	Natsuki, Shizuko	1354
McDonald, Gregory	1190	Nebel, Frederick	1358
MacDonald, John D.	1196	Neely, Barbara	1362
Macdonald, Ross	1200	Neely, Richard	1366
McGerr, Patricia	1205
McGinley, Patrick.	1210	O'Connell, Carol	1370
McGivern, William P.	1214	Oppenheim, E. Phillips	1374
McGown, Jill	1219	Orczy, Baroness	1379
McInerny, Ralph	1223
MacInnes, Helen	1230	Palmer, Stuart.	1384
McKinty, Adrian	1234	Paretsky, Sara	1388
MacLean, Alistair.	1238	Parker, Robert B.	1394
MacLeod, Charlotte	1242	Pears, Iain.	1398
Magnan, Pierre	1248	Pelecanos, George P.	1403
Maitland, Barry	1252	Pentecost, Hugh	1407
Maron, Margaret	1257	Perry, Thomas	1411
		Peters, Elizabeth	1415

COMPLETE LIST OF CONTENTS

VOLUME 4

Peters, Ellis	1421	Solomita, Stephen	1630
Phillpotts, Eden	1427	Spillane, Mickey	1634
Pickard, Nancy	1432	Spring, Michelle	1640
Poe, Edgar Allan	1437	Stabenow, Dana	1643
Porter, Joyce	1443	Starrett, Vincent	1647
Post, Melville Davisson	1446	Stevenson, Robert Louis	1652
Potts, Jean.	1452	Stewart, Mary	1657
Preston, Douglas, and Lincoln Child	1456	Stockton, Frank R.	1661
Priestley, J. B.	1460	Stout, Rex.	1666
Pronzini, Bill	1466	Stratemeyer, Edward	1673
Puig, Manuel	1473	Stubbs, Jean.	1680
Qiu Xiaolong	1478	Sue, Eugène.	1684
Queen, Ellery	1482	Symons, Julian	1688
Quentin, Patrick	1489	Taibo, Paco Ignacio, II	1695
Radcliffe, Ann	1494	Takagi, Akimitsu	1700
Rankin, Ian	1498	Taylor, Phoebe Atwood.	1704
Reeve, Arthur B.	1503	Teilhet, Darwin L.	1708
Reichs, Kathy.	1508	Tey, Josephine	1713
Reilly, Helen	1512	Thomas, Ross.	1717
Rendell, Ruth	1516	Thompson, Jim	1722
Rhode, John.	1521	Todd, Charles	1726
Rice, Craig	1526	Torre, Lillian de la	1730
Rickman, Phil.	1531	Treat, Lawrence.	1735
Rinehart, Mary Roberts.	1535	Tremayne, Peter	1739
Robbe-Grillet, Alain	1542	Trevor, Elleston	1744
Robinson, Peter	1546	Truman, Margaret.	1749
Rohmer, Sax	1550	Turow, Scott	1753
Rowland, Laura Joh	1555	Twain, Mark	1757
Rowling, J. K.	1559	Upfield, Arthur W.	1764
Saki	1568	Valin, Jonathan	1769
Sallis, James	1573	Van de Wetering, Janwillem	1774
Sanders, Lawrence	1577	Van Dine, S. S.	1778
Sapper.	1582	Van Gulik, Robert H.	1783
Sayers, Dorothy L.	1586	Vázquez Montalbán, Manuel.	1788
Saylor, Steven.	1593	Vidocq, François-Eugène.	1792
Shaffer, Anthony	1597	Voltaire	1797
Simenon, Georges	1602	Vulliamy, C. E.	1801
Sjöwall, Maj, and Per Wahlöö	1611	Wade, Henry	1806
Slovo, Gillian	1616	Waites, Martyn	1810
Smith, Julie	1620	Waldron, Ann.	1814
Smith, Martin Cruz	1625

Critical Survey of Mystery and Detective Fiction

Wallace, Edgar	1819	Whitechurch, Victor	1859
Walters, Minette	1825	Whitney, Phyllis A.	1862
Wambaugh, Joseph	1829	Willeford, Charles	1866
Waugh, Hillary	1835	Winslow, Don.	1870
Webb, Jack	1839	Woods, Stuart.	1875
Wentworth, Patricia.	1843	Woolrich, Cornell.	1879
Westlake, Donald E.	1848	Zangwill, Israel	1885
Wheatley, Dennis	1855

VOLUME 5

PAST AND PRESENT MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

Roots of Mystery and Detective Fiction	1891
Golden Age Fiction.	1901
Innovations	1910
Literary Aspects of Mystery Fiction	1919
Mainstream Versus Mystery Fiction	1927
Pulp Magazines	1934

MYSTERY FICTION AROUND THE WORLD

American Mystery Fiction	1947
African Mystery Fiction	1957
Asian Mystery Fiction	1963
British Mystery Fiction.	1970
Exotic Settings	1979
French Mystery Fiction.	1985
Latin American Mystery Fiction	1994

SUBGENRES OF MYSTERY FICTION

Academic Mystery Fiction	2005
Cozies.	2011
Ethnic American Mystery Fiction	2021
Feminist and Lesbian Mystery Fiction	2030
Forensic Mysteries	2038
Historical Mysteries	2046
Horror Stories.	2055
Juvenile and Young-Adult Mystery Fiction	2067
Parodies.	2075
Police Procedurals	2083
Science Fiction Mysteries	2094

Spy Novels	2102
Thrillers	2112
True-Crime Stories	2121

THE DETECTIVES

Amateur Sleuths	2133
Armchair Detectives	2143
Hard-Boiled Detectives.	2149
Sherlock Holmes Pastiches.	2159
Women Detectives	2166

OTHER MEDIA

Drama.	2175
Film.	2184
Graphic novels	2196
Radio	2202
Television.	2214

RESOURCES

Bibliography	2227
Guide to Online Resources.	2236
Genre Terms and Techniques.	2243
Crime Fiction Jargon	2248
Major Awards.	2257
Crime and Detective Fiction Time Line	2289
Chronological List of Authors	2308

INDEXES

Geographical Index of Authors.	2315
Categorized Index of Authors	2320
Character Index.	2327
Subject Index	2336

AUTHORS

LEONARD HOLTON

Leonard Wibberley

Born: Dublin, Ireland; April 9, 1915

Died: Santa Monica, California; November 22, 1983

Also wrote as Patrick O'Connor; Christopher Webb;
Leonard Wibberley

Type of plot: Amateur sleuth

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Father Joseph Bredder, 1959-1977

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

FATHER JOSEPH BREDDER, the chaplain for the Los Angeles Convent of the Holy Innocents and a former marine sergeant and boxer, solves cases based on his analysis of spiritual clues. He has a number of friends and associates who appear in the series and assist him.

LIEUTENANT MINARDI of the Los Angeles police, a widower, and his daughter, Barbara Minardi, whose development from childhood through marriage is detailed throughout the books, are the most important of Bredder's associates.

CONTRIBUTION

Despite the fame of G. K. Chesterton's Father Brown short stories, few full-length novels featuring clerical sleuths had appeared before 1959, the year of publication of Leonard Holton's first Father Bredder mystery. Since then, other series have made clergyman-detectives an important part of the mystery scene. Holton's series is well plotted, and the interplay between Lieutenant Minardi with his procedural approach and Father Bredder with his moral and deductive approach lends plausibility, interest, and humor to the tales. The large number of recurring characters adds much to the series as the reader becomes familiar with Father Bredder's world.

BIOGRAPHY

Leonard Holton, a pen name for Leonard Wibberley, was born in Dublin, Ireland, on April 9, 1915. He was educated at various Irish and English schools. Holton was a journalist throughout his life, beginning in London, between 1931 and 1936, and then in Trinidad, where he was also an oil-field worker and a member of the Trinidad Artillery Volunteers. In 1943 he began work as an editor for the Associated Press in New York, and the following year he became New York chief for the London Evening News. In 1947 he began work in California, where he worked as an editor, a reporter, and a columnist for various papers for the rest of his life. In 1948 he married Katherine Hazel Holton, whose surname he adopted as a pen name. They had two daughters and four sons.

Holton wrote more books for children than for adults. His wide-ranging interests are reflected in his fiction. Many of his children's books, for example, have to do with car racing, history, and sailing; the last two areas are also important for his mystery series. His most famous single work is his entertaining novel The Mouse That Roared (1955), with its somewhat less successful sequels, including The Mouse on the Moon (1962). The Mouse That Roared became the famous film of 1959 starring Peter Sellers; The Mouse on the Moon, starring Margaret Rutherford, was made in 1963.

Holton died on November 22, 1983. His manuscripts are housed at the University of Southern California.

ANALYSIS

Leonard Holton's eleven crime novels star Father Joseph Bredder, a saintly Franciscan who humanely and humorously attends to his clerical duties for a convent with its attached church and school while solving crimes involving those he knows or with whom he comes into contact during the course of his duties or hobbies. Father Bredder's faith and character are vital to the series. His commitment to God is frequently emphasized by references to the founder of his order and to Saint Paul; both are emblematic of Father Bredder's compassion, love, and understanding. Paul's conversion on the road to Damascus is mirrored in Father Bredder's own sudden conversion when, as a marine sergeant, he witnessed Japanese soldiers dying in flames, an incident referred to throughout the series. His faith leads him to solve crimes for much the same reason that motivates G. K. Chesterton's Father Brown: a vocation to tend to the spiritual needs of the criminal. Nevertheless, only in this way and in his use of religion-based information—what Father Bredder calls “spiritual fingerprints”—does he much resemble Father Brown. Holton's disclaimer of any further influence, made in his 1978 essay, “Father Bredder,” is no doubt accurate.

Whereas Chesterton stressed Father Brown's ordinariness, Holton presents Bredder as extraordinary. The reader's prejudices are assaulted by the focus on a marine, in a job known for violence, as a priest, even though violence is precisely the reason for his conversion. To emphasize this unusual personality, Holton makes his character a successful prizefighter as well, one whose ability is highlighted in Flowers by Request (1964) when the bishop gives him permission to fight an exhibition match that will raise money for repairs to the church organ. Depicted throughout the series are Father Bredder's friendships with members of the seedier elements of the Los Angeles streets: the hotel keeper, Mrs. Cha; a fence known as “the Senator”; a broken-down boxer, Cagey Williams; and others who aid Father Bredder and, because of their aid, vindicate his faith in humanity.

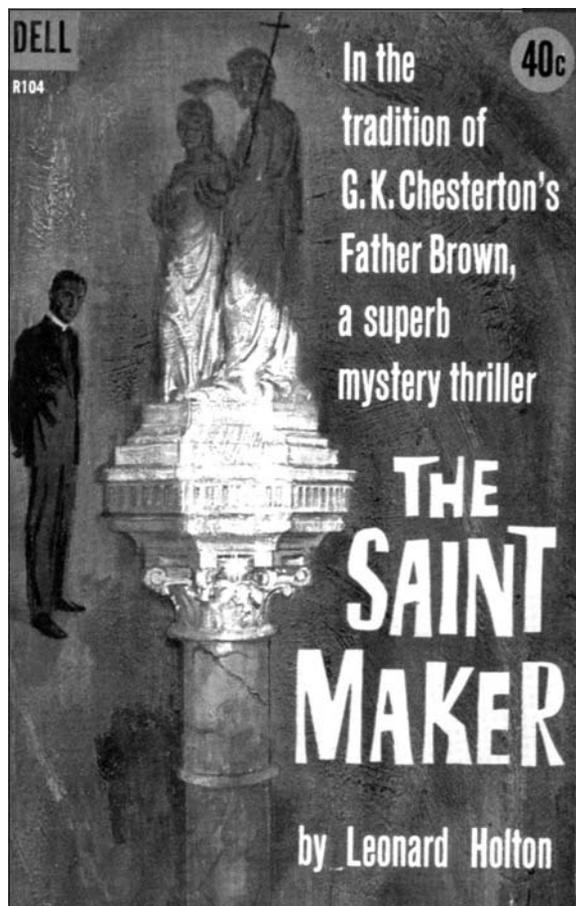

These street figures are aspects of a major strength of the novels. Far more than many authors of detective series, Holton creates an elaborate society around his detective and so can draw on the people in the convent and its church and school, the inner-city people from Father Bredder's earlier assignment, his former marine friends, and the police. The police play a key role in the series, in the person of Lieutenant Minardi, Father Bredder's closest friend. (Even in the one novel not set in Los Angeles, Deliver Us from Wolves, 1963, which is set in Portugal, Minardi appears at the opening and conclusion and, by mail, solves the main part of the police work.) The lieutenant always solves the cases on a police level, while Father Bredder probes the underlying spiritual puzzles. Unlike Father Brown and some other sleuths of crime fiction, Father Bredder has no objection to civil penalties for crime and is therefore fully willing to help and be helped by his friend. Another police officer who often appears in the novels is Minardi's superior, Captain “Normal” Redmond, whose WASP blandness is humorously compared with Minardi's emotionalism and Bredder's spirituality, the captain by temperament understanding nothing of the priest. The final novel of the series, A Corner of Paradise (1977), introduces another delightful character, the Jewish Sergeant Rosenman, who complements the Italian Minardi and the WASP Redmond. These police officers—primarily Minardi—provide much of the stories' plausibility. In their routines, their ability to collect information, and their respect for law, they assist Father Bredder as he makes sense of what he considers the more important aspects of the cases.

Characters from the convent make up another group in Father Bredder's world. The personality of the Reverend Mother Therese forms a contrast to that of Father Bredder, for she is remote, reserved, and conservative, or she seems so to him, although she frequently assists him in surprising ways. His housekeeper is Mrs. Winters, another church conservative, whose name in A Corner of Paradise is inexplicably changed to Mrs. Wentworth, the name of the murdered wife in A Pact with Satan (1960). His assistant priest is the scholarly Englishman Father Armstrong, who makes Father Bredder feel intellectually inferior. Attending the convent school is Lieutenant Minardi's daughter, Barbara, who is twelve years old in A Pact with Satan and ages to twenty by 1977, in A Corner of Paradise.

Barbara generally plays a role in events that run parallel to the main mysteries, although she nearly is a victim herself in The Saint Maker (1959) and is not mentioned in The Devil to Play (1974). Her marriage to a black playwright occasions one of the cases of prejudice in A Corner of Paradise, and she is briefly a suspect herself when her roommate at a college summer session is murdered in The Mirror of Hell (1972).

Other series characters come from the street life of Los Angeles, friends from Father Bredder's previous inner-city ministry. Most often used is Mis-Cha, the Shintoist proprietor of the Melrose Hotel who somehow becomes Mrs. Askuzi of the Tokyo Hotel and in most of the novels appears as Mrs. Cha, a Buddhist, of the Western Hotel. Such inconsistencies are frequent in the series. For example, Jimmy Hughes, “the Senator,” a diamond expert and fence, is shot and killed as he talks to Father Bredder in Flowers by Request, but he is alive and running his business in The Devil to Play, published nine years later. Cagey Williams, the punch-drunk former boxer, is also in most of the series as he moves from street bum to boxing instructor and then, without explanation, to manager of the boxing gymnasium. Other inner-city characters include Soldier Sam and his café, former oil millionaire Texas Mary, and Tino Soldano, an amusing former juvenile delinquent who makes more money as a speaker on crime than he could from crime itself. This motley crew appears in full array in Flowers by Request: Father Bredder enlists them as singers for the Grüber Mass with which the book ends.

OUT OF THE DEPTHS AND A TOUCH OF JONAH

Holton’s plots are all of the puzzle variety, with fair play the general rule. The spiritual fingerprints are generally not difficult for the reader to pick up, despite Lieutenant Minardi’s constant puzzlement. A misuse of music and books in Out of the Depths (1966), for example, provides Father Bredder with spiritual clues. As the music and books show no patterns of selection, the music being in mixed keys, he deduces that they are used as ciphers. A similar type of clue is employed in A Touch of Jonah (1968), where a wrong screw shows Father Bredder (though no one else) that a murderer has been at work. Such misuse of material objects is a recurring theme in the Holton series, combining theology with the needs of the detective story. Several other plot devices recur in the novels. As what could be called variants on the plot of Dashiell Hammett’s The Maltese Falcon (1930), A Corner of Paradise, Deliver Us from Wolves, and Secret of the Doubting Saint (1961) all feature crimes having to do with fabulous jewels. At the end of each of these novels, Father Bredder finds the jewels and surprises those around him. A variant on this pattern has him find a large heroin stash in The Devil to Play and a film of scientific equations in Out of the Depths—both things of great monetary value, like the jewels, that have led to murder.

Also characteristic of Holton’s plotting are the double (or apparently double) plots involving seemingly unrelated deaths. In some novels Father Bredder remembers ancient crimes that he believes shed light on the modern ones: Deliver Us from Wolves has a sixteenth century death by illness of a nobleman, A Pact with Satan cites eighteenth century deaths from spontaneous combustion, and Flowers by Request recalls the death in 1100 of William the Conqueror’s son, William Rufus. The ancient crime most tightly woven into a modern crime is in Deliver Us from Wolves, for the two involve the same family and motive (the ruby). Other novels mention apparently unrelated modern crimes or accidents that only Father Bredder perceives as relevant: A Problem in Angels (1970) and Out of the Depths are especially clear examples. Although Father Bredder frequently claims that he is using spiritual fingerprints to guide him, the clues are often concrete: for example, an old book in Flowers by Request and a journal in Deliver Us from Wolves.

RELIGION AND DETECTION

Religious themes, images, and allusions form an important undercurrent in the Father Bredder novels, though they are handled with subtlety, never clumsily. The title of Out of the Depths is a reference to the biblical psalm often called De profundis. Father Bredder opens the story by pulling a corpse out of the water; Father Bredder himself is almost murdered twice by drowning, and diving scenes and divers permeate the novel. The most specifically theological plot is that of The Saint Maker, in which the guilty character, the murderer of her husband and niece and would-be murderer of her niece's baby and of Barbara Minardi, has the dementedly virtuous motive of making saints by killing people she has judged to be in a state of grace. The title of Secret of the Doubting Saint makes reference to the skepticism of the Apostle Thomas, but the motive, the gigantic diamond, and the method of its detection, which is doubt, do not depend on theology per se. Other themes in the series are linked to theology, although rarely in any technical way. Father Bredder often sees the hand of the devil in events, notably in A Pact with Satan, in which a wife's virtue so disturbs a not-so-virtuous husband that, in guilt, he murders her so that he can continue his evil unreproached. This story is a good example of Lieutenant Minardi's solving a case but not understanding it; it is Father Bredder who shows him the Satan connection. Holton steers clear of technical theological explanations; nevertheless, religion informs all Father Bredder's activities and thoughts and adds depth and interest to the series.

In his essay on Father Bredder, Holton mentions the trouble he had in finding a publisher for the series and leads the reader to believe that he was probably disappointed in sales, even though the series was reprinted in paperback and picked up by book clubs. There was even a brief television series, Sarge, based on Father Bredder's Vietnam experiences. In terms of sales, however, clerical mysteries only came into their own in the 1970's and 1980's, especially with the Rabbi Small and Father Koesler mysteries by Harry Kemelman and William X. Kienzle, respectively.

Holton and mystery writer Jack Webb, with his Father Shanley-Sammy Golden series, had been among the few writers of clerical-sleuth tales in the 1950's and 1960's. In the 1970's, when the final Father Bredder stories were appearing, Charles Merrill Smith began his Reverend Randolph series (1974), Ralph McInerny his Father Dowling series (1977), and Kienzle his Father Koesler series (1979). In the 1980's further clerical series began, two with nuns, authored by McInerny and Sister Carol Anne O'Marie, beginning in 1986 and 1984, respectively.

The appeal of these clerical sleuths draws attention to the nature of popular fiction. Readers of popular fiction demand a high degree of predictability; this is especially true of the mystery genre. Fiction written according to formula is both reassuring and undemanding. At the same time, to avert boredom, a degree of innovation is required, though always within the bounds of the formula. In short, mystery writers are always looking for a new gimmick. In creating Father Bredder, Leonard Holton made use of two gimmicks: the incongruity of a detective-priest (especially in the heyday of Mickey Spillane) and the reverse twist that this priest just happens to be a former marine sergeant and boxer. Father Bredder is indeed a perfect example of one type of hero in popular fiction.

Stephen J. Curry

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

FATHER JOSEPH BREDDER SERIES: The Saint Maker, 1959; A Pact with Satan, 1960; Secret of the Doubting Saint, 1961; Deliver Us from Wolves, 1963; Flowers by Request, 1964; Out of the Depths, 1966; A Touch of Jonah, 1968; A Problem in Angels, 1970; The Mirror of Hell, 1972; The Devil to Play, 1974; A Corner of Paradise, 1977

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS (AS WIBBERLEY): Mrs. Searwood's Secret Weapon, 1954; The Mouse That Roared, 1955 (also known as The Wrath of Grapes); McGillicuddy McGotham, 1956; Take Me to Your President, 1957; Beware of the Mouse, 1958; The Quest for Excalibur, 1959; The Hands of Cormac Joyce, 1960; Stranger at Killknock, 1961; The Mouse on the Moon, 1962;

A Feast of Freedom, 1964; The Island of the Angels, 1965; The Centurion, 1966; The Road from Toomi, 1967; Adventures of an Elephant Boy, 1968; The Mouse on Wall Street, 1969; Meeting with a Great Beast, 1971; The Testament of Theophilus, 1973 (also known as Merchant of Rome); The Last Stand of Father Felix, 1974; 1776—and All That, 1975; One in Four, 1976; Homeward to Ithaca, 1978; The Mouse That Saved the West, 1981

PLAYS (AS WIBBERLEY): The Vicar of Wakefield, pr. 1967; The Heavenly Quarterback, pb. 1967; Gift of a Star, pb. 1969; Black Jack Rides Again, pb. 1971; 1776—and All That, pr. 1973; Once, in a Garden, pb. 1975; Encounter near Venus, pr. 1978

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: 1947-1960 • The Lost Harpooner, 1947 (as O'Connor); The King's Beard, 1952 (as Wibberley); The Coronation Book: The Dramatic Story in History and Legend, 1953 (as Wibberley); The Secret of the Hawk, 1953 (as Wibberley); Deadmen's Cave, 1954 (as Wibberley); Flight of the Peacock, 1954 (as O'Connor); The Epics of Everest, 1954 (as Wibberley); The Society of Foxes, 1954 (as O'Connor); The Watermelon Mystery, 1955 (as O'Connor); The Wound of Peter Wayne, 1955 (as Wibberley); Gunpowder for Washington, 1956 (as O'Connor); The Black Tiger, 1956 (as O'Connor); The Life of Winston Churchill, 1956 (revised 1965; as Wibberley); John Barry, Father of the Navy, 1957 (as Wibberley); Kevin O'Connor and the Light Brigade, 1957 (as Wibberley); Mexican Road Race, 1957 (as O'Connor); Black Tiger at Le Mans, 1958 (as O'Connor); Matt Tyler's Chronicle, 1958 (as Webb); Wes Powell, Conqueror of the Grand Canyon, 1958 (as Wibberley); The Five-Dollar Watch Mystery, 1959 (as O'Connor); John Treegate's Musket, 1959 (as Wibberley); Black Tiger at Bonneville, 1960 (as O'Connor); Mark Toyman's Inheritance, 1960 (as Webb); Peter Treegate's War, 1960 (as Wibberley)

1961-1970 • Sea Captain from Salem, 1961 (as Wibberley); The Time of the Lamb, 1961 (as Wibberley); Treasure at Twenty Fathoms, 1961 (as O'Connor); Zebulon Pike, Soldier and Explorer, 1961 (as Wibberley); Black Tiger at Indianapolis, 1962 (as O'Connor); The Ballad of the Pilgrim Cat, 1962 (as Wibberley); The River of Pee Dee Jack, 1962 (as Webb); Treegate's Raiders, 1962 (as Wibberley); The Quest of the Otter, 1963 (as Webb); The Shepherd's Reward, 1963 (as Wibberley); The Raising of the Dubhe, 1964 (as O'Connor); Seawind from Hawaii, 1965 (as O'Connor); The "Ann and Hope" Mutiny, 1966 (as Webb); Encounter near Venus, 1967 (as Wibberley); South Swell, 1967 (as O'Connor); Attar of the Ice Valley, 1968 (as Wibberley); Man of Liberty: A Life of Thomas Jefferson, 1968 (as Wibberley); Beyond Hawaii, 1969 (as O'Connor); Eusebius, the Phoenician, 1969 (as Webb); A Car Called Camellia, 1970 (as O'Connor); Journey to Untor, 1970 (as Wibberley)

1971-1980 • Leopard's Prey, 1971 (as Wibberley); Flint's Island, 1972 (as Wibberley); Red Pawns, 1973 (as Wibberley); Guarneri: Story of a Genius, 1974 (as Wibberley); The Last Battle, 1976 (as Wibberley); Little League Family, 1978 (as Wibberley); Perilous Gold, 1978 (as Wibberley); The Crime of Martin Coverly, 1980 (as Wibberley)

NONFICTION (AS WIBBERLEY): The Trouble with the Irish (or the English, Depending on Your Point of View), 1956; The Coming of the Green, 1958; No Garlic in the Soup, 1959; The Land That Isn't There: An Irish Adventure, 1960; Yesterday's Land: A Baja California Adventure, 1961; Ventures into the Deep: The Thrill of Scuba Diving, 1962; Ah Julian! A Memoir of Julian Brodetsky, 1963; Fiji: Islands of the Dawn, 1964; Toward a Distant Island: A Sailor's Odyssey, 1966; Something to Read, 1967; Hound of the Sea, 1969; Voyage by Bus, 1971; The Shannon Sailors: A Voyage to the Heart of Ireland, 1972; The Good-Natured Man: A Portrait of Oliver Goldsmith, 1979

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Breen, Jon L., and Martin H. Greenberg, eds. Synod of Sleuths: Essays on Judeo-Christian Detective Fiction. Metuchen, N.J.: Scarecrow Press, 1990. Discusses important Jewish and Christian religious figures in detective fiction; sheds light on Holton's writings.

Erb, Peter C. Murder, Manners, and Mystery: Reflections on Faith in Contemporary Detective Fiction—The John Albert Hall Lectures, 2004. London:

SCM Press, 2007. Collected lectures on the role and representation of religion in detective fiction; provides perspective on Holton's work.

Kerr, Peter. "Leonard Wibberley, Sixty-eight, Dies: Wrote Mouse that Roared." New York Times, November 25, 1983, p. D21. Obituary of Holton (under his real name) describes his history and career.

Penzler, Otto, ed. The Great Detectives. Boston: Little, Brown, 1978. Argues for the place of Father Bredder in the pantheon of great literary detectives.

Steinbrunner, Chris, and Otto Penzler, eds. Encyclopedia of Mystery and Detection. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1976. Useful entry on Holton and his characters, delving into the innovative nature of his work.

E. W. HORNUNG

Born: Middlesbrough, Yorkshire, England; June 7, 1866

Died: Saint Jean-de-Luz, France; March 22, 1921

Type of plot: Inverted

PRINCIPAL SERIES

A. J. Raffles, 1899-1909

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

A. J. RAFFLES, an amateur cricketer and thief. A gentleman with a public school background, Raffles turns to burglary partly for the money but mainly for the adventure. Although a criminal, he adheres to a sporting code of ethics and eventually dies a hero in the Boer War; his is the character of the villain-hero.

HARRY "BUNNY" MANDERS, a writer and thief, is the first-person chronicler of the Raffles adventures. Converted to crime by Raffles and occasionally conscience-stricken, Bunny nevertheless remains Raffles's hero-worshipping partner throughout a series of burglaries and adventures.

CONTRIBUTION

Having borrowed from Arthur Conan Doyle the basic framework of a highly intelligent hero and an admiring disciple who records his deeds, E. W. Hornung inverted the Holmes stories: As a modern alternative to master detective Sherlock Holmes, he offered A. J. Raffles, master thief. In the Raffles tales, Hornung creates an uncommon blend of detective and adventure fiction; while Bunny's ignorance of the finer points of Raffles's criminal plans allows some scope for a reader's detective abilities, the stories' main interest lies in the thieves' exploits outside the law. The element of danger (and snobbery) in these adventures in society crime inspired much English thriller fiction of the 1930's; Raffles initiates a tradition of gentleman outlaws that includes Leslie Charteris's the Saint, John Creasey's the Toff, and his own reincarnation in Barry Perowne's series. Hornung, however, was writing moral as well as adventure stories, a dimension apparent in Bunny's alternating devotion to and revulsion for Raffles. Although the Raffles stories are protothrillers, they are also a serious literary record of public-school boys gone half-wrong and of their fluctuating friendship.

BIOGRAPHY

Ernest William Hornung was born in Middlesbrough, an English manufacturing town, on June 7, 1866, the youngest son of John Peter Hornung, a solicitor. He was educated at Uppingham; there, he learned to play cricket, which remained a lifelong interest. An asthmatic, he emigrated to Australia for his health in 1884 and spent two years there as a tutor. Returning to London in 1886, Hornung became (like Bunny) a journalist and magazine writer; his first novel was published in 1890. In 1893, he married Arthur Conan Doyle's sister, Constance, at Doyle's home and settled near him in Sussex; Hornung's dedication of the first Raffles collection, "To A. C. D. This Form of Flattery," acknowledges Doyle's influence on his work. To his great pleasure, in 1907, Hornung was elected to the Marylebone Cricket Club, the sport's governing body.

In the years between 1890 and 1914, Hornung wrote numerous articles for journals such as Cornhill Magazine and published at least twenty-three novels and several collections of short stories. This body of work ranged from romances and adventure stories—including the bushranger novels drawn from his Australian experiences—to the novels such as Fathers of Men (1912) that were considered more serious literature. Although Hornung is best known for his Raffles stories, he also experimented with detective fiction: The Crime Doctor (1914) follows the career of John Dollar, a physician who not only solves crimes but also runs a sanatorium for potential and reformed criminals.

Despite the fact that Hornung suffered from asthma, at the beginning of World War I he volunteered for service. After two years with an anti-aircraft unit, he was sent in 1916 to France to establish a YMCA library and rest hut for soldiers; he distinguished himself at the siege of Arras, leaving the front only after his library had been captured. His experiences in France and his grief over the loss of his only child, a son killed at Ypres, emerge in the poetry and memoirs published from 1917 to 1919. His already delicate health further weakened by military service, Hornung settled in Saint-Jean-de-Luz after the war; he died there on March 22, 1921.

ANALYSIS

With twenty-six stories and a novel, E. W. Hornung created a character whose name has entered the language as the synonym for a daring and successful thief. In “To Catch a Thief,” for example, Raffles steals another burglar’s plunder after discovering it hidden in a pair of Indian clubs, while in “The Raffles Relics” he steals an exhibit of his own burglary tools from Scotland Yard. In this sportsman-adventurer-thief, Hornung presents a complex villain-hero.

Although Raffles is a criminal, Hornung goes to some lengths to establish his admirable qualities; thus, he emerges as something of a hero. The title of the first collection of stories, The Amateur Cracksman (1899), makes an important point: Because he is an amateur thief, Raffles’s crimes seem less sordid than those of a “professor” or East End professional criminal. In addition, he is an amateur athlete, a gentleman cricketer who turns to burglary, he insists, only because he is chronically in need of money. That is, playing cricket as a professional (like stealing as an East End “professor”) would be considered declassé. In contrast, he plays as a gentleman amateur, for love of the game rather than for money; thus, he is forced into crime. Along with establishing him as an amateur and a gentleman, Raffles’s cricket has a third function: Like his amateur cracksman standing, it is intended to undercut the seriousness of his crimes. Both Raffles and Bunny tend to refer to burglary in cricketing rather than criminal terms: Waiting to burgle a house is like waiting nervously to enter a match; suffering a series of unrewarding burglaries is “playing a deuced slow game.” The word “sport” is frequently used to suggest that crime, at least as Raffles and Bunny play it, is, like cricket, simply an exciting game. This important point is further reinforced through the sportsman’s code that Raffles translates into an ethics of crime. Although he is not averse to breaking the law, he does eschew some activities; using drugged whiskey is “not a very sporting game,” for example, while committing murder is “not the game at all.” This code functions to redeem or at least palliate his crimes, because it acts as a measure less of right and wrong than of style; Raffles’s adherence to his own code papers over the criminality of his thefts by making them seem merely an aspect of his insouciant style.

“GENTLEMEN AND PLAYERS”

The story “Gentlemen and Players” illustrates all the aspects of Raffles’s character that are intended to ease the reader into accepting the criminal as a hero. The title refers to the distinction made at the time between Gentleman (amateur) and Player (professional) cricketers, a distinction very important to Raffles. As a gentleman, he is ordinarily loath to abuse his position as guest by stealing from his host’s home, but he is insulted that Lord Amersteth invites him to Milchester Abbey only to play cricket; his anger at “being asked about for my cricket as though I were a pro” shows the importance he attaches to his amateur athlete status. The equal importance of his amateur cracksman status appears in the distinction Raffles makes between himself as a “Gentleman” thief and Crawshay, a competing East End “Player” thief; both men are interested in a valuable necklace belonging to Lady Melrose, like Raffles a houseguest of Lord Amersteth. His determination to steal the necklace and thereby “score off” both Crawshay, the professional thief, and Mackenzie, the professional detective, displays his pride as an amateur cracksman, while at the same time, it illustrates the analogy Raffles often draws between burglary and cricket: To “score off them both at once” would be “a great game.” Along with this sporting rationale for stealing the necklace, Raffles offers several other reasons meant to excuse the crime: Not only are both he and Bunny hard up again, but “these people deserve it, and can afford it.” Finally, the burglary itself, like his admirable cricket, exhibits Raffles’s daring and skill; as Bunny remarks, both require a “combination of resource and cunning, of patience and precision, of headwork and handiwork.” The manner of the theft—while the professional thieves succeed in stealing Lady Melrose’s jewel case, Raffles has already emptied the case of the necklace while its owner slept—is intended to impress the reader with Raffles’s daredevil style.

Another aspect of Raffles’s style, apparent in “Gentlemen and Players” as well as in the other stories, is his racy conversation. Raffles’s slang (which establishes him as a knowing insider), his self-assured wit, and his gift for casuistry all help to convert the reader to his own view of his crimes.

By presenting Raffles as an amateur criminal, true sportsman, and witty speaker, Hornung created a figure with great reader appeal. Furthermore, the stories are told from Bunny’s point of view, another technique that Hornung uses to draw the reader into Bunny’s view of Raffles. Bunny’s inability to stay on the right side of the law, however, seems to bear out Doyle’s fear that these stories of a criminal-hero might be “dangerous in their suggestion.” Thus, Bunny becomes as important a figure in these adventures as Raffles himself: As narrator, partner in crime, and devoted friend, he as well as Raffles is Hornung’s exercise in the creation of a multifaceted character.

“THE IDES OF MARCH”

In the first Raffles story, “The Ides of March,” Hornung carefully establishes the origin of the complex relationship between these two men, and with it Raffles’s fascination for Bunny. Their initial relation—the story begins with Bunny’s memory of fagging for Raffles at school—foreshadows the later partnership and friendship, in which Raffles is the “irresistible” and “masterful” leader with Bunny the “incomparably weaker” follower. Bunny, who remembers with admiration Raffles’s kindness and daring, turns to him after spending his own inheritance and passing several bad checks; Raffles promises his help but instead tricks Bunny into partnership in a burglary. It is clear to the reader that Raffles is not the friend he seems; even Bunny notices his “fiendish cleverness” in subtly persuading him to make their partnership permanent. To this suggestion of a satanic temptation are added allusions to magic: Bunny is “spellbound and entranced” during the burglary, so that “a fascination for [Raffles’s] career gradually wove itself into my fascination for the man.” Although Bunny realizes the criminality of his new career, he seems unable to free himself from Raffles’s spell. In fact, in “The Gift of the Emperor,” the final story of the first collection, Bunny earns an eighteen-month prison sentence for his loyalty to Raffles; by the time of the second set of stories, The Black Mask (1901), he himself states that he and Raffles are no longer amateur cracksmen but rather “professionals of the deadliest dye.”

THE BLACK MASK

This shift to professional crime follows logically from Hornung’s clear portrayal of Raffles’s less admirable side and its effect on Bunny; it is, however, not a complete shift. Hornung often redeems Raffles by presenting him as a patriot: In “A Jubilee Present,” he steals a gold cup from the British Museum only to send it anonymously to Queen Victoria, “infinitely the finest monarch the world has ever seen”; “The Knees of the Gods,” the final story of The Black Mask, concerns Raffles’s discovery of a military spy and concludes with his heroic death in the Boer War. On the other hand, many stories in this collection show a less sporting Raffles; in “The Last Laugh” and “To Catch a Thief,” for example, he is responsible for two murders and one more or less accidental death.

A THIEF IN THE NIGHT

Bunny, too, has become increasingly unscrupulous; in “The Spoils of Sacrilege,” a story from the final collection, A Thief in the Night (1905), he goes so far as to burgle his ancestral home. It might seem that the once-admirable Raffles would no longer be Bunny's hero, and in the prefatory note to A Thief in the Night, Bunny admits that the previous stories have "dwelt unduly on the redeeming side." Although some of these later stories, particularly "Out of Paradise," show Bunny attempting to portray Raffles at his worst, the final story again redeems his hero; "The Last Word" is a letter from Bunny's former fiancée, who broke her engagement in "Out of Paradise" as a result of Raffles's treachery, revealing that Raffles had later attempted to reunite them and asking Bunny to visit her. This promise of romance, seemingly out of character in a series of adventure tales, is actually a fitting conclusion to the Raffles stories, because it emphasizes the good-friend aspect always present but sometimes shrouded by his villainy.

THE CRIME DOCTOR

Overall, the character of Raffles poses for the reader a question Hornung asked in an earlier story:

One of Frederic Dorr Steele's illustrations for the 1914 edition of E. W. Hornung's The Crime Doctor.

"Why desire to be all one thing or all the other, like our forefathers on the stage or in the old-fashioned fiction?" The complexity suggested here continues in Hornung's last two mystery novels, Mr. Justice Raffles (1909) and The Crime Doctor. In the former, Raffles reminds Bunny that he is indeed a villain; this very recognition indicates, however, that his moral sense is more developed than that of his disciple. The Crime Doctor has as its hero a detective rather than a criminal, but John Dollar is more interested in preventing than in solving crime; like a novelist he admired, the darkly realistic George Gissing, Hornung is here concerned with the difficult social and financial position of England's new and growing educated class. In all of his mysteries, Hornung is clearly moving toward a more complex art than that of "old-fashioned fiction."

The Raffles stories were widely read in early twentieth century England, in part because a criminal with standards must have seemed significantly more admirable than the high-stakes gamblers surrounding the prince of Wales and in part as a relief from the horrors of the Boer War. Several films, beginning with a 1905 silent and reaching their high-water mark with the 1939 Raffles, testify to the character's continuing hold on the popular imagination; starring such romantic leading men as John Barrymore and David Niven, these films emphasize not only Raffles's daredevil charm but also his Robin Hood-like chivalry. Although accurate as far as it goes and interesting testimony to the power of one aspect of the stories, this film version of Raffles is significantly less complex than the Hornung's three-dimensional Raffles. His second creation, the reluctant thief Bunny, is equally engrossing. Like Holmes's Watson, Bunny serves as the foil to a unique character, as a less outré sidekick whose qualities are more accessible to the reader. Nevertheless, Bunny is in his way as complex as Raffles: sometimes plucky and sometimes a rabbit (hence his nickname), fascinated by his friend yet hampered by scruples. By witnessing Bunny's struggles of conscience, the reader is led to share his ambivalent admiration for Raffles.

Johanna M. Smith

Updated by Fiona Kelleghan

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

RAFFLES SERIES: The Amateur Cracksman, 1899 (also known as Raffles, the Amateur Cracksman); The Black Mask, 1901 (also known as Raffles: Further Adventures of the Amateur Cracksman); A Thief in the Night, 1905; Mr. Justice Raffles, 1909

NONSERIES NOVEL: The Crime Doctor, 1914

OTHER SHORT FICTION: Old Offenders and a Few Old Scores, 1923

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: A Bride from the Bush, 1890; Tiny Luttrell, 1893; The Boss of Taroomba, 1894; The Unbidden Guest, 1894; Irralie's Bushranger, 1896; The Rogue's March, 1896; My Lord Duke, 1897; Young Blood, 1898; Dead Men Tell No Tales, 1899; Peccavi, 1900; The Belle of Toorak, 1900 (also known as The Shadow of a Man); At Large, 1902; The Shadow of the Rope, 1902; Denis Dent, 1903; No Hero, 1903; Stingaree, 1905; The Camera Fiend, 1911; Fathers of Men, 1912; The Thousandth Woman, 1913; Witching Hill, 1913

SHORT FICTION: Under Two Skies, 1892; Some Persons Unknown, 1898

PLAYS: Raffles, the Amateur Cracksman, pr. 1903 (with Eugene W. Presbrey); Stingaree, the Bushranger, pr. 1908; A Visit from Raffles, pr. 1909 (with Charles Sansom)

POETRY: The Ballad of Ensign Joy, 1917; Wooden Crosses, 1918; The Young Guard, 1919

NONFICTION: Trusty and Well Beloved: The Little Record of Arthur Oscar Hornung, 1915; Notes of a Camp-Follower on the Western Front, 1919

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Butler, William Vivian. The Durable Desperadoes. London: Macmillan, 1973. Study of the representation of outlaws in literature. Bibliography and index.

Chandler, Frank Wadleigh. The Literature of Roguery. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1907. An early and influential study of Hornung and other picaresque portrayers of the rogue in fiction.

Green, Richard Lancelyn. Introduction to Raffles: The Amateur Cracksman. London: Penguin, 2003. In addition to this introductory commentary on Hornung's novel, Green supplied notes for this edition, which he edited.

Haining, Peter. Foreword to The Complete Short Stories of Raffles: The Amateur Cracksman. London: Souvenir Press, 1984. Haining, a scholar of pulp and detective fiction, offers important insights into Hornung's work.

Kestner, Joseph A. The Edwardian Detective, 1901-1915. Brookfield, Vt.: Ashgate, 2000. Hornung is compared to his fellow Edwardians in this tightly focused study of the British detective genre.

Orwell, George. "Raffles and Miss Blandish." In The Collected Essays, Journalism and Letters of George Orwell, edited by Sonia Orwell and Ian Angus. London: Secker and Warburg, 1968. Orwell, one of England's most famous authors and essayists, compares the moral landscape of James Hadley Chase's No Orchids for Miss Blandish with that of Hornung's Raffles stories.

Rowland, Peter. Raffles and His Creator: The Life and Works of E. W. Hornung. London: Nekta, 1999. Comprehensive biography and literary analysis that gives equal time to Hornung and to his most famous creation. Bibliographic references and index.

Watson, Colin. Snobbery with Violence: Crime Stories and Their Audience. 1971. Reprint. New York: Mysterious, 1990. A reception-based study of the crime genre, focusing on the attitudes of mystery readers and the methods employed by fiction to cater to and reinforce those attitudes.

GEOFFREY HOUSEHOLD

Born: Bristol, Gloucestershire, England; November 30, 1900

Died: Banbury, Oxfordshire, England; October 4, 1988

Type of plot: Thriller

CONTRIBUTION

Several of Geoffrey Household's thriller novels have earned critical acclaim as classic examples of this difficult genre. He sustained a specialized literary tradition identified for a generation after 1900 with such works as Joseph Conrad's The Secret Agent (1907) and John Buchan's The Thirty-nine Steps (1915) and Greenmantle (1916). Though Household by experience was a worldly man, the tone of his thrillers is chivalric. His heroes adhere to (or are notable for their deviations from) aristocratic codes of conduct with roots in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries: personal honor, "playing the game," respect for or empathy with one's opponents, individualism, "fair play," a rather quixotic personal bravery, and a keen appreciation, particularly in moments of danger, of people's reliance on nature. Avoiding the hard-boiled or socially commonplace characters favored by many authors of his day, Household modernized the nineteenth century's traditional tales of highly intelligent, educated, and cultivated individualists who became enmeshed in, and successfully met, deadly challenges.

BIOGRAPHY

Geoffrey Edward West Household was born Edward West on November 30, 1900, in Bristol, England, into an upper-middle-class family. His father, Horace West, was a prominent lawyer; his mother, Beatrice Noton, encouraged his interests in classical literature. During the war years, from 1914 to 1919, Geoffrey attended Bristol's famed Clifton College, from which he moved on to Oxford's Magdalen College. In 1922, he emerged from Magdalen with first-class honors in English literature.

He did not undertake full-time writing, however, until the mid-1930's. A friend who happened to be the son of the manager of the huge Anglo-Austrian, Romanian, and Greek financial consortium known as the Bank of Romania helped land him a post as an assistant confidential secretary. He subsequently spent four of what he described as delightful years learning Romanian and French and enjoying Romanian culture. In 1926, he took a post with the European branch of the United Fruit Company marketing bananas in Spain. In the process, he not only became fluent in Spanish but also found a setting for his children's story The Spanish Cave (1936)—or The Terror of Villadonga as it was first published—and for numerous other tales.

From Spain, Household (with his first wife, Elisaveta Kopelanoff, to whom he was married from 1930 to 1939) came to the United States with the intention of supporting his family by writing. The Great Depression, however, thwarted these plans, and he took a job as a junior editor for a children's encyclopedia, occasionally writing children's radio plays for the Columbia Broadcasting System.

Eventually, Household returned to business. Representing manufacturers of printers' inks, he traveled extensively in the United States, Central and South America, and the Mideast. These travels further deepened his cosmopolitanism, enabling him later to embellish his writings with a colorful sense—and a wide range—of persons and places.

During the mid-1930's, Household developed what proved a lifetime association with the Boston publishing firm of Atlantic, Little, Brown. Before the outbreak of war in Europe in 1939, they had published his picaresque novel The Third Hour (1937); Rogue Male came out two years later.

In 1939, Household joined British Intelligence, serving with distinction until 1945. His postings to the Balkans, Greece, Syria, Palestine, and Iraq were dangerous and challenging ones. His successes earned for him the rank of lieutenant colonel and numerous decorations. In these years, too, he acquired a firsthand feel for the critical confrontations that were to be a hallmark of his best stories.

In 1942, during the course of these adventures, he married his second wife, Ilona Zsoldos-Gutmán, with whom he had three children. After the end of the war, he turned to his writing, until his virtual retirement in 1977 to his home near Aylesbury in Buckinghamshire, England. He died in Banbury in 1988.

ANALYSIS

In his classic thriller Rogue Male, Geoffrey Household unwittingly provides one important key to the appreciation of his writings. “I am not content with myself,” his then-nameless hero proclaims. “With his pencil and exercise-book I hope to find some clarity. I create a second self, a man of the past by whom the man of the present may be measured.”

The quest for that clarity and for better gauges of “the man of the present” preoccupied Household in his stories. His education and maturation came during the devastations and disillusionments born of World War I and the profound economic, political, and social tumults of the years between the great wars: worldwide economic depression; the eruptions of Soviet communism, of fascism, and of National Socialism; widespread criticism of established capitalist practices and values in Great Britain and in the United States; the acceptance, superficially at least, of new personal mores; rejection of liberal individualism in favor of mass movements of one complexion or another; and the waning of traditional religions as a source of solace for many individuals in industrialized nations. Such transforming forces were the stuff of Household’s characters’ discourse in several novels (for example, The Third Hour), and in none of them are they absent from the background.

Although he was a cosmopolite, a man whose writings attest his wide tolerance, Household consistently projected values that harked back to those of Great Britain’s upper and middle classes during most of the nineteenth century. His eschewal of greed as an acceptable source of private motivation, however, prompted him to strip these classic liberal values as nearly as he could to their noble or aristocratic common denominators, particularly as they continued to be accented in England’s elite schools, colleges, and universities.

ROGUE MALE

These denominators, refined from the nineteenth century’s perceptions of Greco-Roman civilization, furnished a code of personal conduct that was chivalric. Nobility—which had little to do with one’s station or rank in life—was the central concept of this code. Not always easily definable—for example, as it applied to complex issues in love and war—the concept for Household certainly embodied the Englishman’s sense of fair play. It demanded “playing the game” in spite of the incompetence of one’s leadership, the failure of one’s friends, the deceptions and treacheries of one’s enemies, or the preponderance of unfavorable odds. It was undeniably quixotic, as exemplified by the hero of Rogue Male as he attempts a sportsman’s stalk and possibly the assassination of a dictator and then tries to survive against “all the cunning and loyalty of a first-class power” when its minions seek to kill him. Again, it is exemplified by Charles Dennim, hero of Watcher in the Shadows (1960), figuratively tethering himself like live bait for a tiger to foil a killer from his concentration-camp past, and by Claudio Howard-Wolferstan, seeking through half a dozen disguises to evade a misguided pursuit by Scotland Yard, his compatriots, and the Russians.

These chivalric elements clearly reflect Household's profoundly optimistic convictions, which he unhesitatingly expounds through his protagonists. "I myself," exclaims Howard-Wolferstan, "consider this earth upon which we are privileged to carry out our duties a most pleasurable dwelling place." He adds,

Let that be my assurance to those who flatter my colleagues and myself by supposing that we are not only able but resigned to effect destruction which the infinite dangers of a hostile cosmos have, since the birth of the planet, been inadequate to accomplish.

Though under deadly provocation, though physically or psychologically trapped, Household's principals cheat their expected fate by consciously reducing themselves to intelligent animality and then making shrewd use of nature's aid. Like an experienced naturalist, Household placed a high premium on people's nature-given powers of observation. Flights of birds repeatedly warn one hero of an enemy's presence. Angles of vision, light and shadow, minute changes in local flora and fauna, and natural camouflages all serve Household's desperate champions. One ingenious hero makes use of a dead cat's gut to string a primitive bow while trapped underground in his last refuge.

Rigorously clinging to their concepts of honor, playing the game against formidable odds, Household's principal characters differ markedly from their hard-boiled, cynical, often seedy counterparts, developed by a number of other thriller writers—Dashiell Hammett and Raymond Chandler, for example—in his generation. Household's figures are better educated, better advantaged, and more civilized in the face of crisis. They are men driven to extremes, but they are individual versions of Man Thinking. They are able by their own intellect—not by tediously following police procedures, by knowing the streets, by pumping snitches, by mastery of martial arts, or by excellence as marksmen—to penetrate the minds of their enemies and engage—somewhat like the great Sherlock Holmes—in deadly chess with them. They are more rational than reflexive, more intelligent than vulgarly tough.

Without being didactic or sententious, Household effectively transports his optimistic, liberal nineteenth century individualism—strengthened by his cosmopolitanism and enriched by his personal adventures—into the twentieth century. Though he wrote crisply and the threat of violence is ever present, his stories develop rather than explode on the reader. In the midst of a society that is fascinated by violence, Household handled plots of danger and suspense with the gentlemanly aplomb of a more genteel tradition—but, at his best, not less adventurously than his peers.

Clifton K. Yearley

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

RAYMOND INGELRAM SERIES: Rogue Male, 1939 (also known as Man Hunt); Rogue Justice, 1982

ROGER TAINE SERIES: A Rough Shoot, 1951; A Time to Kill, 1951

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Third Hour, 1937; Arabesque, 1948; The High Place, 1950; Fellow Passenger, 1955 (also known as Hang the Man High); Watcher in the Shadows, 1960; Thing to Love, 1963; Olura, 1965; The Courtesy of Death, 1967; Dance of the Dwarfs, 1968; Doom's Caravan, 1971; The Three Sentinels, 1972; The Lives and Times of Bernardo Brown, 1973; Red Anger, 1975; Hostage—London: The Diary of Julian Despard, 1977; The Last Two Weeks of Georges Rivac, 1978; The Sending, 1980; Summon the Bright Water, 1981; Arrows of Desire, 1985; The Days of Your Fathers, 1987

OTHER SHORT FICTION: The Salvation of Pisco Gabar, and Other Stories, 1938 (revised 1940); Tales of Adventurers, 1952; The Brides of Solomon, and Other Stories, 1958; Sabres on the Sand, and Other Stories, 1966; Capricorn and Cancer, 1981

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

SHORT FICTION: The Cats to Come, 1975; The Europe That Was, 1979

CHILDREN'S LITERATURE: The Spanish Cave, 1936 (also known as The Terror of Villadonga); The Exploits of Xenophon, 1955 (also known as Xenophon's Adventure); Prisoner of the Indies, 1967; Escape into Daylight, 1976

NONFICTION: Against the Wind, 1958

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Harper, Ralph. The World of the Thriller. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1974. Study of thrillers with particular attention to espionage and spy stories; provides insights into Household's work.

Hitz, Frederick P. The Great Game: The Myth and Reality of Espionage. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004. Hitz, the former inspector general of the Central Intelligence Agency, compares fictional spies to actual intelligence agents. Although Household is not directly mentioned, the work sheds light on his fiction.

Household, Geoffrey. Against the Wind. Boston: Little, Brown, 1958. Household's autobiography provides crucial insight into his life and work.

Kunitz, Stanley, and Howard Haycraft, eds. "Geoffrey Household." In Twentieth Century Authors. New York: H. W. Wilson, 1942. Household is one of 1,850 authors profiled in this massive work.

"Novelist Geoffrey Household." Newsday, October 7, 1988, p. 41. Obituary of Household sums up his life and career. Notes the popularity of Rogue Male.

Panek, LeRoy Lad. The Special Branch: The British Spy Novel, 1890-1980. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1981. Scholarly study of British espionage thrillers geared toward the nonscholar and written by a major critic in the academic study of mystery and detective fiction. Places Household's novels in perspective.

RICHARD HULL

Richard Henry Sampson

Born: London, England; September 6, 1896

Died: London, England; 1973

Type of plot: Inverted

CONTRIBUTION

Richard Hull's mysteries have won acclaim for their "acid bite," their originality, their brilliant viciousness, and their credible exposure of the human capacity for self-delusion. They are marked by resoundingly unpleasant characters who are totally self-convinced, egotistical, and amoral, yet fascinating. They bring a sense of fun and amusement to the mystery story, mingling the comic and satiric with the gruesome, thereby adding an extra dimension to the traditions of the genre. Hull enjoys breaking formulas and reversing expectations time and again within a single work, and his clever and effective use of the inverted pattern with a final narrative twist assures that anyone who has read only the first half of one of his novels will seldom be able to predict the second half.

In fact, the pattern Hull developed provides a highly successful model for imitators. Isaac Anderson of The New York Times calls Hull's books "subtle, skillful and unusual," while Will Cuppy calls for more mysteries by authors such as Hull, who writes with "the same kind of brains needed in other books—murderous fun of a high order."

BIOGRAPHY

Born Richard Henry Sampson in London in 1896, Richard Hull was the son of Nina Hull and S. A. Sampson. He attended Rugby College; though awarded a scholarship in mathematics on completing his studies there, he failed to enter Trinity College at Cambridge University because of the outbreak of World War I. He entered the army on his eighteenth birthday and received a commission. He served with an infantry battalion and the machine gun corps and spent three years in France. After the war, he remained on the active list of his original army battalion until 1929, when he formally retired. During that time, however, he joined a firm of chartered accountants, with whom he worked for several years. Although he passed his qualifying examinations in accounting, he was unsuccessful in establishing a private practice and turned to writing instead. He wrote his first and most famous novel, The Murder of My Aunt, in 1934, and thereafter published a book a year until 1941, when he began to release his work at a slower pace. He published fifteen novels in all, with the last appearing in 1953. When Hull wrote of himself, he relied on the third person, as in his letters to mystery critic and historian Howard Haycraft.

On September 1, 1939, Hull was recalled to service but was released as a major in July, 1940, because of his age. He next worked in the Admiralty as a chartered accountant, investigating costs of government contracts, until the mid-1950's. A lifelong bachelor, he lived in his London club until his death in 1973.

ANALYSIS

Richard Hull claims that his mysteries are imitative of the crime novels of Anthony Berkeley, particularly of Malice Aforethought: The Story of a Commonplace Crime (1931). They are indeed so in their reliance on a first-person narrator, their focus on the motives and mind of the murderer (the most villainous of whom shares the author's name), and their deadly wit. In many ways, however, his work has much more in common with the novels of Jim Thompson or Patricia Highsmith, though his is a British version of these writers' special brand of nastiness. At their best, Hull's works are unique. They draw the reader into their own amoral world of plots and counterplots, utilizing an intimate diary-confessional form whereby the villain talks directly and intimately to the reader, making the unreasonable sound reasonable and the murderous seem necessary.

The variation of point of view within the novels is skillfully handled. Hull excels at having his narrator report one person's story or reactions and then present the totally opposite position of another, giving the reader a strong sense of the self-delusions by which humans exist and of the difficulty of determining truth as events are filtered through a number of complex, conniving minds. The Murder of My Aunt is a tour de force at reversing perspectives, with the bulk of the novel from the point of view of the murderous nephew and the final chapter from the point of view of the aunt, the intended victim. My Own Murderer (1940) repeatedly provides multiple interpretations of the same action, interpretations that reveal the prejudices, obsessions, and values or lack of values of the various characters involved. Hull continually plays with the reader's perceptions, a fact that is evident from his titles. Several of the titles seem clear in their intent as one begins the work but take on a different meaning and texture as one concludes the book and realizes that the pronoun or the possessive has a second sense that fits the situation far more aptly than the more common meaning. Only in The Ghost It Was (1936) does Hull vary his narrative form, relying uncharacteristically and not so successfully on a third-person narrative.

In Hull's novels, there is no focus on clues, suspicions, or police procedures. When a police inspector or an amateur detective does appear, he is a peripheral figure, described in greatest detail only in the final chapter or chapters. He guesses about character and motive; although the narrator thinks that he understands far more fully than the detective possibly could, the irony of the ending is that the narrator (and the reader, who has shared his perceptions), is shown to have been partially, if not totally, wrong all along. Typical of Hull's distinctive manner is The Ghost It Was, wherein the detective enters the case solely to clear a ghost of a murder charge, and in an unexpected switch, the butler is a legitimate suspect. In most Hull mysteries there are no interviews of witnesses, and often there is no traditional suspense, in that the reader knows from the beginning who committed the first murder or who is attempting murder and why. There are often multiple murders, but each one is committed by a different murderer, with the motives for the second or third murder growing out of and interlocked with the first. The pleasure comes from the mental vagaries of the narrator, from his rational irrationality, from his self-revelations and prejudices, and ultimately from a final twist in which perspectives are reversed and the best-laid plans go awry.

Hull explores the total absence of guilt in his characters, who are highly individualistic and with pretensions to education, artistic sensibilities, or wisdom above their fellows, but who have all failed in the real world in some way: financially, socially, or morally. For them, others are but insects to be crushed, and those who would disapprove are maudlin sentimentalists. Hull's narrator, however, nevertheless appeals to the reader's sympathies, explaining the reasons for his unrest, distrust, or distress to show himself in the best light: as a person put on, taken advantage of, or abused in some way by others, who, as a result, seem from his jaundiced perspective to deserve death. Typical is the narrator of My Own Murderer: When a friend in need, though uninvited, thanks him for an egg, he informs the reader, "It was preposterous. I hadn't let him have it. He'd taken it as if it was Czecho-Slovakia, and nothing short of violence, which anyhow was impracticable, could have saved it." Later he confides,

When Mrs. Kilner had been explaining, apparently extremely inaccurately, her desire to humiliate Alan Renwick, to have him in her power and then make him feel it, to make him crawl to her and eat humble pie, I had understood exactly what she meant. I had never had the chance to do that to any human being and I should particularly enjoy doing it to Alan, although from many angles I quite liked him.

Still later, he admits that he would have dearly liked to have been Alan's dentist, "only that dentists in the end relieve pain."

Such characters tamper with car brakes, start fires, experiment with garden poisons, put morphine in drinks, and send friends or relatives to painful deaths without a second thought, indeed with resentment at the trouble the person is causing them, and with regret that they cannot be disposed of more simply. Almost always their goal is financial gain. Moreover, they gloat over their own cleverness in checking out and planning the details of their atrocities, and ignore the possibility of injury to innocent bystanders. Hull's characters are locked together in a strange mixture of like and dislike; at their most kindly they may be most dangerous, and at their most peevish they may be most charming. Ironically, however, convinced of their inherent superiority, his narrators are blind to their own limitations and weaknesses and cannot see major errors of judgment and action that damn them. In fact, when the view is reversed, the reader finds that others see through these narrators most easily, readily predict their future acts or unravel their past deeds, and know them for the scoundrels they are. Because part of the reader's pleasure comes from sharing the speaker's prejudices and plans (the reader is addressed so intimately), ultimately one must also share his guilt and both bemoan and enjoy his comeuppance, if there is one.

THE MURDER OF MY AUNT

The Murder of My Aunt sets the pattern for Hull's later works. His main narrator, a worthless layabout nephew who is sponging off the rich old aunt who has reared him, is fat, blond, homosexual, and spoiled, as are most of Hull's villains. He reads pornographic French novels, consumes sweets, is excessively precise about grammatical constructions, and dismisses most of what his aunt and her friends enjoy as rather crude and uncivilized, particularly if it involves physical labor or dirt. His lifetime has clearly been spent avoiding the lessons of British integrity, industry, and responsibility that his concerned aunt has endeavored to instill in him. When she, in their game of attack and avoid, pushes him a little too far (he must walk to town for his mail), he decides on deliberate and cold-blooded murder to free himself from her judgments and control and to gain for himself the money and estate on which he depends. He acts alone, except for his beloved Pekingese dog, which he calls the only friend he has in the world, but which he would cheerfully sacrifice to further his own interests. His diary reports step-by-step his leisurely plans, their execution and results, and the thousand fears and anxieties to which they make him prey, until the final twist at the end when both the narrator and the perspective shift, revealing the importance of point of view in interpreting reports.

MY OWN MURDERER

The works that followed The Murder of My Aunt explore the possibilities inherent in the inverted form. In My Own Murderer, an unscrupulous lawyer describes an elaborate conspiracy whereby he hopes to rewrite the will of and then murder a confessed mur-derer, making it first look like a contrived suicide to mislead the police and then like a genuine accident. When pawns in his game of death react unexpectedly, he is quite willing for an unwitting substitute to take his place and bear his death penalty. At the close of the work, he addresses the reader as the author of his own published confession. The confessor's name? Richard Henry Sampson.

OTHER WORKS

In a similar vein, A Matter of Nerves (1950) claims to be the diary of a murderer, reporting his method, his performance of the deed, and the aftermath, but keeping his identity a secret. Hull varies the point of view in Excellent Intentions (1938) by telling the story through a series of courtroom scenes and by inverting the psychology as well as the narration as the judge realizes the selfless motives of the murderer and the worthlessness of the victim. In Murder Isn't Easy (1936), the variation is based on the story of the murder of a company director being told from the different viewpoints of those most closely involved. The Murderers of Monty (1937) begins with an elaborate practical joke, a company formed to "murder" Monty, but one that backfires when a real murder results. Keep It Quiet (1935) also involves a not-so-funny joke that gets out of hand (the wife of a club chef placing perchloride of mercury in a bottle labeled "vanilla") and ends with blackmail as the club secretary tries to hide the disastrous results of her act: poison on the club's dinner table and double death thereby. The other works in Hull's canon are weaker in execution and lack the humor and originality of earlier works, though Last First (1947) attempts to surprise in the Hull tradition by placing its final chapter first.

SETTING AND TONE

Hull's settings are highly detailed and concrete and often depend on ironic contrast: a peaceful rural scene that hides mayhem, a sinister setting in which plans go awry and tragicomic bumbling ensues. The interaction of English villagers, their peevish and pranks and gossip good humor, details of gardening and mechanics, the daily activities of a small advertising agency, and the various methods for manipulating and changing legal documents are all presented with convincing verisimilitude. The description of the police interrogating witnesses in Invitation to an Inquest (1950) is particularly nasty.

There is a tragicomic tone to Hull's stories, with the quips and pranks witty in a British tradition. Burke Hare, in his introduction to the 1979 edition of The Murder of My Aunt, calls Hull "a true comic novelist." Indeed, the comic dominates: comic description, comic action, comic wordplay. The guide to Welsh pronunciation that opens The Murder of My Aunt is both learned and hilarious, and speeches like the following are typical:

I rather welcome seeing a little sentiment in you, Edward. In some ways you are a little hard; but you mustn't make a fool of yourself about So-so. Now, don't jump up like that and fly into a pet, just listen reasonably. No dog in this house ever has a tombstone. It was bad enough your making Evans dig up the garden for him; still worse when you made a sort of coffin and even conducted some kind of a burial service over him, from what I hear. That was bad enough, but I refuse absolutely to have a tombstone in the potatoes, and I absolutely and entirely refuse to have an epitaph beginning . . . "To darling So-so, his master's only joy. A victim of speed."

Usually the comedy results from witty repartee as characters with values alien to each other clash, from a character's blindness to his own absurdity (one trying to burn up his aunt and her home secretly, but ostentatiously carrying away a carload of personal valuables, clothes, hats, and favorite books), from objects that reveal personality, from unexpectedly juxtaposed details, or from acts that are taken to the extreme (reading through all the poisons in the encyclopedia in an effort to select the best one; pulling up various garden plants, hoping for a poisonous one, then rerooting them haphazardly and expecting no one to notice). Sometimes it results from the narrator's genuine distress at the behavior of friends or acquaintances, as when one irritatedly notes, "One does not expect one's friends to drop in in the middle of the night and mention casually after an hour or two's delay that they have committed murder that evening." Often the humor results from contrasting versions of the same story, as each character tries to hide his own feelings and motives and to blame others or obscure relationships.

A good Hull mystery, then, depends on a charming but unscrupulous narrator who amuses and provokes and makes murder seem the most natural and inevitable of acts. These well-written stories blend humor and erudition with unpredictable and fascinating plots to make the most gruesome of deeds somehow a pleasure to be savored, like a fine wine.

Gina Macdonald

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

NOVELS: The Murder of My Aunt, 1934; Keep It Quiet, 1935; Murder Isn't Easy, 1936; The Ghost It Was, 1936; The Murderers of Monty, 1937; Excellent Intentions, 1938 (also known as Beyond Reasonable Doubt); And Death Came Too, 1939; My Own Murderer, 1940; The Unfortunate Murderer, 1941; Left-Handed Death, 1946; Last First, 1947; Until She Was Dead, 1949; A Matter of Nerves, 1950; Invitation to an Inquest, 1950; The Martineau Murders, 1953

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Knight, Stephen Thomas. Crime Fiction, 1800-2000: Detection, Death, Diversity. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004. Broad overview of the important trends and developments in two centuries of detective fiction. Argues that the genre becomes more diverse in tone and narrative technique in the twentieth century. Provides perspective on Hull's works.

Morley, Christopher. Introduction to Murder with a Difference: Three Unusual Crime Novels. New York: Random House, 1946. Discusses Hull's The Murder of My Aunt, which is reprinted here alongside novels by Gerald Heard and Patrick Hamilton.

Peach, Linden. Masquerade, Crime, and Fiction: Criminal Deceptions. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2006. Extended study of the theme and portrayal of disguise and deception in mystery and detective fiction. Sheds light on Hull's novels.

Shibuk, Charles. Review of Last First in The Armchair Detective 8 (February, 1975): 140. Review looks at Hull's novel and analyzes its ability to stand the test of time.

_____. Review of The Murder of My Aunt in The Armchair Detective 8 (Summer, 1980): 250. Another retrospective review examines Hull's reception and contrasts it with his present reputation.

Slide, Anthony. Lost Gay Novels: A Reference Guide to Fifty Works from the First Half of the Twentieth Century. New York: Harrington Park Press, 2003. Contains a chapter analyzing The Murder of My Aunt with reference to its inclusion of gay characters.

ELSPETH HUXLEY

Born: London, England; July 23, 1907

Died: Tetbury, Gloucestershire, England; January 10, 1997

Types of plot: Police procedural; comedy caper; inverted; psychological; thriller

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Superintendent Vachell, 1937-1939

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTER

SUPERINTENDENT VACHELL is a Canadian police officer who has become head of the British Criminal Investigation Department in the imaginary African colony of Chania. His Canadianness is actually more nominal than real, something like the Belgian nature of Agatha Christie's Hercule Poirot, and is a device that allows him to be an outsider with a sense of detachment. He frequently gets into trouble with his superiors for his unorthodox ways, among them the abduction of a neighboring colonial governor, and he complains that the officials he has to interrogate do not treat him with respect. He often criticizes himself for errors in his investigations and frequently gets injured; in the course of the series he is beaten up by suspects, gored by a wounded buffalo, caught in the middle of a fire, pushed over a cliff in a car, shot at, and made to crash in an airplane. At the end of the series, he says that he is tired of police work and wants to quit.

CONTRIBUTION

What distinguishes Elspeth Huxley's crime novels is their focus on Africa, specifically on the British colonial experience in Africa. All but one of the novels is set in colonial Africa, and the one that is not features a character from Africa who keeps remembering his past and whose actions are motivated by what happened to him there. According to Huxley, her decision to write from the British point of view about Africa harmed her popularity because the intellectual fashion was to criticize British colonialism and express sympathy with native Africans. Nevertheless, her mysteries were generally praised, though her most popular work was not a mystery but her memoir of her childhood in Africa, The Flame Trees of Thika: Memories of an African Childhood (1959).

BIOGRAPHY

Elspeth Huxley was born Elspeth Josceline Grant in London in 1907. Her mother, Eleanor Lilian Grosvenor, was related to dukes and earls, and her father, Josceline Charles Henry Grant, also had connections to the British upper classes, but they had fallen on hard times and decided to move to British East Africa in 1912 to start a coffee plantation. Left behind for a year with a family friend in England, the six-year-old Elspeth joined her parents in Africa at the end of 1913. During World War I, Elspeth and her mother went back to England while her father fought in France, but Elspeth returned to Africa in 1920, to her parents' farm at Thika in what had just become known as Kenya.

In 1924 Elspeth returned to England to study agriculture at Reading University, after which she spent a year studying at Cornell University in upstate New York. After her return to England in 1928, she used her experience writing articles for the local press in Kenya to find work as a press officer for a marketing board. She met Gervas Huxley, a cousin of the writer Aldous Huxley, and they married in 1931, by which time Elspeth, now Elspeth Josceline Grant Huxley, had embarked on a career as a freelance journalist, specializing in articles on agricultural topics.

In 1933 Huxley was commissioned to write a biography of a leading white settler in Kenya, Lord Delamere, and it was published in 1935 as White Man's Country: Lord Delamere and the Making of Kenya. Work on this book required her to revisit Kenya, and during the rest of her life she made frequent visits there, both for research and to see her parents. Criticized for writing solely from the point of view of the white settlers in her first book, Huxley decided to write a novel focusing on black African characters: Red Strangers appeared in 1939 to much acclaim. While working on Red Strangers, Huxley tried her hand at mystery writing, producing the three volumes of her Superintendent Vachell series between 1937 and 1939. Huxley later said that mysteries were her favorite sort of book to write, but she grew tired of the Vachell series and turned to more literary fiction and to nonfiction about life in Kenya in the following two decades, including The Flame Trees of Thika and its sequel, On the Edge of the Rift: Memories of Kenya (1962). She also pursued an active career in journalism and broadcasting.

In 1959 Huxley was appointed to the government's Monckton Commission, which was investigating the future of the federated British territories of Rhodesia and Nyasaland (later to become Zambia, Zimbabwe, and Malawi). Her work on this commission earned her a Commander of the British Empire (the British honor of Commander of the Order of the British Empire) and also resulted in a comic mystery story, The Merry Hippo (1963). She had earlier returned to genre writing with The Red Rock Wilderness (1957), an adventure story about the search for a missing scientist in French Equatorial Africa. In 1964, Huxley published her last crime novel, A Man from Nowhere, a psychological study of a white settler from somewhere in Africa who has come to England to commit a revenge killing.

In later years, Huxley, saying that she and Africa needed to take a break from each other, turned to other subjects, producing a book on Australia, another on immigrants in England, a book on nature conservation and factory farming (Brave New Victuals: An Inquiry into Modern Food Production, 1965), and a series of biographies. She was at her best, however, writing about Africa, and won praise when she returned to that subject in her nostalgic study of colonial Kenya, Out in the Midday Sun: My Kenya (1985). In her final years Huxley turned once more to mystery fiction, beginning a novel set in an English village and tentatively titled “The Black Prince Murders.” However, she died before completing it.

ANALYSIS

The books in the Elspeth Huxley’s Superintendent Vachell series are generally regarded as skillful examples of mysteries from the Golden Age, illustrating the subgenres of the locked room mystery, the country house mystery, and the expedition or safari mystery. In all of them, much in the manner of Agatha Christie, Huxley gathers together a group of suspects and has her foreign detective explore their motives before revealing the identity of the murderer.

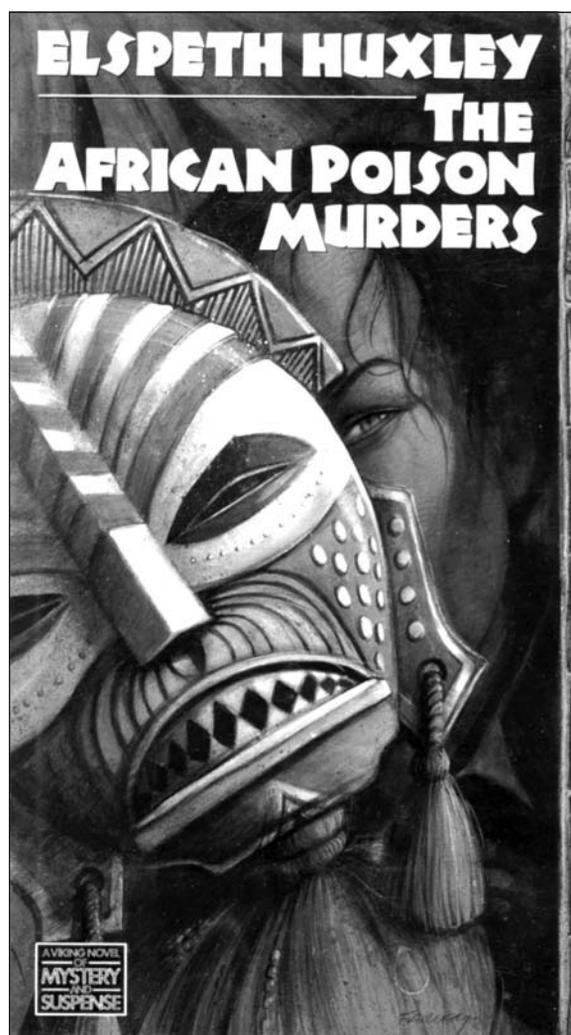

The books contain many twists and turns of plot, some more plausible than others, and more violence and blood than in the classic Christie mysteries, especially in Death of an Aryan (1939). There is conventional attention paid to timetables and the physical layout of the scene of the crime, and in Murder on Safari (1938) Huxley introduces the unusual technique of using footnotes at the end of the novel to refer readers back to passages earlier in the book containing clues to the solution.

The three series books maintain a certain detachment, in part through the use of an outsider as the detective and central figure, and in part through a certain lightness of tone, especially in the first two books. This lightness and detachment become comic in Huxley’s fourth and final completed mystery, The Merry Hippo, but detachment and comedy vanish in her grim psychological crime story, A Man from Nowhere.

Huxley’s detachment seems to reflect her point of view on things African. She presents Africans, white settlers, tourists, administrators, the press, and British politicians, and invites readers to find them all absurd in their own way. Fears of an African uprising turn out to be spectacularly absurd in the first Vachell book, when the true nature of the Africans’ secret society is revealed. Huxley seems ready to laugh at everyone, including the Nazis, an unfortunate misjudgment most notable when she has some characters in Death of an Aryan make jokes about imaginary poison gas piped in from Germany. Admittedly, the poison gas jokes were written before the horrors of the actual poison gas used by the Nazis became known. Similarly, the lighthearted dismissal of African uprisings was written long before the serious Mau Mau uprisings in Kenya began in the 1950’s, terrifying the white settlers, Huxley’s own mother included.

The fact that serious uprisings did occur and that the process of decolonization caused hardship to many white settlers may explain the grim tone of Huxley's last crime novel, which replaces detachment with what seems like identification with the vengeful Dick Herron and his cause, if not with his vengeful methods. It is true, however, that just a year earlier Huxley was more detached and comic than ever, in The Merry Hippo, but that book is notable for representing virtually all parties to developments in Africa except the white settlers. When dealing with visiting British politicians, the press, and African leaders Huxley could still laugh and satirize, but the plight of individual white settlers seems to have made her more serious.

Elspeth Huxley’s Death of an Aryan was published in the United States as The African Poison Murders. (ArKent Archive)

Even while laughing and constructing a murder mystery, Huxley could still be serious, and it is the distinguishing mark of her crime writing that it contains serious undercurrents about Africa, especially concerning the clash of British and African ways of life there. In her mysteries, she portrays the complexities resulting from the British intrusion into Africa, noting how African ways seem foolish to the British but that British ways may be equally foolish. Above all she notes the difficulties created by the British presence, the pressures put on native society, resulting in impossible dilemmas, displacement, corruption, and absurd attempts to imitate European ways. She even notes similarities between British and African attitudes, similarities that do not, however, mean the two cultures can easily work together. Beneath the laughter, therefore, may lurk a certain pessimism, just as, in one of her striking images in her comic The Merry Hippo, a vicious crocodile lurks beneath the placid surface of a pond, slowly killing all the frogs in it. In the end, as was suggested by critic Richard Smyer, perhaps Huxley found the mystery form too constraining as a vehicle for her serious thoughts, which may explain why she turned away from mystery writing and concentrated on writing nonfiction and literary fiction about the situation in Kenya and elsewhere in Africa.

MURDER AT GOVERNMENT HOUSE

In the first Vachell mystery, Murder at Government House (1937), Huxley tries her best to make her detective, Superintendent Vachell, seem Canadian, referring to Alberta, Montreal, and the Arctic, but mainly succeeds in having him sound like a caricature of an American private investigator, talking of "suckers" and "dames" and of suspects who tell him "plenty." She is more successful at constructing a locked-room puzzle in which it at first seems impossible for the murderer to have escaped from the scene of the crime.

It is for its exploration of African themes, though, that this novel has value, for instance in its discussion of the British attempt to suppress African witch hunting and the resulting difficulties this causes for African leaders who try to be loyal to their British rulers while at the same time maintaining the support of traditional tribal elders. Huxley even allows a character to suggest that the African witch hunting is an effective means of social control, little different from the methods of Scotland Yard, and she mocks the British administrator who thinks he can eliminate the African interest in witchcraft by introducing British sports.

In an interesting image, zebras and gazelles graze near an airport, indicating that perhaps the British and their modern technology can coexist with traditional Africa, though other parts of the book suggest otherwise.

The most astonishing part of this novel is the scene in which the British anthropologist, Olivia Brandeis, on a mission from Vachell to see if the Africans might have been involved in the murder he is investigating, stumbles across a meeting of the League of the Plaindweller. This is a African secret society whose very name strikes terror into the hearts of everyone who hears it, but what Olivia sees is a group of African men dressed up in European clothes, some of them in European women's clothes, imitating an English dinner party. Olivia feels she has stumbled onto an absurd but nightmarish scene out of Alice's Adventures in Wonderland (1865), and Huxley's point seems to be that the presence of the British conjures up these absurd imitations among the Africans.

A MAN FROM NOWHERE

In A Man from Nowhere, a departure from Huxley's usual detective fiction, the author takes us into the mind of Dick Herron, whose wife and brother have died horribly in Africa, and who has come to take revenge for this and for the loss of his farm on the person he holds responsible: Peter Buckle, a British government minister. It is interesting that he aims his anger at the British politician rather than at the African gang who killed his brother and drove his wife to suicide and which is now being granted power by the British. For Herron, the fault lies in England, not in Africa; he loves Africa, its landscapes, its climate, and its raw truth. England he derides as a tiny land of compromise, politeness, mists, and ambiguity that mask the same sort of cruelty that is more honestly expressed in Africa.

In effect, this novel is the cry of the displaced white settler wanting his Africa back, the Africa where whites were in charge and the Africans were obedient servants, an Africa that has been taken away less by the Africans than by liberal white politicians in England. Herron comes across as deranged, and Huxley, who in her later nonfiction writes of how it was necessary for the British to leave Africa, does not seem to be endorsing his criminal aims, and yet she does seem to sympathize with his plight.

Huxley also seems to sympathize with the view expressed in the novel that things are not as good as they once were. Oak beams and honest workers have given way to strikes and gambling; everything costs so much more than it used to; people have more money but are less happy; responsibility seems to be a thing of the past; and even the village fair is a pale imitation of its former self. When the villagers try to enact a naval scene from ancient Greece, their boats begin to leak. It is a sinking world that Huxley portrays in this pessimistic tale.

Sheldon Goldfarb

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

SUPERINTENDENT VACHELL SERIES: Murder at Government House, 1937; Murder on Safari, 1938; Death of an Aryan, 1939 (also known as The African Poison Murders, 1939)

NONSERIES NOVELS: The Red Rock Wilderness, 1957; The Merry Hippo, 1963 (also known as The Incident at the Merry Hippo, 1964); A Man from Nowhere, 1964

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: Red Strangers, 1939; The Walled City, 1948; A Thing to Love, 1954

NONFICTION: 1935-1950 • White Man's Country:

Lord Delamare and the Making of Kenya, 1935; East Africa, 1941; Atlantic Ordeal: The Story of Mary Cornish, 1942; Brave Deeds of the War, 1943; Race and Politics in Kenya: A Correspondence Between Elspeth Huxley and Margery Perham, 1944; Colonies: A Reader's Guide, 1947; The Sorcerer's Apprentice: A Journey Through East Africa, 1948; African Dilemmas, 1948; Settlers of Kenya, 1948

1951-1960 • Kenya Today, 1954; Four Guineas: A Journey Through West Africa, 1954; What Are Trustee Nations?, 1955; No Easy Way: A History of the Kenya Farmers' Association and Unga Limited, 1957; The Flame Trees of Thika: Memories of an African Childhood, 1959; A New Earth: An Experiment in Colonialism, 1960

1961-1970 • On the Edge of the Rift: Memories of Kenya, 1962 (also known as The Mottled Lizard); Forks and Hope: An African Notebook, 1964 (also known as With Forks and Hope); Back Streets New Worlds: A Look at Immigrants in Britain, 1964; Suki: A Little Tiger, 1964; Brave New Victuals: An Inquiry into Modern Food Production, 1965; Their Shining Eldorado: A Journey Through Australia, 1967; Love Among the Daughters: Memories of the Twenties in England and America, 1968

1971-1980 • The Challenge of Africa, 1971; Livingstone and His African Journeys, 1974; Flourish Nightingale, 1975; Gallipot Eyes: A Wiltshire Diary, 1976; Scott of the Antarctic, 1977

1981-1993 • Whipsnade: Captive Breeding for Survival, 1981; The Prince Buys the Manor: An Extravaganza, 1982; Last Days in Eden, 1984 (with Hugo van Lawick); Out in the Midday Sun: My Kenya, 1985; Peter Scott: Painter and Naturalist, 1993

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cross, Robert. "Elspeth Huxley: A Voice from the Flame Trees." The Guardian, January 13, 1997, p. 016. In this obituary, Cross reviews the life of Huxley, noting her love of farming, Africa, and writing. Briefly describes some of her writings.

Dawkins, Richard. "Out of the Soul of Africa: Readings." Financial Times, May 9, 1998, p. 05. Dawkins, an admirer of Huxley, discusses her work Red Strangers and her attitude toward Africa.

- Huxley, Elspeth. Out in the Midday Sun: My Kenya. London: Chatto & Windus, 1985. Describes Huxley's time in Africa when she returned there in 1933 as an adult. Sheds light on her thoughts and attitudes.
- Lassner, Phyllis. "Red Strangers: Elspeth Huxley's Africa." In Colonial Strangers: Women Writing the End of the British Empire. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2004. Disagrees with those who see Huxley's writings as colonialist or racist. Sees them as complex explorations of the British experience in Africa. Includes section on the three Vachell mysteries and also discusses A Man from Nowhere.
- Nicholls, C. S. Elspeth Huxley: A Biography. London: HarperCollins, 2002. Full account of Huxley's life and career, showing how important Africa, especially Kenya, was to her. Includes photographs, maps, genealogies, an index, and a bibliography.
- Russell, Sharon A. "Elspeth Huxley's Africa: Mystery and Memory." In Mysteries of Africa, edited by Eugene Schleh. Bowling Green, Ohio: Bowling Green University Popular Press, 1991. Emphasizes the importance of African settings in Huxley's mysteries as well as in her other writings. Also discusses the themes of modernization and the role of the past in her works.

I

MICHAEL INNES

John Innes Mackintosh Stewart

Born: Edinburgh, Scotland; September 30, 1906

Died: Surrey, England; November 12, 1994

Also wrote as J. I. M. Stewart

Types of plot: Police procedural; amateur sleuth; inverted; thriller; cozy

PRINCIPAL SERIES

John Appleby, 1936-1987

Charles Honeybath, 1974-1983

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

SIR JOHN APPLEBY first appears as a young police officer and eventually retires from the position of commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, Scotland Yard. Erudite, he is fond of literary allusions. Seemingly staid, he has an unconventional side, as is demonstrated by his marriage to Judith Raven, a sculptor from an unorthodox literary family.

JUDITH RAVEN APPLEBY first appears in Appleby's End (1945), when a chance encounter brings John Appleby to Appleby's End and Long Dream, the Ravens' ancestral home. Marriage to Judith, who acts as an amateur sleuth in her own right in A Connoisseur's Case (1962), provides John Appleby with an entrée to the English country homes that provide the settings for so many of Innes's mysteries.

CHARLES HONEYBATH is an aging member of the Royal Academy of the Arts whose forays into portrait painting for the aristocracy occasion the need for amateur sleuthing. Highly opinionated on the subjects of art and architecture, he may serve as a charmingly eccentric alter ego for Innes himself.

CONTRIBUTION

Michael Innes's major contribution to English mystery fiction was his wonderfully tongue-in-cheek propensity for turns of phrase that prove more intriguing and delightful than his contrivances of plot. The observations of his two principal sleuths, Sir John Appleby and Charles Honeybath, offer Jamesian dialogue, extraordinary erudition, and a gently critical portrait of the English upper class. Innes's brand of country-house skulduggery revealed his predilection for the intellectual with the sheer joy of excess. Although Innes's mysteries incorporate elements of many subgenres, including the police procedural, amateur detection, the thriller, and the inverted mystery, they were designed first and foremost for readers who have a greater appreciation for a tour de force of words replete with scores of literary allusions than for exciting twists and turns in the action.

In a career that spanned more than a half century, Innes constantly sought to expand the boundaries of detective fiction for his readers.

BIOGRAPHY

Michael Innes was born John Innes Mackintosh Stewart in Edinburgh, Scotland, on September 30, 1906, the son of a professor. Educated at Edinburgh Academy and Oriel College, Oxford University, the young Innes read literature, receiving first-class honors at his graduation in 1928 and winning the Matthew Arnold Memorial Prize in 1929. After spending a year abroad in Vienna, Innes received his first assignment for publication, the Nonesuch Press edition of John Florio's translations of Montaigne's essays, as well as an invitation to join Leeds University, Yorkshire, as a lecturer in English. He married a young medical student, Margaret Hardwick, in 1932; they had five children. In 1935, the twenty-nine-year-old Innes left Leeds to become jury professor of English at the University of Adelaide in South Australia. During the decade of his tenure there, he began to write the mysteries for which he is famous under the name Michael Innes.

On his return to the British Isles in 1946, Innes taught at Queen's University, Belfast, until, in 1949, he became a fellow of Christ Church, Oxford. It was at this time that he began publishing nonmystery short stories and novels as J. I. M. Stewart, his real name. His academic achievements, including critical studies of Thomas Love Peacock, Thomas Hardy, and William Shakespeare as well as biographies of Joseph Conrad and Rudyard Kipling, generated additional honors, including an appointment as the Walker-Ames professor at the University of Washington in 1961 and an honorary doctorate from the University of New Brunswick at Fredericton in 1962. Innes died in Surrey, England, in 1994.

ANALYSIS

Long after he had begun to enjoy fame as the mystery writer Michael Innes, an amused J. I. M. Stewart observed that it was an early English instructor's intentionally disparaging remark that led him to try his hand at detective fiction. As a young man, he had been castigated for having the sort of imagination associated with popular rather than serious novelists. Death at the President's Lodging (1936), renamed Seven Suspects in 1937 so as not to confuse an American audience, was written to amuse rather than to edify during Innes's long voyage from England to Australia, where he was to spend a decade teaching students about the "important" works of literature as jury professor of English at the University of Adelaide. The rapidity with which Innes put together a whodunit replete with the Jamesian characterization, genteel setting, and literary allusions for which he continues to be known offered early promise of an extraordinarily prolific and often-distinguished career.

DEATH AT THE PRESIDENT'S LODGING

Even a casual glance at Death at the President's Lodging suggests that it is not surprising that the work was published under the pseudonym Michael Innes. More than a traditional police procedural, this first novel is characterized by its humorous and often gently critical look at a variety of academic types. Those unable to appreciate adventure fiction by those of some popular reputation (as a student, Innes had been condemned for being too much like his favorite Kipling) would likely have looked askance at an academic who publicly made use of his position to satirize both his vocation and his colleagues. Sometimes criticized for its cumbersome mechanics (the plot hinges on the comings and goings of an eccentric group of dons through a minutely described academic quadrangle), Death at the President's Lodging makes clear from the outset that Innes is primarily concerned with exploring the possibilities inherent in language itself. The novel introduces John Appleby, a Scotland Yard police officer who matures, ages, and rises in consequence along with his creator and who may be presumed to act as a voice for Innes/Stewart. Quiet and unassuming, possessing not a hint of the flamboyant, Appleby charms the well-read reader with his erudition. He in fact injects a new kind of mystery into a time-honored format. To enjoy a typical Innes mystery, a reader must be able to recognize quotations from a variety of literary sources, discover irony in the use of place names, surnames, and titles, and find pleasurable a slow pace and formalities of vocabulary and phrasing evocative of the nineteenth century. Published in its final form in 1937, as Great Britain was once again on the brink of war, Death at the President's Lodging, as is true of most of Innes's subsequent efforts, casts an amused eye on the narrow concerns of a select group, one that manages to remain untroubled by world turmoil.

As Innes himself acknowledged in a piece written in 1964 for Esquire, his thrillers are less topical and more understated than typical examples of the genre; indeed, they are "of the quiet Missing Masterpiece order: very British, very restrained." Designed as entertainments, they purposefully limit a reader's attachment to any one character and scrupulously avoid dealing directly with specific and pressing social or political concerns. Mysteries, Innes holds, are not the place to explore complex motivations and make readers aware of deep psychological truths. They ought not aim at facilitating the formation of new values or prompting the rejection of old ones. Rather, they should be a source of intellectual exercise that can be enjoyed as a process and not as a means to an end.

Thus, Operation Pax (1951), praised highly for its thrillerlike characteristics, works, not because its underlying concerns are so clearly inspired by the growing nuclear menace in an increasingly divided world but because of its ability to engage an audience despite its continual lack of verisimilitude. Innes uses modern problems as a point of departure for his flights of pure fancy, not as a means to offer social or political comment. It does not matter that Innes offers no explanation for those key parts of the action that inevitably strain a reader's credulity. He does not want his admirers to develop a new worldview, but to take pleasure in wordplay, allusions, and skillful incorporation of elements of several fiction genres.

HAMLET, REVENGE!

Ultimately, the subject matter of Operation Pax and that of The Man from the Sea (1955) prove the exception rather than the rule. Innes's detective fiction generally revolves around academics in general and the humanities in particular. In Hamlet, Revenge! (1937), the murder takes place onstage in the midst of a performance of the play most central to Innes's own academic interests and training. The novel thus makes full use of the literary games that are in Innes's work, making them more central to an audience's enjoyment than the unraveling of the plot. Just as this novel's play-within-a-play invites the careful attention to language and the literary allusions that mark Innes's style, so do the later mystery novels that center on characters who write.

APPLEBY'S ANSWER

Appleby's End, The New Sonia Wayward (1960), and Appleby's Answer (1973) all feature central characters who, like Innes himself, write popular fiction. Priscilla Pringle, Sonia Wayward-cum-Colonel Folliot Petticare, and Ranulph Raven are every bit as idiosyncratic in their practice of the craft of writing as are the mad eccentrics who people those novels set in the surroundings most familiar to Innes: the university. Less self-indulgent than self-effacing, Innes's mysteries poke gentle fun at those, like himself, who are given to intellectual circumlocution. These are not mysteries that depend on heart-stopping action. In fact, in many of Innes's stories the mystery, murder, or theft on which everything ought to hinge is almost beside the point. For example, in Appleby's Answer, Miss Pringle's suspicions regarding Colonel Bulkington can never really be justified, for however villainous this would-be evildoer would like to become, he never quite achieves his aims. The petty blackmailer instead manages, just in the nick of time, to fall down a conveniently placed well before Innes has to provide his reader with a real plot. Important to note here is that Miss Pringle—perhaps an alter ego for Innes—has the same sort of overactive imagination that characterizes the melodramatic Catherine Morland in Jane Austen's Northanger Abbey (1818). Innes's style demands that such associations be made. His work is very genteel, very polite, very nineteenth century. The fact that Innes's academic pursuits involve the careful exegesis of Thomas Hardy, Henry James, and Joseph Conrad, among others, sheds light on the origins and development of his own literary style. In Innes's mysteries are combined the elliptical introspection inherent in a Jamesian character's speech, the intellectual precision of a Conradian description, and the amazing coincidences that mark any one of Hardy's plots. It is this playful application of scholarly knowledge and verbal virtuosity to a genre that pedants consider unworthy of their attention that ultimately makes Innes's huge body of detective fiction unique.

COMPONENTS OF INNES'S STYLE

In his creation of recurring characters—the peculiarly endearing John Appleby and the aging portrait painter Charles Honeybath—Innes has left an indelible imprint on the art of mystery writing. Their turns of phrase, their observations about art, architecture, and literature, evoke for readers—somewhat critically as well as somewhat wistfully—the manners, mores, and traditions to which academics cling. The world that provides the humble detective of Death at the President's Lodging with a knighthood, high office, and a comfortable retirement at Long Dream Manor is one in which the harsher realities of modern life scarcely ever intrude.

The world that Sir John chooses to investigate is peopled by delightfully peculiar remnants of the English aristocracy and their moneyed would-be usurpers. In this world, murder can be made fun; in this world, where, to quote Innes, “death is a parlor game,” bits of novelistic business need never be logical. Rather, they must recall and embellish an idea thought to have been “done to death” elsewhere. It is with some pride as well as with tongue in cheek that Innes, speaking of his theories of detective fiction, explains how his use of triplets in A Private View (1952) improves on the plots written around long-lost evil twins.

Innes’s pieces of detection sometimes prove to contain no mystery at all. The surprise in the early There Came Both Mist and Snow (1940) is that no one “dunit”; this novel not only plays on William Shakespeare’s comedy but also inverts the plot device of Agatha Christie’s Murder on the Orient Express (1934). In Carson’s Conspiracy (1984), the extraordinary turn of events is that the imaginary son is not imaginary at all (or is he?), suggesting shades of Edward Albee’s Who’s Afraid of Virginia Woolf? (1962). Such virtuosity has won for Innes a worldwide following among readers of mystery and detective fiction.

Jane Rosenbaum

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

JOHN APPLEBY SERIES: 1936-1950 • Death at the President’s Lodging, 1936 (also known as Seven Suspects); Hamlet, Revenge!, 1937; Lament for a Maker, 1938; Stop Press, 1939 (also known as The Spider Strikes); The Secret Vanguard, 1940; There Came Both Mist and Snow, 1940 (also known as A Comedy of Terrors); Appleby on Ararat, 1941; The Daffodil Affair, 1942; The Weight of the Evidence, 1943; Appleby’s End, 1945; A Night of Errors, 1947

1951-1960 • Operation Pax, 1951 (also known as The Paper Thunderbolt); A Private View, 1952 (also known as One-Man Show and Murder Is an Art); Christmas at Candleshoe, 1953 (also known as Candleshoe); Appleby Plays Chicken, 1956 (also known as Death on a Quiet Day); The Long Farewell, 1958; Hare Sitting Up, 1959

1961-1970 • Silence Observed, 1961; A Connoisseur’s Case, 1962 (also known as The Crabtree Affair); The Bloody Wood, 1966; Appleby at Allington, 1968 (also known as Death by Water); A Family Affair, 1969 (also known as Picture of Guilt); Death at the Chase, 1970

1971-1986 • An Awkward Lie, 1971; The Open House, 1972; Appleby’s Answer, 1973; Appleby’s Other Story, 1974; The “Gay Phoenix,” 1976; The Ampersand

Papers, 1978; Sheiks and Adders, 1982; Carson’s Conspiracy, 1984; Appleby and the Ospreys, 1986

CHARLES HONEYBATH SERIES: The Mysterious Commission, 1974; Honeybath’s Haven, 1977; Lord Mullion’s Secret, 1981; Appleby and Honeybath, 1983

NONSERIES NOVELS: From London Far, 1946 (also known as The Unsuspected Chasm); What Happened at Hazelwood?, 1946; The Journeying Boy, 1949 (also known as The Case of the Journeying Boy); The Man from the Sea, 1955 (also known as Death by Moonlight); Old Hall, New Hall, 1956 (also known as A Question of Queens); The New Sonia Wayward, 1960 (also known as The Case of Sonia Wayward); Money from Holme, 1965; A Change of Heir, 1966; Going It Alone, 1980

SHORT FICTION: Appleby Talking: Twenty-three Detective Stories, 1954 (also known as Dead Man’s Shoes); Appleby Talks Again: Eighteen Detective Stories, 1956; Appleby Intervenes: Three Tales from Scotland Yard, 1965; The Appleby File: Detective Stories, 1975

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS (AS J. I. M. STEWART): Mark Lambert’s Supper, 1954; The Guardians, 1955; A Use of Riches, 1957; The Man Who Won the Pools, 1961; The Last Tresilians, 1963; An Acre of Grass, 1965; The Aylwins, 1966; Vanderlyn’s Kingdom, 1967; Avery’s Mission, 1971; A Palace of Art, 1972; Mungo’s Dream, 1973; The Gaudy, 1974; Young Pattullo, 1975; A Memorial Service, 1976; The Madonna of the Astrolabe, 1977; Full Term, 1978; Andrew and Tobias, 1980; A Villa in France, 1982; An Open Prison, 1984; The Naylor’s, 1985

SHORT FICTION (AS J. I. M. STEWART): Three Tales of Hamlet, 1950 (with Rayner Heppenstall); The Man Who Wrote Detective Stories, and Other Stories, 1959; Cucumber Sandwiches, and Other Stories, 1969; Our England Is a Garden, and Other Stories, 1979; The Bridge at Arta, and Other Stories, 1981; My Aunt Christina, and Other Stories, 1983; Parlour Four, and Other Stories, 1986

RADIO PLAY: Strange Intelligence, 1947

NONFICTION (AS J. I. M. STEWART): Educating the Emotions, 1944; Character and Motive in Shakespeare:

Some Recent Appraisals Examined, 1949; James Joyce, 1957 (revised 1960); Eight Modern Writers, 1963; Thomas Love Peacock, 1963; Rudyard Kipling, 1966; Joseph Conrad, 1968; Shakespeare's Lofty Scene, 1971; Thomas Hardy: A Critical Biography, 1971

EDITED TEXTS (AS J. I. M. STEWART): Montaigne's Essays: John Florio's Translation, 1931; The Moonstone, 1966 (by Wilkie Collins); Vanity Fair, 1968 (by William Makepeace Thackeray)

BIBLIOGRAPHY

"Innes, Michael." In Mystery and Suspense Writers: The Literature of Crime, Detection, and Espionage, edited by Robin W. Winks and Maureen Corrigan. New York: Scribner's Sons, 1998. Details Innes's contributions to detective fiction and compares his work to that of other notable authors.

Jacobs, David L. "Photo Detection: The Image as Evidence." Clues: A Journal of Detection 1 (Fall/Winter, 1980): 18-32. Examines Innes's representation of photography and its importance to his work.

"Michael Innes." In Modern Mystery Writers, edited by Harold Bloom. New York: Chelsea House, 1995. Critical, scholarly examination of Innes's work and its place in the mystery-fiction canon. Bibliographic references.

Panek, LeRoy. "The Novels of Michael Innes." The Armchair Detective 16 (Spring, 1983): 116-130. Useful overview of Innes's work, written for fans of the genre.

Penzler, Otto, ed. The Great Detectives. Boston: Little, Brown, 1978. Argues for John Appleby's inclusion in the pantheon of literature's great detectives.

Roth, Marty. Foul and Fair Play: Reading Genre in Classic Detective Fiction. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1995. A post-structural analysis of the conventions of mystery and detective fiction. Examines 138 short stories and works from the 1840's to the 1960's. Sheds light on Innes's works.

Rzepka, Charles J. Detective Fiction. Malden, Mass.: Polity, 2005. This important entry in the cultural studies of police and detective fiction looks at the genre both as revealing of and influencing the cultures that produce it. Provides perspective on Innes's work. Bibliographic references and index.

Symons, Julian. "The Golden Age: The Thirties." In Mortal Consequences: A History, from the Detective Story to the Crime Novel. London: Faber and Faber, 1972. Places Innes in a lineage of crime-fiction writers, focusing on his role in the evolution of the genre in the 1930's.

J

W. W. JACOBS

Born: Wapping, England; September 8, 1863

Died: London, England; September 1, 1943

Type of plot: Thriller

CONTRIBUTION

W. W. Jacobs, at one time an extremely popular writer of short fiction, is remembered for only one tale, "The Monkey's Paw." His other stories and novels are entirely forgotten. Even the book in which "The Monkey's Paw" appeared, The Lady of the Barge, and Other Tales (1902), has long been out of print.

No one questions Jacobs's literary talent: His mystery and supernatural tales are brilliantly written. His stories of life on the docks and the waterways of England, despite some dated dialogue, remain witty and clever yarns. Even his dockside characters, Ginger Dick, Henry Walker, and Bob Pretty, are still attractive and enjoyable. Yet literary fashion has passed them by.

Jacobs was a master of the economical style. He never offers more than is necessary about the characters involved. V. S. Pritchett once called him "one of the supreme craftsmen of the short story." This high praise is deserved; unfortunately, to the interested reader only "The Monkey's Paw" is available for judgment. Nevertheless, in such a story as "The Interruption," a tale of a hidden crime, his mastery of plot is clear; no time is wasted. Jacobs added quality to the telling of the mystery story and sharply defined the "well-made tale" from the hastily written pulp story.

BIOGRAPHY

William Wymark Jacobs was born in Wapping, near London, on September 8, 1863. His father, William Gage Jacobs, was employed as a wharf manager on the docks at Wapping. His mother was Sophia Wymark. Young Jacobs spent his youth playing around the docks of Wapping, meeting many of the kinds of characters who would later appear in his dockside stories. The only respite from this somewhat wild existence was his holidays in Sevenoaks and East Anglia. He lived the life of a poor boy.

After attending Kirkbeck College, Jacobs entered the civil service in 1879 as a clerk. He was promoted in 1883 to the savings bank section, where he remained until 1899. While serving as a clerk, he began submitting sketches and occasional pieces to magazines. His opportunity came when The Strand Magazine accepted one of his stories in 1895. One year later, his first book, a collection of humorous sea tales entitled Many Car-goes, appeared, and thereafter he was able to issue nearly a book a year until 1914, when his production slowed. His first novel, A Master of Craft, appeared in 1900. His most famous work, "The Monkey's Paw," garnered considerable attention when it first appeared in 1902. A dramatic adaptation, a one-act play produced a few years later by Louis Napoleon Parker, also was received well. Nevertheless, by 1914 Jacobs began to weary of his creations, much as Sir Arthur Conan Doyle had reacted against his Sherlock Holmes series. Jacobs's later books show signs of strain.

A slightly built man, pale in complexion, and retiring, Jacobs was no literary lion. He avoided publicity, keeping to a small circle of friends, including the illustrator of many of his books, E. W. Kemble. Though for a time a most successful writer of stories, he never put on airs. Jacobs died on September 1, 1943.

ANALYSIS

The few stories of W. W. Jacobs that can still be discovered in tattered anthologies are so well written that it is a mystery why his stories, aside from "The Monkey's Paw," have been ignored. Those that deal chiefly with crime and the supernatural are written with great control and a polished élan; they belong to the “gilt-edged classics.” Unfortunately, Jacobs became associated with yarns about the dockside, with jolly longshoremen and nagging captains’ wives. He was best known during his heyday as a humorist. Indeed, Pritchett in his essay “W. W. Jacobs” classes him chiefly as a wit. Nevertheless, Pritchett also gives him credit as a storyteller, calling Jacobs’s plots superior to those “of a writer like O. Henry.”

In “The Monkey’s Paw” as well as in the little-known thriller “The Well,” Jacobs raises a genuine chill by underplaying the threat that lies ahead. In his crime stories, such as “The Interruption,” the plot twist always lies just around the corner, and the guilty, as well as the innocent at times, are brought low.

“THE INTERRUPTION”

Writing for The Strand Magazine was good training for Jacobs. There he honed his skill at alternating sophistication with popular style. His tales show careful plotting, a flair for dialogue, and a sly viewpoint. In “The Interruption,” which appeared in Sea Whispers (1926), Jacobs is at his best. Spencer Goddard is a man who, as the story opens, has just lost his wife. He is not grief stricken but relieved: “At the age of thirty-eight he had turned over a fresh page. Life, free and unencumbered, was before him.” His mood is largely the result of his having inherited a considerable amount of money from his wife.

The first doubt is planted when the maid Hannah becomes overattentive to Goddard’s comfort. She hints that she shares his “secret,” remarking, “there’s few husbands that would have done what you did.”

Then, step-by-step it is revealed that Goddard poisoned his wife. Hannah, who is in on the secret, begins making more and more demands: She wants complete control of the household and asks for a high wage—until Goddard decides that it is time to get rid of her. The reader now awaits the final twist of the plot, as Goddard tries to implicate Hannah, arranging matters to look as if she has been trying to poison him.

Delay was dangerous and foolish. He had thought out every move in that contest of wits which was to remove the shadow of the rope from his own neck and place it about the neck of the woman. There was a little risk, but the stake was a high one.

This sample of Jacobs’s prose displays his technique at its swiftest and most effective. The monosyllables perfectly fit the cool and deliberate thinking of the murderer about to commit another homicide.

Goddard’s plot is foiled, but not by any discovery. Instead, he is frightened by the apparition of his dead wife, which drives him out into the rainy night. As a result of his terrorized wanderings, he catches a fatal chill. This story belongs in any comprehensive anthology of suspense tales, but its last appearance was in the Third Omnibus of Crime, published in 1935.

“THE MONKEY’S PAW”

Dear to the heart of Jacobs was the story with the surprise ending—perhaps the reason that Pritchett compared his plots to those of O. Henry. In “The Monkey’s Paw,” the ending is cleverly built up over a number of pages, until the tension is almost unbearable. The reader is first introduced to the White family, father, mother, and son, in their cozy parlor. Outside, a cold and stormy night is ever present. The Whites live in a distant suburb, in a boglike environment.

Sergeant-Major Morris comes to visit. He shows them the monkey’s paw, a mummified thing of magical properties. Jacobs carefully and slowly builds on these powers. The paw’s owner, the soldier says, has three wishes.

“And did you really have the three wishes granted?” asked Mrs. White.

“I did,” said the sergeant-major, and his glass tapped against his strong teeth.

“And has anybody else wished?” inquired the old lady.

“The first man had three wishes, yes,” was the reply. “I don’t know what the first two were, but the third was for death. That’s how I got the paw.”

This excerpt shows the economy of Jacobs’s plot development. In a few lines of conversation the ominous threat of the paw is presented, without any elaborate description.

The skill with which the surprise ending is created in “The Monkey’s Paw” has never been imitated. This story is a unique example of complexity within simplicity.

“THE WELL”

Jacobs's other stories took somewhat longer to develop, and one notices in certain of these tales an overextension of effort. In “The Well,” a murder story with a supernatural twist, the presence of the murderer's beloved in the story, originally meant as a catalyst to the denouement, lingers on beyond any use for plot development. Nevertheless, the horror of the ending is sufficient to overcome this flaw.

Jacobs is a representative of the well-made-story school, which flourished in England during the early 1900's. Its members also included Saki and M. R. James. These were writers who could grip the reader from the first sentence to the last, whether in a ghost story or a murder narrative. Although Jacobs's work has fallen by the wayside—unjustly, it must be said—Saki's still lives on in anthologies, and James's ghost stories can be found in every supernatural anthology. Jacobs is a writer waiting to be rediscovered; more than a master of the horror story, he is also a fine mystery writer with a keen sense of suspense.

Philip M. Brantingham

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

SHORT FICTION: The Lady of the Barge, and Other Tales, 1902; Sea Whispers, 1926

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NOVELS: A Master of Craft, 1900; At Sunwich Port, 1902; Dialstone Lane, 1904; Salthaven, 1908; The Castaways, 1916

SHORT FICTION: Many Cargoes, 1896; The Brown Man's Servant, 1897; The Skipper's Wooing, 1897; Sea Urchins, 1898 (also known as More Cargoes); Light Freights, 1901; Odd Craft, 1903; Captains All, 1905; Short Cruises, 1907; Sailors' Knots, 1909; Ship's Company, 1911; Night Watches, 1914; Deep Waters, 1919; Snug Harbor, 1931, 1942; The Night-Watchman and Other Longshoremen, 1932; Cargoes, 1965; Selected Short Stories of W. W. Jacobs, 1975; “The Monkey's Paw” and “Jerry Bundler,” 1997

PLAYS: Beauty and the Barge, pb. 1904 (with Louis Napoleon Parker); The Ghost of Jerry Bundler, pb. 1908 (with Charles Rock); In the Library, pb.

1912 (with Herbert C. Sergent); A Love Passage, pb. 1913 (with Philip E. Hubbard); Keeping Up with Appearances, pb. 1919; Establishing Relations, pb. 1925; Master Mariners, pb. 1930; Matrimonial Openings, pb. 1931; Dixon's Return, pb. 1932; Double Dealing, pb. 1935

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adcock, Arthur St. John. The Glory That Was Grub Street: Impressions of Contemporary Authors. London: S. Low, Marston, 1928. Discussions of various writers associated with the bohemian literary scene of London's Grub Street, including Jacobs.

Adrian, Jack, ed. Strange Tales from the Strand. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991. Analyses of Jacobs's horror-fantasy “The Monkey's Paw” and a novella of psychological realism, The Brown Man's Servant.

Chesterton, G. K. “W. W. Jacobs.” In A Handful of Authors: Essays on Books and Writers, edited by Dorothy Collins. New York: Sheed and Ward, 1953. Compares Jacobs's humor to that of Charles Dickens and his farce to that of Aristophanes. Other contemporary humorists are found to be witty but without mirth. Jacobs finds jokes in “funny looking people” and their eccentricities. His stories mimic sailors' insults and the real speech of the British working class.

Cloy, John D. Pensive Jester: The Literary Career of W. W. Jacobs. Lanham, Md.: University Press of America, 1996. Extensive study of Jacobs's professional ups and downs as a writer. Includes bibliographical references and index.

James, A. R. The W. W. Jacobs Companion. Southwick, West Sussex, England: A. R. James, 1990. Provides an overview of Jacobs's work and guides to approaching it.

Jascoll, John, ed. The Monkey's Paw: A Facsimile and Transcript of the Original Manuscript. Lancaster, Pa.: Hazelwood Press, 1998. Includes a facsimile reproduction of Jacobs's manuscript, a transcript, analysis, and four other essays on Jacobs and his work. An invaluable resource.

Priestley, J. B. “Mr. W. W. Jacobs.” In Figures in

Modern Literature. London: John Lane, The Bodley Head, 1924. Praises Jacobs's careful plotting, comic dialogue, and memorable characterizations, which are portrayed as models for aspiring short-story writers.

Pritchett, V. S. "W. W. Jacobs." In Books in General. New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1953. Argues that Jacobs's depiction of a "world at its moment of ripeness and decline" makes him a "supreme craftsman of the short story."

BILL JAMES

James Tucker

Born: Cardiff, Wales; August 15, 1929

Also wrote as David Craig; Judith Jones; James Tucker

Types of plot: Police procedural; hard-boiled; espionage

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Colin Harpur and Desmond Iles, 1985-
Simon Abelard, 2001-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

COLIN HARPUR is a detective chief superintendent in an unnamed British seaport. He has an affair with the wife of another detective, Desmond Iles, and his own wife is murdered, leaving him to raise two precocious daughters. His much younger, student girlfriend, Denise, occasionally stays with him, to the delight of Harpur's daughters. Despite being large and loutish, resembling a boxer, Harpur possesses the wit and irony Iles lacks and performs his investigative tasks more ably.

DESMOND ILES, assistant chief constable, is Harpur's boss and adversary, constantly bringing up Colin's affair with his wife, to whom he reconciled. A debonair ladies' man, Iles is drawn to much younger women, including Harpur's teenage daughters. To maintain some degree of peace in his city, Iles arranges for an understanding between the rival criminal gangs who control the local drug trade. Because of Chief Mark Lane's weak, ineffectual leadership, Iles essentially runs the department. Supremely confident, Iles is quick to pounce on the failings of his subordinates, while confessing his need to be loved by everyone.

CONTRIBUTION

Bill James is best known for his long-running Colin Harpur and Desmond Iles series. These books are unusual because they pay almost as much attention to the criminals as to the police, with both good and bad guys sharing characteristics, including a belief in self-improvement through higher education. James has said that he is equally interested in both sides of the law and that his novels are about the impossibility of controlling crime through conventional methods. He has cited George V. Higgins as the main influence on his work, calling The Friends of Eddie Coyle (1972) the greatest crime novel ever. Both writers share an interest in gritty urban settings and realistic, though playful dialogue.

The Harpur and Iles books are essentially exercises in mood and style, with James's dialogue a distinctive blend of that of Raymond Chandler, Elmore Leonard, David Mamet, and especially Harold Pinter. His characters develop an almost-music-hall-like patter reminiscent of early Pinter plays. Although many prominent mystery and detective writers are highly productive, James is one of the few to have increased productivity and improved quality after turning fifty.

BIOGRAPHY

Bill James was born James Tucker in Cardiff, Wales, on August 15, 1929, to William Arthur Tucker and Violet Irene Bushen Tucker. He grew up in Cardiff's Grangetown section, and his father's relatives lived in the dockland area known as Clarence Bridge. William Tucker worked on a sand dredger, traveling in and out of Cardiff, and his son spent his holidays aboard. Later, as a journalist, James used Clarence Bridge as an occasional pseudonym, and many of his novels are set in Cardiff docks. James graduated from the University of Wales (then University College, Cardiff) in 1951 and was a flying officer in the Royal Air Force from 1951 to 1953. He married Marian Craig on July 17, 1954. Their children are Patrick, Catherine, Guy, and David.

Young James knew he wanted to be a writer, and when he saw in a career guidance book that the minimum weekly wage for London reporters was nine guineas (fifty cents), a lavish salary at the time, he decided to become a journalist. He was a reporter for Cardiff's Western Mail in 1954-1956 and for London's Daily Mirror in 1956-1958. James has said that the terse, tabloid style of the Daily Mirror was a major influence on his fiction.

James returned to South Wales in 1958 and worked as a freelance journalist, contributing to such publications as New Society, Punch, The Spectator, and The Sunday Times. In addition to articles and fiction, James wrote radio plays and radio and television documentaries. He was a part-time tutor at the University of Wales beginning in 1968. He received a master's degree in English from that institution in 1974, and his thesis was published as The Novels of Anthony Powell (1976). The influence of the author of A Dance to the Music of Time (1951-1975) can be seen in James's use of irony and in his creation of characters who continue throughout a series of novels.

James began his fiction-writing career by trying literary fiction, works that he has said are best forgotten, moved to espionage novels when the works of John le Carré and Len Deighton became popular during the 1960's, and turned to crime in the 1970's, writing under his own name and the pseudonym David Craig, from his wife's maiden name and the name of his youngest son. He revived the name of Craig in the 1990's for novels set on the Cardiff docks and returned to espionage with the Simon Abelard series beginning with Split (2001), featuring a black intelligence agent. James also had two series featuring women, police officer Sally Bithron, writing as Craig, and private investigator Kerry Lake, writing as Judith Jones.

ANALYSIS

Bill James's Colin Harpur and Desmond Iles series is remarkable for leaving so many loose ends dangling at the conclusion of each novel. Part of James's approach is that he is writing not only individual books but also one giant novel in which the events in one book have ramifications in a later work. In some cases, the two protagonists, Harpur and Iles, receive equal attention. In others, one is more prominent than the other. In some, the villains overshadow the veteran police officers, though James does not glamorize or romanticize criminals. No matter how well dressed or how many adult education courses they complete, they remain ruthless thugs.

According to James, he does not strive for realism, preferring to create a stylized universe with some realistic touches. This approach makes the often unusual events facing his police have a dreamlike logic. In addition to the setting, the time is also vague, with none of the characters ever getting any older. All the events seem to be occurring in an eternal present.

Throughout the Harpur and Iles series, James favors the down-to-earth Harpur over the rather pompous Iles. However, the assistant chief constable is never a caricature, the target of easy irony. Charming and smart, though not as smart as he likes to think, Iles is a fully realized creation. He and Harpur, the Everyman, together represent a single complex and flawed personality. Both make mistakes. Each is aware of at least some of his flaws. They have a superficial resemblance to Colin Dexter's Inspector Morse and Sergeant Lewis and to Reginald Hill's Dalziel and Pascoe, especially the adversarial relationship of the latter.

The best crime fiction, as with Chandler, Leonard, Ross Macdonald, Ruth Rendell, Adrian McKinty, and many others, is highly literary. James's novels stand out for downplaying many genre conventions, especially the significance of plot. Although each Harpur and Iles book has a basic premise, James uses it merely as a starting point to delve more deeply into character and mood. Not only are some crimes not fully resolved, but also the police often carry on the most perfunctory of investigations. "Villains will be villains" seems to be the police officers' philosophy, and as long as the criminals kill each other and not the general populace, everything is under control. Though James has been called the darkest, least optimistic of British crime writers, he is sympathetic to but amused by the variety of human foibles adrift in his corrupt milieu. He has also been termed grimly jocular.

James loves giving colorful names to his criminals. Minor thugs are known as Sashsaying Vernon and Mildly Sedated. One ironically called Tenderness Mellick is especially vicious. Panicking Ralph Ember remains a crime boss despite his well-known tendency to become easily flustered. Cohorts even call him Panicking to his face.

Central to James's style are allusions to popular culture, especially films. Panicking Ralph Ember frequently mentions his resemblance to the young Charlton Heston. After a season of French films, Iles has his hair cut in the manner of Jean Gabin. Such references underscore how both police officers and criminals are constantly aware of role-playing.

Some of James's touches sneak up on readers. Not only are the Harpur and Iles tales full of young women, but also everyone, both police officers and criminals, seem to have daughters instead of sons. Each is paternalistic yet lecherous toward the daughters of others.

Although some crime writers excel at descriptive passages and are weak on dialogue, or vice versa, James is a master at both. Each entry in the series offers several tour-de-force segments as well as hilarious speeches by both the police and the criminals. Many conversations between Harpur and Iles feature a series of short, cryptic statements like those made by characters in a Pinter play. At other times, the pair will talk lengthily at cross-purposes, with the statements of each having little to do with what the other is saying. Two criminals even get into a semantic debate over the different meanings of apparent.

Although the unspecified urban locale of the Harpur and Iles series resembles Cardiff, the docklands of the writer's hometown are the specific setting of the series about police officers Dave Brade and Glyndwr Jenkins, begun with The Tattooed Detective (1998). The Brade and Jenkins books deal with how such matters as urban redevelopment and organized crime intersect, again with a thin line between the upholders of the law and those who break it. James resurrected his David Craig pseudonym for this series, cited as one of the highlights of the Welsh noir developing in the 1990's.

Beginning with Hear Me Talking to You (2005), the Sally Bithron novels are another Cardiff police officer series. Both Sally and Assistant Chief Constable Esther Davidson use their work to escape from domestic woes. In both the Bithron and Brade and Jenkins books, London criminal gangs try to overpower the Cardiff criminal world. In Split, the first Simon Abelard novel, a British spy bored after the collapse of European communism becomes a drug dealer. The second Abelard book, A Man's Enemies (2004), focuses on the infighting within British intelligence caused by former officers' memoirs. Because Abelard is of mixed race—the product of a Welsh mother and a Jamaican father—he is constantly uncertain of his status within the intelligence community.

James is best known for his Harpur and Iles novels. Although this series has had a greater impact than his other fiction has, its success gives him the freedom to try other characters and settings.

PAY DAYS

In Pay Days (2001), James draws a parallel between the rivalry of Harpur and Iles and that of criminal bosses Ralph Ember and Mansel Shale. These villains ostensibly cooperate with each other, though both secretly plot each other's downfall. As Ember and Shale conspire to cover up the murder of a drug dealer and the police pursue the truth about the case, more killings result.

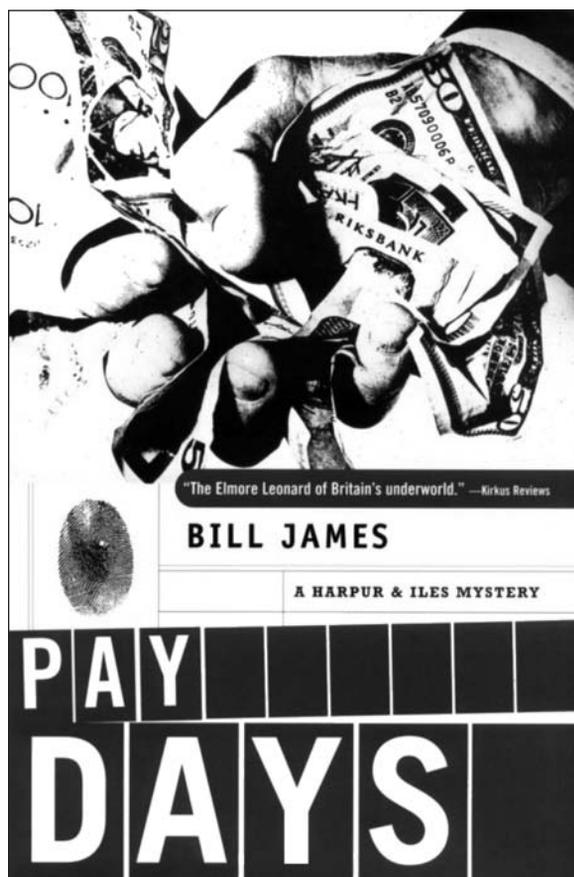

Pay Days is full of distinctive James touches. Harpur's daughters question his professional ethics. Shale thinks quoting from the film The Godfather (1972) makes him seem more worldly and threatening. Aspiring to respectability, Ember becomes involved in environmental causes and protests when his daughters' exclusive private school drops Latin and Greek. A politician blames the fiction of Martin Amis and the films of Quentin Tarantino for the moral confusion of the educated class.

THE GIRL WITH THE LONG BACK

In The Girl with the Long Back (2003), to protect Louise Machin, an undercover female officer who has infiltrated drug lord Ferdy Dubal's gang, Harpur and his primary informant, Jack Lamb, kill two of Ferdy's enforcers. As is typical of James's indirect approach to narrative, these killings occur offstage. Harpur does not have to work hard to cover up his crime because no one, including Ferdie, cares too much about two more dead villains. Harpur must, however, keep Iles from discovering too much because the undercover operation was conducted without the approval of the assistant chief constable.

Then Wayne Rideout, Iles's main informant, is murdered, and the assistant chief constable becomes obsessed with Fay-Alice Rideout, the victim's beautiful daughter, whose education, first at an exclusive school and then at Oxford, is underwritten by the police. The much smarter Fay-Alice seems to enjoy encouraging Iles's attention, while not taking him that seriously. Toward the end of the novel, the focus shifts from Harpur, Iles, Louise, and Fay-Alice to the bubbling rivalry among the gangs. Just as Iles desires, the criminals settle scores by killing one another.

SPLIT

The title, Split, is a metaphor for Simon Abelard's ethnic, professional, and emotional status. Uncomfortable as a spy because he can never be sure whether his superiors see him as a token black, Abelard finds his usual duties suspended while he attempts to locate Julian Bowling, a colleague who has gone missing with at least nine million dollars in drug money.

As Abelard tracks Bowling to France, he discovers he is suspected of being in league with the fugitive. After falling for Lucy, Bowling's bisexual girlfriend, Abelard begins to wonder whether he is a spy, an officer, or a criminal. Matters are further complicated by the actions of his immediate superior, Verdun Cadwallader, a fellow Welshman. Though the Abelard titles have more straightforward narratives than the Harpur and Iles series, James still provides his offbeat humor, especially with Cadwallader's cocky viciousness and Abelard's eccentric mother.

Michael Adams

PRINCIPAL MYSTERY AND DETECTIVE FICTION

ROY RICKMAN SERIES (AS CRAIG): The Alias Man, 1968; Message Ends, 1969; Contact Lost, 1970

STEPHEN BELLECROIX AND SHEILA ROATH SERIES (AS CRAIG): Young Men May Die, 1970; A Walk at Night, 1971

COLIN HARPUR AND DESMOND ILES SERIES: You'd Better Believe It, 1985; The Lolita Man, 1986; Halo Parade, 1987; Protection, 1988; Come Clean, 1989; Take, 1990; Club, 1991; Astride a Grave, 1991; Gospel, 1992; Roses, Roses, 1993; In Good Hands, 1994; The Detective Is Dead, 1995; Top Banana, 1996; Panicking Ralph, 1997; Lovely Mover, 1998; Eton Crop, 1999; Kill Me, 2000; Pay Days, 2001; Naked at the Window, 2002; The Girl with the Long Back, 2003; Easy Streets, 2004; Wolves of Memory, 2005; Girls, 2006; The Sixth Man, and Other Stories, 2006

DAVE BRADE AND GLYNDWR JENKINS SERIES (AS CRAIG): The Tattooed Detective, 1998; Torch, 1999; Bay City, 2000

KERRY LAKE SERIES (AS JONES): Baby Talk, 1998; After Melissa, 1999

SIMON ABELARD SERIES: Split, 2001; A Man's Enemies, 2004

SALLY BITHRON SERIES (AS CRAIG): Hear Me Talking to You, 2005; Tip Top, 2006

NONSERIES NOVELS (AS TUCKER): Equal Partners, 1960; The Right-Hand Man, 1961; Burster, 1966; Blaze of Riot, 1979; The King's Friends, 1982

NONSERIES NOVELS (AS CRAIG): Up from the Grave, 1971; Double Take, 1972; Bolthole, 1973; Knifeman, 1973; Whose Little Girl Are You?, 1974; A Dead Liberty, 1974; The Albion Case, 1975; Faith, Hope, and Death, 1976

NONSERIES NOVELS: Forget It, 1995; The Last Enemy, 1997; Double Jeopardy, 2002; Middleman, 2003; Between Lives, 2003

OTHER MAJOR WORKS

NONFICTION: The Novels of Anthony Powell, 1976

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gould, John A. "Harpur, Iles, and the Shadow of Anthony Powell." The Boston Globe, July 4, 2004, p. 8. Notes similarities between Anthony Powell's A Dance to the Music of Time and James's Harpur and Iles novels, particularly The Girl with the Long Back. Gould argues that the relationship between Powell's Nick Jenkins and his nemesis Widmerpool is the model for James's antiheroes.

James, Bill. Interview by Anthony Brockway. <http://homepage.ntlworld.com/elizabeth.ercocklly/bill.htm>. Excellent interview in which James discusses his Cardiff upbringing, his journalism career, his attitude toward crime fiction, and his literary influences.

Lenzer, Steve. "Crime and Punishment." Review of Naked at the Window, by Bill James. The Weekly Standard 8, no. 41 (June 30, 2003): 31. Lengthy review examines not only the individual work but also James's Harpur and Iles series, noting that the novels differ from the traditional detective novel in that many lack neat endings.

Pederson, Jay P., and Taryn Benbow-Pfalzgraf. St. James Guide to Crime & Mystery Writers, 4th ed. Detroit: St. James Press, 1996. A short overview of James's work, including a brief interview.

Scaggs, John. Crime Fiction. New York: Routledge, 2005. Contains chapters on police procedurals and hard-boiled detective fiction, including variants on these subgenres, which gives a context for understanding James's unusual approach.

P. D. JAMES

Phyllis Dorothy James

Born: Oxford, England; August 3, 1920

Types of plot: Police procedural; private investigator

PRINCIPAL SERIES

Adam Dalgliesh, 1962-
Cordelia Gray, 1972-

PRINCIPAL SERIES CHARACTERS

ADAM DALGLIESH, a Scotland Yard inspector, eventually commander, is a widower. He is a sensitive and cerebral man and a poet of some reputation. His wife and son died during childbirth. As a police officer, Dalgliesh enforces society's rules, giving himself a purpose for living and some brief respite from his feelings of loss and devastation.

CORDELIA GRAY, an optimistic, outgoing, and good-natured young woman (temperamentally, the exact opposite of Dalgliesh), unexpectedly falls heir to a detective agency and, thereby, discovers her vocation. Occasionally, she becomes the protagonist of a novel and Dalgliesh assumes a supporting role; a friendly rivalry exists between them.

CONTRIBUTION

P. D. James's novels are intricately plotted, as successful novels of detection must be. Through her use of extremely well-delineated characters and a wealth of minute and accurate details, however, she never allows her plot to distort the other aspects of her novel. In this meticulous attention to detail, James writes in the tradition of Gustave Flaubert, Leo Tolstoy, and the nineteenth century realists. She is the acknowledged master of characterization among contemporary mystery writers. She also creates a very powerful sense of place. Because the characterizations and setting of a James novel are so fully explored, it tends to be considerably longer than the ordinary murder mystery. This fact, along with Dalglish's increasingly distant presence in the midst of so many other deeply nuanced and compelling characters, accounts for what little adverse criticism her work has received. Some critics have suggested that the detail is so profuse that the general reader may eventually grow impatient—that the pace of the narrative is too leisurely. These objections from a few contemporary critics further attest to James's affinity with the novelists of the nineteenth century. Quite a few of her novels have been adapted for television, with as much fidelity to the depth and psychological complexity of the original works as possible.

BIOGRAPHY

Phyllis Dorothy James was born in Oxford, England, on August 3, 1920. She attended Cambridge High School for Girls from 1931 until her graduation in 1937. Prior to World War II, she served for a time as assistant stage manager at the Festival Theatre, Cambridge. She worked during the war as a Red Cross nurse and also at the Ministry of Food. She married Ernest C. B. White, a medical practitioner, on August 8, 1941, and was widowed in 1964. She has two daughters.

In 1949, James commenced a long career in the civil service. She was a principal administrative assistant with the North West Regional Hospital Board, London, until 1968, when she became a senior civil servant in the Home Office. From 1972 until her retirement in 1979, she served in the crime department. James is a Fellow of the Institute of Hospital Administrators. Although writing has been her full-time occupation since 1979, she has also served as a London magistrate.

P. D. James. (Courtesy, Allen & Unwin)

James's first novel, Cover Her Face, did not appear until 1962, at which time the author was past forty years of age. Nevertheless, she quickly attained recognition as a major crime novelist. A Mind to Murder appeared in 1963, and with the publication of Unnatural Causes in 1967 came that year's prize from the Crime Writers' Association. James denies that her decision to write under her maiden name preceded by initials only was an attempt to disguise her identity as a woman. Clearly, she was aware of the sexual ambiguity of the name P. D. James, but she points out, quite correctly, that detective fiction is a field in which women, writing under their own names, have long excelled. Agatha Christie and Dorothy L. Sayers—two writers to whom James is often compared—are masters of the genre. On reaching the age of seventy-seven, James added a work to the memoir field, much to the delight of her readers.

ANALYSIS

Cover Her Face is the exception that proves the rule—the rule being, in this case, that P. D. James eschews the country weekend murders of her predecessors, with their leisure-class suspects who have little more to do than chat with the visiting sleuth and look guilty. Cover Her Face is set in a country house where a servant is murdered. The suspects are the inhabitants of the house and their guests from the city, who are attending an annual fete on the grounds. A detective from the outside, Adam Dalgliesh of Scotland Yard, is called in to sort through the clues and solve the crime. This superficial description of the novel makes it sound very much like many an Agatha Christie story, and in her first book James may have felt more comfortable treading familiar literary ground. James has said, however, that comparisons of her to Christie are basically unwarranted. She likens herself more to Dorothy L. Sayers in the light of her greater interest in personality and motivation than in the crime puzzle itself.

James was from the very beginning a writer of great restraint. She almost never allows herself the luxury of self-indulgence. The old saw that first novels are largely autobiographical seems to apply to Cover Her Face in one detail only. The master of the house is bedfast, and his wife, daughter, and an old housekeeper have for a long time attended him lovingly and selflessly. James's own husband was an invalid for many years before his death. After Cover Her Face, James turned to another kind of setting for her novels.

A MIND TO MURDER

